Fourthly, the Words of St. Hilary which follow this Letter, have no Connexion with the Contents of it, and plainly shew, That he refers to a quite different Letter: The Words are these; (Is not this a very Holy Letter? What does it contain in it that proceeds not from a Spirit full of the Fear of God? But Potamius and Epictetus, desiring to condemn the Bishop of Rome, as is said in the Synod of Ariminum, would not obey him; and though Fortunatianus sent this Letter to many Bishops, he lost his labour.) Now is it credible that St. Hilary should so commend a Letter that contained the Condemnation of St. Athanasius? What he adds, does yet more clearly prove what we have said, and confirm our Opinion. (They would rather prejudice their own Interests, and hazard all, than refuse Communion to St. Athanasius, or reflect upon the Authority of the Council of Sardica, which had absolved him. The Egyptians wrote to Liberius, that he should maintain Communion with St. Athanasius, as they had formerly written to Julius, to desire him, that he would restore him to it.) These Words plainly discover, that Liberius had not Excommunicated St. Athanasius, since the Egyptians do not desire him, as they had formerly done Julius, to restore him to Communion, but only to maintain Communion with him. Qualis ad Julium pridem de reddenda exulanti Communione, talis nunc, ut de subjectis intelligitur, datæ sunt de tuenda.

Liberius.

Fifthly, Liberius himself is a Witness, That he never Excommunicated St. Athanasius. For in his Letter to Lucifer, where he gives an Account of what happened about the Cause of this Saint, at the Beginning of his Pontificate, he says, that the Bishops of the East had written Letters against him, that he had not suppressed them, as he was accused, but had read them in Council, and yet gave no Credit to them: Queis fidem & sententiam non commodavimus nostram: (Which we did neither believe nor approve) because he at the same time received Letters from 75 Bishops of Egypt, in behalf of St. Athanasius. Does not this plainly shew, That the Letter which we now speak of, was none of Liberius's, since it supposes, that he believed the Letter from those of the East, and Excommunicated St. Athanasius?

Sixthly, if Liberius had Excommunicated St. Athanasius at the beginning of his Pontificate, would not the Officers of Constantius have alledged this as a Reason to make him subscribe to his Condemnation? And how could he have maintained so stoutly as he did, That the Church of Rome had always held him innocent?

Seventhly, Tho' Liberius should have concealed or suppressed this Letter, while he was of St. Athanasius's Party; yet would he not have produced it immediately after he had signed against him? For then he could have no Interest to conceal it, but on the contrary, was obliged to publish it: And yet even then he confesses, that he was always of St. Athanasius's side. (Because Julius my Predecessor of happy Memory, received St. Athanasius into his Communion, I was afraid, lest I should have passed for a Prevaricator, if I should have condemned him; but as soon as I understood that you had justly condemned him, I followed your Judgment.) Does not this plainly shew, that Liberius did not condemn St. Athanasius at the beginning of his Pontificate, but that on the contrary, he did always protect him, upon the Authority of his Predecessor?

Lastly, There are some Expressions in this Letter, that were not used till after Liberius's time.

Liberius. From all which, I conclude it to be falſe, that Liberius did write this Letter, or Excommunicate St. Athanaſius. On the contrary, immediately after he was exalted to the Pontificate, he wrote to him a Letter of Communion. The Biſhops of the Eaſt wrote to him againſt this Saint, and thoſe of Egypt for him. He read their Letters in a Synod, where 'twas decreed that Communion muſt be continued with St. Athanaſius, as it had always been in the Weſt. This happened towards the end of the year 352, or at the beginning of 353, before the Defeat of Magnentius. After the Death of this Tyrant, Conſtantius convened a Council at Arles. Liberius ſent thither Vincentius of Capua, in his Name, together with Marcellus a Biſhop in Campania, and gave them Order to entreat the Emperor, That he would call a Council at Aquileia. Theſe Biſhops were ſo far from being ſtedfaſt, that they ſuffered themſelves to be impoſed upon, and ſubſcribed to the Condemnation of St. Athanaſius, together with all the other Biſhops of the Council, excepting only Paulinus Biſhop of Triers: Liberius underſtanding this, ſent Lucifer Calaritanus, with Pancratius a Prieſt, and Hilary a Deacon, to carry a Letter to the Emperor Conſtantius, wherein after he had given an Account of what we have already ſaid concerning every thing that had been done ſince the beginning of his Pontificate, in the Cauſe of St. Athanaſius, he prays him to order the Examination of this Affair in a free Council, upon Condition that they ſhould begin with confirming the Nicene Creed. He gave to the ſame Deputies a Letter of Recommendation, addreſſed to Euſebius Vercellenſis; and indeed, he wrote two other Letters to him, one of Recommendation, and another of Thanks. About the ſame time, he wrote alſo to Oſius, and other Biſhops concerning the Lapſe of Vincentius of Capua. Immediately after, the Council of Milan, held in the year 355, which was not more favourable to St. Athanaſius, than that of Arles had been before. Liberius wrote an elegant Letter to Euſebius Vercellenſis, Denys and Lucifer then in Baniſhment, wherein he praiſes them for their Conſtancy, and teſtifies to them, That he was ready to ſuffer the ſame Perſecution for the ſame Cauſe. He ſays, he knew not whether he ſhould be grieved for their Abſence, or rejoyce for their Glory; which he obſerves to be greater than that of former Martyrs, becauſe theſe ſuffered only the Torments of their Pagan Perſecutors, but they endured the Injuries of their falſe Brethren. He prays them to aſſiſt him with their Prayers, That God would give him Grace to bear with Patience and Conſtancy, the Tryals that he was threatned with. And indeed, a little after, Conſtantius perceiving that there was none almoſt left but Liberius, who juſtified the Innocence of this Saint, and deſiring to confirm his Condemnation by the Authority of the Biſhop of Rome, ſent an Eunuch thither, who urged him to ſubſcribe to the Condemnation of St. Athanaſius to no purpoſe; for all the Anſwer he could get from him, was, That he ſhould call a free Council in ſome place, that was diſtant from the Court, where there ſhould be neither Guards nor Officers; That this Council ſhould begin with making a Profeſſion of the Faith, as it had been explained in the Council of Nice; That it ſhould drive away all the Arians, and anathematize their Error, and then afterwards ſhould examine the Cauſe of St. Athanaſius. Liberius. The Emperor having received this Anſwer, ſent an Order to the Governor of Rome, to ſurprize Liberius, and ſend him to Court; which Order was executed. And when he was in the Emperor's preſence, he ſpoke to him with no leſs Conſtancy, than he had done at Rome to his Eunuch. We have his Anſwers in Theodoret, in B. II. of his Hiſt. Ch. 16. wherein he diſcovers an unconceivable Firmneſs of Mind, in refuſing to ſubſcribe to the Condemnation of St. Athanaſius. Conſtantius objected to him, That he had been condemned by all the World; and, ſays he, You are the only Biſhop in the World, that juſtifies an impious Diſturber of the Peace; to which he anſwered with great Conſtancy, Tho' I were alone, yet the Cauſe of Faith is nevertheleſs good, for at another time there were found but three young Men that diſobeyed the Orders of the King. After this, he prayed him, that he would call a Synod, but withal deſired, That before they ſhould proceed to examine St. Athanaſius's Cauſe, he would make all the Biſhops ſubſcribe the Nicene Creed. Conſtantius being enraged againſt St. Athanaſius, as ſuppoſing him the Cauſe of that Enmity which his Brother Conſtans had againſt him; Liberius, as to this, anſwered him wiſely, You ought not, Sir, to make uſe of Biſhops, to revenge your Quarrels; for the Hands of Eccleſiaſticks, ought not to be employed, but only to bleſs and to ſanctify. At laſt, Conſtantius threatning him with Baniſhment; I have already, ſays he, bid adieu to my Brethren at Rome, for the Eccleſiaſtical Laws are to be preferred before my Living there. Three Days time were given him to conſider of it, and becauſe he did not change his Opinion in that time, he was baniſhed two Days after to Berœa, a City of Thrace. The Emperor, the Empreſs, and the Eunuch Euſebius, offered him Money to bear the Expence of his Journey, but he refuſed it, and went away chearfully to the place of his Baniſhment. The Clergy of Rome having loſt their Head, took an Oath to chooſe no body in the Room of Liberius, as long as he was alive: But Conſtantius, by the Management of Epictetus, Biſhop of Centumcellæ in Italy, procured one Felix a Deacon to be ordained Biſhop, who was himſelf alſo one of them that had ſworn not to chuſe a Biſhop in the Room of Liberius. St. Jerome, ſays, That Acacius had a hand in this Ordination. St. Jerome and Socrates accuſe this Felix of Arianiſm; but Theodoret and Ruffinus, ſay, That he was not an Arian in Doctrine, but only communicated with that Party. However, all the Ancients agree, That this Ordination was not lawful (a); and ſome late Authors, are very much to be blamed for putting this Man in the Catalogue of Popes, and yet they have far leſs Reaſon to place him among the Holy Martyrs in very many Martyrologies (b).

But Liberius, who had given Proof of ſo great Conſtancy in time of Peace, could not long endure the Tediouſneſs of Baniſhment; for before he had been two years in it, he ſuffer'd himſelf to be over-perſwaded by Demophilus Biſhop of that City, to which he was baniſhed, and did not only ſubſcribe the Condemnation of St. Athanaſius; but he alſo conſented to an Heretical Confeſſion of Faith (c); whether it was the

(a) However, all the Ancients agree, That this Ordination was not lawful.] St. Athanaſius, in his Epiſtle to thoſe that lead a Monaſtick Life; ſays, that he was ordained in the Palace without the Conſent of the People, or the Election of the Clergy, by Epictetus, in the Preſence of three Eunuchs, and three Biſhops, who were rather Spies than Biſhops; that the People would not permit him to enter into the Church, and withdrew themſelves from his Communion. St. Jerome ſays that he was an Antipope. Optatus and St. Auſtin in the Catalogue of Popes, make no mention of Felix, but place Damaſus immediately after Liberius. And certainly Liberius being a lawful Biſhop, another could not be ordained in his Room. And whereas 'tis ſuppoſed, that after his Lapſe he fell from his Biſhoprick; This can never make the Ordination of Felix valid, which was null from the Beginning: Beſides Liberius was not depoſed after his Fall, but on the contrary was always acknowledged as a lawful Biſhop, and continued in the Poſſeſſion of his See with the Conſent of all the Biſhops of the Catholick Church.

(b) They have far leſs reaſon to place him among the Holy Martyrs in very many Martyrologies.] His Feſtival is kept on Auguſt 4th. Mombritius was the firſt that publiſhed his Life, and after him Baluſius put forth a more correct Edition of it. There was a Diſpute about the Sainthip of Felix, among the Correctors of the Roman Martyrology in the time of Gregory; and 'tis ſaid, there was then found an old Inſcription in the Church of St. Coſmus and St. Damian, expreſſed in theſe Words: The Body of St. Felix Pope and Martyr, by whom Conſtantius was condemned. But the Life of this Felix, and theſe Monuments are Apochryphal: For, firſt they ſuppoſe that Conſtantius put him to Death; But 'tis evident by the Teſtimony of Marcellinus the Presbyter, that Felix ſurvived Conſtantius. 2. How could it poſſibly be, than neither St. Athanaſius, nor Hilary, nor Lucifer, &c. nor any other of the Ancients ſhould ever ſpeak one Word, either of the Condemnation of Conſtantius by Felix, or the Martyrdom of this Pope? 3. The Acts of Mombritius relate, that Conſtantius was condemned for being twice baptized by Euſebius of Nicomedia; But 'tis manifeſt from the Teſtimonies of St. Hilary and St. Lucifer, that Conſtantius was a Catechumen, and was not baptized till about the latter end of his Life, by Euzoius, as St. Athanaſius relates in the Book of Synods. The Authority of theſe Martyrologies is of little worth, as well as that of Anaſtaſius the Library-Keeper. The Inſcription found in the Church of St. Coſmus, and St. Damian is an Argument of little weight.

(c) Conſented to an Heretical Confeſſion of Faith.] Baronius and many others maintain, that he ſubſcribed only the firſt Creed of Sirmium which was not Heretical: But if this had been ſo, St. Hilary who approved this Creed, had never called that which was ſigned by Liberius, The Perfidiouſneſs of the Arians, and anathematized Liberius ſo often upon the Account of his Subſcription. St. Jerome ſays alſo, that Liberius was forced to ſign Hereſie, and all the Ancients ſpeak of the Fall of Liberius, as the Approbation of the Hereſie of the Arians, which made Faber, Blondel and Petavius think that Liberius ſubſcribed the ſecond Creed of Sirmium. But this Opinion has its Difficulties, for St. Hilary ſays, that the Creed ſigned by Liberius was compoſed by 22 Biſhops, which were for the moſt part Eaſtern; and that the ſecond Creed was made by Potamius and the Weſtern Biſhops. Baſil is reckoned among thoſe that approved the firſt, and condemned the ſecond Creed of Sirmium aſſoon as it appeared. In ſhort, Liberius returned not from his Exile, till after the Council of Ancyra; in which, the Eaſtern Biſhops had already thrown out the ſecond Creed of Sirmium. What Probability is there then, that they ſhould offer it to him to ſign? To anſwer theſe Difficulties and clear up this Matter, we muſt obſerve, that Demophilus cauſed Liberius to ſign or approve a Creed while he was in Exile, different from that which he ſigned after his Return to Sirmium; that the Creed which Demophilus preſented to him, was made at Sirmium by many Biſhops, quæ, ſays Liberius in his Letter, Sirmiumi à pluribus Fratribus, & Conſcis noſtris tranſlata & ſuſcepta eſt: Words which can be underſtood of none, but the ſecond Creed of Sirmium, which begins thus; Cum nonnulla paterentur eſſe de fide diſceptatio, diligenter omnia apud Sirmium tractata ſunt & diſcuſſa, præſentibus ſanctiſſimis Epiſcopis: And therefore we muſt ſay, that the Creed which Liberius approved in his Exile was the ſecond of Sirmium: For Demophilus was an Arian, and of the Party of Uſtacius and Valens, who maintained the ſecond Creed of Sirmium. It was for this Reaſon that Eudoxius and Aëtius ſpread a Report that Libe-

First

Liberius. First or Second Confession of Sirmium, is disputed among the Learned. Whichsoever 'twas, he did certainly write one Letter of Communion to the Bishops of the East, wherein having declared St. Athanasius to be cast out of his Communion, and acknowledged his Approbation of that Confession of Faith which Demophilus presented unto him, he desires them to use their Interest and Prayers with the Emperor, to obtain his Deliverance from Banishment, and Restauration to that Church which God had entrusted him with. He wrote also at the same time two Letters, which contained for the most part the same things, one to Ursacius and Valens, and the other to Vincentius of Capua; which are preserved amongst the Fragments of St. Hilary.

After these Letters, Liberius quickly obtain'd his Desires; for the Emperor being satisfied, sent immediately for him to come to Sirmium, where he found Deputies of Bishops from the East and from the West. There was held a kind of a Council, which made a Collection of all the Creeds that had been approv'd by the Semi-Arians, wherein the Son was declar'd like unto the Father in Substance. These Creeds Liberius was oblig'd to sign, and then was sent back to Rome, with a Letter from the Synod directed to Felix, importing that Liberius and he should govern the Church of Rome as Co-partners. But Liberius was no sooner return'd thither, but Felix was forc'd to depart, and when afterwards he endeavour'd to return by Force, he was driven away with disgrace.

Now Liberius seeing himself in peaceable Possession of his See, as he had Subscrib'd against his will to the Condemnation of St. Athanasius, and the Creeds of the Arians, so he quickly repented of what he had done, made Profession of the Nicene Creed, and reconcil'd himself to St. Athanasius. He wrote one Letter to all the Bishops of the World in the Year 362, wherein he would have all those Bishops pardon'd, who through surprize, had approv'd of the Error of the Arians; but he absolutely Anathematizes the Heads of their Party, and those that would not return from their Error. This Letter is set down in the Fragments of St. Hilary. At last the Semi-Arians seeing themselves overpower'd by the Anomœans, who had more Interest in the Emperor Valens, had recourse to Liberius, and sent to him, in the Year 366, Eustathius of Sebaste, together with Sylvanus and Theophilus Bishops of Cilicia, who presented him with Letters from the Council of Lampsacus: Liberius at first would not receive them, because, he said, they were of Arius's Faction; but they perswaded him that they would retract that Error, and profess that the Son is perfectly like his Father, and of the same Substance; yea, they made Profession of the Nicene Creed it self: approv'd the word Consubstantial, and condemn'd the Creeds of Ariminum and Seleucia. Liberius having exacted of them these Declarations, wrote into the East in their favour; and he died within a little time after in the Year 366 (d). The History which we have now given of Liberius, informs us of the number of Letters that were written by this Pope, as well as the time, the occasion and subject of every one of them: And therefore it will be sufficient here to give a Catalogue of them, and to mark out those that are falsly attributed to him; and in doing of it, we shall follow the Order that is observ'd in the 2d. Volume of the last Edition of the Councils. Liberius.

The 1st. is that which was written to Hosius upon the Lapse of Vincentius of Capua, publish'd by Baronius, and taken from a Manuscript in the Vatican. This appears to me to be Genuine, and agrees with the History of that time.

The 2d. is a Letter to Constantius, at the End of Lucifer's Works, and in the Fragments of St. Hilary.

The three following to Eusebius Vercellensis, are taken out of the Acts of this Bishop, and appear to me to be Antient.

The 6th. to the Confessors in Exile, is in the Fragments of St. Hilary, and in the Acts of which we have spoken already.

The 7th. which was written to the Eastern Bishops after he had sign'd against St. Athanasius, is taken out of the Fragments of St. Hilary, and is very Genuine.

The 8th. is that which is suppos'd to have been written to those in the East, immediately after his Advancement to the Pontificate, wherein he declares St. Athanasius Excommunicated: But we have shewn that 'tis very doubtful, though it is in the Fragments of St. Hilary.

The 9th. written to Ursacius, to Valens, and Germinius, and the 10th. to Vincentius of Capua, from the place of his Banishment, after he had sign'd, are Genuine, and taken out of the Fragments of St. Hilary.

The 11th. written to the Bishops of Italy after the Council of Ariminum, is unquestionable, and is preserved in the same place.

The 12th. which is a Confession of Faith addressed to St. Athanasius is Supposititious, as we have already prov'd when we discours'd of the Works of that Father, among which it occurs.

The 13th. which is suppos'd to be that which Eustathius and the other Deputy-Bishops from the East, obtain'd of Liberius, and presented to the Synod of Tyana, agrees very well with the History of that time.

The 14th. and 15th. ought to be rank'd among those Letters that are forg'd by Isidore; and are rejected by all the Criticks.

The three Decrees attributed to this Pope, have not any respect to the Discipline of his time, nor have they any Authority.

The Conference (e) which he had with Constantius and Epictetus, is preserved by Theodoret, B. II. of his Hist. Ch. 16. and was by him drawn out of the Antient Acts written in Liberius's time.

The Stile of Liberius is Simple and without Ornament, but strong and clear. His Conduct unblameable, if he had not suffer'd himself to be overcome by the Love which he had for the City of Rome, and his Church: But he made amends for that Fault by the Constancy which he shew'd after his Return.

rius was of their Opinion, and Liberius himself wrote to Ursacius and Valens, that he was of their Judgment; but being afterwards called to Sirmium, where he found Basil of Antyra, Eleusius, and the other Semi-Arian Bishops, who a little before had condemned the Arians in the Council of Ancyra, he and those other Bishops signed a Book, which contained the Creeds of Antioch, the first of Sirmium, and those other Creeds that asserted the Son to be like unto the Father, and were obliged to condemn those that said he was unlike to him. See Sozomen B. IV. ch. 14. of his Hist. Nevertheless it may be objected, That the second Creed of Sirmium was not made by Basil and the other Eastern Bishops; but that which was presented to Liberius by Demophilus, was made by these Bishops as we are assured by the Fragments of Hilary. To this I know of no other Answer but by saying, that the Names of these Bishops were added by the Author who made these Extracts out of St. Hilary, who has put in the Margin, Inquirendum, i. e. we must enquire if these were the Bishops: Which plainly discovers, that he was not certain of it, but might set down those Names at a venture. This is what I thought my self obliged to say of this Question, which is very difficult and famous, though of no great use: [Though it is of no great Importance for us to know who precisely were the Bishops that drew up the second Sirmian Creed; yet it is of great Moment to know whether that or the Creed of the first Council of Sirmium were signed by Pope Liberius: Our Author who knew the thing was too gross to be quite omitted, shuffles it off at last as if it had been a Critical Question, only started at first to employ the Learned: But when the ablest Advocates of the Church of Rome have confessed, that an Arian Creed was deliberately signed by one of its Bishops, they must also own that this destroys Infallibility effectually: And St. Hilary's Carriage, who declaimed against Liberius's Apostacy with all the Warmth that he usually employed upon such Occasions, shews how the Orthodox Bishops of that Age, thought a Bishop of Rome might be treated, when guilty of a Crime which they thought equal to that of denying the Faith in the times of Paganism.]

(d) He died in the Year 366.] St. Jerome and Marcellinus say so in their Chronicles.

(e) The Conference.] 'Twas rather an Examination which Liberius under-went in the Emperor's Council.

St. HILARY.

St. Hilary. St. Hilary was born in the City of Poictiers (a), whereof he was afterwards Bishop. He was bred up in the Heathen Religion, and applied himself in his Youth to the Study of Profane Learning: He was Married, and had one Daughter nam'd Apra (b). The Reflections which he made upon the Falshood of the Gentile Doctrines, did by little and little conduct him to some Imperfect Knowledge of the Truth, which he compleated by Reading the Holy Scriptures, as he himself tells us, at the Beginning of his Books concerning the Trinity. After he St. Hilary.

(a) Was born in the City of Poictiers.] St. Jerome in his Preface to B. II. of his Commentaries upon the Epistle to the Galatians, says, that St. Hilary was a Gaul born at Poictiers: Fortunatus says also, that he was of that City. Pictavis residens quæ sanctus Hilarius olim Natus in Urbe Pater. The Names of his Parents are not known; for we must not acquiesce in what Bollandus writes, that the Tomb of his Father and Mother were found in a Village of Poictou, where his Father was nam'd Francarius: But there is some probability that he was of a good Family. We need not now distinguish this Hilarius from several others of that Name, of whom we shall speak afterwards.

(b) Apra.] The Author of the Life of this Saint which is attributed to Fortunatus, is the only antient Witness that we have of this Circumstance; who does also observe, that St. Hilary was perfectly inſtructed in the Chriſtian Religion. He was Baptized, and probably his Wife and Daughter were converted with him. He liv'd ſeveral years after his Baptiſm, before he was made Biſhop (c), but we know not any one particular Circumſtance of his Life during all that time. He was Ordain'd Biſhop of Poictiers ſome years before his Baniſhment; and immediately after he was promoted to that Dignity, he labour'd with all his might to Save the Flock which Jeſus Chriſt had entruſted him with, by Preaching the Truths of the Goſpel. Afterwards, when he ſaw that the Arian Hereſie began to ſpread in France, he wrote Twelve Books of the Trinity againſt it (d), which he finiſh'd about the time that he was threatned with Baniſhment. He was ſent by Order of the Emperor Conſtantius into Baniſhment, becauſe he had defended St. Athanaſius in the Council of Beziers, againſt Saturninus Biſhop of Arles, and againſt Urſacius and Valens, who had been a little before Excommunicated by the Biſhops of France; for being come to this Council, which was Aſſembled by the intriguing of Saturninus, he deſir'd that Matters of Faith ſhould be handled before all other things, and offer'd to convict Saturninus, Urſacius and Valens, of Hereſie; But they were ſo far from accepting this Propoſition, that they condemn'd St. Hilary, and wrote a Letter againſt him to the Emperor, who was then at Milan; whereupon he ſent immediately an Order to Baniſh St. Hilary and Rhodanius Biſhop of Tholouſe. Nevertheleſs, there were no Biſhops Ordain'd in their room; and ſo the Church of Poictiers enjoy'd Peace, and St. Hilary continued ſtill to Govern it, and to Adminiſter the Sacraments there by his Prieſts. The ordinary place of his Baniſhment was Phrygia (e); where he wrote his Treatiſe of Synods, which he dedicated to the Biſhops of France, to inform them of the Opinions of the Eaſtern Biſhops about the Trinity, and to inſtruct them how they ſhould behave themſelves in theſe two Synods, the expectation whereof held all the Church in Suſpence. This Treatiſe was compos'd by St. Hilary after the Council of Ancyra, held in the Year 358, whoſe Canons he there explains, and before the Councils of Ariminum and Seleucia, that is to ſay, towards the Beginning of the Year 359. Sometime after he was ſent to the Council of Seleucia by the Lieutenant of the Præfectus Prætorio, and by the Governor of Phrygia. Being arriv'd at that City, he was kindly receiv'd, and gain'd the good opinion and affection of every Body. Firſt of all, he was requir'd to give an account of the Faith of the Biſhops of France, becauſe of the falſe Reports that the Arians had ſpread Abroad againſt them, which render'd them ſuſpected of Sabellianiſm, and charg'd with believing that there was but one Perſon only in the God-head. But St. Hilary having declar'd his Faith which agreed with the Nicene Creed, gave an authentick Teſtimony of the Purity of the Faith of the Weſtern Biſhops: and ſo having remov'd the Jealouſies they might have of his Doctrine, he was admitted to the Communion and Society of the other Biſhops, and took his Place among thoſe that were to vote in the Council. He aſſiſted there at the beginning; but ſeeing that the greater part of the Biſhops were Arians, they would not ſuffer him to ſtay there any longer. Yet he continued ſtill at Seleucia till the end of the Council, and followed the Deputies of the Council to the Emperor's Court, to receive the Orders that ſhould be given him: But when he ſaw that the true Faith was in extream Danger, the Biſhops of the Weſt being over-reached, and thoſe of the Eaſt over-powered, he deſired Audience of the Emperor in three Petitions, (if we may believe Sulpitius Severus) which he publickly preſented, That he might have leave to diſpute for the Faith againſt his Adverſaries. St. Jerome, mentions but one Petition, and indeed, of the three Papers which St. Hilary preſented to Conſtantius, there is none but the Third, wherein he deſires Audience. This he preſented towards the End of the Year 359, and the Second Paper alſo about the ſame Time. The Arians ſeeing themſelves attacked by ſo powerful an Enemy, procured him to be ſent back into France, yet without releaſing him wholly from his Baniſhment. As he return'd, he paſs'd through Italy, and entered France in the Year 360. It was in his Journey, or a little after his Return, that he addreſſed his Third Diſcourſe to Conſtantius, which is commonly placed Firſt. St. Jerome, ſays, That he Wrote it after the Death of this Emperor: But it appears by the Diſcourſe it ſelf, that it was compoſed Five Years after St. Hilary withdrew from the Communion of Saturninus; and after the Baniſhment of Lucifer, Euſebius and Paulinus, which diſcovers that it was in 360, and ſo before the Death of Conſtantius; and yet 'tis probable, that it was not publiſhed in the Eaſt, till after the Death of this Emperor, which made St. Jerome believe, that it was not written till that time. It was about the ſame time, that he compoſed his Treatiſe againſt Urſacius and Valens, which contained the Hiſtory of the Council of Ariminum and of Seleucia; from whence part of theſe Fragments are taken which have been publiſhed by themſelves. The whole Book conſiſts of two Parts; The Firſt is taken out of a Book of St. Hilary, which he wrote during the time of Perſecution, and before the Death of Conſtantius, as the Preface ſufficiently diſcovers. This Firſt Part begins at P. 430. and ends at 466. of the Paris Edition in the Year 1652, and it contains the Tranſactions that happened to the end of the Councils of Ariminum and Seleucia. The Second part taken out of another Book, beings at P. 466, and contains what paſſed afterwards. When the Catholick Biſhops afterwards recovered their Liberty under Julian the Apoſtate, St. Hilary aſſembled many Councils in France for the Re-eſtabliſhment of the Antient Faith, and the Condemnation of the Synods of Ariminum and Seleucia. In them he procured the Condemnation of Saturninus Biſhop of Arles, who oppos'd his Deſign, as well as Paternus Biſhop of Perigueux. As to the other Biſhops who acknowledged their Fault, they were pardoned; and all the World muſt own, ſays Sulpitius Severus, that our France was obliged to St. Hilary alone for its happy Deliverance from Hereſie. He extended alſo his care as far as Italy, if we believe Ruffinus, and took a great deal of pains to re-eſtabliſh the Faith there, by viſiting the Churches, and cauſing them to reject the Errors of the Hereticks. Euſebius of Vercellæ found that St. Hilary had prevented him in this Employment, and Ruffinus makes no ſcruple to ſay, that St. Hilary laboured with more Diligence and Succeſs than he (becauſe he was of a ſweet and mild Diſpoſition, and withal of great Learning, and every way qualified for perſuading: Niſi quod Hilarius, vir natura lenis, placidus, ſimulq; eruditus, & ad perſuadendum commodiſſimus, rem diligentius & aptius procurabat.) An excellent Remark, which may ſerve for an Inſtruction to thoſe who are employed in the Converſion of Hereticks: The ſame Hiſtorian adds, (That St. Hilary compoſed Books concerning the Faith, which were nobly written, wherein he clearly diſcovers the Artifices and Tricks which the Hereticks us'd to deceive the too Credulous and ſimple Catholicks.) Laſtly, Ruffinus relates in his Book concerning the Corruption of Origen's Works, That St. Hilary having wrote a Book to chaſtiſe thoſe that had ſigned the Creed of Ariminum, his Book was ſo corrupted by the Hereticks, though he knew nothing of it, that he was accuſed in a Synod of being an Heretick, and forced to depart from it as an excommunicated Perſon. But I do not think we ought to take this Relation for certain, becauſe 'tis no ways probable that the Faith of St. Hilary about the Trinity, having left his Daughter and Wife at Poictiers when he was baniſh'd, had a Revelation in the Place of his Baniſhment, that a rich and potent young Man courted his Daughter to marry her, but that he by his Prayers hindered her from taking any other Spouſe but Jeſus Chriſt, and that he wrote a Letter to her, which this Author recites. The ſame Author adds at the end of B. I. of the Life of St. Hilary, that returning from his Baniſhment, and finding that his Daughter deſir'd to marry, he prayed God to take her out of the World; that his Prayer was heard, for his Daughter died, and her Mother ſurviv'd her but a very little time. This is reported by the Author of this Life, who liv'd ſoon after King Clovis, towards the Year 580, and who appears to be different from Venantius Fortunatus. St. Gregory of Tours, cites this Life without naming the Author of it; and ſo we muſt not wholly reject what he ſays, nor yet altogether build upon it.

St. Hilary.

(c) He liv'd ſeveral Years after his Baptiſm, before he was made Biſhop.] In his Book of Synods, he ſays, that he was baptiz'd a long while before his Baniſhment, and but a little while before it he was made Biſhop: Regeneratus pridem, & in Epiſcopatu aliquantiſper manens.

(d) He wrote his Twelve Books of the Trinity againſt it.] Some have thought that they were written in his Baniſhment; but the Preface alone, which is the Beginning of the Firſt Book, diſcovers that theſe Books were written before that time: For after he has there deſcribed his Converſion he obſerves that ſoon after his Ordination the Arian Hereſie was ſpread in France, and immediately he took Pen in hand to confute their Impious Doctrines. What he ſays in the tenth Book, does alſo prove that he was not baniſh'd, but only threatned with Baniſhment when he wrote it, Sed licet, ſays he, nunc à multis coacervantibus ſibi ſecundum deſideria ſua Magiſtros ſana doctrina exulet, (which is plainly meant of the Baniſhment of Paulinus of Triers, Euſebius of Verceilles, and Luciſer Calariſtanus baniſh'd after the Council of Milan) non tamen à Sanctis quibuſq; Prædicationis Veritas exulabit. Loquemur enim exulas per hos libros, & Sermo Dei qui vinciri non poteſt, liber excurret, &c. Where he ſpeaks of his Baniſhment as a thing that was future and had not yet come to paſs, but which was quickly to follow after the Baniſhment of Paulinus and others: From whence it appears that this tenth Book was written between the Council of Milan and that of Beziers.

(e) The ordinary Place of his Baniſhment was Phrygia.] St. Jerome in his Catalogue, and Sulpitius Severus, B. II. of his Hiſt. do teſtify this, as well as the Author of the Life of St. Hilary. Theodoret B. III. ch. 4. ſays, That Hilary, Euſebius and Luciſer were in Thebais, when Julian permitted the exil'd Biſhops to return to their Sees. This is true of the two laſt, but not of the Firſt, for he was then in France. St. Hilary himſelf ſays, in his Book of Synods, that he was in the Provinces of Aſia.

could be suspected by the Western Bishops. In the Year 364, an occasion offer'd it self (f) wherein St. Hilary shew'd his zeal for the Truth. The Emperor Valentinian being come to Milan, published an Edict, wherein he obliged all the Catholicks to acknowledge Auxentius for their Bishop. St. Hilary being persuaded that this Bishop was in his Judgment an Arian, presented a Petition to the Emperor, wherein he declared, that Auxentius was a Blasphemer, whose opinions were contrary to those of the Prince and other Catholicks. The Emperor being mov'd by so sharp an Accusation, appointed a conference, in the Presence of the Treasurer, and the great Mr. of the Palace, between St. Hilary accompanied with Ten Bishops; and Auxentius at this Conference, after he had endeavoured to elude the Dispute, was obliged, under pain of losing his See, to profess that Jesus Christ was truly God, and of the same Substance, and the same Divinity as the Father. The Emperor thinking this Profession sincere, embraced his Communion, and St. Hilary, because he still continued to proclaim Auxentius a Heretick, who mocked God and Men, was driven out of Milan as a Disturber of the Peace of the Church. Being thus disabled to speak any more Viva voce against Auxentius, he wrote a Tract against this Bishop the next Year. In the Year 366. he Collected the Commentaries of all the Transactions, that had happened after the Council of Ariminum, as may be seen in the Second Part of the Fragments which is taken out of this Work, where you will find the Letters Written in 366.

St. Hilary.

At last, After he had endured so much Labour and trouble for the Defence of the Faith, he finished his course in the Year 367 (g).

Besides the Works of St. Hilary which we have already mentioned, because they have a respect to the History of his Life, he has also written other Books, some whereof are come to our Hands.

He wrote a little Tract against Dioscorus the Physician, and Sallustius the Prefect, wherein he has particularly shewn, says St. Jerome, in his Epistle to Magnus, how far his Learning and Eloquence could reach. This Book is not extant, but 'tis very probable that 'twas written in Defence of the Christian Religion against Paganism.

He wrote several Commentaries upon the Scriptures, which are almost wholly taken out of Origen, whose Commentaries he caused Heliodorus to explain to him, if we believe St. Jerome: But it must be confess'd, that he followed more the Sense than the Letter of Origen's Commentaries, and that he added many things of his own, as the same St. Jerome has also observed. We have his Commentaries upon St. Matthew, we have also more of his Commentaries upon the Psalms than St. Jerome had seen; for this Father mentions only the Commentaries upon the 1st. and 2d. Psalms, upon the 51st. and those that follow until the 62d. and upon the 118th. and those that follow unto the last; and we have besides these Commentaries, the Commentaries upon the 14th. and 15th. Psalms, and upon 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, Psalms, which bear the Name of St. Hilary, and are written in his Stile. But we have none of his Commentaries upon Job, which are cited by St. Jerome, whereof St. Austin relates a passage in his 2d. Book against Julian, to prove Original Sin.

There was also attributed to him in St. Jerome's Time, a Commentary upon the Canticles, but this Father says, that he had never seen it.

St. Jerome mentions also a Collection of Hymns, composed by St. Hilary; a Book Entituled Mysteries; and many Letters.

I place not the Letter and Hymn to his Daughter Apra, in the Number of St. Hilary's Works, because I doubt not but these Pieces were the Work of him that Wrote his Life, which are not at all like this Father's way of Writing: Some have attributed to him the Hymn Pange Lingua, and that of St. John the Baptist, Ut queant laxis; but without any ground: The Books of the Unity of the Essence of the Father and the Son, were Rhapsodies taken out of the Genuine Works of St. Hilary. St. Jerome in his Apology to Pammachius, speaks of a Book of St. Hilary address'd to Fortunatus, which was concerning the Number Seven. Some have confounded this Treatise with St. Cyprian's Books of Exhortation to Martyrdom, being address'd to a Person of the same Name. But that which St. Jerome attributes to St. Hilary, must be different from those of St. Cyprian; and therefore if there be no Mistake in this place of St. Jerome, we must say, that St. Hilary wrote a Treatise address'd to his Friend Fortunatus, concerning the mysterious Significations of the Number Seven. And this Work may very well be one of those Treatises of Mysteries, which St. Jerome mentions in his Catalogue of Ecclesiastical Writers.

St. Hilary.

The Twelve Books of the Trinity, composed by St. Hilary in Imitation of Quintilian's Books, as St. Jerome has observed, are an excellent Work, which contains the Explication and the Proofs of this Mystery. He has there established the Faith of the Church in a demonstrative Manner; he has clearly detected the Errors of the Hereticks, refuted them solidly and answered all their Objections: So that this is the largest and most methodical Work of any, that we have in all Antiquity upon this Subject.

The First Book is a Preface to the Whole, wherein he describes very pleasantly after what manner a Man arrives at Happiness, and the Knowledge of the Truth; and then gives an account of the Subject of the Eleven following Books. He begins with observing, that Happiness does not consist in Abundance, nor in Repose as common People imagine, nor yet in the bare Knowledge of the First Principles of Good and Evil, as many wise Men among the Pagans thought, but in the Knowledge of the true God. He adds, that Man having an ardent Desire after this Knowledge, meets with some Persons that give him low and mean Ideas, unworthy of the Divinity. Some would persuade him that there are many Gods of different Sexes: Others take the Representations of Men, of Beasts, and Birds, for Divinities: Others acknowledge no God at all; and some, in short, confess, That there is a God, but deny that he has any Knowledge, or takes any care of things here below. But the Reason of a Man discovers these Notions to be false, and so by the Light of Nature, he comes to know, That there can be but one God Almighty, Eternal and Infinite, who is in all places, who Knows all things, and Orders all things; and afterwards by reading the Books of Moses and the Prophets, where he found these Truths explained, he was fully convinced of them, and studied with the greatest application of Mind to know this Sovereign Being, who is the Fountain of all kind of Beauty and Perfection. Neither did he stop here, but upon further Enquiry, he came to understand, that 'twas unworthy of God to suppose, that Man to whom he had given so much Knowledge, should be annihilated for ever; for if this were true, to what purpose would his Knowledge serve, since Death would one Day deprive him of all Understanding? But then as on the one side, Reason discovers it to be fit, that Man should be Immortal; so on the other side the Sense of his present Weakness, and the Apprehension of Death, which he sees is unavoidable, fill him with anxious Fears. In this State he has recourse to the Gospel, which perfects all the Knowledge he had before, and resolves all the Doubts that yet remain with him. There he learns, That there is an Eternal Word, the Son of God, who was made Man, and came into the World to communicate to it the Fulness of Grace and Truth. This gives him hopes infinitely above all that he could have before, for now he presently perceives the Excellency and Greatness of these Gifts, by understanding, That since the Son of God was made Man nothing can hinder, but Men may become the Sons of God; and so when a Man joyfully receives this Doctrine, he perfects the Knowledge he had of the Divinity, by the Knowledge of the Humanity of Jesus Christ. He renews his Spirit by Faith, He acknowledges the Providence of one God over him, and begins to be fully persuaded, that he who created him, will not annihilate him. In short, he understands, That Faith is the only infallible means of coming to the Knowledge of the Truth; That it rejects unprofitable Questions, and resolves the captious Difficulties of Human Philosophy; That it judges not of the Conduct of God according to the Thoughts of Men, nor of that of Jesus Christ, according to the Maxims of this World; That 'twas by this Faith, (whereof the Law was only a shadow and Type) that Jesus Christ having raised our Minds to that which is most Sublime and Divine, prescribed to us, instead of the Circumcision of the Flesh, the Circumcision of the Spirit, which consists in the Reformation of our Lives, and the Renovation of our Hearts: That as we die to Sin in Baptism, that we may live a Spiritual and Immortal Life, so Jesus Christ died for us, that we might rise again together with him; and so the Death of him who is Immortal, procured Immortality to us Mortals. Now when once the Soul is fully possessed with these thoughts, she rests satisfied with this hope, without fearing Death, or being wearied of Life: For she considers Death as the beginning of Eternal Life, and (f) In the Year 364, an occasion offered it self.] Baronius places this Conference in 369, which is a gross mistake, since according to the Testimony of all the Ancients, St. Hilary was dead before. Besides the Letter of Auxentius, which was written after this Conference, bears not the Name of Gratian, who was declared Emperor in 367, but only the Names of Valens and Valentinian. It appears by Ammianus Marcellinus, B. XXVI. that Valentinian came to Milan about the end of the Year 364, and went away soon after: And therefore this Conference must have been held in this Year.

(g) He finished his Course in the Year 367.] St. Jerome places his Death in this Year. Sulpitius Severus says, that he died Six Years after his Return into Gaul, and Gregory of Tours B. I. of his Hist. ch. 3. says, that his Death happened in the Fourth Year of Valentinian. These Two Dates fall out just in the same Year; for the one reckons six Years after the end of the Year 360, which reaches to the Beginning of 367, and the 4th. Year of Valentinian's Reign begun in the Month of February the same Year.

looks upon this present Life, as the means of obtaining a happy Immortality.

St. Hilary.

These are the Steps by which St. Hilary guides the minds of Men to the Knowledge of Happiness and Truth, after he himself had arrived at it by the same Methods: For he does not deliver these things as curious and profound Discourses which he had meditated in his Study, but as the History of his own Thoughts, which by degrees carried him on to a perfect Conversion. Then he declares, that afterwards being ordained Bishop, as his Office obliged him to take Care of the Salvation of others, he preached the Truths of the Gospel; and at last, that the Heresie of the Arians, who would judge of the Almighty Power of God, by the weak Light of their own Reason, had obliged him to undertake the Defence of the Truth, and the Refutation of their Errors. After he has in a few Words explained the Faith of the Church, he admonishes the Reader, above all things, when he thinks of God, to divest his mind of the meanness of Human Opinions, and to judge of God according to the light of Faith, and agreeable to the Testimony of God himself. 'For, says he, the chief Qualification requir'd in 'a Reader, is, That he be willing to take the Sense of an 'Author from what he reads, and not give that Sense 'wherewith he himself is prepossess'd. He must take the 'meaning of the Author and not give him one of his own: 'He ought not to endeavour to find in the Passages which 'he reads, that which he presumed, ought to be found there 'before he read them; wherefore in Discoursing of God, 'he ought at least to be persuaded, that he knew himself, 'and so to embrace with Reverence, that Doctrine which 'he teaches us. He only can give an Account worthy of 'himself, because he is not known but from himself, and by 'himself. But if it happens says St. Hilary, that some Comparison, from Human Affairs be used in Discoursing of these Mysteries, we must not believe that they are just, or have a perfect Resemblance to them.' After this Excellent Advertisement, St. Hilary gives an account of the Subject of his Eleven Books of the Trinity, and finishes this First Book, with an Invocation of the Divine Assistance.

In the Second Book, he explains the Catholick Doctrine concerning the Three Divine Persons. He says, He should have permitted Christians to keep themselves to the Words of the Gospel, without diving further in the Mystery of the Trinity, if the Hereticks had not obliged them to explain it more clearly. 'The Errors and Blasphemies of the Hereticks, 'says he, oblige us to do those things which are forbidden 'us, to search into those Mysteries which are Incomprehensible, to speak those things that are Ineffable, and to explain that which we are not permitted to examine: And 'instead of performing with a sincere Faith, (which were 'otherwise sufficient) that which is commanded us, i. e. 'Worshipping the Father and the Son, and being filled 'with the Holy Spirit, we are obliged to employ our weak 'Reasonings to explain those things which are Incomprehensible; being constrained, if a Man may so say, by the 'fault of others, to commit this one our selves, lest we 'fall into the Error of those who have dared to give an 'Heretical Sense to the Words of Scripture; for that which 'makes the Heresie, says he, is not the Scripture, but the 'manner of Expounding it; 'tis the Interpretation that 'makes the Crime, and not the Words.' After this, he gives an Account of the Errors of the Sabellians, the Ebionites and Arians, to which he opposes the Faith of the Church. He says, that the Father who is the first Person of the Trinity, is the Fountain and First Principle of all Things, being Eternal and Infinite; and that the Word, who is the Second Person of the Trinity, is the Son begotten from all Eternity of the Father. He confesses, That this Generation is incomprehensible, and reproves those that endeavour to explain it. He asks them, if they can comprehend how they came into this World; how they received their Feeling, Life, Perception, Taste, Sight, Understanding, and the other Senses; How they can communicate them to others. (Tell me, says he, O Man, if thou canst comprehend how all this is done; and if thou canst not comprehend it, with what Face dost thou demand an Explication of the Generation of the Son of God? Thou art so ignorant of what passes in thy self, Wilt thou be so insolent as to complain for not knowing what passes in God?) And so, without insisting on the Explication of the Eternal Generation of the Word by Human Reason, he proves it by Holy Scripture, and confirms the Catholick Faith of the Divinity of the Word against all Heresies. He speaks occasionally of the Temporal Generation of the Son of God, that is to say, of the Mystery of the Incarnation. At last, he treats of the Holy Spirit, who is the Third Person of the Trinity, and maintains, That he is a Divine Person, distinct from the Father and the Son. He observes, That tho' the Name of Spirit be given sometimes in Scripture to the Father and the Son, yet in most places, it signifies a Person distinct from them both. He Discourses of the Effects and Gifts of the Holy Spirit, and says, that he intercedes for us; That he Enlightens our understanding, and warms our Hearts; That he is the Author of all Grace, and of all Heavenly Gifts; That he will be with us until the end of the World; that he is our Comforter here while we live in Expectation of a future Life, the Earnest of our future Hopes, the Light of our Minds, and the Warmth of our Souls. From whence he concludes, That we must beg this Holy Spirit, to enable us to do Good, and to persevere in the Faith, and keeping the Commands of God.

St. Hilary.

In the third Book, he proves the Divinity of the Son of God, by the Words of the Gospel of St. John, I am in my Father, and my Father is in me. He observes also, 'That 'the Generation of the Word is incomprehensible, as well 'as the most part of the Miracles of Jesus Christ; That human 'Reason cannot give an Account of it; and, That Jesus 'Christ was made Man, to preach this eternal Power to 'Men, and to make known his Father unto them; That 'in this sense, we must understand his Desire to be glorified, that he might glorify his Father, viz. That the Glory which the Humanity of Jesus Christ received and made 'appear unto Men, discovered the Dignity and Power of 'his Father.' He observes also, that the Birth of Jesus Christ, his Resurrection, his entring into the Room where the Disciples were, unseen, thro' the Doors, and the other Miracles of Jesus Christ, are no less above Reason, than his Eternal Generation. From whence he concludes, 'That the 'Nature and Operations of God, are above the Reason, 'Perception, and Understanding of Men; That we must 'acknowledge in these things, the Folly of Worldly Wisdom, and the Vanity of human Knowledge, and embrace 'that Heavenly Prudence, and Divine Wisdom, that seems 'to be Folly to the World.

In the fourth Book, he describes the Errors of the Hereticks concerning the Consubstantiality of the Word; He opposes to them the Faith of the Church; answers the Passages which they alledge, and endeavours to prove the Divinity of the Word, by many Passages taken out of the Old Testament.

He continues the same Subject in the fifth Book, where he thinks, That 'twas the Word which appeared to Abraham, to Jacob, to Moses and the other Patriarchs, who is called an Angel, because of his Ministry, and not because of his Nature.

In the sixth Book, he proves, That Jesus Christ is the Son of God, by the Testimony of his Father, by his own Declaration, by the Preaching of the Apostles, by the Confession of the Faithful, by the Acknowledgment of the Devils and Jews, and by the Belief of the Gentiles. We must observe here, That in citing a Passage of the Epistle to the Romans, he appeals to the Greek Text, as to the Original.

In the seventh, He shews that the Son of God, is truly God. There he observes, That the Hereticks use very great Address and Subtilty to maintain their corrupt Opinions which they falsly pretend to have from Religion; That they deceive the simple by their Expressions, which are Catholick in appearance; that they accommodate themselves to the Wisdom of this World; That they corrupt the true Sense of Scripture Expressions, by the Explications which they add, as it were to give an Account of what they say. He adds, That 'tis this which renders the Matter of the Trinity, a difficult Subject to treat on: (For if in the beginning, says he, I declare that there is but one God, Sabellius will think that I espouse his Opinion: If I say, That the Son is God, the modern Hereticks will accuse me of admitting two Gods: If I affirm, That the Son is born of the Virgin, Ebion and Photinus will make use of that Truth, to establish their Impiety.) But, says he, the Doctrine of the Church confounds all those Errors. The Power of Truth is so great, that even its Enemies explain it; that the more 'tis opposed, the more force it gains; and certainly, the Church was never more triumphant, than when it was most vigorously attacked. It was never more flourishing, than when it was reproached. It was never more powerful, than when it seemed to be abandoned. She wishes, That all Men would continue in her Bosom, and She is never more troubled, than when She is obliged to throw any one out, and deliver him up to the Devil. But when the Hereticks go out from her, or when She casts them out, as She loses on one side the occasion of giving them Salvation, so She gains this Advantage on the other, of discovering the Happiness of those who continue invariably fixed in her Communion. And a few lines after, he adds, All Heresies attack the Church, and while they attack the Church, they wage war one another. But the Victory is gained to the Church and not to them; for they all quarrel about those Errors, which are alike equally rejected by the Church. Sabellius, for Instance, does not confute the Error of Arius; Arius confounds the Error of Photinus; and so of the rest. But in vain do they mutually conquer one another, for they are always overcome in some one Article or other; and the Church alone remains victorious over all Errors, by professing that Jesus Christ is the true God, Son of the most God, born before all Ages, and afterwards become a Man of a Virgin. Lastly, he proves that he is God, because the Name of God is given him in the New Testament, and from what is related of his Birth, his Nature, his Power and his Actions.

In the eighth Book, he shews the essential Unity of the Father and the Son, and refutes the Interpretations of the Hereticks, by explaining the Passages which they alledged, to prove that the Unity of the Father and the Son is an Unity of Will and Judgment, and not of Essence and Na-

Nature. At the beginning of this Book he obſerves, 'That 'tis not ſufficient for a Biſhop to live a good Life, 'but he muſt alſo teach ſound Doctrine; that as his Life 'muſt be innocent, ſo his Preaching muſt be learned: For 'if he be pious without being learned, he will not be ſer-'viceable to others; and if he be learned without being ho-'ly, his Doctrine will want Authority: From whence he 'concludes, That the Holineſs of a Biſhop ſhould ſhine 'more brightly by his Learning, and his Doctrine ſhould 'be recommended by the Holineſs of his Life, Ut et vita 'ejus ornetur docendo, et Doctrina vivendo.' There is in this Book an excellent Paſſage for the real Preſence of Jeſus Chriſt in the Euchariſt, where he ſays, That by this Sacrament, we truly receive the Fleſh and Blood of Jeſus Chriſt, who remains corporeally in us.

In the ninth Book he anſwers the great Objections of the Arians founded upon five Paſſages of Scripture, whereof he explains the true Senſe. And firſt of all, he ſhews, That they abuſe the Paſſages which they alledge by perverting them from their natural Senſe; That they do not explain them by their Connexion with what follows, and what goes before; That they attribute to the Divinity of Jeſus Chriſt, that which ſhould only be attributed to his Humanity. Upon this occaſion he diſcourſes of the Union of the two Natures in Jeſus Chriſt, and explains how by Vertue of this Union, thoſe things are attributed to God which agree only to the human Nature, and thoſe to Man which belong to the Divinity. Afterwards he explains the Paſſages which the Arians continually object to the Catholicks, one by one: The firſt, which is taken out of the tenth Chapter of St. Mark, is the Anſwer which Jeſus Chriſt made to the rich young Man, who called him Good Maſter, Why calleſt thou me Good, ſays he, there is none Good but God; from whence the Arians concluded, That Jeſus Chriſt was not truly God. St. Hilary anſwers, that he does not particularly reprove the young Man, for calling him Good, but becauſe he gives him this Title, as if it agreed to him in the Capacity of a Doctor of the Law. The young Man, (ſays he) not knowing that he was the Meſſias, who came to ſave the loſt Sheep of the Houſe of Iſrael, asked him as a Doctor of the Law, and gave him the Title which the Doctors take to themſelves. Jeſus Chriſt reproves this Notion, and to explain to him in what ſenſe he ſhould be called Good, he tells him, none is Good but God; ſhewing by this, That he was ſo far from rejecting the Title of Good as it agreed to God, that he accepted of it in that ſenſe. And therefore his Anſwer is one Proof of his Divinity, which ought to be underſtood in this ſenſe, Why call you me Good, if ye believe not that I am God? There is none Good but God; which ſuppoſes that he himſelf was God. St. Hilary confirms this Anſwer by many places of Scripture, where Jeſus Chriſt gives himſelf the Title of Good, and of Maſter; from whence it appears that the Title was not here refuſed upon its own Account. Upon this occaſion he anſwers the Objection of the Arians, who ſay, That Jeſus Chriſt called his Father the only God; and ſhews that the Father is the only God, becauſe the Divinity of the Father is the ſame with that of the Son, which Truth he proves by many Paſſages of Scripture.

The ſecond Paſſage objected by the Arians is taken out of the Goſpel of St. John, Chap. 17. This is Life eternal to know thee the only true God, and Jeſus Chriſt whom thou haſt ſent; from whence the Arians concluded, That Jeſus Chriſt was not the true God, but one ſent from the true God. St. Hilary anſwers, 'That this Paſſage does not exclude the eſſential 'Unity of the Father and the Son, ſince in this and other 'places, Jeſus Chriſt affirms, That he came forth from God; 'That he is with God; That he had overcome the World; 'That he ſhould be honoured as the Father; That he had 'received the Power of giving eternal Life; That all things 'which are the Father's are his.' He adds, That in the ſame place Jeſus Chriſt prays the Father to glorify him, with the Glory that he had with him from all Eternity; which evidently proves the Unity of the Eſſence of the Father and the Son: Moreover the Words alledged in the Objection, prove nothing contrary to the Faith of the Church, which acknowledges that the Father is the only true God, tho' Jeſus Chriſt is alſo God, becauſe the Father and the Son are not two Gods, but one God only.

The third Objection is taken from Ch. 5th of the ſame Goſpel of St. John, The Son can do nothing of himſelf, he doeth only what he ſeeth his Father do. St. Hilary ſhewes that this Paſſage eſtabliſhes the Divinity of Jeſus Chriſt, and is very far from deſtroying it, becauſe it proves the Unity and Equality of the Father and the Son.

The fourth Paſſage is the grand Objection of the Arians founded upon thoſe Words of Jeſus Chriſt in St. John, Ch. 14. My Father is greater than I. St. Hilary ſays, That the Father is greater than the Son, conſidered as Man and as Mediator. The laſt Objection is taken from thoſe Words of Jeſus Chriſt in St. Mark, Ch. 13. No Man knoweth the Day of Judgment, nor the Angels, nor the Son, but the Father only. From whence the Arians concluded, That the Knowledge of the Father being more extenſive than that of the Son, his Nature muſt be more excellent. St. Hilary having in anſwer to this Objection, proved by many Reaſons, that Jeſus Chriſt could not be ignorant of the Day of Judgment, and having demonſtrated this Truth, he adds, That what Chriſt ſays in this place, That the Son knew not the Day of Judgment, ought not to be underſtood literally, as if he were really ignorant of it; but in this ſenſe, That he did not know it, not ſo as to tell it unto Men. Wherefore being asked about the ſame Matter after his Reſurrection, he does not ſay, That he was ignorant of it; but he reproves his Apoſtles with that Heat, which teſtified his Knowledge of it, by ſaying unto them, 'Tis not for you to know the times and the ſeaſons which my Father has reſerved in his own Power. He adds alſo, That it may be ſaid in another ſenſe, That the Son of Man was ignorant of the Day of Judgment, becauſe he knew it not as he was Man, but as he was God: For, ſays he, as we may ſay, That the Son of God was ſubject to Fear, to Sadneſs, and to Sleep; becauſe the Humanity of Jeſus Chriſt was ſubject to theſe Infirmities; So we may ſay, That he was ignorant of the Day of Judgment, becauſe he knew it not as he was Man, but upon the account of his Divinity.

St. Hilary.

In the Tenth Book he Anſwers the Objections which the Arians draw from theſe Paſſages of Scripture which prove that Jeſus Chriſt was ſubject to Fear, to Sorrow and Pain. And here he maintains, That Jeſus Chriſt had not truly any Fear or Pain, but only the Repreſentation of thoſe Paſſions within him: In which, if his Judgment is not different from that of the Church, yet it muſt be confeſs'd, that the manner of expreſſing it is very harſh. He had anſwer'd the Arians better, if he had ſaid, That the Fear, the Sorrow and Pain of Jeſus Chriſt did belong to his Human Nature, and not to his Divinity. He acknowledges in this Book, that all Men are conceiv'd in Sin, and that none but Jeſus Chriſt ought to be excepted from this General Law. He ſays, That the Soul is not communicated to Children by the Parents. He obſerves, That what is ſaid in the Goſpel of St. Luke concerning the Bloody Sweat of Jeſus Chriſt, and of the Angel that appear'd unto him, is not to be found in many Greek and Latin Copies of this Goſpel.

In the Eleventh Book, he Anſwers ſome Paſſages of the Goſpels, and of St. Paul concerning Jeſus Chriſt's being riſen from the Dead, and becoming Glorious, which are alledg'd by the Arians to prove that the Son is not equal to the Father: But St. Hilary ſhews, That thoſe Paſſages do much rather prove the Divinity of Jeſus Chriſt, than deſtroy it.

In the laſt Book, St. Hilary explains that Paſſage of the Proverbs, God created me in the Beginning of his Ways, &c. He demonſtrates that the Word of God was not properly created, but begotten of God from all Eternity; which he proves by many Paſſages of Scripture. He expounds this Paſſage of the Proverbs of the Incarnation of Jeſus Chriſt. He adds ſome Proofs of the Divinity of the Holy Spirit, and Ends with a Prayer to God, wherein he begs Grace to preſerve in his Heart that Faith whereof he made Profeſſion at his Baptiſm, that he may always worſhip the Father and the Son, and receive the Holy Spirit which proceeds from the Father by the Son.

His Book of Synods is Addreſs'd to the Biſhops of France and Britain. He commends them for the Conſtancy which they had ſhewn in refuſing Communion to Saturninus, and for the Zeal wherewith they maintain'd the Faith of the Church, by condemning the Impieties of the Arians ſo ſharply. After this, he ſets himſelf to explain the Creeds made by the Eaſtern Biſhops after the Council of Nice. He declares, That if there were any Error in ſome of thoſe Creeds, it ought not to be attributed to him, ſince he only relates what others had ſaid; and if they were found agreeable to the Doctrine of the Apoſtles, the Praiſe of it ought not to be given to him but to the Original Authors: He leaves it to the Judgment of the Biſhops, to whom his Book is written, whether they be Heretical or Catholick. Then he intimates to them, what Obligation lay upon him to inſtruct them in the Opinions of the Eaſtern Biſhops, that they might Join with the right Side in thoſe Councils which were ſhortly to be held at Ariminum and Seleucia. But before he comes to ſpeak of thoſe Creeds which are ſuſpected, he relates and explains that of the Council of Ancyra, which was made in oppoſition to the Second Creed of Sirmium, afterwards he relates the Creeds made by the Eaſtern Biſhops after the Council of Nice, at Antioch, Sardica, and the firſt Creed at Sirmium. He ſhews, That thoſe Creeds are Catholick, and endeavours to excuſe the Oriental Biſhops for making ſo many, by alledging the Multitude and Obſtinacy of the Arians that were in the Eaſt. He ſays, That in thoſe Provinces to which he was Baniſh'd, there was only Eleuſius, and a ſmall number of Biſhops with him, that acknowledg'd the Divinity of the Word. He Congratulates the Weſtern Biſhops for maintaining the Apoſtolical Faith, engrav'd by the Holy Spirit in their Hearts, who were ignorant of the Creeds written by the hands of Men. After this, he explains in a lively and clear manner his own Doctrine and that of the Weſtern Biſhops concerning the Myſtery of the Trinity, and ſecures it againſt the falſe Explications of the Hereticks. He gives the true ſenſe of the word Conſubſtantial, which he juſtifies againſt thoſe that directly oppoſe it, or that think fit it ſhould be ſuppreſs'd. He Exhorts the Weſtern Biſhops with much Eloquence to uſe this term, and to receive the Confeſſion of Faith made by the Council of Nice. He concludes with conjuring his Brethren in much Humility, to Pardon the Freedom he had taken to inform them of theſe things, and adviſe them what they ought to do. He Exhorts them to preſerve with inviolable Fidelity, the Doctrines of Piety and Religion which were written upon their Hearts, and Requeſts them to remember his Baniſhment in their Prayers. St. Hilary.

The third Diſcourſe addreſs'd to the Emperor Conſtantius, which ſhould be the Firſt as we have obſerv'd already, is a Petition preſented to this Emperor, wherein he remonſtrates, that he was a Catholick Biſhop of France, baniſh'd by the Intrigues of his Enemies, who had falſly accus'd him to his Majeſty. He prays the Emperor that he would grant him Audience in the Preſence of Saturninus, who was the chief Cauſe of his Sufferings, that he might have Opportunity to juſtify himſelf from thoſe Accuſations that were form'd againſt him: and he makes no ſcruple to declare, that if his Adverſary could ſhew that he had done any one thing unworthy, either of the Holineſs of a Biſhop, or the Piety of a Chriſtian, he would not only quit all Claim to his Favour for continuing to him his Biſhoprick, but on the contrary, he would be willing to ſpend his Old Age in a State of Penance among the Laity. But ſo far as this Petition concern'd only his own Perſon, he went further and proteſted, that he would never ſpeak more of it unleſs the Emperor commanded him; yet ſtill he deſir'd with great Boldneſs and Earneſtneſs, an Audience about the Cauſe of the Faith, which was common to him with all other Catholicks. And to this purpoſe, he repreſents to the Emperor the Confuſion of ſo many Creeds. 'When once they be-'gun, ſays he, to make new Confeſſions of Faith, the Faith 'became the Creed of the Times rather than of the Goſpel: 'Facta eſt Fides temporum potius quam Evangeliorum. Every 'Year new Creeds were made, and Men did not keep to 'that Simplicity of Faith which they profeſs'd at their Bap-'tiſm: And O what Miſeries enſued! For preſently, there 'were as many Creeds as might pleaſe each Particu-'lar Party; and nothing elſe has been minded ſince the 'Council of Nice, but this making of Creeds. New Creeds 'have been made every Year and every Month, they have 'been chang'd, they have been anathematiz'd, and then re-'eſtabliſh'd; and ſo by enquiring too much into the Faith, 'there is none left; it has always continued uncertain, and 'there was never any Certainty of the Truth.' After he has deſcribed this Confuſion very ſmartly, he remonſtrates to the Emperor, that the only way to ſave himſelf from this Shipwrack, was to acquieſce in the Faith of the Goſpel; whereof he made Profeſſion at his Baptiſm. Then he prays the Emperor, that he would give him Audience in the Preſence of the Council, which was to meet at Conſtantinople; and promiſes that for explaining and proving the Faith of the Church, he would only make uſe of the Words of Jeſus Chriſt. He confeſſes, that all the Hereticks boaſt of preaching the Goſpel, but, ſays he, they do not underſtand it; For they alledge Scripture without knowing the meaning of it, and make uſe of Orthodox Terms without having the True Faith. He preſſes the Emperor to grant him this Audience for the good of the whole Church; and promiſes him, that being to ſpeak publickly to him of a Queſtion ſo famous in the Preſence of a Council divided upon this Subject, he would ſay nothing but what ſhould tend to the Honour of the Emperor, the Preſervation of the Faith, and the peaceable Union of the Eaſt and the Weſt. And to aſſure him of this Promiſe, he gives him this Sign of it, by confining himſelf wholly to the Terms of the Goſpel, in declaring his Doctrine at preſent. With this Declaration he concludes this Paper, which ſome have thought Imperfect, but without any Ground.

The Second Book of St. Hilary to Conſtantius, is alſo a kind of Petition, wherein he prays him, to put an End to the Perſecutions and Vexations wherewith the Arians exercis'd the Church; To forbid the Secular Judges to meddle in Affairs of Religion; To leave his Subjects to their Liberty, whether they will be Arians, or no; To permit them to continue united to the Catholick Biſhops, and ſeparated from the Arian Biſhops; and in ſhort, to ſuffer all the baniſh'd Biſhops to return to their Sees. After this, He compares the Perſecution of the Arians againſt the Catholicks, with that of the Pagans againſt the Chriſtians: He ſhews how Cruel it was, and how far diſtant from the Spirit of the Church and of Jeſus Chriſt. The Biſhops, ſays he, are put in Priſon; The People are oblig'd to ſerve as their Guard; The holy Bodies of the Virgins of Jeſus Chriſt, are expos'd to the View of all the World, to abuſe them; Men are compell'd, I do not ſay to be Chriſtians, but to become Arians; the Name and Authority of the Emperor is abus'd; He is impos'd upon by Surprize; Judges are deſir'd of him for approving theſe Injuſtices; and in ſhort, the People are forc'd to conſent unto them. After this, He deſcribes particularly, the Violence that was us'd to Paulinus of Triers, to Dionyſius of Milan, to Euſebius of Vercellæ, and many others. This Book is imperfect.

Theſe Diſcourſes of St. Hilary, are written with great Moderation, as to what concerns the Emperor, whoſe Conduct he excuſes; but he has not [illegible]'d the ſame Moderation in the laſt, which is commonly plac'd before the other Two. There he ſpeaks with ſo fervent a Zeal, that he might deſerve to be accus'd of too violent a Paſſion, if it were not otherwiſe certain that he was acted only from a principal of Love to the Truth *. He begins with theſe Words which are all Sparks of Fire: 'Tis time to Speak, ſince the time to be Silent is paſt; we muſt wait upon Jeſus Chriſt, ſince Anti-Chriſt Governs: Let the True Paſtors cry aloud, ſince the Hirelings are fled: Let us die for the Sheep, ſince the Thieves are entered, and the Lion full of Rage, goes about the Sheep-fold. After he has exhorted the Paſtors in theſe Words, and many others of the ſame Nature, to Defend the Truths of the Goſpel with Courage and Boldneſs, He gives an Account of the Conduct which he had obſerv'd ſince his Baniſhment. He ſays, That he kept Silence in Modeſty, hoping that things would change for the better, but there being now no further place for hope, he found himſelf oblig'd to ſpeak: He declares, That he wiſhes he had rather been in the time of Decius or Nero, than in that wherein he liv'd; That neither Tortures, nor the Fire, nor the Croſs, could have made him afraid, but he would boldly have maintain'd the Combate againſt his declared Enemies, and ſuffer'd with Conſtancy in this publick Perſecution. But now, adds he, we oppoſe a Perſecutor that deceives us with falſe appearances, an Enemy that puts on a Friendly Countenance to us; Conſtantius, the Anti-Chriſt, who Perſecutes the Church under a maſk of deſigning its advancement. He profeſſes, ſays he, to be a Chriſtian, that he may deny Jeſus Chriſt; He procures Union, to hinder Peace; He ſtifles Hereſies, to ruin Chriſtianity; He honours the Biſhops, that he may make them loſe the Title of the Miniſters of Jeſus Chriſt; He builds up Churches, that he may deſtroy the Faith. Let him not imagine, adds he, that I Charge him falſly; That I reproach him; The Miniſters of Jeſus Chriſt, ought to ſpeak the Truth; If what I have propos'd be a Calumny, I am willing to paſs for an infamous Perſon; but if it be true and publickly known, I uſe the freedom of an Apoſtle, in reproving it after a long Silence. After this, He juſtifies his calling Conſtantius, Anti-Chriſt, by giving a horrible Repreſentation of the Perſecution that he raiſed. He adds, That it was neither through Indiſcretion, nor Raſhneſs, nor Anger, that he ſpoke ſo of him, but that his Reaſon, his Conſtancy, and his Faith oblig'd him to ſay theſe things. Yes, ſays he, addreſſing himſelf to Conſtantius, I tell you what I ſhould have told Nero, what Diocleſian and Maximian ſhould have heard from my Mouth: You fight againſt God; You uſe Cruelties to the Church; You Perſecute the Saints; You hate thoſe that Preach Jeſus Chriſt; You utterly aboliſh Religion: In a word, You are a Tyrant; I ſpeak not with reference to the things of this World, but with reference to the things of God. This is what is common to you with the Pagan Emperors. Let us now come to that which is peculiar to your ſelf. You feign your ſelf to be a Chriſtian, and you are the Enemy of Jeſus Chriſt; You are become Anti-Chriſt, and have begun his Work: You intrude into the Office of procuring New Creeds to be made, and you live like a Pagan; You teach things Profane, and are ignorant of Piety and Religion; You give Biſhopricks to thoſe of your own Faction, and take them away from the good Biſhops, that you may beſtow them upon the Bad. You put the Biſhops in Priſon; You keep your Armies in the Field to terrify the Church; You aſſemble Councils to eſtabliſh Impiety in them, and you compel the Weſtern Biſhops to renounce the Faith, that they may embrace Error. You ſhut them up in a City to weaken them by Famine, to kill them with the Rigor of the Winter, and to corrupt them by your Diſſimulation: You foment the Diſſentions of the Eaſt by your Artifices. He adds alſo many other Accuſations of the ſame Nature; and to compleat all, he ſays, That the Church never ſuffer'd ſo much, under Nero, under Decius, and Maximianus, as it has done under Conſtantius, who is more cruel than all thoſe Tyrants, becauſe the former gave Martyrs to the Church, who overcame Devils, whereas Conſtantius makes an Infinite number of Prevaricators, who cannot ſo much as comfort themſelves by ſaying, that they were overcome by the violence of their Torments. I ſhould never have done, if I ſhould relate all that St. Hilary ſays in this place of the Perſecution of Conſtantius. He charges him particularly, with the Baniſhment of Paulinus and Liberius, and the Troubles wherewith he exercis'd the Church of Tholouſe; and concludes with ſaying, That all thoſe things that he had accus'd him of, were publick and certain; and therefore he had juſt Cauſe to call him Anti-Chriſt. He ſhews afterwards the Impiety of thoſe Biſhops that Aſſiſted at the Council of Seleucia, who maintain'd, that the Father was not like in Subſtance to the Son, and condemn'd the Words, Conſubſtantial, and like in Subſtance. He anſwers, what Conſtantius alledges

St. Hilary.

*[The beſt Excuſe that can be made for St. Hilary, is, That Oppreſſion may make a Wiſe Man mad; and St. Athanaſius needs it as much as he; for in his Letter to all thoſe that lead a Monaſtick Life, he ſhews as great Marks of Rage and Anger againſt Conſtantius, as St. Hilary does here; and yet St. Gregory Nazianzen, a Man that was never ſuſpected of Arianiſm, has ſaid very great Things of that Prince, when he ſet him againſt Julian the Apoſtate.]

St. Hilary. alledges as the Reason of condemning these Terms, That we must not make use of any but Scripture Expressions: He answers, I say, That these Terms agree with the Doctrine of the Gospel; That Constantius, and those of his Party, are also forc'd to make use of such Terms as are not to be found in Scripture; and in short, That the Scripture makes use of Terms more Emphatical, since it establishes the Equality and Unity of the Father and the Son. He blames Constantius for the variety and contrariety of those Creeds that were made after that of the Council of Nice. He explains the Faith of the Church concerning the Majesty of God, and proves by many Examples, That we are not to wonder, if the Eternal Generation of the Son is Incomprehensible. This Book is also imperfect.

The Book of Fragments, is a Collection of many Pieces taken out of two Books of St. Hilary, and likewise of some Passages out of his other Works. 'Tis not known who is the Author of this Abridgment, nor when he liv'd. The Passages that are cited in it, are certainly St. Hilary's, and for the most part, the Pieces that are collected in it are antient; but he does not observe any Order in this Collection.

He begins with a Fragment of St. Hilary's Preface, wherein after he had spoken of the Excellency of Faith, Hope and Charity, he declares, 'That he had undertaken to publish a Work of great Importance and vast Extent, but very 'Intricate, because of the Diabolical Cheats of the Here-'ticks, and wherein he must use great Cunning, because of 'their Knaveries; against which also, there were many 'Prejudices, by reason of the Dissimulation and fear of 'many: That this Book would seem strange, even to those 'of the Country where he was, tho' there the things them-'selves were done which he treated of: That what he was 'to deliver, had come to pass some years ago, but the Si-'lence which he had hitherto kept, made all these things 'still seem New; That the Peace had almost made him 'forget the Memory of them, but that not long before 'these things had been renew'd again by the impious Ma-'lice of some notable Seducers.' After this, He describes the State of the Affairs of the Church under Constantius; He complains, That he had banish'd those Bishops that would not condemn St. Athanasius, and that he interpos'd his Authority in Ecclesiastical Decisions. At last, he says, That he had treated in his Work, of Faith in God, of the Hope of Eternity, and the Defence of the Truth; and he exhorts all Christians to inform themselves of those things which he there recites, that so every one may be satisfied in his own Judgment, without following the Opinions of others blindly.

After his Preface, follow the Letters of the Council of Sardica, to all the Churches, and in particular to Julius Bishop of Rome, together with the Subscriptions of some Bishops, and the Names of the Hereticks that were condemned.

The Author of these Fragments, has join'd to these two Letters, a Fragment of St. Hilary for St. Athanasius; at the End, the Recantation of Ursacius and Valens, is mention'd: Their Letters to Julius and St. Athanasius, are at the bottom of this Fragment. The Passage which immediately follows, has reference to the Condemnation of Photinus; and that of Marcellus of Ancyra, which he consented to; but the End of that Passage concerns the Council of Nice, whose Creed he recites and explains.

The first Letter of Liberius, here produc'd is Supposititious, as the Passage which follows, plainly discovers, and as we have already shewn when we treated of the Works of this Pope: The Second, is Genuine, which is directed to the Bishops of Italy, concerning the Restitution of the Bishops, who had approv'd the Arian Creeds. The Letter of the Bishops of Illyricum, concerning the Condemnation of the Creed of Ariminum, is one of the most Excellent Monuments of that time. The Letters of Ursacius and Valens, to Germinius, and his Answer, are put here out of their proper place, being written in the Year 366. We have already spoken of Pope Liberius's Letters that are set down: After which, there follows a Letter of the Eastern Bishops, to the Council of Ariminum, with some Reflections of St. Hilary, which are very much corrupted. After this Fragment, the Author of this Collection has added this Note: Here endeth the Book taken out of the Historical Work of St. Hilary: And yet he adds afterwards many Pieces which are probably taken out of the same Book. St. Hilary.

The 1st. is a Letter from a Council of the Bishops of France, held at Paris, against the Creed made at Ariminum.

The 2d. is a Letter of Eusebius of Vercellæ, written to Gregory, a Bishop in Spain, wherein he commends him for opposing Hosius, and preserving the Faith.

The 3d. is a Letter, or rather a Confession of Faith by Germinius the Arian Bishop, against those of his own Party, who had Sign'd the Creed of Ariminum.

The 4th. is a Letter written by the Eastern Bishops in the Name of the Council of Sardica, against the Bishops of the West: This Letter should have been plac'd before those others which we have already spoken of.

The 5th. is a Letter of the Bishops of the Council of Ariminum to the Emperor Constantius, before they had Sign'd the Creed which was presented to them by the Arians. There follows after it a short Reflection concerning the Stile of St. Hilary.

The 6th. is the Approbation which the Legates of the Council of Ariminum, gave to the Creed made by the Arians at Nice, a City of Thracia.

The 7th. is a Letter written to the Emperor Constantius, by the Bishops of Ariminum; after they had approv'd the Confession of Faith made at Nice, which was presented to them by the Arians.

The 8th. is a large Letter of Liberius to Constantius, in Favour of St. Athanasius. This is mis-plac'd as well in respect of time, as of the Matter it self.

The 9th. is a Letter of Constantius, to the Council of Ariminum.

The 10th. is the Decree of this Council before they had surrendred up themselves to the Emperor's Pleasure.

The 11th. is the Condemnation of Ursacius and Valens, in this Council. Here end the Monuments taken out of the Works of St. Hilary, to which there is subjoin'd in some Copies, the Creed of the Nicene Council, the Creeds of Ariminum, and that which is attributed to St. Athanasius. These are the Pieces contain'd in the Fragments of St. Hilary, which might be read with more Pleasure and Profit, if they were dispos'd according to the Order of time which I have set down in the Notes (b).

The Book against Auxentius, Bishop of Milan, is a Manifesto against this Bishop, and against those that maintain him. Who, because they cover'd themselves chiefly under the Cloak of procuring Peace and Unity, St. Hilary says, That we can have no other true Peace, but that of Jesus Christ and the Gospel; and that this Peace cannot take place in a time when the Ministers of the Church are become Anti-Christs, by opposing the Doctrine of Jesus Christ and the Gospel, while they pretend to preach it. He complains, That they make use of Temporal Power, to maintain a False Doctrine. He endeavours to prove, that Auxentius, fosters Heretical Opinions; he recites the Conference that he had with him, and exhorts the Catholicks to take heed of Anti-Christ, and to separate themselves from Auxentius. After this Book, follows a Letter of Auxentius to the Emperor, wherein he endeavours to purge himself from the Heresie of Arius, yet without approving the Term Consubstantial, or rejecting the Creed of Ariminum.

The Commentaries of St. Hilary upon St. Matthew, are very excellent; for there he had made many very useful Historical and Moral Observations. The Chief of them are these following.

(b) According to the Order of Time which I have set down in the Notes.] These pieces are:

St. Hilary. In the 1ſt. Canon, he endeavours to reconcile the two Genealogies of Jeſus Chriſt, by ſaying, That St. Matthew deſcribes the Royal Race of Jeſus Chriſt, by Salomon; and St. Luke, the Sacerdotal Race, by Nathan. He maintains, That the Virgin was of the ſame Tribe, and the ſame Family with Joſeph; and that ſhe continued a Virgin after her Child-bearing, and that the Perſons who are call'd in Scripture, the Brethren of Jeſus Chriſt, were indeed, the Children of Joſeph, that he had by a former Wife. He ſays, That the Wiſe-men acknowledg'd the Royal Power of Jeſus Chriſt, by preſenting him with Gold, his Divinity by offering him Incenſe, and his Humanity by giving him Myrrh. He obſerves, that Rachel who mourn'd for her Children, is a Figure of the Church, which having been a long time barren, became afterwards fruitful. He ſays, That the Innocents were made partakers of Eternal Life by the Martyrdom which they ſuffer'd.

In the 2d. Canon, he ſays, That Jeſus Chriſt did not cauſe St. John to Baptize him for the Purification of his Sins, ſince he was without Sin, but that Water might Sanctify us by Jeſus Chriſt. Then he ſpeaks of the Effects of Baptiſm. After Baptiſm, ſays he, the Holy Spirit deſcends upon the baptiz'd, he fills them with a Cœleſtial Unction, and makes them the adopted Children of God.

In the 3d. Canon, he explains the Temptations of Jeſus Chriſt, and ſpeaks of his Faſt for Forty Days. He ſays, that the Devil was ignorant of the Incarnation.

In the 4th. he explains the Beatitudes: He ſays, that none but the perfect Man who is wholly purified from his Sins, ſhall enjoy the Viſion of God. He obſerves, that Adultery is the only cauſe for which married Perſons can be Divorced. He condemns Oaths, Revenge and Vanity.

In the 5th. he ſends the Reader to a Book of St. Cyprian, for the Explication of the Lord's Prayer: He alſo mentions Tertullian; but he ſays of this laſt Author, that his following Errors deprived his Firſt Books of that Authority, which he could otherwiſe have allowed them. He occaſionally ſays, That the Soul is Corporeal.

In the 6th. Canon, he particularly recommends Good Works, without which all other Things are unprofitable to Salvation.

In the 7th. he explains allegorically the cure of the Leper, and of St. Peter's Mother-in-Law; underſtanding thoſe places of the curing of Sinners. He compares the Church to a Ship toſt with a Tempeſt; and towards the latter end, he obſerves, that we ought not to mention the Names of Dead Infidels, in the Commemoration of the Saints.

In the 8th. he diſcourſes particularly of the Fall of Human Nature by the Sin of the firſt Man, and of the Reparation of Mankind by Jeſus Chriſt.

In the 10th. he Adviſes Catholicks not to enter into the Churches of Hereticks. He obſerves, that nothing in the Eccleſiaſtical Miniſtry ought to be ſold for Money, and that the Eccleſiaſtical State ought not to be ambitious of obtaining Temporal Authority. He ſays, that at the End of the World, the Jews that ſhall be then alive, ſhall believe in Jeſus Chriſt, and be ſaved. He aſſures us, that Man was created Free, but that the Sin of Adam enſlaved him to Sin and Vice; and that in Baptiſm we are delivered by the Word from Sins, contracted by our Birth.

Towards the latter end of the 11th. he explains wherein the Eaſineſs of Chriſt's Yoke conſiſts excellently, and in a few Words. What is more Eaſy, ſays he, than the Yoke of Chriſt, and what is more Light than his Burthen? It is only to be obliging to all the World; To abſtain from committing Sin; To deſire that which is Good, not to deſire that which is Evil; To love our Neighbours; To hate no Body; To lay up for Eternity; Not to addict our ſelves to things preſent; Not to do to another, what we would not they ſhould do unto us.

In the 12th. he explains after the ſame manner as St. Athanaſius, the Blaſphemy againſt the Holy Ghoſt, by ſaying, that it is the denying of Jeſus Chriſt to be God.

In the 13th. he obſerves, that thoſe who are out of the Church, cannot underſtand the Word of God.

In the 14th. ſpeaking of St. Joſeph, he ſays, that he was a Lock-Smith, and not a Carpenter, as is commonly believed.

In the 15th. he obſerves that thoſe who are to be Baptized, make profeſſion of their Faith in Jeſus Chriſt, and of being firmly perſuaded of his Death and Reſurrection; and that their Actions may be agreeable to their Words; they paſs all the Time of the Paſſion of Chriſt, in Faſting, that ſo in ſome meaſure they may ſuffer with Jeſus Chriſt.

He ſpeaks in the 16th. of the Prerogative that St. Peter received, when Jeſus Chriſt gave him the Keys of his Church, after this manner: O happy Foundation of the Church, ſays he, in the change of your Name! O Rock, Worthy of the Building of Jeſus Chriſt, ſince it was to abrogate the Laws of Hell, to break its Gates, and to open all the Priſons of Death! O happy Porter of Heaven, to whom are entruſted the Keys of admiſſion into it, and whoſe Judgment on Earth, is a fore-judging of what is done in Heaven, ſince whatſoever he binds or looſes upon Earth, ſhall be bound or looſed in Heaven.

In the 18th. Canon he concludes with theſe Words of Jeſus Chriſt; The Angels of theſe Children ſee the Face of my Father. From whence, ſays he, it may be concluded, That the Angels rejoyce at the ſight of God, and that they preſide over the Prayers of the Faithful, which they offer continually to God. He ſays, thoſe who are bound on Earth by the Miniſters of Jeſus Chriſt, (that is, ſays he, thoſe whom the Miniſters of Jeſus Chriſt leave bound in their Sins,) and that thoſe who are looſed by receiving them unto the Grace of Salvation, upon the Declaration which they make, having obtained Pardon of their Sins, ſhall be bound and looſed in Heaven according to the Apoſtolical Judgment. St. Hilary.

In the 19th. after he has ſpoken of thoſe that voluntarily make themſelves Eunuchs to preſerve their Chaſtity, he ſpeaks of Riches, and the uſe we ſhould make of them. He ſays, that 'tis no crime to enjoy them, but that we ſhould obſerve Moderation, and employ them innocently: That 'tis dangerous to deſire to enrich our ſelves, and that an innocent Man finds himſelf overcharged, when he is taken up in purchaſing, in preſerving, and increaſing his Riches. From whence he concludes, That tho' 'tis not abſolutely impoſſible for a rich Man to be ſaved, yet very few of them ſhall be ſaved, becauſe it is ſo difficult a thing to make uſe of the Goods of this World, as we ought.

In the 20th. he affirms, That Moſes and Elias ſhall come with Jeſus Chriſt at the laſt Judgment, and that they ſhall be put to Death by Anti-Chriſt; he rejects the opinion of thoſe who thought that Enoch or Jeremy ſhould come before Jeſus Chriſt.

In the 23d. he ſays, That Spiritual Perſons ought not to entangle themſelves in the affairs of this World; but that they ought to render unto God that which is due, that is to ſay, their Heart, their Soul, their Will. He ſhews the Neceſſity of Loving God in order to Salvation.

In the 25th. he obſerves, that Nicholas, one of the Seven Deacons was a falſe Prophet and a Heretick, and that the laſt Judgment ſhall be given in the place where Chriſt ſuffered.

In the 26th. he ſpeaks of the uncertainty of the time of the laſt Judgment, and obſerves, That 'tis uſeful to keep all Men upon their Guard.

In the 27th. he obſerves, that tho' all Chriſtians are obliged to Watchfulneſs, yet the Princes of People, and the Biſhops are more particularly oblig'd to Watch over themſelves and their Flocks.

In the 30th. he aſſerts, that Judas was not preſent, when Jeſus Chriſt diſtributed the Sacrament, becauſe he was unworthy of thoſe Eternal Sacraments. He ſays, that when St. Peter ſaid ſo boldly that he would not be offended becauſe of Chriſt, he did not conſider the weakneſs of the Fleſh.

In the 31ſt. he thinks that Jeſus Chriſt had no fear of Death at all. He ſays, he was Conſecrated in the Sacrament of that Blood which he was to ſhed for the Remiſſion of Sins. [This Opinion ſeems not eaſily reconciled with the Account which the Evangeliſts give of the Agonies of our Saviour in the Garden, and upon the Croſs.]

In the 32d. he obſerves, that St. Peter's Denials were ſtill more and more Criminal. At Firſt, ſays he, he only anſwered, That he knew not what ſhe meant; then he denyed that he was of the Number of Chriſt's Diſciples; and at laſt, he ſaid, he knew him not: but preſently he wept, after that Fault, which he could not avoid, though he was fore-warned of it.

In the 33d. he ſays, that the Words of Jeſus Chriſt upon the Croſs, My God, my God, why haſt thou forſaken me? Belonged to his Body, which complained of its Separation from the Divine Word. He compares the Crime of thoſe who abuſe the Gifts given to the Church, with that of the Scribes and Phariſees, who gave Money to Judas to betray Jeſus Chriſt, and with the Soldiers who guarded his Sepulchre, that they might ſay, He was not riſen. Laſtly, he obſerves upon the Words of Jeſus Chriſt, Go and teach all Nations, baptizing them, &c. He obſerves, I ſay, That Inſtruction ought to precede Baptiſm, becauſe the Body ought not to receive the Sacrament of Baptiſm, unleſs the Soul has received the Truth of Faith.

There is a Preface prefix'd to the Commentaries of St. Hilary upon the Pſalms, wherein he treats of ſome Critical Queſtions. He ſays, that ſome Jews have divided the Pſalms into Five Books, and that others have enrolled them, The Pſalms; but for his part, he gives them the Title of, The Book of Pſalms. He maintains, that they were written by the Perſons whoſe Names they bear at the beginning, and is of Opinion, that thoſe that carry no Name, are written by the ſame Author with the laſt foregoing Pſalm, where the Name of ſome Author is to be found. He ſays, There are ſome that are falſly attributed to Jeremy, Haggai, and Zachary, ſince thoſe Names are not found in thoſe Copies of the Verſion of the Septuagint, which he thinks to be authentick. He objects to himſelf, that there is a Pſalm which bears the Name of Moſes, wherein Samuel is mentioned, who lived many Ages after. He contents himſelf with anſwering this difficulty by ſaying, that Moſes named Samuel by the Spirit of Prophecy. He attributes to Ezrah that Collection of the Pſalms which we have at preſent. He maintains, that all the Pſalms ought to be Expounded, with a reference to Jeſus Chriſt and the Goſpel. He obſerves that the Hebrews call the Pſalter Nabla, and he thinks that they never diſtinguiſhed the Pſalms at all. He makes the LXX. Interpreters Authors of their Diſtinction, and obſerves, that they have not always followed the Order of Time. From this Diſtribution, he paſſes on to the num-number of Canonical Books. He reckons 22 of them according to the Hebrews, and says, that some have added Tobit and Judith. He observes, that the Lord's Day is a Day of Prayer and of Rest for Christians; and that they are forbidden to Prostrate themselves, or Fast on that Day.

He explains afterwards the Titles of the Psalms in general *. He says, that those which are called Songs, were made to be sung without any Instrument of Musick; That those which are entituled Psalms, were made to be play'd upon Instruments of Musick without singing. That those which are called, Songs of a Psalm, were such as the Chorister Sung after the Instrument; but those which are called Psalms, of a Song, are such as the Chorister Sung before the Instrument of Musick. Lastly, that those which are called, in Psalms, are such wherein there is a change both of the Person and the Voice. He gives also some Moral Interpretations of those Titles, which are too useless to be repeated. After all, he says, that the Key for Understanding the Psalms is to enquire, what Person it is to whom they agree; for some of them agree to David, and others to Jesus Christ, and others to some Prophet, and so of the rest.

* [This Distinction of the Titles of the Psalms, is according to the LXX; in that Translation some Psalms are called ψαλμοί, Psalms: Others ᾠδαί, Songs: Others ψαλμοὶ ᾠδῆς, Psalms of a Song: Others ᾠδὴ ψαλμοῦ, Songs of a Psalm: Others again, ἐν ψαλμοῖς & ἐν ὕμνοις, in Psalms or Hymns.]

In his Commentary upon the First Psalm, he says, that there are three or four degrees of Happiness mark'd in those words, Blessed is the Man who hath not stood in the Counsel of the ungodly, and who hath not walked in the way of Sinners, and who hath not sat in the Chair of Infection. (According to the LXX, ἐν καθέδρᾳ λοιμῶν.) The first degree is, Not to be of the Number of the Impious, and the Hereticks: The Second, is not to be of the number of the Wicked, as the Covetous, the Drunkards, the Incontinent, the Proud, the Detractors, the Robbers, &c. who observe not the Discipline of the Church. The Third, is not to sit in the Chair of Infection. By this Chair, he understands the Cares and affairs of the World, which corrupt Men by an Infection, that is almost unavoidable. 'For though, says he, some Persons that enter upon Secular Office, and engage in the Affairs of 'the World, have a Holy and Religious Will, yet they 'are often corrupted by those affairs in which they are 'obliged to employ themselves, and the Rules of this World 'do not permit them to live according to the Maxims of 'Christianity.' He adds that those Three Degrees ought to be crowned with a Fourth, which is continual Meditation in the Law of God: That this Meditation, as well as Prayer, does not only consist in reading, or reciting the Holy Books, but in the Practice of those things which are prescribed and taught in them; and that 'tis not sufficient to do it out of Fear, but our Practice must proceed from Love and Good-will. He applies the rest of the Psalm to Jesus Christ, and observes, That he restores unto Man, that Immortality which the first Man had lost by his Sin; That the Impious shall be as it were annihilated by the Fire of Hell. He confesses, that they shall rise again at the Day of Judgment, but he maintains that they shall not there be judged at all, because they are already condemned; and that the Judgment shall be only for those, who having had Faith, did not live up to the Laws of Christianity. This Opinion is very singular, and we may believe that he took it from Origen. His next Observation is much more reasonable, which is this, That when it is said in Scripture, That God learns any thing; we must not understand it as if he were ignorant of it before; but only that he then gave to Men the Signs of his Knowledge: As when he says to Adam, Where art thou? This does not imply that he was ignorant of it before, but only that he had a Mind to put him to shame; And so again, when he says to Abraham, Now I know your Faith; this does not signifie that he knew it not before, but only that he had now proved it.

He begins his Commentary upon the second Psalm with this Observation, That this Psalm is called the first by St. Paul (Act. 13.) because in the Hebrew it is one continued Psalm with the first, tho' it has been since distinguished from it in the Version of the Septuagint. [In the common Editions of the New Testament, this is quoted as the second Psalm by St. Paul; and in the common Editions of the Hebrew Bible, the second Psalm is always distinguished from the first.] He says, that this Version was made in the time of Ptolomy, and that its Authors were the Successors of the Seventy appointed by Moses, who entrusted to them secret Mysteries, which he would not commit to Writing in his Books: That their Successors, instructed by this Tradition, have translated the Psalms according to those Notices which they had, and fixed the sense of many Hebrew Words which before were undetermined: That therefore the Version of the Septuagint, ought to be of great Authority, and is to be preferred before all other Versions, which have been made by such Persons as were ignorant of the Tradition which Moses left to the Synagogue. After he has made these Remarks (whether they be just or no, this is not a place to examine) he applies all that is said in this Psalm to Jesus Christ and his Church. He thinks that the first Words are spoken in the Person of God the Father, and that the following Words beginning at these, Let us break their Cords asunder, agree to the Apostles, understanding by these Cords, the Cords of Sin. He observes in this Psalm, That God has no need of any of his Creatures; so that God did not create them for himself, but for themselves: That when he requires Men to love and to fear him, this is not for any Profit that he can draw from their Service, but only that this Love and Fear may be serviceable to their own Salvation. He establishes Free-Will, and says, that Justice is the Consequence of our Good Will, and Happiness is the Reward of our Merits, and that Hell is the Punishment of Sins freely committed: That God does not put himself in a Passion to punish us, being no ways subject to Change, but that his Justice produces those Effects of Vengeance which Men attribute to Anger. So that he appears not to be angry, but when he would bring us to Repentance. He says upon these Words, Hearken O ye Kings of the Earth, that the true Royalty of a Man consists in conquering his Passions, and that the Kings of the Earth who are estranged from the Commandments of God are unhappy Kings. He observes, that the Motives of Fear and Joy are intermixed in this Psalm; that Fear may retain Men in Reverence and Devotion, and that Joy may temper this Fear. At last, he assures us, that after Death, the Impious are reserved in a place of torment unto the Day of Judgment; and that the Just are conducted by the Angels to the Mansions of the blessed in Abraham's Bosom.

St. Hilary.

In the Fragment of a Commentary upon the thirteenth Psalm, he discourses of the Necessity that Mankind lay under of having a Saviour and a Physician.

In his Commentary upon the fifteenth Psalm, he says, that this Psalm is nothing else but David's Prayer which he made to God, to beg of him the Knowledge of what a Man ought to do in order to the obtaining of eternal Blessedness. By the Tabernacles which he desires, we must understand, (says St. Hilary) the Multitude of these Churches that have been established since the Coming of Jesus Christ, who is this Mountain that David seeks after. He says, that good Works avail nothing without Faith in Jesus Christ. He seems to approve a Lye as necessary upon some Occasions; but he absolutely condemns Usury, and chiefly that which tends to the Ruin of the Poor: If ye be Christians, says he, wherefore do ye draw a temporal Profit from your Silver? Wherefore do ye not rather lay up for your selves a treasure in Heaven? If ye be Christians, wherefore do ye expect from Men a recompence of your Liberality? I do not say that you should give them your Goods; but at least you should be content to demand back again what you had lent, without robbing him of more. And remember ye, that he from whom ye exact this Usury is a poor Christian, for whom Christ was willing to be poor; Therefore when ye do good or evil to this poor Man, it is to Jesus Christ that ye do it, &c. He discourses against Pride and false Confidence. He says, that we must reprove with all possible Sweetness, if we would amend our Brother by it, and we must not use bloody Accusations, which only provoke him: That we must despise the Wicked with Freedom, and honour the Good with Humility, and resist the Powers with an holy Boldness, when they would oblige us to do Evil. He praises this Psalm, which, says he, should be written in the Hearts of Christians, and engraven upon their Memory: They ought to be intent upon it Night and Day, and to make it the subject of their Meditations. In effect, it contains the principal Rules of an holy Life.

He applies to Jesus Christ the 52d. Psalm, and exhorts the Rich not to put their Confidence in their Riches, and to make good use of them. He says, that the Just are at rest till the Day of Judgment, and that the Wicked are in Pain; that there is no Repentance after Death, because there is no more Freedom of Choice.

Upon these Words in the 53d. Psalm, The Fool hath said in his Heart, There is no God; he observes, that the Wicked commonly dare not speak out the Blasphemies that they have in their Hearts; that there is no Man but is convinced that there is a God, but the Pleasure that the Wicked take in committing Sin, makes them say, that there is no God. In the rest of this Commentary, he discourses of the Goodness of God, and the Corruption of Men. He excuses the Sin of St. Peter, and blames the Avarice of some Pastors, who eat up the People of God, as it is said in the Psalm. They make, says he, their Belly their God, as the Apostle speaks, they make a Trade of their Ministry, and enrich themselves with the Offerings and Gifts of their People; They make sumptuous Feasts under Pretence of Religion; They fill their Purses with the Beneficence of Christians, tho' the use of these Offerings was intended by the Apostles, only for their daily Food, who renounce the World, or are in want. He condemns those that flatter the Powers, because we must fear God more than Man.

He applies the 54*th*. Psalm to Jesus Christ. There you may find a pretty Moral Reflection upon the Disorders of the Tongue, to which the far greater part of Men are subject, either when they are angry, or when they complain; when they reproach, or when they flatter; or lastly, when

St. Hilary. they reprove others. He maintains in the Commentary upon this Pſalm, as well as in his Books of the Trinity, that Jeſus Chriſt did not really ſuffer.

He interprets alſo the 55th. Pſalm, of Jeſus Chriſt. In his Commentary upon it, you may find a good paſſage about Prayer. God deſpiſes (ſays he) the Prayers which are accompanied with Lightneſs and Diffidence, which are diſordered with the Cares of this Life, which are mixed with Deſires of worldly Good Things, and which do not bring forth the Fruit of good Works.

There is nothing conſiderable in the Commentaries upon the following Pſalms: You may find in that upon the 57th. his ſingular Opinion concerning the laſt Judgment, which we have already obſerved: In that upon the 64th. he approves the Vows that are made to perform certain Actions of Piety, ſuch as the Contempt of ones Body, the preſervation of our Chaſtity and Faſting. He aſſures us, that Men are Predeſtinated according to their Merits; he diſcourſes of the wonderful Effects of Baptiſm.

His Commentary upon Pſalm 119th. is very large and full of Moral Thoughts: He there diſtinguiſhes the Words which are often repeated in this Pſalm, the Law, the Commandments, the Teſtimonies, the Judgments, &c. and gives them ſuch ſenſes as are not very natural. He teaches, that Grace is neceſſary to the Obſervation of the Commandments of God; that the Beginning comes from our ſelves, but the Grace of God comes in to our help, and that afterwards it depends upon us, whether we will retain or reject this Grace: That all Men are ſubject to Sin; that their faults ſhall be expiated by the Fire of the laſt Judgment; He ſeems alſo to think that the Virgin Mary ſhall not be exempted from paſſing through this Fire; He obſerves, that a Miniſter of Jeſus Chriſt who preaches his Word, ſhould be without Blame; that he ſhould pray in the Night time; that a Chriſtian ſhould ſhun the pleaſures and the pride of the Men of this World; that to make our Actions perfect, they muſt be done from a principle of Love to God; that Celibacy is more perfect than a ſtate of Marriage; and that thoſe who are out of the Church, which is the Body of Jeſus Chriſt, are delivered up to the Devil. There are alſo in this Commentary, divers pretty Remarks about Almsgiving, Humility, the forbearing of thoſe things which are to others an occaſion of Scandal and Falling, about Faſting, about Charity, about Prayer, about the Attention we ſhould have in time of Prayer, and about many other Subjects.

In the Commentary upon Pſalm 121. he ſays, that God does not forſake us, but when we offend him by our Sins: He maintains, that the Juſt are in Abraham's Boſom till the Day of Judgment; he declaims againſt thoſe who live in Exceſs. He ſays, that in Baptiſm a Man is purged from his Sins, and exchanges his Vices for Virtues.

In Pſalm 123. he diſcourſes againſt Pride; and admirably deſcribes the Slavery into which the Paſſions of the Vicious precipitate them, in his Comment upon Pſalm 125; Theſe are his Words: Conſider, ſays he, a covetous Man, who deprives himſelf of all kind of Satisfaction, leſt he ſhould want Money; you may ſee him buſie, ſad, anxious, reſtleſs; his Mind is always full of fear, leſt he ſhould loſe what he has: He forgets Honeſty, neglects his Friends, and has no Civility: He has neither Religion, nor Sincerity. The ſame may be ſaid of other Paſſions: Into what an Abyſs of Infamy does a Man precipitate himſelf who is maſtered by the Paſſion of Love? Who can be more miſerable than he who is a Slave to Drunkenneſs? Can you ſee any thing more ſhameful than the Motions of a Man tranſported with Anger? &c.

In the Commentary upon Pſalm 127. he treats largely of the Fear of God. He ſays, That it is never ſpoken of in Scripture, but there are join'd with it many Conditions: That it conſiſts not in Terror; that 'tis not a Paſſion which proceeds from Nature, but a rational Motion excited by the Knowledge and Love of Goodneſs and Truth. Wherefore, ſays he, the Fear of God conſiſts entirely in Love. Perfect Charity perfects Fear. The Effects of this Love of God, are, to obey his Commandments, to follow his Precepts, to believe his Word, and to hope in his Promiſes.

In the Commentary upon Pſalm 129. he tells us, that 'tis in reſpect of the Soul that a Man is ſaid to be like God; that the Soul is ſpiritual, and the Angels are active Spirits, whom God makes uſe of to aſſiſt the Weakneſs of Men.

In his Commentary upon Pſalm 132. he obſerves, that the Woman which anointed the Head of Jeſus Chriſt was different from her that anointed his Feet. He takes notice that ſome have ſaid, that it was upon Mount Hermon the Angels deſcended to have Commerce with Women; but he rejects this Imagination, becauſe we cannot truſt thoſe things; but to that which is written in the Book of the Law.

In Pſalm 135. he reproves thoſe that are not attentive to what is read in the Church.

In the Comment on Pſalm 137. he obſerves, that true Repentance conſiſts in refraining from all thoſe Sins which we know our ſelves to have formerly committed, and in doing them no more.

In the Comment upon the following Pſalm, he blames the Miniſters of Jeſus Chriſt, who addict themſelves wholly to the Affairs of this World, that they may purchaſe temporal Riches. He ſays, that we are permitted to hate the Enemies of God; that is to ſay, as far as they are the Enemies of God, according to that excellent Saying, That we ſhould hate the Vices and love the Perſons. St. Hilary.

Upon Pſalm 140. he diſtinguiſhes four ſorts of Prayer, Deprecation, Oration, Petition, and Thankſgiving: And he ſays, that it belongs to our Humility to pray, to the Majeſty of God to be prayed unto; it belongs to our Faith to petition, and to our Gratitude to thank God for his Benefits. He deſcribes the Eaſineſs and Danger of offending God by the Sins of the Tongue. He obſerves that the Book of Wiſdom, which the Latins attribute to Salomon, paſſes among the Greeks and Hebrews for Jeſus the Son of Syrach's.

An infinite number of other Remarks might yet be drawn from theſe Commentaries, but theſe are ſufficient for our Deſign: For if we ſhould give an Account of all the Commentaries of Authors upon the Scripture, and all that they contain, we ſhould never have done. Wherefore we pray the Reader, that he would be content with theſe Extracts which we have made from the Commentaries of St. Hilary, which cannot but be too long already. 'Tis plain, that theſe Commentaries are almoſt wholly taken out of Origen. They contain many Allegories and many Moral Thoughts. There is much Wit and Learning obſervable in them. He adverti ſes the Reader often, that the Latin does not fully expreſs the ſenſe of the Greek word, which alſo diſcovers that this Work was taken from a Greek Commentary; and that he followed the Emphaſis of the Greek Words, the ſenſe whereof the Latin Tranſlator was obliged to expreſs. St. Jerome calls St. Hilary the Rhoſne of Latin Eloquence, Latinæ Eloquentiæ Rhodanum; alluding not only to the Country where he was born, but alſo to the Genius of his Stile, which is violent and rapid like the Courſe of the Rhoſne; for as this River by the Violence of its Waters carries all before it that hinders its Courſe; ſo St. Hilary raviſhes the Mind and Judgment, and extorts a Conſent by the Vehemence of his Expreſſions. His manner of expreſſing things ſmites, aſtoniſhes, overthrows, and perſuades. His Periods are commonly long and intricate, which renders him every-where obſcure, and almoſt unintelligible in ſome places. He often uſes barbarous terms, and there are ſome places in his Works, where there is no Syntax. He is full of Figures and Antitheſes; his Reaſons, tho' ſolid, yet are much improved by the lively and ſmart turn that he gives them. He does not ſpare his Adverſaries, but he ſpeaks to Powers and of Powers with an unparalell'd Freedom. He is partial to none, but is a rigid Cenſor of Manners, and a ſevere Defender of the Faith. Tho' St. Jerome ſays in his ſeventh Epiſtle to Leta, that one may read St. Hilary's Works without meeting any thing that is offenſive to Piety and Religion, inoffenſo decurrat pede; yet it muſt be confeſſed, that there are ſome Errors and ſome Expreſſions which are not agreeable to the Doctrine of the Church. One of the principal, is his Opinion concerning the Paſſion of Jeſus Chriſt. He thinks that he had no ſenſe of Pain, tho' he received upon his Body the Wounds and Blows which cauſe Pain. The Schoolmen have endeavoured to give a good ſenſe to this Expreſſion. Some have ſaid with the Maſter of the Sentences, that he does not deny, but Jeſus Chriſt felt Pain; but he denies that the Pain he had was the Effect of Sin, as it is in other Men. Others have ſaid, That he does not exclude his Sufferings, but the Neceſſity of ſuffering. Some have affirmed, that he ſpeaks in this place of the Divinity of Chriſt and not of his Humanity. But all theſe ſolutions appear to me to be groundleſs; and if one would excuſe St. Hilary, it might be better done by ſaying That the Words, Pain, Suffering, Fear, Sorrow, are not to be underſtood preciſely of the perception that is in the Senſes, but of the trouble that reſults from thence in the Soul and Spirit, of the uneaſineſs of Pain, or the ſenſible Commotions of Fear or Sorrow: And in this ſenſe it may be ſaid, that Jeſus Chriſt had no Pain, nor Fear; becauſe his Soul continued in a perfect Tranquility. St. Hilary had not very clear Notions concerning ſpiritual Beings; for in the fifth Canon of his Commentary upon St. Matthew, he ſays, That all Creatures are corporeal, and that the Souls which are in Bodies are corporeal Subſtances. He held alſo an intolerable Error concerning the laſt Judgment. I do not inſiſt upon ſome ſmaller Errors, as when in Canons 31, and 32. upon St. Matthew, he excuſes the Sin of St. Peter, when he ſays in Canon 16th. That the Words of Jeſus Chriſt, Get thee behind me, Satan, were not addreſſed to this Apoſtle; when he affirms in Canon 33d. that the Divinity of Jeſus Chriſt was ſeparated from his Humanity at the time of his Death; upon Pſalm 119. That the Virgin ſhall be purged by the Fire of the Day of Judgment; In Canon 14th. and upon Pſalm 129th. That God created the Soul of the firſt Man before his Body; In Canon 17th. That the World ſhall not continue above 6000 Years; In Canon 20th. That Moſes did not die, and that he ſhall come again at the Day of Judgment. But if this Father had ſome Errors of this nature, yet it muſt alſo be acknowledged, that he held a very Orthodox Doctrine about the chief Myſteries of Faith. He ſpeaks of the Attributes of God in a ſublime and noble Manner; He explains

St. Hilary. explains the Mystery of the Trinity with wonderful Clearness and Exactness. Every time that he speaks of the Mystery of the Incarnation, he uses the most proper Terms to express the Hypostatical Union of the two Natures in Jesus Christ. He explains the different Orders of the Angels and their Ministry. He makes Happiness to consist in the Vision of God, and says expressly, That the Good and Evil are happy or miserable before the Day of Judgment. He thinks, that on this Day there will be a Purgatorial Fire to expiate the Sins of the Just: He acknowledges the Fall of Mankind in Adam, Original Sin, and the Necessity of a Mediator. He attributes much to Free-Will and the Merit of Good-Works; and yet he admits the Necessity of the Grace of Jesus Christ, which he seems to subject to Free-Will. He alledges often the Authority of the Church, and is clearly of Opinion, that there is no Salvation out of her Communion. He ascribes wonderful Effects to Baptism, when it is received with good Dispositions. He says expresly in the eighth Book of the Trinity, That in the Eucharist we eat and drink the Body and Blood of Jesus Christ. He approves of Vows and Invocation of Saints; He praises Penance, Fasting and Celibacy: He condemns Simony, Usury and Luxury: In a word, his Writings are full of most pure Morality, and a most holy Discipline.

The Works of St. Hilary were printed at Paris in the year 1500 by Badius Ascensius: Afterwards Erasmus having corrected them, caused them to be printed at Basle in 1535. They were also printed in the same City in 1550, revised by Justus Lipsius. In 1572, Gillot published a new Edition of St. Hilary's Works, together with a Preface, which contains the Life of this Father, and some Notes: It was printed the same year at Paris. In 1605, this very Edition was reprinted more correctly, because some able Men, as Nicolaus Faber and Bongarsius, gave themselves the trouble to compare this Impression with many Manuscripts. There is added in this Edition, the Fragments of St. Hilary, which were published by the Pithoei, and printed at Paris in the year 1598, with an excellent Preface of Nicolaus Faber about these Fragments, and the Commentaries of St. Hilary upon the Psalms 13, 14, 149, and 150, which had not been published before. The same Edition has been printed anew at Paris in 1631, and 1652. Leunclavius has published under the Name of St. Hilary, a Confession of the Faith of the Trinity, Greek and Latin, printed at Basle in 1578. The Book of the Unity of the Father and the Son, was printed at the same place in 1528. There is a new Edition expected soon from the Benedictins.

LUCIFER CALARITANUS.

Lucifer Calaritanus. Lucifer, Bishop of Calaris, the Metropolitan City of the Isle of Sardinia, was deputed with Hilary and Pancratius, by Pope Liberius, to the Emperor Constantius, after the Fall of Vincentius of Capua. He came to the Council of Milan, held in the year 354, where he defended Athanasius and his Cause, with great Courage. The Emperor being provok'd by his Firmness, sent him into Banishment, where he was detained till the Reign of Julian; but they forced him many times to change his Habitation: For, at first, he was banished to Germanicia, a City of Syria, whereof Eudoxius was Bishop, afterwards to Eleutheroplis in Palæstine, where he was extremely tormented by Eutychus, Bishop of that City. At the Death of Constantius, he was found banished in Thebais, and he suffered also a fourth Banishment, the place whereof is not known: 'Twas at the time when he was in Palæstine, towards the year 356, that he wrote his Books. They are all against Constantius, in behalf of St. Athanasius and his Defenders. The two first, have no other Title, but, The Books in behalf of St. Athanasius against Constantius. The third, is entituled, Of Apostate Kings. The fourth, bears this Title, That we must not assemble with Hereticks. And the fifth, That we must not pardon those that offend against God.

All these Books are written with so much Heat and Boldness, that Lucifer must needs have a Soul fully prepared to suffer Martyrdom, when he wrote them, as is observed by St. Jerome. But that which is most surprizing is, that he was not contented with publishing of them, but also sent a Copy of them to Constantius, and caused them to be presented to him in his own Name. The Emperor being astonished at this Boldness, gave this Copy to Florentius, Grand-Master of his Palace, to send it to Lucifer, that he might declare, whether the Book was his or no. Lucifer confessed it openly, and acknowledged that it was by his Order, that it was presented to the Emperor. He had charged one named Bonosus, to report this at Court, and now made Answer to Florentius, who had written to him, that he was ready to suffer Death with Joy. It was probably upon this occasion, and at this time, that he added his last Book, entituled, That we should die for the Son of God. St. Athanasius understanding that Lucifer had undertaken his Defence with so much Courage, sent a Deacon to him named Eutychus, to carry a Letter in his Name, wherein, after he had testified the Obligation that he had laid upon the Church, he prays him to send him a Copy of his Works; which having received, he sent him a very obliging Letter of Thanks and translated them into Greek. We have now those Letters of St. Athanasius, the Letter of Florentius, and the Answer of Lucifer at the End of the Works of this Bishop of Calaris; and what we have said of the rest of his Life is taken out of St. Jerome, and a Petition presented to the Emperors Theodosius and Valentinian, by Marcellinus and Faustinus, two Luciferian Priests.

After the Death of Constantius, Lucifer obtained his Liberty, as well as the other Bishops that were banished for the Faith. He came to Antioch, and found the Church of that City in division. For after that Eustathius had been forced to leave it, many Catholicks did alway separate from those Bishops, that some would have set over them. They were not willing to acknowledge Meletius, who was then Bishop of Antioch, though they had nothing to reprehend in his Faith. These Catholicks were then governed only by Priests, and they were called Eustathians. Lucifer, a severe Man, and a rigorous Defender of Discipline, being come to Antioch, was persuaded, That Meletius was ordained by Arian Bishops, or such as were suspected of Arianism, and had communicated with them, and therefore could not be a lawful Bishop; whereupon he joined himself to the Eustathians, and Ordained Paulinus a Priest to be their Bishop. This Ordination, which still heightened the Division of the Church of Antioch, was disapproved by Eusebius of Vercellæ, who was sent to Antioch, in the Name of the Synod of Alexandria. He condemned the Conduct of Lucifer, and retired into the West, having no more hope of restoring Peace to the Church of Antioch; Lucifer, on the contrary, to maintain what he had done, resolved to have no more Conversation or Correspondence with any of the Bishops who had received into their Communion, those that had formerly signed the Arian Creeds. He withdraws therefore into his own Island, and separates from the Communion of almost all the Bishops of the World. He died in this Resolution, and left some Followers called Luciferians, who spread themselves over all the World.

The Works of Lucifer are written without Art and Eloquence, with much Heat and Passion; the Stile is harsh and barbarous; there is no Reasoning, nor Principles in any thing that he says. He only proposes Maxims, which he proves by the Testimonies and Examples of Scripture, whether they be pertinent to his Subject or no; from whence it comes to pass, that his Writings are nothing but a Collection of passages of Scripture mixed with Apostrophe's Applications and Reflections.

In the two Books against Constantius, he designs to prove, That this Emperor was very much to blame for endeavouring to compel the Bishops to condemn St. Athanasius, who was absent and Innocent. To prove this Truth, he produces abundance of Histories and Passages out of Scripture, which shew, first, That God condemns no Man without hearing him; And, secondly, That 'tis forbidden in Scripture to condemn any Man without hearing his Defence; thirdly, that those who shed the Blood of the Innocent, shall be most severely punished; fourthly, That Constantius has no right to command Bishops, because he is a prophane Person, a Heretick, and a Persecutor.

The Design of the Treatise Of Apostate Kings, is to prove by the Examples of many impious Kings, That the Success of Constantius, does not demonstrate, that he has any right to persecute the Orthodox Bishops, nor that his Doctrine is true.

The other Books shew their Arguments by their Titles. The first, is to shew, That we must neither assemble nor pray with the Arians, who are declared Hereticks: The second, is to justifie the severe Conduct of the Catholicks against the Arians, and the Liberty that they take to reprove them with boldness and vehemence, without sparing even the Powers themselves; that is to say, this Book is peculiarly designed to justify Lucifer, St. Hilary, and some other Catholicks, in their way of speaking to the Emperor Constantius. The last Book contains many Proofs of this Truth, That we must die for the Son of God: He blames the Emperor, Constantius, for his Impiety and Cruelty, and at the same time, he praises the Constancy of the Catholicks, who suffer Martyrdom with Joy, for the Defence of the Orthodox Faith. [Lucifer's Works, with the Letters of St. Athanasius and Florentius, were printed at Paris, in 8*vo*. by Johannes Tillius, Bishop of Meaux, in 1568. and afterwards inserted into the Bibliotheca Patrum.]

VICTORINUS of Africk.

Victorinus of Africk.

[Fabius] Marius Victorinus, born in Africk; after he had profeſſed Rhetorick for the ſpace of many years in the City of Rome, with ſo much Reputation, that a Statue was erected for him in one of the publick places of the City, did at laſt in his old Age, embrace the Chriſtian Religion. The ſtudying of Plato's Books, which he had tranſlated, gave him ſome reliſh for the Holy Scripture; for when he read it, he admired it, and ſo became a Chriſtian in his heart. He diſcovered this Inclination to his Friend Simplicianus, who exhorted him to enter into the Church of Chriſt, ſince he was perſuaded of the Truth of his Religion. Victorinus thinking it was ſufficient to know the Truth, anſwered him, as it were jeſting upon his Simplicity, And do the Walls then make Chriſtians? But at laſt, being confirmed in the Faith, by reading and meditating upon the Holy Scripture, and conſidering that Jeſus Chriſt would not own him at the Day of Judgment, if he ſhould be aſhamed to confeſs him publickly here; he ſays to his Friend Simplicianus, Let us go to Church; and after he had been ſome time a Catechumen, he was baptized in the preſence of all the People. St. Auſtin, reports this Hiſtory, B. VIII. of his Confeſſions, Ch. 2. which he ſays, he learned from St. Ambroſe. St. Jerome, places this Victorinus among the number of Eccleſiaſtical Writers, and obſerves, that he wrote Books againſt Arius, compoſed in a Logical Method, Dialectico More, which are very obſcure, and cannot be underſtood but by learned Men. He adds, that he had alſo written Commentaries upon the Apoſtle St. Paul, but he ſays in another place, that theſe Commentaries were almoſt uſeleſs, becauſe this Author having been wholly addicted to the Study of human Learning, did not underſtand the true ſenſe of the Holy Scripture.

We have at preſent thoſe four Books of Victorinus againſt Arius, which are printed in the Orthodoxographa, and in the Bibliothecæ Patrum; but beſides this Book which St. Jerome mentions, there are ſome other Tracts which bear the Name of the ſame Author. Theſe are in the Bibliothecæ Patrum, viz. one in Defence of the Word Conſubſtantial, three Hymns of the Trinity, and one Poem of the Maccabees: Sirmondus has alſo publiſh'd by it ſelf, in the Year 1630, a little Treatiſe againſt the Manichees, and another about the beginning of Day. All theſe Books are written in the ſame Stile, and by the ſame Author.

In the four Books againſt Arius, dedicated to Candidus, he refutes the Errors of this Heretick, and thoſe of his Followers; he proves there the Divinity of the Word, and defends the Conſubſtantiality: But he does it in ſo Scholaſtick and Intricate a way, that 'tis very difficult to comprehend his Arguments. One may find ſeveral Expreſſions about the Myſtery of the Trinity, that are ſcarce Senſe, and quite different from that way of ſpeaking which is us'd in the Holy Scripture, and by the Church of God. The Book in Defence of the Term Conſubſtantial, is a kind of Summary of thoſe Four Books.

The Treatiſe to Juſtinus, who was a Manichee, is written againſt the Error of thoſe Hereticks, who admitted two Principles of the World, and believ'd that the Fleſh was created by an Evil Principle. Victorinus refutes theſe two Errors in few words, and exhorts Juſtinus to acknowledge one God only. 'Suffer not any more, ſays he, my Friend 'Juſtinus, ſuffer not your ſelf, you who are of the City of 'Rome, to be abus'd by the Impieties of the Perſians, or 'Armenians. In vain do you macerate your ſelf with extraordinary Mortifications, for after you have made your 'ſelf lean by thoſe Auſterities, your Fleſh is of no other 'kind, than that which ſhall return to the Devil in darkneſs, who according to you, created it. I adviſe and require you to acknowledge, That God Almighty is he that 'created you, that ſo you may be truly the Temple of God, 'according to the Words of the Apoſtle, You are truly the Temple of God, and his Spirit dwelleth in you. If you have 'not the Honour to be the Temple of God, and to 'receive the Holy Spirit into you, Jeſus Chriſt is not come 'to ſave, but to deſtroy you; for if we are his, our Body 'and Soul muſt belong to him, and then it may be truly 'ſaid, That God is all in all; That he is the One, and only 'Almighty and Eternal Principle of the whole Univerſe, 'and perfectly Infinite, to whom be Honour and Glory.' This is the Concluſion of this Treatiſe which is pleaſanter and more intelligible than thoſe which are written againſt the Arians.

Victorinus of Africk.

In the little Tract about the beginning of Day, he endeavours to ſhew, That the Days of the Creation which are mention'd in Geneſis, do not begin at Night, but at the Morning, and end at the Morning of the Day following.

The Firſt and Third of his Hymns, are in commendation of the Myſtery of the moſt Holy Trinity, which he explains in many Words.

The Second, is a Prayer to God, and is rather in Proſe, like the Creed attributed to St. Athanaſius, than in Verſe.

The Poem of the Maccabees, is a Deſcription in Hexameter Verſe, of the Martyrdom of thoſe Seven Brethren. There is nothing extraordinary in this Poem; there is nothing Poetical in it, but ſome mean Imitations of Virgil, and for the moſt part, the Verſes are low and deſpicable.

The Commentaries of Victorinus upon St. Paul, have not yet been publiſh'd. Sirmondus found ſome Fragments of them in a Manuſcript, from which he took thoſe two little Treatiſes of which we have already ſpoken. But probably, he judg'd them not worth publiſhing, though he ſays in his Advertiſement, that the Stile of thoſe Commentaries is more clear and clean, than that of his Dogmatical Works.

There are many Philoſophical Books attributed to the ſame Victorinus, as his Commentaries upon Tully's Rhetorick, cited by Caſſiodorus in his Bibliotheca, and by Pope Sylveſter the II. in his Epiſtle 130, which have been Printed ſeveral times. There is alſo attributed to him the Verſion of Porphyrie's Iſagoge, which is amongſt Boetius's Works, a Book about Poetry, and ſome Books of Grammar. But thoſe ſort of Books ought not to come into our Bibliotheca, which ſhould contain none but Eccleſiaſtical Monuments.

St. PACIANUS.

St. Paciaanus.

ST. Paciaanus, Biſhop of Barcelona, no leſs Famous, ſays St. Jerome, for the Holineſs of his Life, than the Eloquence of his Diſcourſe, wrote many Books, among which there is one entituled, Cervus or The Hart, and ſome other Treatiſes againſt the Novatians. He died under the Reign of Theodoſius, towards the Year 380. We have three Letters of his againſt the Novatians addreſs'd to Sempronianus, who was of this Sect. An Exhortation to Repentance, and a Treatiſe or Sermon of Baptiſm, addreſs'd to the Catechumens. All theſe Pieces are written with much Wit and Eloquence.

The Firſt Letter to Sempronianus, has two Parts. In the Firſt, he makes uſe of the way of Preſcription from the Name and Authority of the Catholick Church, to ſhew, that the Sect of the Novatians, cannot be the Church of Jeſus Chriſt. In the Second, he refutes their Doctrine about Repentance. He obſerves at the beginning of the firſt Part, that ſince the coming of Jeſus Chriſt, there have appear'd an infinite Number of Sects, who have all been denominated from the Names of their Authors; that the Name of Catholick is continued only in the true Church; That the Novatians make one of thoſe Sects which are ſeparated from the Catholick Church; that they have forſaken the Tradition of the Church under pretence of Reformation. He oppoſes to them the Authority of the Antient Fathers of the Church, who were Succeſſors to the Apoſtles. 'Why 'ſhould not we, ſays he, have a Reſpect to the Authority 'of thoſe Apoſtolical Men? Shall we pay no Deference 'to the Teſtimony of St. Cyprian? Would we teach this 'Doctor? Are we wiſer than he? But what ſhall we ſay 'of ſo many Biſhops diſpers'd over all the World, who 'are united with theſe Saints? What ſhall we ſay of ſo 'many Venerable Old Men, of ſo many Martyrs, and ſo 'many Confeſſors? Is it for us to Reform them? Shall 'our times corrupted by Vice, efface the Venerable Antiquity of our Anceſtors?' My Name, ſays he, addreſſing himſelf to Sempronianus, is Chriſtian, and my Sir-Name, is Catholick. Chriſtianus mihi nomen eſt, Catholicus cognomen. He explains afterwards, the Name of Catholick, and tells us, that the moſt Learned ſay, that it ſignifies Obedient; and that according to others it means, one thro' all, and ſhews, that theſe two Significations agree to the Catholick Church, which alone is obedient to the Voice of Jeſus Chriſt, and which only is the ſame in all the World. After he has thus ſpoken of the Church, he proceeds to Penance, and ſo he enters into the Merits of the Queſtion: 'May it pleaſe God, ſays he, that none of the Faithful may 'ever ſtand in need of it; that no Man after Baptiſm may 'ever fall into the precipice of Sin; That ſo the Miniſters 'of Jeſus Chriſt may never be oblig'd to Preach and Apply long and tedious Remedies, for fear of Patronizing 'the Liberty of ſinning by flattering Sinners with their Remedies. Nevertheleſs, we allow this Mercy from our 'God, not to thoſe who are ſo happy as to preſerve their 'Innocence, but to thoſe who have been ſo unhappy as to 'loſe it by their Sins. It is not to the Sound, but to the 'Sick, that we Preach theſe Remedies. If the Evil Spirits 'have no more Power over the baptiz'd; if the Fraud of 'the

St. Paciaanus.

St. Pacianus.

'the Serpent which destroy'd the first Man, and gave so 'great occasion of Damnation to his Posterity, has ceas'd; 'If, I say, the Devil is gone out of the World; If we may 'sport our selves in Peace; If Man does not fall into many 'Sins of Thought, Word and Deed: Then let us not ac-'knowledge this Gift of God; Let us reject this Aid; Let 'us have no more Confessions; Let us no longer hearken 'to Sighs and Tears; Let Justice and Innocence proudly 'despise these Remedies. But if Man be subject to these 'Miseries, Let us no more accuse the Mercy of God, who 'has proposed these Remedies to our Diseases, and Rewards 'to those that preserve their Health; Let us no more ef-'face the Titles of God's Clemency by an unsupportable 'Rigour, nor hinder Sinners by an inflexible hardness from 'rejoycing in those Gifts which he has freely bestow'd up-'on them. 'Tis not we who give this Grace of our own 'Authority, but God himself who says, Be converted to 'me, &c.' After he has set down many Passages of Scripture, which prove, That God Pardons penitent Sinners, he proposes this Objection of the Novatians: God only, will you say, can grant Pardon of Sin; That's true, answers he, but what he does by his Ministers, he does by his own Power; For he says to his Apostles, Whatsoever ye shall bind on Earth, shall be bound in Heaven; and whatsoever ye shall loose on Earth, shall be loos'd in Heaven. But, perhaps, he did not give this Power to any but the Apostles? If this were true, then we must say, That they only had also Power to Baptize, to give the Holy Spirit, and to Purifie the Gentiles from their Sins: For in the same place, where he gives them Power to Administer the Sacrament of Baptism; he also gives them Power to loose Sinners. Either then these two Powers were peculiarly reserv'd to the Apostles, or they are both continued to their Successors, and therefore since it is certain that the Power of giving Baptism and Unction, is continued in the Bishops; that same must consequently be granted of the Power of binding and loosing. He adds, That whatever Power the Bishop has, he receiv'd it from the Apostles; That the right of administring Unction and Baptism, of Forgiving Sins, of Consecrating the Body of Jesus Christ, was devolv'd upon him, because he is Successor to the Apostles. He concludes this Letter with saying, I know very well, my dear Brother, that the Pardon of sins is not to be granted indifferently to all Sinners, and that they are not to be loos'd, before there be some Signs of the Will of God, that it should be done; That Absolution is not to be given, but with much precaution and discretion, after Sinners have sighed and wept long; and when the whole Church has pray'd for them, that so no Man may prevent the Judgment of Jesus Christ. If you would write your Thoughts more clearly to me, my dear Brother, I would Instruct you more fully. Sempronianus, having answered this Letter, St. Pacianus, confirmed the two Parts of his Letter, by two other Answers.

In the First, he proves what he had said concerning the Name of the Catholick Church; and as to what Sempronianus had objected, that the People of St. Cyprian had been treated as Apostates, as Sectaries, &c. He shews, that they did not commonly carry these Names, but on the contrary, were always call'd Catholicks, whereas Sempronianus cannot deny, but the Sect whereof he was, did bear the Name of Novatian. He answers afterwards to the Accusation of Sempronianus, founded upon his making use of a Verse of Virgil in his Letter, and shews, that a Bishop is allowed to know human Learning, and to make a profitable use of it. He answers also another Accusation against the Catholicks, concerning the Persecution which he pretends the Novatians had suffer'd from them. He says: 'That the Novatians must 'not attribute to the Catholicks the severity of some Prin-'ces who would not tolerate them; that this was not done 'upon the Complaint, and at the desire of Catholicks, but 'by the proper Motion of Christian Princes who espous'd 'the Interests of the Church; thus the Powers had reason 'to Protect the Innocent, and to make use of their Autho-'rity for the publick Good.' The rest of this Letter, respects some particular Debates between them, concerning the Persons of Novatian, St. Cyprian and Cornelius. St. Pacianus, defends and praises these two last, and accuses the first of Pride and Schism. In the last Letter to Sempronianus, he treats of Penance against Novatian. He says, that all the Doctrine of the Novatians, explain'd by Sempronianus, is contain'd in this Proposition, That Penance is not allowed after Baptism, because the Church cannot forgive Mortal Sin: and in short, That she destroys her self by receiving Sinners. 'Who is it, says he, that proposes this Doctrine? Is it Mo-'ses? Is it St. Paul? Is it Jesus Christ? No, it is Novatian. 'And who is this Novatian? Is he a Man pure and blame-'less, who has never forsaken the Church, who was law-'fully Ordain'd Bishop, and by the common Methods, 'succeeded in the room of a Bishop deceased? What do 'you mean, you will tell me? It suffices that he has taught 'this Doctrine. But still, when was it taught? Was it im-'mediately after the Passion of Jesus Christ? Not at all, 'it was after the Reign of Decius, 300 Years after Christ. 'But did this Man follow the Prophets? Was he a Pro-'phet? Did he raise the Dead? Did he work Miracles? 'Did he speak all sorts of Languages? For at least he 'ought to have these signs for establishing a new Gospel; 'and though he had, yet the Apostle assures us, that though 'an Angel should descend from Heaven to teach us a new 'Gospel, he should be accurs'd. Was there never any Per-'son, since the coming of Christ till Novatian, that under-'stood the Doctrine of Jesus Christ? and since the Reign 'of Decius, Is there none but Novatian in the way of Sal-'vation? But you will tell me, We do not acquiesce in 'Authority, we make use of Reason. But as to me, who 'hitherto have been settled in my Religion upon the Au-'thority and Tradition of the Church, and am satisfied with 'the Communion of this Antient Society, I will not now 'dissent from it, I will not seek after Disputes; and you 'who have separated from this Body and divided from your 'Mother, search in Books for every thing that is most se-'cret, that you may disturb those that are at rest. 'Tis not 'we, but you, that have raised this Dispute. But still let us 'hear what you say, let us examine your Reasons. You 'say, that the Church is a Body of Men regenerate by Wa-'ter and the Holy Spirit, who have not denied the Name 'of Christ, which is the Temple and House of God, the 'Pillar and Ground of Truth: we say the same also. 'But who has taken away from us this Living Water? 'Have we it not, we who draw from its Fountain? But 'you who are separated from it, how can you be regene-'rate by Baptism? How can the Holy Spirit, who has not 'deserted the Church, come upon you who are fall'n off 'from it? How can your People receive the Holy Spirit, 'since they are not Confirmed by Bishops, who have re-'ceiv'd the Sacerdotal Unction? Have not we had some 'Confessors and Martyrs? Yes, you will say, you have had; 'but they are now lost by receiving of Apostates. I will not 'tell you, that Novatian, while he was yet in the Church, 'wrote a Book to prove that we ought to receive them; 'but how do you prove that the whole Church is perish'd 'by receiving Penitent Sinners? If some Churches have 'shewn too great Indulgence, must others, who have not 'approved them, but have followed the old way, and pre-'served Peace, lose upon that account the Name of Chri-'stians?' He proves afterwards by many Reasons, that the Church by receiving Penitent Sinners, did not cease to be the Church, and that the Schism of Novatian made his Disciples lose the Title of the Sons of the Church. He strongly urges the Testimony of Novatian, who approved before his Separation, the Conduct of those that received the lapsed that were Penitent. He describes afterwards the Origin of the Sect of Novatians; and says, that Novatus an African Priest, being convicted in his own Country of many Crimes, came to Rome to avoid the Condemnation which he had deserved; and that being arriv'd there, he persuaded Novatian who was vexed that Cornelius was Ordained Bishop of Rome; he persuaded him, I say, to procure himself to be Ordained Bishop, and advis'd him for gaining his design, to object against Cornelius, the ill Conduct he observed in receiving Penitent Sinners. St. Pacianus enters upon this Matter, and justifies against the Novatians the Conduct of Cornelius, by shewing that we ought to receive Sinners to Penance; and that God has given his Church the Power of forgiving Sins. But at the same time, he takes Notice, that there is not the same reason of Penance as of Baptism, for the former ought to be accompanied with much Labour, with Tears and Sighs? He confutes the Objections of the Novatians, and shews, that the passage of St. Matthew, Whatsoever ye shall loose on Earth, shall be loos'd in Heaven, cannot be understood of Baptism. He proves all the Answers of Sempronianus to the Passages alledg'd in his first Letter to him, to be false. He objects to the Novatians their Hardheartedness, with reference to Penitents. He shews, That those of this Sect are not so pure, nor so Innocent as they boast themselves to be, and that there have been many Persons among them guilty of enormous Crimes. He opposes to them the Authority of St. Cyprian and Tertullian before his Fall. He ends with an Exhortation to Sempronianus to return into the Church.

He begins his exhortation to Repentance with an Introduction, wherein he observes, that oftentimes it were better not to mention some Sins than to reprove them; because the Sin is rather learned than restrained. He says, that the Book that he had written against the Play called Cervulus, or the Little Hart, had the misfortune to render that Immorality the more common. Concerning which, we may learn by the bye, That the Book of St. Pacianus, entituled, Cervus or Cervulus, the Little Hart, mentioned by St. Jerome, which is not extant, was composed against some Profane and Lacivious Play or Ceremony, wherein probably there were us'd indecent Postures. He adds, that this Treatise was written against the Heathens, who mocked at it, and that he was not to expect better success from this Exhortation to Repentance, which was addressed to the Christians of his own Dioceses. He says, that we cannot but Imagine that this Book was designed only for Penitents, since Penance, is as it were the Bond of all Ecclesiastical Discipline: For, says he, we must take care of Catechumens, that

St. Pacianus. they fall not into Sin; of the Faithful, that they relapſe not after they have been purified; and of Penitents, that they may receive quickly the Fruit of their Humiliation. After this, he divides his Diſcourſe into three Parts: He treats in the Firſt of the different ſorts of Sin, leſt any ſhould imagine that all Sins deſerve the ſame Puniſhment. In the Second, he diſcourſes of ſome Perſons that are aſhamed to make uſe of the Remedy of Penance, and ſo receive the Sacrament with an heart and mind polluted with Sin: They are fearful, ſays he, before Men, but impudent before God, they defile by their impure Hands, and by their corrupt Mouth, they defile, I ſay, that Altar which makes the Angels themſelves to tremble. The laſt part is of the Pains that they ſhall ſuffer who do no Penance, and of the Reward of thoſe that purifie themſelves by a true and ſincere Confeſſion of their Sins. In the Firſt Part he diſtinguiſhes Sins from Crimes. He averrs, that we muſt not imagine that Men are obliged to do Penance for an infinite number of ſmall Sins, from which no Perſon is exempt; That according to the Diſpenſation under the Old Teſtament, leſſer Faults were rigorouſly puniſhed, but Jeſus Chriſt is come to deliver us from this Yoke of the Law. Thus after Pardon (if a Man may ſo ſpeak) of an Infinite number of Sins, which need no Powerful Remedies to cure them, there remains a ſmall number which may be eaſily avoided, that deſerve a ſevere Puniſhment. Amongſt theſe he reckons Idolatry, Murder and Adultery: As for other Sins, ſays he, they may be cured by the Practice of good Works, Inhumanity by Civility, Injuries by Satisfaction, Sadneſs by Mirth, Harſhneſs by Sweetneſs, Lightneſs by Gravity; and ſo of other Vices which are puniſhed by the contrary Virtues. But what ſhall be the Puniſhment of Idolatry? What ſhall the Murderer do to expiate his Crime? What ſhall be the remedy of an Adulterer or Fornicator? Theſe are, my Brethren, Capital Sins, theſe are Mortal Sins. After he has terrified thoſe who have committed theſe Crimes, with the dreadful words of Fire and Brimſtone, and almoſt made them deſpair of Pardon, he adds, However you may be healed, if you begin to be ſenſible of the greatneſs of your Crime, and the ſtate to which you are reduced; if you have a fear that approaches near to Deſpair. I addreſs my ſelf firſt of all to you, who having committed thoſe Crimes refuſe to do Penance; you who are ſo timorous, after you have been ſo impudent; you who are aſhamed to do Penance after you have ſinned without bluſhing; you who are not aſhamed to commit thoſe Crimes, but are aſhamed to confeſs them; you who approach the Holy of Holies, with a Conſcience polluted by theſe Crimes, without trembling, when ye preſent your ſelves before the Altar; you who receive the Myſteries from the Hands of the Prieſts in the preſence of the Angels, as if ye were innocent; you who trample upon the Patience and Mercy of God, and preſent at his Altar a defiled Soul, and an unclean Body. After he has thus ſpoken a word to Impenitent Sinners, he repreſents to them the Puniſhments that God has threatned to thoſe that Approach unworthily to Holy things. He propoſes to them the terrible words of St. Paul, and exhorts them by moſt powerful Motives, and moſt convincing reaſons to diſcover the Wounds of their Conſcience. The Sick that are Prudent, ſays he, do not hide their Wounds from their Phyſicians, even thoſe that are in the moſt ſecret Parts. They ſuffer them to apply the Iron, the Fire, and Cauſticks to cure them; And ſhall a Sinner be afraid to purchaſe Eternal Life for a Little ſhame? ſhall he dread to diſcover his Sins to God, which are but ill hid from him? He that dares offend againſt God, why does he bluſh at any thing? would he rather Periſh without ſhame, than be aſhamed to Periſh? But though you ſhould be aſhamed to diſcover your Miſery to others, yet fear not to diſcover it to your Brethren, who bear a part in your unhappineſs. It does not become one Part of the Body to rejoyce in the evil that befalls another Member of the ſame Body, they ſuffer all the ſame Pain, and contribute to the Remedy. The Church conſiſts of the Faithful, and Jeſus Chriſt is in his Church, and ſo he that diſcovers his Sins to his Brethren, is aſſiſted by the Tears of the Church, and Abſolved by the Prayers of Jeſus Chriſt.

After this, he ſpeaks a word to thoſe, who under pretence of being willing to do Penance, lay open indeed their Wounds by Confeſſion, but know not what it is to do Penance, nor what the Remedies which muſt cure them; who are exactly like thoſe who diſcover their Wounds and Diſeaſes to Phyſicians, but neglect to bind up their Wounds, and to apply neceſſary Remedies; nay, encreaſe their Diſeaſe by taking contrary Remedies and pernicious Potions, and add new Crimes to their old Sins. What can I do for theſe, I who am a Biſhop. Says he, 'Tis very late to give them a Remedy, but yet if any of you be willing to ſuffer the Iron and the Fire, I can apply them: Behold the Razor which the Prophet preſents me. Turn ye, ſays he, to the Lord your God, with faſting, weeping and mourning, and ſighing, and break your Hearts; fear not this Inciſion, for David was very willing to endure it. He relates alſo many other examples of Penance, and reproves the Softneſs, the Pride, and Looſeneſs of the greateſt part of Chriſtians and Penitents. He blames them for not obſerving ſo much as the daily Exerciſes of Penance, which are made in the Preſence of the Biſhop; As to weep in the Sight of all the Church, to diſcover by the uncleanneſs of their Garments the regret they ought to have for loſing their Innocence, to Sigh, to Pray, to throw themſelves at the Feet of the Faithful, to deprive themſelves of Pleaſures, to proſtrate themſelves before the Prieſts, to hold the Hands of the Poor, to ſupplicate the Widows, to beſeech the whole Church, and implore its Prayers; and in ſhort, to try all ways poſſible to ſave their Souls. After this, he quickens the Penitents by the Fear of Eternal Puniſhments, which he repreſents to them in a moſt Pathetical manner, and invites them to Penance by the conſideration of the Mercy and Goodneſs of God, who deſires nothing but the Converſion of Sinners. St. Pacia. nus.

The Subject of the Treatiſe of Baptiſm addreſſed to the Faithful and the Catechumens, is ſet down by St. Pacian. in the beginning of his Diſcourſe, I will ſhew you, ſays he, in what condition we are Born, and how we are renewed by Baptiſm---- To make you underſtand this, I ſhall diſcover to you what the Gentiles are; what is the Fruit of Faith, and what are the Effects of Baptiſm. In order to the Explication of theſe Three Things, he obſerves, That by the Sin of Adam all Men were enſlaved to Death and Sin; That the Law of Moſes diſcovered this miſery very plainly but afforded no remedy at all; That ſo Sin reigned from Adam till Chriſt, who delivered Mankind from the Tyranny of Sin, becauſe as the Sin of the firſt Man was imputed to all his Poſterity, ſo the Righteouſneſs of Jeſus Chriſt was communicated to all Men by Baptiſm, and by the Aid of the Holy Spirit, provided that Faith precede. He adds, That this Regeneration cannot be perfected but by the Sacrament of Baptiſm, and Unction, and by the Miniſtry of the Prieſt. [For, ſays he, Baptiſm Purifies from Sins, and Unction brings down the Holy Spirit, and both the one and the other are applyed by the Hand and the Mouth of the Biſhop; the whole Man is Born again and renewed in Jeſus Chriſt, that we may lead a new Life, which ſhall never end; becauſe though this Body ſhall die, yet we ſhall always live in Jeſus Chriſt, in a Heavenly and eternal Life. He obſerves, that being delivered in Baptiſm from the bands of Sin, we renounce the Devil and the World; and if afterwards, by forgetting the Grace which we have received, we relapſe into a Crime, our Relapſe is almoſt irrecoverable; becauſe that Jeſus Chriſt ſuffered but once, and we cannot be waſhed and purified above once. He concludes with an Exhortation to thoſe that are newly Baptized, to preſerve the Grace which they have received, to Sin no more, to keep the Purity and Innocence of Baptiſm till the Day of Judgment, and to endeavour to obtain eternal Treaſures by their Prayers and Spiritual Labours.

These Extracts which we have drawn from the Writings of St. Pacianus, ſufficiently diſcover his Judgment, his Stile and Learning. There is hardly any of the Ancients that ſpeaks more clearly of the Efficacy of the Sacraments of Baptiſm, Confirmation and Penance: He attributes to Chryſm the effect of Confirmation, which is an Opinion very rare among the Latins, who attribute it to Impoſition of Hands. Though he ſpeaks advantageouſly of the Efficacy of the Sacraments, yet he requires very great Diſpoſitions in order to their producing ſuch Effects as they ought to have. He particularly recommends Publick Penance for the Sins of Idolatry, Murder, and Fornication; under which Three Sins muſt be comprehended all the Conſequents of them, which extend very far. He thinks that thoſe Sins cannot be pardoned but by Publick Penance. As to all other Sins, he does not believe it neceſſary to ſubmit to that Penance which the Canons of the Church enjoyned for them. He explains the Fall of all Mankind, that 'twas cauſed by the Sin of the Firſt Man, very clearly, and the unprofitableneſs of the Law, the neceſſity and Effects of the Incarnation of Jeſus Chriſt. He equally condemns the Rigour of the Novatians, and the Impenitence of ſome Sinners, as well as the heedleſneſs and ſoftneſs wherewith others perform their Penance. His Exhortations are lively and perſuaſive, his Thoughts well-weighed, his Proofs ſolid, his way of Writing pleaſant, his Stile elegant, and the Periods ſhort. In a word, Theſe little Tracts may paſs for Maſter-pieces in their kind, and theſe two Treatiſes may be looked upon as a perfect Model of Preaching, or exhortation to the People.

The Works of this Father were Publiſhed by Tilius, and Printed at Paris, with ſome other Books in 4to. in the Year 1538, by Guillardus; in 1655, in 8vo. by Melchior Goperus; and together with Hermas at Rome in 1564, in Folio; and in the Bibliotheca Patrum.

GREGORY.

GREGORY of Bætica.

Gregory of Bætica.

GRegory, Bishop of Elvira, a City of the Province of Bætica in Spain, wrote divers Treatises in a low Stile, and an elegant Book concerning the Faith; which were extant in the latter end of St. Jerome's time. We have in the Fragments of St. Hilary, a Letter of Eusebius of Vercellæ to this Bishop, where he commends him for the Constancy wherewith he defended the Faith of the Church, and resisted Hosius. Marcellus and Faustinus the Luciferians, tell us, in their Letter to Valentinian, the Emperor, that Hosius being ready to condemn him, was miraculously thrown upon the Ground, and lost the use of his Speech. But there is no probability that this Relation should be true as we have already shewn, when we Discoursed of Hosius. St. Jerome, in his Chronicle, joyns this Bishop with Lucifer Calaritanus, and observes, that they would never have any Correspondence with those that were suspected of Arianism. This joyned with the Honourable mention that Marcellinus and Faustinus make of this Bishop, may induce us to believe, that he was of the Judgment and Party of Lucifer. He flourished from the Year 357, till the latter end of that Century. The Ancients speak of him as a simple, plain, sincere Man, but a zealous Defender of the Faith. His Stile was no ways Sublime, if we believe St. Jerome. There have been printed under his Name at Rome, in the Year 1575, and in the Two first Editions of the Bibliothecæ Patrum, seven little Treatises against the Arians, which are thought to be the same with the Book concerning the Faith cited by St. Jerome: But it has since been discovered, that they were written by Faustinus a Luciferian Deacon, to whom the Abbot Trithemius attributes them. They are addressed to the Empress Galla Placidia, Sister to the Emperor Honorius, which discovers that they rather belong to Faustinus than Gregory of Bætica, who was dead when Placidia had the Title of Empress.

PHÆBADIUS.

Phæbadius.

PHæbadius (a) Bishop of Agen, having seen the Second Creed of Sirmium, composed by Potamius and subscribed by Hosius, wrote immediately a Treatise against this Creed. He assisted afterwards at the Council of Ariminum, held in 359, wherein he defended until the End of the Council, the Nicene Creed, and refused to Sign that which was there proposed. Neither Fear nor Threatnings could change his Resolution; but the Governor Taurus, seeing that his constancy was not to be overcome by these means, used Entreaties, and beseeched him with Tears to take more moderate Courses, that so he might release a great Number of Bishops, who had been shut up for the space of seven Months in one City, where they were distressed by the Rigour of the Winter, and the want of all things. He remonstrated to him, that if all the Bishops did not sign the Creed that was brought from the East, there would be no hopes that they should ever have permission to return from thence: In short, that he must fix his Resolution, and that he ought to follow the Example and Authority of many that had already signed. Phæbadius answered, that he was ready to go into Banishment, and suffer all sorts of Punishment, rather than do that which was desired of him, and that he would never receive a Creed made by the Arians. Some days passed in these Debates; but at last, seeing that there was no hopes left of obtaining Peace, he departed from his Resolution, after that Ursacius and Valens had declared, That the Profession of Faith, which they proposed, was Catholick, and that those to whom it appeared not sufficient, might add to it what they thought fit. This Proposition was favourably received by all the Western Bishops: Phœbadius and Servatio Tungrensis drew up Declarations, wherein they Condemned Arius and his impious Doctrine, acknowledging that the Son of God was without Beginning, and that he was not a Creature. But Ursacius and Valens, added maliciously, that he was not a Creature as others are; and so deceived the Bishops who signed with those Declarations, the Creed composed at Nice by the Bishops of the East. Phœbadius, being upon his return into his own Country, was one of those Bishops who were most troubled for their Fault, and who atoned for it, by Declarations and Protestations against what they had done by Surprise: He assisted at the Council of Valentia in 374. We have a Letter of St. Ambrose, addressed to him and Delphinius, Bishop of Bordeaux. St. Jerome assures us in his Book of Illustrious Men, that Phœbadius lived in his time, and that he was then extreamly old: He adds, That he also wrote some other Books, besides that which we have already mentioned. The Memory of this Saint, is particularly honoured at Agen, where he is commonly called St. Fiari.

We have still extant in the Bibliothecæ Patrum, a Treatise of this Bishop, against the Second Creed of Sirmium, which was first published by Pithœus, in a Collection of Antient French Ecclesiastical Authors, printed by Nivelle, in the Year 1589. This Treatise is a refutation of the Second Creed of Sirmium, composed by Potamius, Bishop of Lisbon, and Signed by Hosius Bishop of Corduba. In the Exordium, he says, that if the greater part of Christians had not been circumvented by the Artifices of the Devil, who makes them take Heresie for Faith, and condemn the Faith for Heresie; he had not undertaken to say any thing of this Writing, which was sent a little while ago into France: That he could be content to continue Firm in his own Faith, without medling with the Examination of other Men's: 'But since, says he, we are reduced to this Condition, that 'we must necessarily embrace Heresie, that we may be called Catholicks, or cease to be Catholicks by not rejecting 'Heresie; we find our selves obliged to discover the Poyson of Heresie hid under the appearance of Religion, and 'to lay open that Error, which is Wrapt up in such Terms, 'as appear at first sight to be Innocent, that so Falshood 'being discovered, the oppressed Truth may at last take 'Breath. We must destroy the Opinions of Strangers, that 'ours may be believed, and so in refuting Error, I shall 'prove at the same time, The Truth of my Creed, and 'demonstrate my self to be a Catholick to those that are 'not over-awed by fear, nor bribed by Ambition.' After this, he examines the Second Creed of Sirmium, discovers the Malignity of it, and refutes by Testimonies of Scripture, the Errors that it contains about the Trinity. He speaks also occasionally of the Mystery of the Incarnation, while he refutes a Letter of Potamius; who had affirmed, that by the Incarnation of the Word, God was rendered passible, and that the Son of God, and the Flesh of Man, were become as it were, a Third Person, who was neither God nor Man. He Disputes against this Opinion, shewing by Scripture, That the Two Substances, or the Two Natures, continued without mixture in the Person of Jesus Christ; That the Word did still preserve the properties of the Divine Nature, and the Humanity of the Human Nature. He is very Angry afterwards, that they suppressed the Word Substance, which was ordered by the Creed, that he examines. The Bishops, says he, make an Edict, whereby they decree, That no Person shall speak of One Substance. 'Alas, what have you 'done, O ye Holy Bishops, Assembled at Nice from all 'parts of the World? you have to no purpose Composed 'with admirable Circumspection, a Creed which should be 'the Infallible Rule of Truth? To what End was your Labour designed? What is the Fruit of your Care? 'Tis now 'forbidden to teach in the Church, the only Thing which 'you commanded to be taught there for the Confounding 'of Error. That is now condemned, which you approved; 'and that is now approved, which you condemned; Falshood 'is maintained, and the Truth is opposed. But in vain do they 'strive to do it, for Truth shall never be destroyed, it shall 'remain eternally without Change, and shall punish those 'that set themselves against it. Let no Man, say they, make 'use of the Word Substance. Ha, what Evil, what Crime is 'it, to make use of this Word? Wherein does it wound the 'Faith? Is it the Sound? Is it the Sense?' Afterwards he makes it appear, That this Word is used in Scripture; That the Sense of it is most Catholick, and that 'tis most proper to expound the Faith of the Church in such a manner, as it may not be capable of any further Explication. At the End of this Treatise, he refutes those that say, The Word of God suffered Pain. At last, he concludes with saying, That there is but One only God in Three Persons. 'This is 'what we believe, this is what we defend, what the Prophets have taught us, what the Gospel Preaches to us, 'what the Apostles left us by Tradition, what the Martyrs confessed in their Sufferings. This is the Faith which 'is engraven on the Hearts and Minds of the Faithful; and 'when an Angel shall descend from Heaven and teach the 'contrary, he shall be accursed.' He adds afterwards, as a kind of an appendix, when he speaks of Hosius, Bishop of Corduba: 'I know very well, says he, that the Name of 'Hosius, that Antient Bishop, may be objected to me, whose 'Faith was always so Firm, and I doubt not, but they 'will make use of his Authority, as a Buckler to cover the 'Opinion that is contrary to ours. But I answer in a word

(a) PHæbadius.] Sulpitius Severus, calls him Fegadius; in St. Jerome, and the Greek Translator of his Book, he is called Ebadius, which is a Fault in the Latin, and ought to be read Phebadius, as it is in the Manuscripts. There is also by mistake in St. Ambrose Fygadius.

to thoſe who will make uſe of theſe Arms, that his Authority cannot be alledged as an unanſwerable Argument, becauſe either he is at preſent in an Error, or elſe he always was ſo. The World knows what he believed till this preſent time, with what Aſſurance he approved the Sardican and Nicene Doctrine which I defend, and with what Rigor he condemned the Arians. But if he be at preſent of another opinion, if he maintains now what he always condemned heretofore, if he condemns now what he always maintained, How can his Authority be objected to me? If he was in an Error for 82 years together, How comes it to paſs, that I muſt believe, that at this Age he found out the Truth? But ſuppoſe I could believe it, What Judgment can be given of thoſe who died in the Faith of the ſame Doctrine which he maintained before he altered his Opinion? what Judgment would he have given of himſelf, if he had died before that Council wherein he changed? And ſo the Prejudice drawn from the Authority of Hoſius, is of no conſideration, becauſe it oppoſes it ſelf: Beſides that, we read in the Scripture, that the Righteouſneſs of a Judge, ſhall not ſave him, when he ſhall depart from it. Phabadius

I was very willing to ſet down this paſſage entire, becauſe it may be of great uſe to weak Perſons, who ſuffer themſelves to be drawn into Errors, by the Authority of thoſe whom they highly eſteem and value. It ſerves alſo to diſcover, that the greateſt Men are ſubject to great Infirmities, and that therefore we muſt not follow their Example blindly, eſpecially when Religion is the Matter in queſtion; and that the only infallible Rule to which we ſhould adhere, is the Authority of the Church, to which we ought to pay a blind Obedience, and without reſerve.

To conclude, this Tract is written very politely, the Stile is clear and clean, the Subject is handled very plainly; and there are ſometimes Sallies of Wit, which diſcover that the Author wrote with much Vigor and Eaſineſs.

St. OPTATUS.

S.Optatus.

ST. Optatus (a), Biſhop of Milevi (b), a City of Numidia, wrote under the Reign of Valens and Valentinian, about the year 370, his Books of the Schiſm of the Donatiſts, againſt Parmenianus, a Biſhop of that Sect. There is nothing in particular, known of the Life of this Author. He died, according to the Teſtimony of St. Jerome, under the Reign of Valentinian (c). St. Auſtin and St. Fulgentius, cite him with great Commendation, and he has been numbred among the Saints, becauſe of the ſervice he did the Church, by this excellent Book which he compoſed in its Defence. It was divided into ſix Books, in St. Jerome's time: There is a ſeventh now extant, but 'tis very probable, that 'tis ſuppoſititious. Firſt of all, becauſe Optatus himſelf in his firſt Book, divides his Treatiſe into ſix Books, without mentioning a ſeventh. Secondly, becauſe St. Jerome ſays, that Optatus wrote but ſix Books againſt the Schiſm of the Donatiſts. Thirdly, becauſe the Stile of the laſt Book (d), comes not near the Elegance and Sublimeneſs that is in the others. And laſtly, becauſe it contains Opinions contrary to thoſe that are in the other Books (e). This Book therefore was written by ſome African, who lived ſoon after St. Optatus (for it cannot be doubted but that the Book is antient) who thought he ought to make this Addition, which was afterwards attributed to this Father.

St. Optatus begins his firſt Book with words very full of Charity. He complains, that the Peace which Jeſus Chriſt left to his Church is diſturbed by the Schiſm and by the Actions of the Donatiſts: Yet he gives them the Name and Title of Brethren. 'Tho' they renounce us, ſays he, tho' 'all the World knows that they hate us, that they deteſt 'us; tho' they would not have us call them our Brethren, 'yet we will follow the Command of the Prophet Iſaiah, 'in ſaying unto them, Ye are nevertheleſs our Brethren, 'tho' ye be Evil: We have the ſame ſpiritual Birth, but our 'Actions are different.' Afterwards, he gives an Account of his undertaking to write to Parmenianus, whom he calls his Brother: He ſays, that he was the only Donatiſt with whom he could have a Conference in Writing, and he ſhews the Uſefulneſs of it: He obſerves, that this Biſhop in Writing againſt the Catholick Church, had written for it; ſo that it had not been neceſſary to have anſwered his Treatiſe, if he had not affirmed many things whereof he was not well-informed, as when he charges the Catholicks with deſiring Soldiers that they might perſecute the Donatiſts. He owns, that this is the only place in all the Books of Parmenianus which is againſt the Church; and that all others are either for the Catholicks only, as when he proves that there is but one Church only; or for the Catholicks and the Donatiſts, as when he ſhews that Hereticks have not the Sacraments of the Church; or laſtly, againſt the Donatiſts only, as when he ſpeaks of the Enormity of their Crime, who delivered up the Holy Books and made a Schiſm. He adds, That the Compariſon which Parmenianus has made of Baptiſm with Circumciſion, and the Flood, is honourable to the Church, which maintains, that there is but one only Baptiſm, as there was but one Circumciſion and one Flood.

Optatus having made this general Remark upon the Book of Parmenianus, gives an account of the Method he has obſerved in his Work; and then lays down a Scheme of his Refutation, and propoſes the ſubject of his Books. 'I ſhall 'begin, ſays he, firſt of all, with giving an Hiſtory of the 'Traditors and Schiſmaticks, with an account of their Abode, 'their Perſons, and their Names; that ſo it may be known 'who theſe are that are guilty of the Crimes that Parmenianus has condemned. Secondly, I muſt ſhew what is the 'Church, and where it is, becauſe there is but one only, 'and there cannot poſſibly be two Churches. Thirdly, I 'am to prove, that we did not deſire the Soldiers, and that 'we are not guilty of the Crimes which are ſaid to be done 'by thoſe, who would have procured a Re-Union. Fourthly, 'Twill be neceſſary to ſhew who is the Sinner, whoſe 'Sacrifice God refuſes, and whoſe Unction we muſt flee 'from. In the fifth Book, I ſhall treat of Baptiſm. In the '6th. I ſhall lay open your Errors and Deſigns.' This is the Argument of thoſe ſix Books of Optatus. In the firſt Book before we come to the Hiſtory of the Donatiſts, which is the Subject of it, we muſt obſerve a Miſtake of Parmenianus, who ſays, That the ſinful Fleſh being drowned in the Waters of Jordan, was purified from all its Stains. He reproves this paſſage of Parmenianus, becauſe from hence it would follow, either that the Fleſh of all Men was purified by the Baptiſm of Jeſus Chriſt; or that the Fleſh of Jeſus Chriſt was ſinful. But becauſe he foreſaw very well, that Parmenianus might explain his Meaning, by ſaying, that nothing elſe was intended by thoſe words, but that the Fleſh of Men was purified in the Fleſh of Jeſus Chriſt, therefore he ſhews that this Expreſſion is improper; for we never ſay, that a Chriſtian was baptized in the Fleſh of Jeſus Chriſt; but in the Name of Jeſus Chriſt. He adds, that the Fleſh of Jeſus Chriſt could not be baptized for the Remiſſion of Sins, ſince he had not committed any. At laſt, that he might not pardon Parmenianus in any thing, he blames him even for the term drown'd, which he uſes, and tells us, That he could only ſay of Pharaoh, that he continued at the bottom of the Waters, and not of Jeſus Chriſt, who deſcended into Jordan that he might come out of it, and who ſanctified the Waters of this River by his Deſcent. He ſays, that he cannot paſs over the Imprudence of Parmenianus, Who having given a Deſcription of the Flood and Circumciſion, and ſpoken in the praiſe of Baptiſm, ſhould go about (if I may ſay ſo) to raiſe from the dead the antient Hereticks, who were buried together with their Hereſies in Oblivion, and whoſe Names and Hereſies were unknown long ago in Africa, ſuch as Praxeas, Sabellius, Valentinus and others, who had been confuted in their time, by Victorinus of Paſſow, by Zepherinus of Rome, by Tertullian of Carthage, and other Defenders of the Catholick Church.

S.Optatus.

'Wherefore, ſays he, do ye make ſuch a War with the 'Dead, as does not concern the Affairs of our time? Is 'it becauſe ye have no proof that the Catholicks are Schiſ'maticks, therefore you would ſwell your Book with a 'Catalogue of the Names and Errors of the antient Here-

(a) ST. Optatus.] The Name of Optatus is very common among the Africans. St. Auſtin ſpeaks of many other Perſons of this Name, who are eaſily diſtinguiſhed from this Biſhop.

(b) Milevi.] Some Authors have thought that he was Biſhop of Malta, but this is a groſs Miſtake: Milevi is a City of Numidia in Africk, often mentioned in the African Councils.

(c) He died under the reign of Valentinian.] In B. II. he places in his Catalogue of Popes, Pope Siricius, who was not Biſhop of Rome till after the Death of Valentinian; which would cauſe a doubt of what St. Jerome ſays, if it were not eaſy for a Tranſcriber to add the Name of Siricius, when he copied out this Book after the Death of Optatus.

(d) The Stile of the laſt Book.] The Stile of it is flat, mean and weak, whereas the Stile of Optatus is ſublime, maſculine, and enriched with many Figures; there are alſo many terms, which appear not to be Optatus's. The Author of this Book treats of what Optatus had already handled in B. I. and III. and the beginning of the IV. which Repetition does alſo ſhew, that it is none of his.

(e) Opinions contrary to thoſe that are in the other Books.] This Author extenuates the Enormity of their Crime, who delivered up the Holy Books to be burnt; he denies that it was a Capital Crime, and endeavours to prove that it was light and pardonable. On the contrary, St. Optatus declares, B. I. that it was a great Sin, equal to that of Schiſm, and that thoſe who committed it, ſhould purchaſe ſome years of this Life, with the loſs of Eternal Life, which ſuppoſes, that this Crime was mortal, and deſerved Damnation; but the Author of the ſeventh Book, eſtabliſhes the contrary.

ticks?

S. Optatus.

'ticks? Why do ye speak of those who had no Sacraments 'which are common to us? Those that are in Health have 'no need of Remedies. Virtue and Innocence seek no help 'nor support but in themselves. Truth wants no far-fetch-'ed Proofs. None but the sick seek after Remedies; only 'the weak and sluggish trust to external Succours, and 'tis a sign of a Lye when Men take much pains to find 'out a Justification.' Parmenianus had not mentioned these Hereticks, but to tell us, that they had not the signs of a true Church; that their Churches were Strumpets who had no right to the Sacraments, and could not be the Spouses of Jesus Christ. Optatus was so far from refuting this Proposition, that he approved it, but he wondred that Parmenianus had joined the Schismaticks with them, since he himself was one of this Number.

'I see very well, says he to Parmenianus, that you know 'not who were the Authors of the Schism at Carthage. 'Look back to the Rise of this Affair, and you will see 'that you have condemned your selves, by joyning the 'Schismaticks to the Hereticks; for Cæcilian did not sepa-'rate from Majorinus your Predecessor, but Majorinus se-'parated from Cæcilian. 'Twas not Cæcilian that deserted 'the Chair of St. Peter, or St. Cyprian, but Majorinus, in 'whose Chair you sit, a Chair that is of no older Original 'than Majorinus himself.' This being so, he wonders that Parmenian should joyn the Schismatick with the Heretick, and should say of the former as well as the latter after this manner: How can a Man that is defiled, cleanse another by a false Baptism? How can an impure Man purifie? How can one that makes others fall, lift up those that are fallen down? How can one that is guilty, grant Pardon? or one that is condemned, absolve? Optatus confesses, that all this may be truly said of Hereticks who have corrupted the Creed, and have no share in the Sacraments of the Church; but he denies that this can be said of those that are only Schismaticks; who, as he thinks, may lawfully administer the Sacraments. To prove this, he shews the difference between Hereticks and Schismaticks. 'Two things, says he, are necessary to render the Church 'Catholick; The Confession of the true Faith, and the U-'nity of Hearts. Schism which breaks the Bond of Peace 'is begotten by Discord, nourished by Envy, and confir-'med by Disputes; thus impious Children forsake the Ca-'tholick Church their Mother, withdraw and separate them-'selves, as you have done, being cut off from the Church, 'and become Rebels and Enemies: But they innovate no-'thing in Doctrine, still retaining what they had learned 'from their Mother. The Hereticks on the contrary are 'Enemies to the Truth, Deserters of the true Creed, tho' 'they are begotten in the bosom of the Church, and being 'corrupted by their impious Errors, they call themselves 'Authors of their Sect.' Optatus concludes from these Definitions, That Hereticks can have no Baptism nor valid Sacraments, but that there is not the same Reason for Schismaticks, because they have preserved the true Sacraments of the Church, tho' they are separated from its Body. After this Digression, he returns to his Subject, and undertakes to prove historically, that the Authors of the Donatists are guilty of delivering up the Holy Books and making a Schism. 'Tis now, says he, 60 years and more since Africk was 'harrass'd with a violent Persecution, at which time you 'might have seen many Martyrs and Confessors; but there 'were also some Christians who yielded in this Day of Try-'al, and others who hid themselves: To say nothing of the 'Laity, Ministers, Deacons or Priests, there were even Bi-'shops, those that were the Heads and Chief of the Clergy, 'who delivered up the Books of the Divine Law, with an 'astonishing Impiety; and to preserve for some years this 'Mortal Life, exposed themselves to the Loss of Eternal 'Life. Donatus of Mascula, Victor of Rusiccadia, Marinus 'of Aquæ Tibilitanæ, Donatus of Calama, and Purpurius the 'Homicide of Limata, were of the number of those Bi-'shops, together with Menalius, who fearing to be accused 'of sacrificing, would not be present at the Assembly of 'of his Brethren. These Bishops and some others, whom 'we shall shew to have been your Authors, assembled to-'gether after the Persecution, on the 12th. of May in the 'City of Cirtha, in the House of Urbanus Carisius, because 'the Churches were not yet re-built. Secundus of Tigisis ha-'ving asked them, they confessed to him that they had de-'livered up the Holy Books; and when Purpurius objected 'the same thing to Secundus, they all began to murmur; so 'that Secundus being afraid of himself, followed the Advice 'of his Nephew Secundus, who counselled him to leave this 'Cause to the Judgment of God. The other Bishops, Victor 'Garbiensis, Felix of Rotarium, and Nabor of Centurio, were 'of the same opinion, and therefore, Secundus declared that 'all the Bishops should sit in the Council. Sometime after 'the same Bishops, Traditors and Murderers, ordained Ma-'jorinus Bishop of Carthage, in whose Chair Parmenianus 'now sits. Optatus having thus shewn that the Ring-leaders 'of the Donatists were Traditors, convicts them also of be-'ing the Authors of a Schism. In treating of this Separa-'tion, 'tis certain, says he, that there was but one Church 'in Africk, as there is in all other Parts of the World, be-'fore it was divided by the Bishops who ordained Majo-

'rinus. It is only to be enquired, who those were that re-'mained united to the body of the Church with all the World; 'and who they were that departed from it, who it was that 'sate in a Chair wherein he had no Predecessor, who those 'were that set up Altar against Altar, who he was that 'Ordained a Bishop in the room of another Bishop yet a-'live. All the World knows that this was done at Car-'thage after the Ordination of Cæcilian, and that it was done 'at the Instigation of Lucilla, a great Lady: This Woman 'had been reproved by the Arch-Deacon Cæcilian, even be-'fore the Persecution begun, because before receiving the 'spiritual Food and Drink, she had kissed the Bones of a 'dead Man, who was not publickly acknowledged for a 'Martyr, preferring thus the Carcass of a dead Man before 'the Cup of Salvation. She retired in great Anger, and very 'much enraged at this Reprimand. The Persecution came 'on, which hindered the Bishop from reducing her within 'the bounds of her Duty. In the mean time, a certain Dea-'con, named Felix, being cited to appear before the Tyrant, 'and accused of writing a defamatory Libel against him, 'hid himself in the House of Mensurius the Bishop; who 'being interrogated about this Fact, denyed it publickly, 'and upon his Denial, there came an Order from Court, 'importing, that if Mensurius did not bring forth the Dea-'con Felix, he should be sent to Court. When he had re-'ceived this Order, he was very much concerned; He had 'then in the Church a great number of Ornaments of Gold 'and Silver, which he durst neither hide under Ground, 'nor carry away with him; he trusted them with the most 'antient Men of his Church, believing them faithful, and 'made an Inventory of them, which he is said to have de-'livered to an old Woman, with this Charge, That if he 'did not return again, she should deliver it to him that 'should be chosen Bishop in his room. When he came to 'Court, he defended himself, and being permitted to return 'to Carthage, he died by the way. Liberty being restored 'to the Church of Africk, by an Edict of Maxentius, Bo-'trus and Celesius who were ambitious to be ordained Bi-'shops of Carthage, called together the neighbouring Bishops 'about this City, without summoning those of Numidia to 'come to them: Yet Cæcilian was chosen by the unani-'mous Suffrages of the People, and Ordained by Felix of 'Aptungis, and so Botrus and Celesius fail'd of their hopes. 'The Inventory of the Gold and Silver belonging to the 'Church, was delivered to Cecilian; who sends for the old 'Men that were entrusted with this Charge: who had al-'ready made it their own Property. When they saw them-'selves obliged to restore it, they alienated the People from 'the Communion of Cæcilian. Those who had intrigued 'for the See, did the same thing; and in short, Lucilla, an 'imperious and powerful Woman, who could not bear a 'Reproof, would not hold Communion with him, and hin-'dered those that belong'd to her from doing it. So the Schism 'was begun by the Passion of a furious Woman, nourish-'ed by the Ambition of Botrus and Celesius, and confirm-'ed by the Avarice of the Old Men. These three sorts of Per-'sons invented Accusations against Cæcilian, and endea-'voured to get his Ordination condemned. They fetched 'Secundus Bishop of Tigisis to Carthage: thither they came 'with the Bishops Traditors whom we have mentioned, and 'were received by the Covetous, Ambitious and Furious, 'that we named before, but not at all by the Catholicks, who 'had chosen Cæcilian. Not one of them durst enter into the 'Church where he was with all the People. Cæcilian took care 'to acquaint them, That if his Accusers had any thing to 'say or prove against him, they had nothing to do but appear. 'His Enemies could find nothing to blame in his Con-'duct. But they accus'd him that Ordained Cæcilian, of 'being a Traditor, making this Infamy rebound upon him. 'Cæcilian also told them, that if Felix had no Power to 'conferr Orders, as they pretended, they might Ordain him 'anew, as if he had been but a Deacon still: Purpurius 'then answer'd with his ordinary Malice: Very well, let 'him come; Let us make as if we would lay hands upon 'him to Ordain him Bishop, and instead of doing that, let 'us put him under Penance. This Design being discovered, 'the Catholicks detained Cæcilian, and hindered him from 'exposing himself to the fury of his Enemies. They must 'then either force him away as a Criminal, or Communi-'cate with him as an Innocent Man; The whole Church 'was full of People, the Episcopal Chair was filled, the 'Altar was in its place, that Altar on which the Pacifick 'Bishops had offered, as St. Cyprian, Lucianus and others. 'Nevertheless, they set up an Altar against this Altar, and 'make an Ordination against all the Laws. Majorinus a 'Domestick of Lucilla, who had been Reader when Cæci-'lian was Deacon, was Ordained by the Bishops of Nu-'midia, who had themselves confessed their Crimes, and 'Pardoned themselves. 'Tis plain then that Majorinus 'withdrew from the Church, and that those were the Ring-'leaders of the Donatists, who separated themselves, and de-'livered up the Holy Books.' After Optatus has thus proved that the Donatists were the Authors of the Schism which divided Africk, he shews by the Example of Corah, Dathan, and Abiram, that there is no Crime greater, or which de-ſerves a more ſevere Puniſhment than Schiſm: But not contenting himſelf with convicting the Donatiſts, he undertakes alſo to juſtifie Cæcilian; and proves that he was Innocent by the Judgment of the Council of Rome, which Condemned Donatus, and declared Cæcilian Innocent. He obſerves that the Ring-leaders of the Donatiſts had themſelves deſired Judges of Conſtantine, and that the Emperor had anſwered them in great Paſſion, Do ye deſire Judges of me, of me who am waiting for the Judgment of Heaven? He ſhews, that nevertheleſs, he gave them for Judges, Maternus Biſhop of Cologne, Rheticius Biſhop of Autun, and Marinus Biſhop of Arles; which Judges came to Rome, and there held a Council with Miltiades, and Fifteen Italian Biſhops: That Donatus was there condemned upon the Confeſſion that he made of having re-baptized and re-ordained the Biſhops which yielded in the time of Perſecution; that the Witneſſes which he had produced againſt Cæcilian having declared they had nothing to ſay againſt him, he was ſent back acquitted by the Sentence of all the Biſhops, and of Miltiades who concluded this Judgment: That the Donatiſts having appealed to the Emperor, he cryed out aloud, O ſtrange Fury! They appeal from us, as if we had given a Pagan Sentence. That the Emperor detained Cæcilian at Breſſia by the Sollicitation of Filuminus a Partiſan of Donatus. That there were ſent into Africk two Biſhops, Eunomius and Olympus, to declare where the Catholick Church was; That being come to Carthage, they were hindered from doing it by the Seditious Party of Donatus; That theſe two Biſhops made Oath in favour of Cæcilian; That Donatus came firſt to Carthage and Cæcilian followed him, after he had been declared Innocent by many Judgments. There remained now nothing more for Optatus to do, but to Vindicate Felix of Aptungis, who ordain'd Cæcilian, from the Calumny of being a Traditor, which he proves by the Information that Elianus the Proconſul had given about this Matter, who after a moſt ſtrict Enquiry made into it, had declar'd him Innocent of this Crime.

The ſecond Book of Optatus is concerning the Church. There he ſuppoſes as an unconteſted Principle, that there is but one only Church, which Jeſus Chriſt calls his Spouſe and his Dove. This Principle being ſuppos'd, he proves that the Party of the Donatiſts were not the Catholick Church; becauſe from thence it would follow, that the Church had periſhed in all other Parts of the World, and was encloſed in a little Corner of Africk; which was contrary to the Signification of the Catholick Church, that ſignifies a Society ſpread over all the Earth. He adds for Confirmation of this Truth, that thoſe who ſhut up the Church within ſuch narrow bounds defeated the Promiſe of Jeſus Chriſt; that they ſtraitned the Extent of God's Mercy, and gave the Lye to the Holy Spirit who has ſpoken by the Prophets. After he has made uſe of this general Reaſon againſt the Donatiſts, he proves that the Signs of the True Church do not in the leaſt agree to them. The firſt of thoſe Signs is the Chair, that is, the Succeſſion of Biſhops. He ſays to Parmenianus, that he cannot be ignorant of this Sign of the true Church; 'For you cannot deny, ſays he, but St. Peter, the Chief 'of the Apoſtles, eſtabliſhed an Epiſcopal Chair at Rome; this 'Chair was one, that all others might preſerve Unity by the 'Union they had with it; So that whoſoever ſet up a Chair a'gainſt it, was a Schiſmatick and an Offender. 'Twas then 'in this one Chair, which is the firſt Sign of the Church, 'that St. Peter firſt ſate; to St. Peter ſucceeded St. Linus, 'and after him others till Damaſus, who is now our Col'league: by whoſe means, all the Churches of the World 'are United with us in the ſame Communion, keeping 'Correſpondence by Circular Letters. As to your Party, 'which would willingly be thought to be the Church, en'quire after the Original of your Chair. You tell us, that 'you are a Part of the Roman Church, but this is a branch 'of your Error, which proceeds from the Root of Falſhood, 'and not from the Stock of Truth. If Macrobius be ask'd 'in what Chair he Sits, can he ſay, that it is in the Chair 'of St. Peter, which perhaps he never ſaw; for certainly 'he never went to the Sepulchre of the Apoſtles. He is 'diſobedient to the Command of the Apoſtle, who would 'have us Communicate to the Memory of the Saints; and 'the Relicks of the two Apoſtles, St. Peter and St. Paul 'are in the Church of Rome. Tell me, I pray, you if ever 'he could enter there, if ever he could offer in the Place 'where theſe Relicks are certainly kept. Macrobius your 'Brother, muſt then confeſs, that he ſate in the Place where 'Encolpius held the See; and if we could ask Encolpius, he 'muſt ſay, that he ſucceeded to Boniface of Balli, and Bo'niface to one Victor Garbienſis, whom ye ſent from Africk. 'This Victor is a Son without a Father, a Diſciple with'out a Maſter, a Succeſſor without a Predeceſſor, a Paſtor 'without a Flock, a Biſhop without a People. For we can'not call them a Flock or a People, who were ſo few, 'that they had not one of the forty Churches at Rome to 'keep their Aſſemblies in, and who were oblig'd to ſhut 'themſelves up in a Cave without the City, to keep their 'Conventicle there.' Optatus does not enlarge ſo much on the other Signs of the Church that are very obſcure, but he inſiſts particularly upon its Extent. 'Wherefore, ſays he, 'would you Unchurch an infinite Number of Chriſtians 'that are in the Eaſt and the Weſt? You are but a ſmall 'Number of Rebels who have oppos'd all the Churches of 'the World, with which ye have no Communion: You 'are alſo convicted of Falſhood, by the Sacrifices which 'ye offer; for I believe that you do not omit the Solemn 'Prayer that is made at theſe Sacrifices; I doubt not but 'you will ſay, that you offer Sacrifice for that Church 'which is one, and ſcatter'd over all the Earth. Now this 'Prayer convicts you of a Lye, for how can you offer Sa'crifice for one only Church, ſince you have divided it in'to two? How can you offer for the whole Church, ſince 'you are not within the Catholick Church?

S. Optatus.

Parmenianus objected to the Catholicks, that they had exercis'd Violence and Perſecution againſt them, and concluded from thence that they could not be the true Church, becauſe that ought never to be cruel, nor to feed it ſelf with the Fleſh and Blood of the Saints. Optatus anſwers him, that the Church had never Perſecuted them, and that he could Name none of the Church that had done it. He retorts this Charge upon the Donatiſts, by obſerving that in the time of the Emperor Conſtantine the Church enjoyed a profound Peace, and all its Members lived in wonderful Union; that then Pagans were forbidden to exerciſe their Sacrilegious Ceremonies, then the Devil groaned in their Temples where he was ſhut up, and then the Donatiſts were baniſhed into foreign Countries, leſt they ſhould diſturb the Peace of the Church: But no ſooner was Julian declared Emperor, but they begged his leave to return into their own Country, which he granted them very willingly, knowing that they were moſt fit to trouble the Peace of the Church. He obſerves, that with the ſame Edict by which he open'd the Pagan Temples, he alſo reſtored Liberty to them; That they had not ſo ſoon obtained it, but that they exercis'd horrible Violences in Africk. He accuſes the Donatiſts of tearing the Members of the Church, of driving away the Biſhops, of invading the Churches, of committing Murders, of killing two Deacons at the feet of the Altars, of rending Mens Garments, of dragging the Women, ſtifling the Children; and in fine, of violating every thing that was moſt Sacred. Your Biſhops, ſays he, cauſe the Euchariſt to be thrown to the Dogs, and preſently the Tokens of God's Anger appear; for the Dogs being enraged, turned upon their Maſters, and tore them as if they had been Thieves whom they never knew, the Juſtice of God making uſe of their Teeth to revenge this Sacrilege. They alſo caus'd a Bottle full of holy Oil to be thrown out at a Window, on purpoſe to break it: but though it was caſt down from a very high place, yet being ſupported by Angels, it fell upon the Stones without breaking. He accuſes alſo a Biſhop of their Party nam'd Felix, of abuſing a Virgin to whom himſelf had given the Veil, and of having afterwards deprived an antient Catholick Biſhop, 62 years Old, of his Biſhoprick, and put him under Penance. Here he makes a Digreſſion about the Vanity of the Donatiſts, who boaſted themſelves to be Holy and Innocent. Whence comes this Sanctity of yours, ſays he, which the Apoſtle St. John durſt not attribute to himſelf, ſeeing he ſays, If we ſay that we have no Sin, we deceive our ſelves, and the truth is not in us? He that ſpeaks after this manner, does prudently refer himſelf to the Mercy of God; for a Chriſtian may deſire Good, and endeavour to walk in the way of Salvation, but he cannot be perfect of himſelf: For though he does run, yet there will always remain ſomething to be done by God to perfect him; and 'tis neceſſary that he ſhould help a Man in his Weakneſs, for he is Perfection, and there was never any but Jeſus Chriſt the Son of God who was perfect; all other Men are imperfect. It belongs to us to will and to run, but God only can give Perfection. Jeſus Chriſt has not given us perfect Holineſs, but has only promis'd it. Optatus afterwards returns to his Subject, and goes on to charge the Donatiſts with the Crimes and Sacrileges which they had committed, and accuſes them of exorciſing and waſhing the Walls of Churches, of breaking down the Altars, of throwing the Euchariſt to Dogs, of making the People Swear by their Name, of ſhaving the Biſhops, and putting them under Penance, of ſparing neither Prieſts, Deacons, nor the Faithful, of reproaching the Innocent, and putting Chriſtians againſt their will under Penance; and in fine, of doing an infinite number of things againſt Piety and Chriſtian Charity.

In the third Book, Optatus vindicates the Church from thoſe Violences of which it was accus'd. In the firſt place, he ſays, that if ſome of thoſe Violences were committed by Macarius's Order, the Predeceſſors of the Donatiſts, gave occaſion to them, becauſe their Seditious Behaviour, oblig'd the Governor to call for Aid, which they no ſooner ſaw come to him, but they preſently fled of themſelves; and that none but thoſe that were moſt obſtinate had been Baniſhed. But then he maintains, that the Church did not contribute to this Perſecution in the leaſt; and that there was nothing of all this done by Her Advice; that ſhe neither wiſhed for it, nor knew of it, nor contributed any thing towards it; but the Juſtice of God alone, had ſent this Perſecution upon the Donatiſts, to revenge the Diſhonour they had done to the Waters of Baptiſm. Here Optatus makes a very obſcure Digreſſion concerning Baptiſm and the Church. And afterwards wards returning to his Subject, he says, that Paul and Macarius, were not sent by Constantine, to Persecute the Donatists, but to carry Alms; that Donatus being transported with Rage, demanded of them with unsupportable Pride, what the Emperor had in common with the Church: 'That 'from that time he carried on a Design of doing Injury to 'the Kings and Princes of the Earth, contrary to the Precept of St. Paul, who commands us to pray for them, 'that we may lead a quiet Life; For, says Optatus, the State 'is not in the Church, but the Church in the State; that is, in the Roman Empire. Thus St. Paul had reason to say, 'that we must pray for Kings, even when they made Profession of Paganism: But how much more reason have 'we to shew respect to a Christian Prince, one that is Religious and Fears God, and has sent Alms to the Poor. 'Wherefore then was Donatus transported with Fury? 'Wherefore did he refuse the Alms which the Emperor 'sent? His Officers said, that they were come to distribute 'Alms in all the Provinces, to those that would receive 'them; and Donatus told them, that he had written to all 'places, forbidding them to receive them. Does this look 'as if he took Care of those that are in Misery, or would 'relieve the Necessities of the Poor? God hath said, 'Tis I 'that make Rich and Poor. Can he not then give Riches 'to the Poor? Yes, but if he had given them to all the 'World, then sinners had wanted the means of expiating 'their Faults; for 'tis written, That as Water quenches Fire, 'so does an Alms expiate Sin. This being so, what Judgment should we give of him that would give to the Poor, 'and him that would hinder the giving? What would Donatus answer, if God should ask him, O Bishop, What 'do you think of Constantine? Do you take him for an Innocent Man, or a Sinner? If you believe him to be an 'Innocent Man, Why do ye not then receive the Presents 'of an Innocent Man? And if you believe him to be a Sinner, Why do ye not then permit him to give Alms, since 'tis for the Sinner that I have made the Poor?' Optatus adds, that Donatus had join'd with his Pride, a pitiless Disposition: That he would be considered as the Prince and Sovereign of Carthage; That he exalted himself above the Emperor, tho' there is nothing above the Emperor, but God only who makes Kings; That he despis'd his Brethren, and would not receive their Oblations; That he made those of his Party Swear by his Name, as if he had been God, and that he would have them carry his Name, instead of that of Jesus Christ. In the following Part of this Discourse, he proves, that the Donatists had not only brought upon themselves Persecution, by their Pride, and the Contempt they had testified of the Emperor; but also that 'twas they who had begun the War. That 'twas Donatus of Bagais, who had first gathered together a Multitude of Seditious Persons, whom he called Agnosticks or Circumcellians, to hinder Paul and Macarius from distributing their Alms. Optatus, describes the horrible Outrages of these desperate Fellows, and shews, that the Soldiers who came only to put a stop to these Disorders, being attacked by these Madmen, were obliged to defend themselves, and to beat them: That the Church nevertheless had no Hand in this, and that the Seditious could attribute it to none but themselves. He proceeds further, and shews, that they did justly suffer those Mischiefs, because they broke the Unity of the Church; that the Persecution which they endured, was an Evil that was necessary for procuring the Good of Peace and Union; that this Proceeding against them, was Authorized by the Examples of Moses, who put to Death 3000 Men, for Worshipping the Golden Calf; Of Phinehas, who killed two Persons for violating the Law of God in committing Adultery; and of Elias, who put to Death 450 false Prophets. The Donatists answered to these Instances, that we must put a great Difference between the Spirit of the Old Testament, and that of the New; That Jesus Christ had forbidden in the Gospel, the use of the Sword, when St. Peter drew it to cut off Malchus's Ear. Optatus, maintains to the contrary, that this Prohibition respected only the time and Circumstances of that Action of St. Peter; that Jesus Christ was come to suffer, and not to defend himself; that if St. Peter had compass'd what he designed, Mankind had not been delivered by the Death of the Messias: But as distrusting the Truth of this first Answer, which indeed is not very Solid, because the Advice of Jesus Christ, is general; he trys another Answer, and maintains, that Macarius did not use the Sword as St. Peter did, and that he was not the Author of any Persecution like that of the Pagan Emperors; That he would only oblige Christians to go all into the Church and Pray unto one and the same God in the Spirit of Peace and Unity; that those who suffered on this occasion were not Martyrs, since they had not Charity, without which, none can be crowned; that this cannot pass for a Persecution against the Church, but for a just Punishment of some Persons tha were refractory to the Church. He objects to the Donatists, their obliging some Catholicks to call themselves still Pagans, that they might re-baptize them. He observes, that they had spread about a Report when Paul and Macarius came into Africk; that those two Officers were to set up an Image of the Emperor upon the Altar at the time of Offering Sacrifice, but there was nothing done like it; that even those of their own Party who were present at the Sacrifices, had acknowledg'd that 'twas a Calumny, and that they saw nothing but the ordinary Ceremonies of the Church: In short, that there was nothing changed, nothing diminished, or added to the Sacrifice. He returns again to Macarius, and proposes to himself this Objection: If the Catholicks had not approved the Action of Macarius, they should have excommunicated him, which they did not do, and therefore are guilty of his Crime. He answers, that Macarius being no Bishop, they did not Communicate with him, as one Bishop does with other Bishops, and by consequence the Clergy could not be prophaned by his Communion, because a Lay-man has no right to Preach or to Teach, whereas a Bishop speaks to the People with Authority, beginning his Discourse, and ending it always with the Name of God. The Donatists, add, that Macarius ought not so much as to Communicate with Lay-men. Optatus, answers, that being a Minister of the Will of God, and discharging the Office of a Judge, who has Secular Authority in his Hand, the Church ought not to Excommunicate him; that moreover what he had done, might be defended by the Examples of Moses and Phinehas; but in short, that tho' we should confess that Macarius was Guilty, yet the Church could not Excommunicate him who was never accus'd; that there was no Accuser found, neither had he confess'd his Crime, and therefore the Ecclesiastical Judges could not condemn him, since it was forbidden to one and the same Person to be both Accuser and Judge at the same time.

S. Optatus.

In the Fourth Book, he refutes the Donatists for saying, that the Catholicks were such Sinners, that we should shun their Sacrifices, as it is said in Isaiah, ch. 66. and that we should not receive their Unction, as it is in Psalm 140. Optatus, after he has given this Caution in his Introduction, that Men ought not mutually to condemn one another, but to wait for the Judgment of God; and after having exhorted them to receive the Title of Brethren, which the Catholicks are willing to bestow upon them, he proves that those Accusations which they draw up against the Church, are rather applicable to themselves, than to the Catholicks. For proof of this, he sets down all the Characters of a wicked Man, which are given in Psal. 49. God hath said unto the Wicked, Why do they Preach my Precepts? Why do they open their Mouth to speak of my Law? Ye that hate Discipline, and have cast my Words behind you? You sit and speak against your Brother. If you see a Thief, you run along with him, and have made your self the Companion of Adulterers. He shews, that the Donatists cannot excuse themselves from these Crimes; that they hate Discipline, since they shun peace, since they re-baptize, and rob the Bishops of their Priesthood: That they Preach in their Pulpits against their Brethren; because under pretence of Preaching the Gospel they speak injurious Words against the Catholicks, and inspire those with hatred against them who hear their Sermons; That they endeavour to persuade them that according to the Apostolical Injunction they should shun them, they should not Salute them, nor wish them Good Morrow, though all this is to be understood only of Hereticks, whose Discourse creeps like a Serpent; that they joyn themselves with Thieves, since they correspond with the Devil to extirpate one part of the Flock of Jesus Christ. He describes this after a very pleasant manner. 'All Men, says he, that come into the 'World, tho' they be Born of Christian Parents, are filled 'with an unclean Spirit, which must be driven away by 'Baptism: This is done by the Exorcism which drives away this Spirit, and makes it fly into remote places. After this, the Heart of Man becomes a most pure Habitation. God enters and dwells there, according to that of 'the Apostle, We are the Temple of God. When therefore 'ye re-baptise Men, and exorcise them anew, and when ye 'say, O accursed, come forth of this Man, 'tis to God that 'ye speak after this manner, you drive him disgracefully 'out of this Man, and the Devil re-enters into his Heart.' This place of Optatus, is very express for proving Original Sin, and the Antiquity of Exorcisms. At last, Optatus shews, That the Donatists render themselves Companions of Adulterers, because they separate from the Church, which is the only lawful Spouse of Jesus Christ, to unite themselves with the Adulterers. He comes afterwards to the second Passage taken out of Psal. 140. Let not the Oyl of the wicked anoint my Head; and he observes that this should only be applyed to Jesus Christ, and that it is a Prayer, and not a precept; a Wish, and not a Command. Then he explains also two other Passages which Parmenianus had quoted against the Catholicks, and shews, that the first is to be understood of Adulterers or Hereticks; and the Second, of Jews, and that neither the one nor the other is applicable to Catholicks.

In the Fifth Book, Optatus proves, That the Donatists commit a great Crime, in reiterating Baptism, which Jesus Christ has commanded to be given but once only. He approves of the Commendations which Parmenianus has given this Sacrament, by saying, That it is the Life of Virtue the Death of Crimes, the Immortal Birth, the means of obtaining the Kingdom of Heaven, the Port of Innocence, and the Shipwrack of Sins. But he adds, That 'tis not he who gives this Sacrament of Baptiſm, that confers theſe Graces, but the Faith of him that receives it and the Vertue of the Trinity; and conſequently, that Baptiſm is not to be reiterated, which is Adminiſtred in the Name of the Trinity. He has alſo here a moſt Remarkable Reflection about the Rule which we ſhould Conſult in all Eccleſiaſtical Controverſies. 'We ask, ſays he, if it be lawful to repeat Bapt' tiſm given in the Name of the Trinity? Ye maintain, That 'it is lawful; we ſay, that it is forbidden. The People are 'in ſuſpence, between your affirming and our denying the 'ſame thing, and they can neither believe you nor us, for 'we are all fallible Men: Let us then ſearch after Judges 'in this Caſe. But where are they to be found? If they be 'Chriſtians, they are either of your Party or ours, and by 'conſequence cannot be Judges of our Difference. We 'muſt then enquire after a Judge out of Chriſtendom. But 'then if he be a Pagan, he underſtands not our Myſteries; 'if he be a Jew, he is an Enemy to the Baptiſm of Chri'ſtians. There cannot be therefore found any Judge upon 'Earth, but we muſt ſeek for one in Heaven. But why 'ſhould we have recourſe to Heaven, ſince we have the 'Teſtament of our Father upon Earth? Let us ſearch after 'his Will in the Goſpel, which will inform us, that he who 'has been once waſhed, needs not to be waſhed again. 'Wherefore, adds he, we do not re-baptize thoſe who 'have been baptized, when they return again to us.' He proves alſo, that it ought not to be done, becauſe there is but one Faith, one Jeſus Chriſt, and one Sacrament of Baptiſm: That there are Three Things to be conſidered in this Sacrament, the Trinity, the Faith of him that receives it, and the Perſon that adminiſters it: That the Trinity is the firſt Thing of abſolute neceſſity, without which there can be no Sacrament at all; That the Faith of him that receives the Sacrament, is the ſecond Thing, which is no leſs neceſſary, becauſe it ought always to be the ſame; but then there is not the ſame Neceſſity that the Miniſter ſhould be Faithful and Juſt, becauſe the Miniſters are changed every day, and it is Jeſus Chriſt who Baptizes, and the Miniſter ought not to attribute to himſelf the Effect of the Sacrament which is owing to God Only; and in ſhort, becauſe the Sacraments are Holy, and do Sanctify by themſelves, tho' the Holineſs of the Miniſter do not contribute to it. Optatus proves this Truth by many Reaſons, and many Teſtimonies. He obſerves by the bye, That thoſe who had been baptized by John, before Jeſus Chriſt inſtituted Baptiſm, were not re-baptized; but thoſe who were baptized, after Jeſus Chriſt had inſtituted Baptiſm, have been re-baptized. At laſt, he endeavours to prove, That the Faith of him that receives Baptiſm, is neceſſary to the Validity of this Sacrament, which muſt be underſtood of Adult Perſons only.

The Sixth Book is Written againſt the Impieties and Sacrileges of the Donatiſts, who had broken, cut in pieces, razed, and overturned the Altars of the Catholicks; Thoſe Altars, ſays Optatus, which have born the Offerings of the People, and the Members of Jeſus Chriſt, upon which the Almighty God has been invoked, upon which the Holy Spirit has deſcended, where the Faithful have received the earneſt of eternal Salvation, the Support of their Faith, and the Hopes of a bleſſed Reſurrection; thoſe Altars upon which we are forbidden to offer any other offerings, but thoſe of Peace. For what is the Altar, but the place where the Body and Blood of Jeſus Chriſt are laid? 'What hath Jeſus Chriſt done to you, ſays he further to the Do'natiſts, that you ſhould deſtroy the Altars on which he 'reſts at certain Times? Why do ye break the ſacred Ta'bles where Jeſus Chriſt makes his abode? Ye have imi'tated the Crime of the Jews, for as they put Jeſus Chriſt 'to Death upon the Croſs, ſo ye have beaten him upon 'theſe altars. If you believe that the Euchariſt of the Ca'tholicks is Sacrilegious, yet at leaſt you ſhould have ſome 'reſpect to the former Offerings that your ſelves have made 'upon theſe Altars. Upon this Occaſion, Optatus puts a 'very pleaſant Objection to them: All the Faithful know, 'ſays he, that Linen Cloaths are laid upon the Altars, 'for the Celebration of the Holy Myſteries. The Eucha'riſt does not touch the Wood of the Altar, but only the 'Linen Clothes: Why then do ye break? Why do ye 'ſcrape? Why do ye burn the Wood of the Altar? If the 'Impurity can paſs through the Linen, why cannot it pe'netrate the Wood, nay, and the Ground alſo? If there'fore ye ſcrape off ſomething from the Altars becauſe they 'are impure, I adviſe you alſo to dig into the Ground, 'and there to make a great Ditch, that ye may offer in a 'moſt pure Place: But take heed that ye do not dig down 'to Hell, where you will find your Maſters, Corah, Dathan, 'and Abiram.' So pleaſantly does Optatus ridicule the folly of the Donatiſts. But from this Raillery, he quickly paſſes to moſt bloody Accuſations. 'Ye have alſo redoubled your 'Sacrileges in breaking the Chalices which carried the Blood 'of Jeſus Chriſt; ye have melted them down to make In'gots of Gold or Silver, which you have Sold in the Mar'kets to every one indifferently, that have offered to buy 'them: Sacrilegious Perſons as you are, you have not 'ſhewn the leaſt reſpect to thoſe Chalices, wherein you 'your ſelves have offered. Perhaps, Infamous Women have 'bought them for their own uſe. Perhaps, the Pagans took 'them to make veſſels wherewith they might offer Incenſe 'to their Idols. O enormous Crime! O unheard of Impiety!' This Declamation of Optatus, clearly ſhews, what is the Reverence that we ought to pay to the Sacrament of the Euchariſt, and Evidently proves, that it was not conſidered merely as Bread and Wine, but that it was believed to be the Body and Blood of Jeſus Chriſt. The Donatiſts anſwered to theſe accuſations, That thoſe Veſſels having been touched by polluted Perſons, were thereby become unclean, as is ſaid by the Prophet Haggai, that which is touched by an impure Man, becomes unclean: From whence they concluded, that they had reaſon to make no further uſe of them, but to conſider them as common and ordinary Veſſels. Optatus anſwers them, by ſhewing, that the Catholicks were not defiled with any Crime; that they had not ſacrificed to Idols; that no ſuch Accuſation could be prov'd againſt them; that the only thing that could render them odious to the Donatiſts, was their Love of Peace, and their endeavours after Union; That they are united by Communion with all the Churches of the World, and that they cannot be accuſed of being defiled; but ſuppoſing that even the Catholicks were Unclean, yet the Veſſels which they touched at the Invocation of the Name of God, would not be ſo, becauſe that Sacred Name, Sanctifies even that which is unclean: That the touch of an unclean Perſon, has leſs power to render a Veſſel impure, than the Invocation of God has to purifie it, ſince 'tis the Invocation, and not the Touch that Sanctifies it.

S. Optatus.

[As if a belief that the Euchariſt was inſtituted for a Remembrance of the Death of Chriſt, and of the Benefits which we receive thereby, had not been ſufficient to have commanded Reverence to thoſe Inſtruments with which it was performed.]

The Second Accuſation that Optatus makes againſt the Donatiſts, is their putting under Penance the Virgins Conſecrated to God, and making them leave off the Signs of their former Profeſſion, and forcing them to deſire a new one, and doing violence unto them. In this Place, he ſpeaks of a little Mitre of Cloth, which they put upon their Heads, and of the Veil wherewith they covered them, and ſays, That theſe Ornaments were ſigns that they had profeſſed Virginity, and that the Donatiſts, by taking them away from thoſe Virgins to put them under Penance, had given occaſion to many Perſons to Raviſh and Marry them. He adds, that the Donatiſts had carryed away by force, the Ornaments of Churches, and the Holy Books, and that they had waſhed the Veſtments, the Walls, and the Floors of the Churches with Salt-Water. He laughs at their folly, and asks them, why they waſhed the Veſtments, and did not alſo waſh the Books of the Goſpel? Why they waſhed the Walls, which are only looked upon? And why they did not alſo waſh the Pavement of the Streets, and how they would make uſe of that Water wherewith the Catholicks had waſhed themſelves? At laſt, he accuſes them of invading the Cœmiteries, and hindering the Interment of the Catholicks. 'Wherefore do you abuſe the Dead, ſays he 'to them, that you may terrifie the Living? Why do you 'deny them Burial? If you have any Differences with your 'Brother while he is alive, yet Death ſhould put an End 'to them all. Why do you inſult over him after Death? 'why do you refuſe him Burial? Why do you quarrel 'even with the Dead? But ſays he, if you could hinder 'his Body from being Interred among other Chriſtians, 'yet you cannot ſeparate his Soul from the Company of 'thoſe Holy Souls that are with Jeſus Chriſt.' At laſt, Optatus, ſays, That the Donatiſts were ſo extravagantly wicked, that they corrupted all thoſe that came over to their Party: 'So thoſe that were Patient, ſays he, by going over 'to you, become Furious of the ſudden; thoſe that were 'Faithful, become Perfidious; thoſe that were Peaceable, 'become Quarrelſome; their Simplicity, is changed into 'Cheating; their Modeſty, into Impudence; Their Humi'lity, into Pride. Thoſe who are gone over to your Par'ty, ſollicit others to come after them, and accuſe of Sloth 'and Stupidity, all thoſe that are yet in the Boſom of the 'Church, they lay Traps for them, and make them to fall 'into the ſame precipice with themſelves.

The Laſt Book which is commonly attributed to Optatus, is a Recapitulation of ſome Points that have been handled in other places; particularly, he refutes the Objection of the Donatiſts, who ſay, they cannot re-unite themſelves to the Catholicks, becauſe they are the Sons and Succeſſors of Traditors. The Author of this Book, extenuates as much as he can the Enormity of this Crime, and ſhews, that tho' it were much greater, and that thoſe to whom the Catholick Biſhops ſucceed were guilty of it, yet they have no ſhare in that Guilt, neither can it be imputed to them, nor alledged

S. Optatus. alledged against them as a just cause of Separation. He shews, that we ought sometimes to suffer Sinners in the Church, and to dissemble the Sins of our Brethren for the good of Peace. He observes, that there is no Man free from Sin; and that if any one were so, yet he ought not to separate from his Brethren, though they were Sinners: That the Apostles did not separate from the Communion of St. Peter after his Sin; but on the contrary the Keys were given him, that he being a Sinner, might open the Gates of Heaven to the Innocent, and teach those that are Innocent, that they should not shut them against Sinners. Besides these, there are many other Repetitions of what had been said by Optatus concerning Macarius, and the Persecution that he raised against the Donatists.

Optatus at the end of his Books, had placed many authentick Instruments to justifie the Matters of Fact which he had proposed against the Donatists; we have none of those which Optatus placed there extant, but many other Monuments concerning the History of the Donatists have been added to his Books.

The First is a part of the Acts of the Conference between the Catholick Bishops and the Donatists, held at Carthage by the Order of the Emperor Honorius, in the Year 411, which belongs to another Century.

The Second, is part of the Verbal Process made by Zenophilus, who had been Consul, on the 30th. of December in the Year 320, by which it appears, that Silvanus who ordained Majorinus, had given up the Holy Books to the Heathens: Zenophilus there examines a Grammarian named Victor, a Deacon named Castus, and a Sub-Deacon called Crescentianus, and makes them confess, that Silvanus had delivered up the Ornaments of the Church and the Holy Books, according to the Deposition of Nundinarius the Deacon, who was present. He causes also the verbal Process made in the Year 363, to be read by Munatius Felix, Judge of the Colony of Cirtha, who further confirmed the Deposition of Nundinarius. The Letters Written to Silvanus, by the Bishops of his own Party are set down, wherein they reprehend him for his outragious manner of Treating his Deacon Nundinarius. He is accused also of making a Simoniacal Ordination, of appropriating to his own use the Alms that were given for the Poor, and of being ordained himself by the Sollicitation of some Country Fellows. There are many things very remarkable in this Act: for there one may see, that at the Beginning of the 3d. Age of the Church, they used Chalices of Silver and Gold, Cups, Lamps and Candlesticks of Silver and Copper; That they kept in the Church, Garments for the Poor; That the Readers, who were very Numerous, had the Holy Books; That the Christians had a Library near the Church, where they put their Books.

The Third Record, is also part of a Verbal Process concerning the Justification of Felix of Aptungis, made by Ælianus the Proconsul, in the Year 314, in the Month of February, as appears by St. Augustin: There he examines one named Ingentius, and Convicts him of making an Addition to a Letter of Cæcilian, that he might falsly accuse Felix of being a Traditor.

The Fourth, is a Letter of the Emperor Constantine to Ablabius; wherein he orders him to send Cæcilian to Arles, with some Bishops of his Party, as well as some of his Accusers, that he might receive Judgment from the Council which was to assemble there.

The Fifth, is a Letter from the Council of Arles, of which we have spoken in its place.

The Sixth, is the Letter which Constantine Wrote against the Donatists, when they appealed to his Judgment, after they had been condemned in the Council of Arles.

The Seventh, is another Letter of the same Emperor, wherein he acquaints the Bishops of Donatus's Party, That he once designed to send Judges into Africk, to determine their Differences with Cæcilian; but that he judged it more proper to make him come before himself.

The Eighth, is a 4th. Letter of the same Emperor written to Celsus; wherein he acquaints him, That he will quickly come into Africk to decide the Differences between Donatus and Cæcilian himself.

The Ninth, is a 5th. Letter of Constantine, wherein he gives the Donatist Bishops leave to return into Africk.

The Tenth, is a 6th. Letter of this Emperor about the Cause of the Donatists, addressed to the Catholicks of Africk. He tells them that he had done all that lay in his Power to re-establish Peace, but since the Obstinacy of some Men had frustrated his good Intentions, they must now wait upon God only for the Remedy of this Mischief, and that till it pleased the Divine Mercy to remedy it, they must proceed with Moderation, and bear with Patience the Insolence of the Enemies of the Church: That they must not render Evil for Evil, since Vengeance is reserved to God only, and that by suffering Patiently the Fury of these Insolent Men, they should certainly merit the Glory of Martyrdom. For, says he, Is not this to Fight and Conquer for God, to bear with Patience the Outrages and Injuries of the Enemies of God's People? At last he assures the Catholicks, That if they observe this Method, they will quickly see their Enemies Party weakned, and that God will give Grace to many to acknowledge their Error and do Penance. S. Optatus.

The following Letter is a further Indication of the Meekness of this Emperor, and the Moderation of the Catholicks. The Donatists had invaded the Church which Constantine had caus'd to be built in Constantina a City of Numidia; which the Catholicks demanded back again, but they refus'd it. The Catholicks to avoid all further Contention, prayed the Emperor to give them a Place in the Dependances of his Demesnes thereabouts, where they might Build another Church: To which Constantine answered, that he did not only grant their Desire, but he had also written to the Receiver of his Revenues to furnish them with so much Money as was necessary for the Building of this Church. In this Letter he praises the Moderation of the Catholicks, and condemns the Obstinacy of the Donatists; and ordains, that the Laws which he had made for Exemption of the Clergy from all publick Taxes, should be put in Execution.

The last of these Records, which are added to the Books of Optatus, is a Fragment of the Acts of the Passion of the Saints Dativus, Saturninus, Felix, Ampelius, and of some other African Martyrs, made in the time of Anulinus, and written by a Donatist. This Piece contains some part of the Calumnies of the Donatists against Mensurius and Cæcilian. The Author of these Acts accuses them of hindring the Faithful from carrying Food to the Christians that were in Prison, and of beating them back with blows of Whips and Cudgels: He adds, that these Martyrs would never communicate with Mensurius, nor Cæcilian, because they had delivered up the Holy Books to the Heathens, and that the Church of Christ being Holy, ought not to hold Communion with those that are defil'd with a Crime of this heinous Nature. At last, he says, that those Martyrs who wanted Food by the Cruelty of Mensurius and Cæcilian, died of Famine in Prison, and went to Heaven there to receive the Crown of Martyrdom.

The Stile of Optatus's Books is noble, vehement and close, but not enough Polite or Neat. He presses briskly upon those against whom he Disputes, and Describes very sensibly the Transactions which he relates, and explains the passages which he produces with a great deal of Wit. He gives his Thoughts a fine and delicate turn, his Expressions signifie very perfectly what he means to say; his Reasonings are subtile, and his Relations pleasant. In a word, it appears that the Author of this little Book, was Master of much Learning and Wit. The Doctrine which he teaches, is, and always will be of much use to the Church: for there is not the same Reason of those Questions which concern the Truth of the Church, as of those that concern only some particular Doctrines. These continue only so long as the Sect subsists which opposes these Doctrines; and the Books which treat of them become almost useless whenever the Heresie is extinct. But all Heresies, all Schisms, having one common principle, of opposing the Church, the Books which are written in its Defence, are contrary to all Heresies, and will be useful as long as there shall be any Hereticks in the World whosoever they be. The Books of Optatus teach us also a great many very remarkable particulars concerning the History of the Donatists: We find in them many Points of Doctrine, and we may observe many things which clear up the antient Discipline. He says, that all Christians have but one Faith and one Creed. He explains the chief Mysteries in a most Orthodox manner. He shews, that there neither is, nor can be any more but one Catholick Church spread over all the Earth, that it cannot be shut up in a small Part of the World: That this Church is made up of Bishops, Priests, Deacons, Ministers, and those that are meerly the Faithful. He observes, that the Bishops are above the Priests, as the Priests are above the Deacons: He considers the Church of Rome as the chief Church in the World, and as the Centre of Unity, because of St. Peter, who was the Head of the Apostles: He says, That Man by Nature is Weak and Imperfect, and therefore has need of the Grace of Jesus Christ to make him Perfect; that we are all Born in Sin, and that Baptism is necessary to obtain Remission of it; that when the Sacrament is given in the Name of the Trinity, it ought not to be reiterated: and yet he seems to think that we ought to re-baptize those who were baptized by Hereticks; but he does not make the same determination for those who were baptized by Schismaticks. He mentions Exorcism with Commendation, as a necessary Ceremony at Baptism; He speaks of Chrysm also as a Holy Thing, and of the Unction that was us'd at Baptism. He expresses himself in so plain terms about the Real presence of the Body and Blood of Christ in the Eucharist, and about the Adoration that is due to this Holy Sacrament, that nothing can be desired more express. He observes many Ceremonies at the Celebration of the Eucharist, to which he gives the Name of a Sacrifice; and it appears by what he says of it, that in his time they offer'd Sacrifice for the whole Catholick Church, and then they recited the Lord's-Prayer; that the Celebration of it was upon an Altar of Wood, which was adorned and covered with a Linen-Cloth for the greater reſpect; that they then uſed Chalices of Gold and Silver, and alſo had Ornaments. He ſays, that the Church has Judges; that ſhe puniſhes Crimes; that ſhe exacts Penances of thoſe that confeſs their Sins, or are convicted of them. He praiſes Virginity, and yet he ſays, that there is no obligation to it upon thoſe that have not made a Vow. He obſerves, that in his time, this Vow was made Solemnly by the Virgins who dedicated themſelves to God; and that they carried a ſmall covering upon their Head, which was the Sign of the Vow they had made. He teſtifies ſufficiently the reſpect that was paid in his time for the Relicks of the Saints, when he ſpeaks of the Sepulchre of St. Peter and St. Paul, and ſpeaking of Lucilla, he blames thoſe that honoured the Relicks of falſe Martyrs, which were not owned by the Church.

The only Error that can be obſerv'd in the Books of Optatus is, that he maintains that thoſe who had been baptized with John's Baptiſm, before the Inſtitution of Chriſts Baptiſm, were not re-baptized. [See Acts xix. 1--5.] We may add to this, what he ſays of reiterating the Baptiſm of Hereticks, and perhaps alſo what he propoſes about the Power of Free Will, to which he ſeems to give the Power of willing and beginning a Good Action, and alſo of advancing in the Way of Salvation, without the help of the Grace of Chriſt; but theſe Errors are light and pardonable. One may alſo reprehend in his Book the Allegorical way in which he explains many Paſſages of Holy Scripture, by giving them a ſenſe very remote from that which they naturally have, and by applying them to thoſe things with which they have no affinity. This Fault which would be tolerable in a Preacher, ſeems not to be pardonable in an Author who writes a Treatiſe of Controverſy, wherein all Proofs ſhould be ſolid and convincing. But Optatus had to do with ſuch Enemies as us'd the ſame way, who perverted Paſſages of Scripture to calumniate the Church, and commend their own Sect.

The Text of Optatus is much corrupted in many places. It was printed at Mentz in the Year 1549. with many Faults. Afterwards Balduinus a Learned Civilian, publiſhed it at Paris in 1563, reviſed by a Manuſcript which was communicated to him by Eſpencæus, and corrected in many places. He prefixes to it a large Preface againſt Calvin, wherein he refutes the Concluſion that this Heretick had drawn from the Hiſtory of Optatus, that Princes were lawful Judges in Matters of Religion, and at the ſame time he diſcovers a great many ſtupid Miſtakes and groſs Errors that he had propos'd. He thought it not proper to prefix this Preface to the Second Edition of Optatus, which he caus'd to be printed at Paris in 1569, together with Victor Uticenſis, after he had reviſed and corrected it by a Manuſcript. 'Twas by this Edition that Commelinus made his in the Year 1599. The Annotations of this famous Civilian upon Optatus, are moſt learned and curious, and they perfectly clear the Hiſtory of the Donatiſts; but they are ſo long, that they may rather paſs for a Commentary than for Notes. In 1631. Albaſpinæus caus'd the Books of Optatus to be printed in One Volume in Folio, with ſhort Notes, and large Obſervations, which he added to the Annotations of Balduinus, and ſome Notes of an unknown Author. He added the Records of which we have ſpoken already, together with the Hiſtory of the Conference of Carthage, publiſhed by Balduinus, and the excellent Obſervations which he made in French and Latin about the Diſcipline of the Church. In the ſame year 1631. Meric Caſaubon printed in a little Volume the Text of Optatus at London, with moſt Judicious Critical Notes. At laſt, Philippus Priorius took care to make a new Impreſſion of this Author at Paris by the Widow of Dupuis. In 1679, they put in this Edition the Prefaces of Balduinus, the Notes of Albaſpinæus, Caſaubon and Barthius, and thoſe of the Unknown Author: Priorius alſo added ſome, which he put before the others, though they do not deſerve ſuch an honourable place. After this followed the Commentary of Balduinus, and the Obſervations of Albaſpinæus upon Optatus, the Conference of Carthage, and the other pieces of which we have ſpoken. The Hiſtory of the Conference of Carthage, written by Balduinus, is the laſt Diſcourſe in this Volume, which has ſome affinity with the Books of Optatus. After ſo many Editions and Commentaries, one would think that this Author were become moſt correct and plain: and yet 'tis not ſo, for the Text is ſtill very much corrupted; there are many places that ſtill want to be cleared up and reſtored. The Notes of Balduinus do indeed enlighten the Hiſtory; but he is miſtaken in many paſſages of it, as Valeſius has plainly proved in his learned Diſſertation of the Schiſm of the Donatiſts. The Notes and Obſervations of Albaſpinæus explain ſome Points of Diſcipline, but they are not always juſt. Thoſe of Meric Caſaubon, are the beſt for underſtanding of the Text; but thoſe of Barthius and others, are not very valuable: The learned Rigaltius, after he had publiſhed Tertullian, Minutius and St. Cyprian, deſigned to publiſh Optatus: And it may be preſumed, that as he was a very able Critick, very well vers'd in the African Antiquities, and in the Knowledge of Manuſcripts, he would have made conſiderable Corrections, and reſtored the Text of Optatus in many places: But he died before he had undertaken this Work. I ſhall be able perhaps to undertake it, and to publiſh the Text of Optatus reviſ'd by many Manuſcripts, more correct than any hitherto publiſhed.

ACACIUS of Cæſarea.

Acacius of Caſarea.

Acacius firnamed One-Ey'd, becauſe he look'd aſquint, ſucceeded in the year 338. to his Maſter Euſebius Biſhop of Cæſarea in Paleſtine. He joyned himſelf to the Euſebians, and came to Sardica with them: He was one of thoſe againſt whom the Council of the Weſtern Biſhops, that was held in that City, pronounced the Sentence of Depoſition. Being returned into the Eaſt, he had ſome Differences with Cyril of Jeruſalem, and in hatred of this Saint, he ſeparated himſelf from the Semi-Arians and joyned with the Anomæans, whom he defended ſtoutly at the Councils of Seleucia and Conſtantinople; but he quickly repented of taking their part, and having got Meletius Ordained, and many other Biſhops, whoſe Doctrine was Catholick, he re-united himſelf to them, and ſigned the Creed of the Nicene Council in the Council of the Eaſtern Biſhops that was held at Antioch, under the Reign of Jovian. He died towards the year 366. He compoſed many Books before he was Biſhop, and wrote a Book againſt Marcellus of Ancyra, a Fragment whereof is quoted by Epiphanius in Heref. 72. Some time after he was Biſhop he wrote the Life of Euſebius his Predeceſſor and Maſter, as Socrates teſtifies, Ch. 4. B. II. of his Hiſtory. St. Jerome ſays, that he wrote ſeventeen Volumes of Commentaries upon Scripture, ſeven Volumes about ſeveral Queſtions, and many other Treatiſes upon different Subjects. This Author had much Wit and Learning, but he ſeveral times changed his Opinion and Language as he was moved by Intereſt or Paſſion.

PHOTINUS.

Photinus.

Photinus Biſhop of Sirmium, was originally of Galatia. When he was Deacon and Diſciple of Marcellus of Ancyra, he followed ſome of his Errors: He did not diſtinguiſh the Perſon of the Word from the Perſon of the Father, and ſaid, That we ought not to give him the Name or Title of the Son of God, before he was born of Mary (a): He had hardly diſcovered his Error (b), but it was condemned by the Biſhops of the Eaſt, in a Council held at Antioch in the year 345, and by the Biſhops of the Weſt in the Council of Milan in 346. Theſe laſt aſſembled two years after at Sirmium to depoſe him, but they could not compaſs their Deſign, becauſe of the Oppoſition that was made by the People of that City, and therefore they were contented to draw up a Sentence againſt him, and to write of it to the Biſhops of the Eaſt: But at laſt, the Eaſtern Biſhops being aſſembled at Sirmium in the year 351, when the Emperor Conſtantius was Maſter of this City, after the Defeat of Vetranio---- they depoſed Photinus, and procured his Baniſhment. He died in Galatia the place of his Exile, under the Reign of Valentinian and Valens, to-

Photinus.

(a) HE did not diſtinguiſh, &c.] After this manner St. Athanaſius in his ſecond Apology, in his Book of Councils, and St. Epiphanius in Hareſ. 51. explain the Error of Photinus. He is commonly accuſed of renewing the Error of Paulus Samoſatenus and Ebion; but though he ſpeaks like them, yet he was not wholly of their Opinion. For he did not believe with Ebion and Paulus Samoſatenus, That Jeſus Chriſt was a mere Man; but he ſaid, That the Son of God was born of Mary, becauſe he did not believe that he had the Title of the Son of God, before he was born of the Virgin. He comes nearer to the Error of Sabellius, becauſe he did not diſtinguiſh the Word, before he was born of Mary.

(b) He had hardly diſcovered his Error.] Some ſay, That he began to publiſh it under the Reign of Conſtantius, which they ground upon the Authority of Severus Sulpitius. But Socrates, B. II. Ch. 18. and St. Hilary in his Book of Fragments, teſtifie, that the Error of Photinus was not known till a little while before the Council of Antioch in the year 345. All that we have ſaid of the Hiſtory of Photinus, is taken out of the Fragments of St. Hilary, and what we have obſerved about his Writings, is taken out of St. Jerome in his Catalogue.

Photinus. wards the year 376. This Heretick was a great Master of Wit and Eloquence, was acute and subtle in his Reasonings, and led an unblameable Life. He wrote many Books, but the chief of them were his Treatise against the Gentiles, and his Books addressed to the Emperor Valentinian. St. Epiphanius relates in Hæres. 71. some Extracts of the Conference he held with Marcellus of Ancyra, in the Council of Sirmium; and we have nothing else of his. Vincentius Lirinensis assures us, that he had much Wit, Learning and Eloquence, and that he spoke Greek and Latin equally well, as may be seen, says he, in his Works, whereof he wrote part in Greek, and part in Latin. Photinus.

AETIUS and EUNOMIUS.

Aëtius and Eunomius. THese two Impious Wretches deserve not to be placed amongst the Ecclesiastical Writers, neither should we speak of them here, but to condemn their Books, and their way of writing about Religion. Aëtius was of Cœlosyria, the Son of a Soldier in the Governor's Guard. For some time he was a Goldsmith, but leaving that Trade, he applied himself to the Study of Logick, and retired to the City of Tyre, where he put himself under the Discipline of Paulinus Bishop of that City, about the year 330. After the Death of this Bishop, he was driven away by Eulalius, and forced to withdraw to Anazarbus, where he conversed with two Disciples of the Martyr Lucianus. From thence he came to Antioch, where he knew Leontius, who was afterward Bishop of that City, and drove him away a little while after. And now not knowing where to hide his Head, he set up for Controversy, and disputed publickly with very little success against two Hereticks. But probably finding that this Art would not maintain him, he tryed a little at Physick. This is what Philostorgius, a great Admirer of Aëtius, relates of the beginning of his Master's Life. St. Gregory Nyssen paints him forth in very black Colours. He says, that from a Vinedresser, he became a Blacksmith, that he was indicted in a Court of Justice for taking a Gold Chain from a Woman, and returning her one of the same form and thickness which was nothing but Copper gilt: That afterwards he put himself in the Service of a Quack, and having gained some Mony with him, he set up for a Physician; and that at last he learned the Subtleties of Aristotle's Logick, and by this means was admitted into the presence of Gallus Cæsar. However it was, this is certain, that Aëtius learned all the Subtleties and Sophistical Tricks of the Aristotelian Logick, but he was ignorant in Scripture and Ecclesiastical Antiquity. A Man of this Temper was very proper to advance all sorts of Impiety, to maintain them with Impudence, and also to entangle those that he disputed against. He was ordained Deacon by Leontius of Antioch, who deposed him soon after. Eudoxius tryed in vain to restore him, and was hindered from doing it by the hatred which the Christians of Antioch bore towards him. He continued nevertheless in this City, being in Friendship with Eudoxius, till he was banished to Pepuza, by the Order of the Emperor Constantius. He came to the Council of Constantinople, where he disputed with the Semi-Arian Bishops, who having detected his Impiety, rendered him odious to the Emperor, and procured his Banishment from the Palace. So that Eudoxius, Acacius, and those of his own Party, were obliged to condemn him in the year 360. After this Condemnation he was banished to Mopsuestia, and from thence removed to Amblada, a Castle in Phrygia. He returned under the Emperor Julian, and Eudoxius, who was gone to the See of Constantinople, wrote to Euzoius Bishop of the Arian Party at Antioch, to receive him; and the Sentence of Condemnation passed against him. But Euzoius not doing it very readily, Eudoxius caused him to be Ordained Bishop, by some Bishops assembled at Constantinople; and soon after, Euzoius having assembled a Council of nine Bishops, declared the Sentence null which was given against this Heretick at Constantinople. But at last, under the Reign of Jovian, Aëtius being abandoned by Eudoxius, and the other Bishops that had maintained him, made a Faction by himself, and ordained many Bishops for his own Party. He was forced in the time of the Emperor Valens, to retire to the Isle of Lesbos; and yet he died at Constantinople, in the year 366.

The Doctrine of Aëtius, was the pure Doctrine of Arius, without Disguise; but he used terms and comparisons that were very odious to explain it. He affirmed without hesitation, That the Son of God was unlike to his Father; That he was of another Substance; That he was created of nothing: Wherefore his Disciples were called Anomœans, Heteroüsians, Exoucontians, Terms that denote the three Dogmes, which we just now mentioned. He affirmed the same things of the Holy Spirit, as of the Word: He imagined, That God revealed to himself the Mysteries that were unknown to the Apostles: He affirmed, That he had a clear and distinct Knowledge of God, and comprehended him even as he comprehends himself. He maintained also with Arius, That the Word assumed the Flesh without a Soul. His Disciples baptized with one Immersion only, and in the Name of the Death of Jesus Christ, they re-baptized those that came over to them, tho' they had been baptized by Catholicks. Some of them are accused of having taught, That the most enormous Crimes would not hinder the Salvation of those that were of their Judgment. Aëtius and Eunomius.

Aëtius, as Theodoret observes, made Theology an Art of Tricks, or Sophistry. He raised a great number of Propositions, which contained unanswerable Difficulties, in his Opinion, to destroy the Mystery of the Trinity. We have in the Hæres. 76. of Epiphanius, a Libel which contains 47 Propositions of this Nature; and the same Author attesteth that Aëtius composed 300 of the very same sort: I shall set down one or two of them, by which ye may sufficiently judge of the rest. Is it possible for God to make that a Person begotten should not be begotten?——If God is not begotten according to his Essence, how can it be said, that he who is begotten is of his Essence? Can the same Essence be begotten, and not begotten.

Eunomius the Disciple of Aëtius, was the Son of a Husbandman in a Village of Cappadocia: He wrote some time for the Publick, after which he was made Master of a School, and at last he put himself under the Discipline of Aëtius. He was not so subtile as his Master, but he had a greater Command of Words. After he was Ordained Deacon by Eudoxius, he was quickly banished to Myda a City of Phrygia. He returned to Constantinople, at the time of the Council in the year 359, and some time after, he was Ordained Bishop of Cyzicum by Eudoxius, his Protector, who advised him to conceal his Doctrine: But he not following this Counsel, was accused by his People, and Eudoxius was obliged to condemn and depose him. Afterwards he separated himself wholly from this Bishop, and retired to a House which he had at Chalcedon, where he hid the Tyrant Procopius. His Master Aëtius being returned to Constantinople; he lived some time with him, and did the last Offices to him: But he was quickly forced to retire to Chalcedon, and being accused before the Emperor, of giving Sanctuary to his Enemy, he was banished into Mauritania. But Valens, Bishop of Mursa, obtained his Restauration, and he would have obtained the Favour of the Emperor, if Eudoxius had not hindered him from coming into his sight. About the end of the Reign of Valens, Modestus the Prætorian Prefect, banished him into the Isle of Naxos, as a Disturber of the Peace of the Church. After the Death of this Emperor, he returned to Chalcedon; but Theodosius immediately banished him to Halmyris, which Castle being taken by the Enemy, he was removed to Cæsarea, a City of Cappadocia. But the Inhabitants of this City not being able to endure him, because he had formerly written against St. Basil, their Bishop, he obtained leave to dwell in the place of his Nativity, where he died. He was alive when St. Jerome wrote his Catalogue of Ecclesiastical Writers. He wrote many Books against the Church, and seven Books of Commentaries upon the Epistle to the Romans, which are mentioned by Socrates, Cb. 7. of B. IV. of his History. The same Author observes, That he imitated the sophistical stile of his Master, and followed his way of Arguing; That he was not learned in the Holy Scripture, and had no understanding of it; but that he had abundance of Words, and repeated oftentimes the same thing in different terms, without ever explaining clearly, what he proposed; That tho' he employed many Words to explain the Epistle of St. Paul to the Romans, yet he could never discover the true Sense of that Apostle. He adds, That his other Books were written after the same manner, and that whoever would take the pains to read them, would find Multitudes of Words and very little Matter. St. Basil quotes in his Books against Eunomius, some part of the Books of this Heretick, which he afterwards refutes. Eunomius answered St. Basil's Book by an Apology, and St. Gregory Nyssen undertook the Defence of his Brother, and the Refutation of this Heretick's Apology. He quotes also some of his Passages, and many of his Arguments. These Fragments of Eunomius, shew us, that he followed the Method of his Master, but that he was more plain and copious.

GEORGE of Laodicea.

George of Laodicea.

THis George was a Prieſt of the Church of Alexandria, in the time of Arius. He eſpouſed the Intereſts of this Heretick, and making a ſhow of being Mediator between Alexander and him, he maintained his Impiety. We have in Athanaſius's Book of Synods, two Letters of this Man, one written to Alexander, wherein he would perſuade him, that we may ſay, That there had been a time when the Son of God was not; and the other to the Followers of Arius, wherein he counſels them to acknowledge, That the Son was of the Father, and of God, ſince all things are of God. Alexander caſt him out of the Church, not only becauſe of his Hereſie, but alſo upon ſome other account. Being excommunicated at Alexandria, he endeavoured to procure a Reception among the Clergy of Antioch; but Euſtathius refuſing him, he retired to Arethuſa, and was there received; for Conſtantine calls him the Prieſt of Arethuſa. He was afterwards Ordained Biſhop of Laodicea, and aſſiſted the Euſebians at the Councils of Tyre and Antioch. The Weſtern Biſhops pronounced Sentence of Depoſition againſt him in the Council of Sardica. Afterwards he declared himſelf an Enemy of the Eunomians, and the Head of the Party of the Semi-Arians. 'Twas he that wrote a circular Letter to the Biſhops of his own Country, againſt Aëtius and Eudoxius, ſet down by Sozomen, Ch. 15. of B. IV. of his Hiſtory, wherein he exhorts them to aſſemble themſelves, that they may condemn thoſe impious Men, as they had done in the Council of Ancyra, in the year 358; ſoon after this George died. He paſt in thoſe antient times for a very able Man in Philoſophy. Theodoret teſtifies, That he had written againſt the Manichees, and Socrates quotes a Book which he compoſed of the Life of Euſebius Emiſenus.

The APOLLINARII.

The Apollinarii.

Apollinarius (a), the Father, was a Citizen of Alexandria, who forſook his Country, and went to teach Grammar at Berytus. From thence he paſs'd to Laodicea, where he had a Son of his own Name, whom he brought up to Learning. This young Man who had a great deal of Wit, in a ſhort time, made a wonderful Progreſs in Knowledge, and capacitated himſelf for teaching Rhetorick publickly at Laodicea, while his Father was writing Books of Grammar. Both of them afterwards applying themſelves to the Study of the Scriptures, the Father was Ordained Prieſt, and the Son Reader. But having a great Affection for prophane Learning, they maintained an intimate Correſpondence with a Pagan Sophiſt, call'd Epiphanius, which rendered them odious to the Chriſtians. Socrates ſays, that Theodotus Biſhop of Laodicea, caſt them out of the Church for this cauſe; and 'tis certain, that George the Succeſſor of Theodotus laid hold of this Pretence, to Excommunicate them, becauſe they took part with Athanaſius againſt him. Nevertheleſs, Apollinarius the Son, was choſen Biſhop of Laodicea (b), and was beloved and eſteemed by St. Athanaſius, St. Baſil, and St. Epiphanius, and all the great Men of his Age (c), upon the account of his Knowledge and Learning. But afterwards falling into Errors concerning the Myſtery of the Incarnation, he was looked upon as a Heretick, and he gave Name to a Sect which was condemned by the Church: He died under the Reign of Theodoſius, about the year 380. All the Ancients teſtify, that this Author wrote an infinite number of Volumes (d) upon the Holy Scripture, and upon other Subjects. He made Books againſt the Arians, Eunomius, Origen, and againſt many Hereticks. He compoſed alſo many Homilies, and wrote ſeveral Letters (e). But his chief Work in the Judgment of all Men, was his great Treatiſe divided into 30 Books, which he wrote in Defence of Religion againſt Porphyrie, the Philoſopher (f). It excelled in Beauty and Strength, all that had been written before by Euſebius and the Ancients, againſt the Pagan Religion. He wrote alſo in the time of Julian, another great Book of the Truth of Religion againſt the Emperor and the Pagan Philoſophers. 'Tis ſaid, that Julian having perus'd it, wrote to him that ſent it, I have read it; I have underſtood it; I have condemned it; and that St. Baſil or ſome other Biſhop made anſwer to him; You may have read it, but ſurely you never underſtood it; for if you had underſtood it, you had never condemned it. Under the Reign of the ſame Emperor, Apollinarius ſeeing that Chriſtians were forbidden to read to their Children the Greek Poets, Orators and Philoſophers, wrote in Heroic Verſe the Hiſtory of the Jews, down to the time of Saul, and divided this Work into 24 Books, in Imitation of Homer. He took Subjects alſo from the Old Teſtament, to make Tragedies, Comedies and Odes, in Imitation of Euripides, Sophocles and Pindar. Beſides that, he turned the Goſpels and the Epiſtles into Dialogues, in Imitation of Plato's Books: And thus he ſupplied to Chriſtians, the want of prophane Authors of all ſorts. Socrates, attributes the Poetical Books to Apollinarius the Father, and 'tis probable that they were rather his, ſince they are more agreeable to his Profeſſion. We have alſo a Tranſlation of the Pſalms in Verſe, which bears the Name of Apollinarius; and this is the only entire Book we have extant of this Author. 'Tis an exact, faithful, and noble Tranſlation of all the Pſalms: Some have alſo attributed to him the Tragedy, entituled, Chriſt Suffering, which bears the Name of Gregory Nazianzen; but it has neither the ſame Air nor Stile. Theodoret relates ſome Paſſages of Apollinarius, in his Dialogues, which prove that this Author acknowledged, That Jeſus Chriſt took Fleſh in the Womb of the Virgin, and that this Fleſh was not changed into the Divinity; but then withal, they ſhew, That he denied that the Soul of Jeſus Chriſt had an Underſtanding or Mind. Eulogius in the Extract made by Photius, Vol. 230 of his Bibliotheca, produces a Paſſage of Apollinarius, wherein he ſeems to admit one Nature only in Jeſus Chriſt. Polemon, the Diſciple of Apollinarius, who is mentioned in the ſame place, and in the Fourth Book of the Fables of Hereticks, written by Theodoret, was of the ſame Opinion, and attributes it to his Maſter. The Extracts taken out of the Diſcourſes of Apollinarius and Polemon, produced in the Council of Lateran, under Martin the V. Seſſ. 5. prove alſo that Apollinarius maintained, that there was but one Nature in Jeſus Chriſt after the Union. And yet he acknowledges in the Paſſages recited by Theodoret, that the Divine and Human Nature, remained in Jeſus Chriſt without Mixture or Confuſion, and that each of them retained their own Properties. This probably is that Contradiction which made St. Baſil ſay, that the Judgment of Apollinarius, about the Incarnation, was very obſcure and intricate. The ſame Father, in Letter 59, and 293, and St. Gregory Nazianzen, in his firſt Letter to Cledonius, accuſe him of the Error of Sabellius, who con-

The Apollinarii.

(a) Apollinarius.] The Greeks always called him, Απολλινάριος: St. Baſil is the only Perſon that wrote it with a double λλ. St. Jerome, called him, Apollinarius. The generality of the Latins for ſoftneſs ſake, give him the Name of Apollinaris.

II. Ch. 20. and St. Jerome in his Catalogue, all agree, that he was Biſhop of this City. Theodoret in B. V. of his Hiſtory ſays, that Apollinarius would have invaded the See of Antioch, but it was his Diſciple Vitalis.

(c) He was beloved and eſteemed by all the great Men of his Age.] He was a very good Friend to St. Athanaſius, who had ſeen him at his return from his Baniſhment, as St. Epiphanius teſtifies in Hareſ. 77. Leontius in B. III. againſt Neſtorius, ſays, that Apollinarius boaſted, of receiving Letters from Athanaſius, Serapion, and the great Men of his time. He quotes a Fragment of a Letter of Apollinarius, where he glories in having Letters from St. Athanaſius. His Deputies aſſiſted at the Council of Alexandria, and Sign'd there as the Deputies of an Orthodox Biſhop. It does not appear that St. Athanaſius did ever break with him. St. Baſil ſays in his Letter 82, that he ow'd reſpect to this Man; that he was ſo much his faſt Friend, that he would take his Faults upon himſelf. St. Epiphanius calls him, a Venerable Old Man, and ſays, that he was very dear to St. Athanaſius, and all the Orthodox Biſhops. St. Jerome in his 64 Letter, ſays, that he had often ſeen him at Antioch, that he honoured him, and had learned many things from him. And Sozomen, B. 2. Ch. 19, relates a Fragment of Apollinarius, concerning St. Athanaſius. He wrote alſo againſt Diodorus of Tarſus, as appears by Suidas, B. III. Ch. 4.

(f) His Chief Work in the Judgment of all Men, was his Treatiſe againſt Porphyrie the Philoſopher.] St. Jerome ſays, that his 30 Books againſt Porphyrie, were the moſt eſteemed of all his Works. Vincentius Lirinenſis ſays, that it was his greateſt and moſt excellent Work.

founded the three Divine Persons. But Theodoret observes, that at the bottom he believed the Mystery of the Trinity as we do, tho' he explained it in such a manner, as gave occasion to accuse him of Error, because he admits Degrees among the three Persons of the Trinity, and seems not to distinguish the Personal Subsistences. And indeed, St. Epiphanius vindicates Apollinarius from the Sabellian Heresie, and says, that Vitalis, his most famous Disciple, who calls himself Bishop of Antioch, was so far from holding this Heresie, that the Pretence which he alledged for his Separation from Paulinus, was because he believed him to be of Sabellius's Opinion. In short, Vincentius Lirinensis, and Leontius, vindicate Apollinarius from the Suspicion of Sabellianism. There are two Errors more attributed to him, which were common to him with many Ancients. The first, is that famous Opinion of the Reign of Christ, and the Saints upon Earth, for the space of 1000 Years, which St. Basil, Epist. 74, and 293; St. Gregory Nazianzen, Epist. 2. and St. Jerome in his Catalogue, Ch. 28. do all charge him with. The second Opinion is, that the Souls of Men are produced by Souls, as the Bodies are by Bodies. St. Jerome and Nemesius, are the only Persons that accuse him of this Error; the first in Ep. 28, the second in Ch. 2. of his Treatise.

The Opinion of Apollinarius about the Incarnation, was condemned in the Council of Alexandria, where it was declared, That Jesus Christ assumed a Body, a Soul and Spirit, such as we have. Paulinus of Antioch, did also professe this Doctrine in a Discourse by its self, which is at the end of the Council of Alexandria, and in St. Epiphanius, Haeres. 77. In the Year 373, Vitalis the Disciple of Apollinarius, who caused himself to be ordained Bishop of Antioch, went to find out Pope Damasus, and presented to him a confession of Faith about the Incarnation, which seemed to be Catholick, and clearly rejected the Error of Apollinarius. St. Cyril produces a Fragment of this Confession of Faith, in the Book which he dedicated to the Queens. When the Pope saw this Confession, he believed that Vitalis was a Catholick, and therefore did not refuse him his Communion; but having no full assurance of his Sincerity, he wrote to Paulinus, and sent him Articles about the Trinity and the Incarnation, which he should cause Vitalis and all those that would be restored, to Sign. When these Articles were brought into the East, Vitalis, and those of his Sect, would not Sign them. Damasus understanding this, says St. Gregory Nazianzen, and being informed that they persisted still in their antient Error, cast them out of the Church, and tore the Libel and Anathematisms which had been presented to him by Vitalis, being very much troubled that he had been so deceived. He gave this Judgment in a Council at Rome, held in the Year 377, at which, Peter, Bishop of Alexandria, assisted. The Bishops of the East, approved of what Damasus had done, and confirmed the Judgment which the Pope had given against the Apollinarians: For in the Synod of Antioch, in the Year 378, they signed a Tome or Writing of the Western Bishops, which condemned their Errors. Afterwards, the Apollinarians were always looked upon as Hereticks, as appears by the Council of Constantinople, where they are joyned with the Arians, Eunomians, and other declared Hereticks.

The Apollinarii.

Apollinarius, of all the Christian Writers, had most studied Grammar, Rhetorick, and prophane Philosophy: But he was not profoundly Learned in the Scripture and Religion; he philosophized too much upon our Mysteries, and did not confine himself enough to the simplicity of the Scriptures, which fault was the occasion of his falling into Error: For when once Men give themselves up to Human Reasonings in the Explications of Mysteries, they presently wander from the right Way, and are in danger of falling headlong. He had not the sublime and affected Eloquence of the Bar, but a Philosophical kind of Eloquence which consisted in turning his Thoughts and Reasons, after an easy, clear and pleasant manner. Philostorgius quoted by Suidas, compared him to St. Basil, and St. Gregory Nazianzen, and says, 'That these three were the ablest Men of their 'time. That they excelled those who had written before 'them, and that St Athanasius in comparison of them, appeared but a Child; that they were well versed in prophane 'Learning, and had made a great Progress in them; That 'with all this, they had all that was necessary for Reading 'and understanding the Scriptures, and chiefly Apollinarius, 'who understood Hebrew. That each of them excelled in 'his Kind; That the Stile of Apollinarius was fittest for 'writing Books; that St. Basil's Stile was best for public Orations, but Gregory Nazianzen surmounted them 'both in the sublimity of his Stile, which was more lofty 'than that of Apollinarius, and more grave than that of St. 'Basil. He adds, that these three persons had all the Qualities which were most proper for winning the Admiration 'of all Mankind.

The Life of Apollinarius, was probably no less Holy than that of the other two great Men. In short, he might have been equal to the greatest Pillars of the Church, as Vincentius Lirinensis says excellently, if his prophane Curiosity had not carried him to the Invention of Novelties, which made him lose the Fruit of all his Labours, and made his Doctrine an occasion of Scandal, rather than Edification.

Apollinarius's Paraphrase or Translation of the Psalms, was printed in Greek at Paris, in the Year 1580; and together with the Version of Sylburgius, by Commelinus, in the Year 1596. Since that time, it has been put into the Bibliothecæ Patrum. The other Works of this Author are lost, except some Fragments; and his Error was probably the cause of this loss. The Catholicks had so great a Horror of Books of Hereticks, that they would not so much as preserve those that did not concern their Heresie, and which might have been useful to the Church: Upon which Account it is, that we have scarce any book of the antient Hereticks, and that the Eutychians were obliged to publish Apollinarius's Books under the Name of Catholick Authors, as we have observed when we spoke of the Writings of Pope Julius.

TITUS of Bostra.

Titus of Bostra.

TItus, Bishop of Bostra, a City of Arabia Petræa, wrote a Treatise against the Manichees, and some other Works, in the Time of the Emperors Julian and Jovian. Julian, who persecuted all the Bishops who had any Reputation, did all that lay in his power, to drive this Bishop out of his Country, and to render him odious to his People. 'He wrote to him, that if any 'trouble happened in the City of Bostra, he should impute 'it to himself and to his Clergy. This Bishop answered 'him, that he kept his People in Peace by his Exhortations, 'and that tho' he had as many Christians as Pagans in his 'City, yet he so ordered the matter, that there was no Contention amongst them.' Julian laid hold on this Occasion, to write to the Inhabitants of Bostra against their Bishop, endeavouring malciously to persuade them, that his Answer reproached them, because it supposed that without his Exhortations, they would not have continued in their Duty. However this ill-natured Accusation of the Emperor Julian, did not hinder them from putting Confidence in their Bishop, so that he continued in his See till the Time of the Emperor Valens, under whose Reign he died, about the Year 370. He assisted at the Council of Meletius, held at Antioch, under the Reign of Jovian, in the Year 364.

The Book of Titus of Bostra, against the Manichees, was written in Greek, and divided into Four Parts: There is nothing now extant but the Version of three of those Books made by Turrianus, and printed in Canisius's Collection of Antient Pieces, and in the Bibliothecæ Patrum. To the Text of the Author, there are prefixed the Arguments of the Four Books translated out of Greek, which inform us what is the Subject of them. 'The first Book, says the Author of those Arguments, contains a Refutation of the 'principal points of Doctrine taught by the Manichees, which 'contradict common Sense, and the Principles of Natural 'Reason. The second is intended to shew, that Man is not 'addicted to Sin by a Principle that is Eternal and without 'Beginning, or by a Being that is contrary to the True God: 'That there is no substance of evil in the World; That 'there is not in us two sorts of Natures, one Good, and 'the other Evil; That 'tis Folly and Impiety to Condemn 'and Reprehend the manner of Governing the Universe. 'In short, This Book contains all that can be said of Providence, and invincibly proves, that 'tis no wise necessary 'to admit a Second Principle contrary to God. The Third 'Book is intended to defend the Law and the Prophets, 'and to shew that God is the Author of the Old Testament; 'That there is nothing of Evil to be found in it; That it 'does in every thing agree with the New, and therefore 'there is no need for the Explication of it to have recourse 'to a Second Principle contrary to God. The Fourth Book 'defends the New Testament against the Blasphemies of 'the Hereticks: There he shews that there is nothing in 'the Gospel which favours their Error; that they abuse 'some passages of Scripture to prove their Impiety to no 'purpose; and that the Diabolical Explications which they 'give of them cannot help to Establish what they say a-'gainst God.' In the First Book, he propounds the Doctrine of the Manichees, and detects the Absurdities of it by Metaphysical Arguments. In the Second he shews, That there is but one God only, and that he is the only Principle; That he is not the Author of Sin; That he made Man free and capable of doing Good and Evil; and so 'tis not God but Man who is the Author of Sin, which proceeds not from the Nature of Man, but from his Will. He Explains the great difficulty that is urged by the Manichees, why the Just are so often Unhappy, and the Wicked Happy in this World; and shews that the Just are always Happy and the Wicked Unhappy, because Innocence is the chief Happineſs. He adds, that Afflictions are uſeful to prove and to exerciſe Virtue. He maintains, That Death is not an Evil, becauſe 'tis the end of Sinning to the Wicked, and the Beginning of Recompence to the Good. In ſhort, having ſurveyed all things in this World, and all the occurrences of this Life, he proves that they are eaſily reconciled to the Providence of God.

In the Third Book he ſhews, That the Old and New Teſtament agree very well together, and that one and the ſame God is the Author of them both.

There are in theſe Books much Metaphyſicks and Logick; The Arguments are ſolid and ſubtil; The Stile is fine and clean enough for a Work of this Nature. It is indeed a ſurprizing thing that he never makes uſe of Original Sin for the explaining all the difficulties objected by the Manichees, which might have ſerved as one general Solution to almoſt all their objections. For when once Original Sin is admitted, there is no difficulty in underſtanding, why a Man is addicted to Sin; Why he ſuffers Affliction; Why he is ſubject to Hunger, to Pain, to Diſeaſes, to Miſeries, and to Death; and yet he never urges it to explain thoſe Queſtions, but examines them as a Philoſopher. He ſays not one Word of the Grace of Jeſus Chriſt, and ſeems to ſuppoſe that Man could do Good of himſelf as well as Evil.

There is a Commentary upon the Goſpel of St. Luke, which is attributed to Titus of Boſtra; but this can be none of his Book, ſince he who is the Author of it, cites St. Jerome, St. Iſidore Peluſiota, and St. Cyril of Alexandria, who had not written till after the Death of this Titus of Boſtra, whom we now ſpeak of. Yet this is a very Good literal Commentary upon St. Luke, and ſeems to me to be very antient. There was a Verſion of it publiſhed by Peltanus, and Printed by Sartorius at Ingolſtadt in the Year 1579. Since that, Fronto Ducæus publiſhed the Greek from a Manuſcript out of the King's Library, and it was Printed in Greek and Latin in the Supplement to the Bibliothecæ Patrum: 'Tis ſaid, that there is a Commentary of the ſame Author upon St. Matthew, and there is ſome probability for it, becauſe in the Commentary on St. Luke, he never attempts to explain any thing in this Evangeliſt but what is not to be found in the Goſpel of St. Matthew. In ſhort, Father Combefis has publiſhed in his Auctarium to the Bibliothecæ Patrum, a Sermon upon Palm-Sunday, which bears the Name of Titus of Boſtra, but is not written by the true Titus of Boſtra, nor by the Author of the Commentaries upon St. Luke, it having no affinity with the Air and Stile of either of thoſe two Writers.

Titus of Boſtra.

DIDYMUS of Alexandria.

Didymus of Alexandria.

NOthing is more ſurprizing than what the Ancients have related of this Author. St. Jerome and Ruffinus, who were his Diſciples, aſſure us, That having loſt his Sight from the age of five years, at which time he was ſcarce able to read, he applied his Mind ſo vigorouſly to ſtudy, that he learned in perfection, not only Philoſophy, Rhetorick and Muſick, but even Geometry; which one would think could not be learnt without the help of Sight. He particularly addicted himſelf to the Study of Divinity, and was choſen as the moſt able Perſon to fill the Chair of the famous School of the Church of Alexandria. His Reputation drew to him a great number of Scholars, of whom the moſt famous were St. Jerome, Ruffinus, Palladius and Iſidore. He had a wonderful Eaſineſs of expreſſing himſelf, a pleaſing way of declaiming, and a ſurprizing ſharpneſs of Wit. He anſwered immediately to all the Queſtions that were made upon the Scriptures, he confuted the Arguments which the Hereticks propoſed to him againſt Religion, and ſhewed in an inſtant where the Weakneſs of their Reaſons lay. He has written many excellent Books. St. Jerome mentions theſe following in his Catalogue: Commentaries upon all the Pſalms, Commentaries upon the Goſpels of St. Matthew and St. John, Commentaries upon the Epiſtle to the Galatians, eighteen Tomes of Commentaries upon Iſaiah, three Books of Commentaries upon Hoſea, which are addreſſed to me, ſays St. Jerome, and five Books upon Zachary, which he wrote at my deſire, ſays the ſame Father; Commentaries upon Job, and an infinite number of other Diſcourſes, which would require a particular Table. He wrote alſo a Treatiſe upon the Dogmes, or upon the Sects, two Books againſt the Arians, and a Book of the Holy Spirit, which I tranſlated into Latin, ſays the ſame St. Jerome. He alſo interpreted Origen's Principles, and defended them againſt thoſe that condemned them. he conſidered this Author as his Maſter, and eſpouſed his Opinions. He was alive when St. Jerome wrote his Catalogue of Eccleſiaſtical Writers, i. e. in the year 392, and was then 93 years old and more; and 'tis thought that he died two years after. His being addicted to the Opinions of Origen, was the cauſe of his condemnation in the fifth General Council, and in the fifth Seſſion of the Lateran Council by Martin the fifth, tho' he died in the Communion of the Church, and all the Ancients, even St. Jerome, ſpeak of him as one whoſe Doctrine was very Orthodox. We have among St. Jerome's Works, a Tranſlation which this Father made of Didymus's Book concerning the Holy Spirit. He ſays in his Preface, 'That being in Babylon, dwelling in this Province clothed with Purple (by which word, he means the City of Rome) he had a deſign to write a little Book of the Holy Spirit, and to dedicate it to the Biſhop of that City; but that immediately the Senate of Phariſees cryed out againſt him, and the Faction of ignorant Men conſpired againſt his Perſon, which obliged him to return to Jeruſalem, where he finiſhed his Work at the deſire of Paula and Euſtochium; but that he could not dedicate it to Damaſus, who was dead when it was finiſhed. He adds, That he put at the beginning of it the Name of the Author whom he tranſlated, and thought it better to be only the Interpreter of another's Work, than to mix bad Thoughts with that which is good in the Greek Authors, as ſome Latins have done.' He has divided this Treatiſe of Didymus into three Books: Tho' it is rather a continued Diſcourſe which ought not to be parted, or at leaſt, ought not to be divided but into two parts.

This Treatiſe is the moſt demonſtrative and methodical of all thoſe that the Ancients have written to prove the Divinity of the Holy Spirit. He begins with theſe Words. Didymus of Alexandria.

'Tho' we ought to ſpeak with Reverence and Exactneſs of every thing that concerns the Divinity, yet this ought chiefly to be done, when we ſpeak of the Holy Spirit, ſince the Scripture tells us, That the Blaſphemy which is ſpoken againſt him is unpardonable. Wherefore we muſt give diligent heed that we may underſtand what is ſaid of him in the Holy Scripture, leſt we fall into ſome Error, which may make us ſpeak Blaſphemies. And upon this account, it ſeems to be convenient for a faithful Chriſtian, who is ſenſible of his own Weakneſs, as I am, to keep ſilence in a Queſtion which is above his Power, rather than venture to treat upon a Subject where he runs ſo great a hazard. But ſince there are ſome Men, who by a ſurprizing boldneſs exalt themſelves againſt Heaven, and ſpeak of the Holy Spirit ſuch things as are no where to be found in Scripture, and which never have been propoſed by any Eccleſiaſtical Writers, I thought my ſelf obliged to yield to the frequent Entreaties of my Brethren, and to prove my own Opinion by Teſtimonies of Scriptures, leſt ſome of the Faithful that are ignorant of this Doctrine, ſhould be ſeduced by thoſe that hold the contrary.' After he has in the following words obſerved, That the Holy Spirit is no where ſpoken of but in the Holy Scripture, and that the ſame Spirit inſpired the Prophets and Apoſtles, he enters upon the Matter, and proves by many Arguments founded upon Paſſages of the Holy Scripture, That the Holy Spirit is not a Creature, but that he is of one and the ſame Nature with the Father and the Son. He ſhews that the Holy Spirit is not a Creature. 1. Becauſe every Creature is either corporeal or ſpiritual. Now the Holy Spirit, ſays he, is not a corporeal Creature, ſince it dwells in the Soul; neither is he a ſpiritual Creature, becauſe ſpiritual Creatures receive into themſelves Virtues, Knowledge and Holineſs, whereas the Holy Spirit produces them in others, being himſelf ſubſtantially Virtue, Light and Holineſs. 2. Becauſe every Creature is liable to Change and circumſcribed within a place; but the Holy Spirit is immutable, and every where preſent, and therefore the Holy Spirit is not a Creature. 3. Becauſe he who ſanctifies, and he who is ſanctified, are of different Natures; but the Holy Spirit ſanctifies all Creatures, and therefore he is not of their Nature. He adds, That 'tis never ſaid that Men are filled with a Creature, as 'tis ſaid that they are filled with the Holy Spirit. He ſhews, That the Holy Spirit is not diviſible; but that it receives different Names according to the different Effects it produces, tho' it be always one and the ſame Spirit. In ſhort, he ſhews, That the Apoſtle St. Paul puts an Eſſential Difference between the Holy Spirit and the Angels, which ſufficiently diſcovers that it is not a Creature. Afterwards he refutes thoſe that ſay the Holy Spirit is of the number of thoſe things which were created by the Divine Word. He explains a place in the fourth Chapter of the Prophet Amos, where 'tis ſaid, That God created the Spirit, Creans Spiritum, by ſhewing that this place is literally to be underſtood of the Wind, and that it cannot be applied to the Holy Spirit, but in an Allegorical and Figurative ſenſe.

After he has thus ſhewn that the Holy Spirit is not a Creature, he proves, That he is of the ſame Nature with the Father and the Son. 1. Becauſe they have but one and the ſame Operation, and by conſequence muſt be one and the ſame Subſtance. 2. Becauſe to lye to the Holy Spirit is to lye unto God, as appears by the words of St. Peter to Ananias. 3. Becauſe the Wiſdom and Teaching of the Holy Spirit is called the Wiſdom and Teaching of God. 4. Becauſe cause the Holy Spirit is called the Finger of the Father, 5. Because 'tis said of him, that he is Wisdom it self. 6. Because we are to believe in the Holy Spirit, as we do in the Father and the Son, and we are baptized in the Name of the Holy Spirit, as we are in the Name of the Father and the Son. 7. Because he is called Lord, as the Father and the Son are. 8. Because he is sent from the Father in the Name of the Son, as having the same Nature with the Son. 9. Because the Father, Son and Holy Spirit are never separated; every thing that agrees to one of the Three Persons, agrees to the other two, and whatever is said of one, is said of the other two, and whatsoever one does, is done by the others, &c. And therefore they have all there the same Nature and the same Substance. He concludes with these words, 'Since there is no Pardon for those that blaspheme against the Trinity, we must be very cautious in 'speaking of this Mystery, lest we be mistaken in the least 'Expression: And every one who desires to read this Book, 'must purifie himself, that so by an enlightned Mind he 'may understand what is contained in it, and by a Heart 'full of Charity and Holiness, he may pardon us, if we do 'not always answer the Expectation of the Reader. He 'must only consider the Mind wherewith we have written, and not tie himself up to our manner of Expression: 'For as the Testimony of our Conscience makes us boldly affirm, That our Doctrine is that of the Christian Religion; so our Sincerity makes us confess, That in the 'manner of Writing, we do not come near the Politeness, 'Fineness, and Eloquence of others; because we have only attempted to give a religious Explication of what the 'Holy Scripture teaches us, without studying to polish and 'adorn our Discourse:' But tho' he speaks thus of his stile, and St. Jerome says also, that this Author is not a very able Penman, yet this Treatise is very well written for a Dogmatical Treatise. I speak not this of the Words or Terms, since we have not now the Original Greek, but of the turn of his Thoughts, the methodizing of his Arguments, and the manner of expressing himself about a Mystery so difficult to explain as this of the Trinity. He treats of the subject in a very clear Method, without diverting from the Difficulties of it. He proposes his Arguments plainly and smoothly: His Reasons are close and convincing, one may observe a Vein of Logick which runs thro' all his discourse without intermission. He quotes the passages of Scripture in their natural sense, and makes many very curious and profound Remarks. He uses the most proper and most fit terms for Explication of the Mysteries. He does not too nicely distinguish, and yet he clears up all Difficulties. In a word, it were to be wished that all the Schoolmen had taken this Treatise for their Pattern, and had followed his Method in treating of the Mysteries of Religion. I forgot to observe that he speaks occasionally of the Incarnation, and that he says, Jesus Christ is God-Man; and yet we must not affirm that there are two Persons in him, but believe, that he being God and Man both together, there is attributed to him what agrees to the Nature of God, and the Nature of Man. 'Twas good to observe this against the Error of the Nestorians.

We have in the Bibliothecæ Patrum, Commentaries in Latin, upon all the Canonical Epistles which go under the Name of Didymus. They seem to be antient, and they may possibly be a Translation from a Greek Commentary of this Author. He speaks of the Opinion of those who thought that Spirits were from all Eternity, and he neither condemns nor approves it. He maintains, That Predestination is nothing else but the Choice which God made of those that he foresaw would believe in Jesus Christ, and do good Actions. He rejects the Milennium, and affirms, That the Pleasures and Joys of Paradise are all spiritual. He disapproves of servile Fear; He believes with Origen, That the Incarnation of Jesus Christ was profitable to Angels as well as Men, and that it purifies them from their Faults. He observes, That the second Epistle of St. Peter is not in the Canon, and believes that it is corrupted. These Commentaries are very clear and intelligible, and contain useful and judicious Instructions and Reflections, which are not unworthy of the famous Didymus.

Didymus of Alexandria.

There is also a little Tract, or rather the Fragment of a Tract against the Manichees, translated from Greek by Turrianus, printed by Possevin in his Apparatus, and inserted into the Bibliothecæ Patrum, which goes under the Name of Didymus, which agrees well enough with the Treatise of the Holy Spirit written by this Author. There he refutes by Metaphysical Arguments, the Opinion of the Manichees, who admitted two Principles, the one Good and the other Evil. He explains the sense in which Men are called in Scripture Children of Wrath, by saying, They are so called, because they become the Object of the Wrath of God by the Sins which they voluntarily commit; as others are called Children of the Light, and Children of Wisdom, who are purified by the Light of Truth. He says, That Judas is called a Son of Perdition, because he did those things that deserved Perdition. He is mightily perplexed when he explains the reason why the Flesh of Man is called Sinful Flesh. He says first of all, That it is so called, because it was produced by the Use of Marriage, which commonly was not free from Sin before the coming of Jesus Christ, who sanctified it: That there is none but Jesus Christ and the first Man, whose Flesh could not be called Sinful; for Jesus Christ was born of a Virgin, and Adam was made out of the Earth; That all Men being begotten by Men after the Sin of the first Man, are subject to Sin; and that if the Body of Jesus Christ had been formed in the ordinary way of Generation, it had been liable to Sin, to which all the Posterity of Adam are subject. He adds, that the use of Marriage, tho' it is permitted, is called Sin, in comparison of Virginity; which is a much more excellent state. After this, he proves that the Devil was not wicked by substance, but by will; He demonstrates, that God is not the Author of Evil, because he created a free Agent, which could incline it self to Good or to Evil; That the Divine Conduct cannot be blamed, and that those who commit Sin ought not to impute it to any but themselves, since it was in their own Power to do Good, and to shun that which is Evil. In a word, That Man is not naturally Wicked, but by his Will only; since he that has been Wicked and Impious, may change his Condition by Repentance, and become Good and Virtuous.

PETER of Alexandria.

Peter of Alexandria.

ST. Athanasius dying in the year 373, the Catholicks chose in his room Peter, whom St. Athanasius had designed for his Successor. He had no sooner taken Possession of his Church, but he was forced away from it by the Governor of the Province named Palladius, and necessitated to fly to Rome. Some time after Euzoius of Antioch brought with him one named Lucius, whom he Ordained Bishop of Alexandria, and caused the Churches to be given to him. This Man being an Enemy to the Doctrine of his Predecessor, was hated by all the Christians of Alexandria, who would not afterwards come any more to the Assemblies of the Church: Whereupon Lucius was obliged to get a Guard of Pagan Soldiers, who committed by his Order infinite Outrages against the Catholicks. Peter of Alexandria wrote at this time a Letter against the Exorbitances that were done by the Arians, which Theodoret produces in the fourth Book of his History, Ch. 22. It charges them with causing a Multitude of Infidel Soldiers to enter into the great Church of St. Theonas, who vomited up Thousands of Blasphemies, violated Virgins, and put to Death many Christians. He adds, That they had committed abominable Sacrilege, in making a young Man dance upon the Altar in Woman's Apparel, and making him go up into the Pulpit, where he uttered infamous and impious words. Afterwards he charges the Arians with carrying away Lucius to place him in the Episcopal See, tho' he had neither been chosen by the Suffrages of the Clergy and the People, nor ordained by a lawful Synod, as the Ecclesiastical Canons required. Afterwards he gives an account of the manner in which he entred into the Church, being accompanied with Euzoius, and the chief Treasurer of the City; how he would have forced the Priests and Deacons to approve Arianism, to please the Emperor Valens; with what Boldness and Constancy they answered him, and how they were imprisoned, tormented, and sent on Shipboard without Victuals. In short, he relates the Cruelties committed against the People of Alexandria, against the Deacon sent by Pope Damasus, and against eleven Bishops of Egypt banished to Diocæsarea, together with a great number of Priests and Deacons. We have in Facundus, two Fragments of another Letter written by the same Father to those that were banished. The first, is in Ch. 2 of the fourth Book, against Timotheus the Disciple of Apollinarius, whom he accuses of having Anathematized St. Basil, St. Paulinus, St. Epiphanius, and Diodorus, that he might communicate with Vitalis only. The second Fragment is in Ch. 2. of B. XI. where he commends the Epistle of St. Athanasius written to the Antiochians. We have not any other Fragment of the Letters of this Saint, tho' 'tis probable, that he wrote many more during the space of six years that he stayed at Rome. But when Valens being to march against the Goths, gave leave to the banished Bishops to return, he came to Alexandria with a Letter of Recommendation from Pope Damasus. The People received him and drove away Lucius. Some time after, Peter indiscreetly ordained Maximus the Cynick Bishop of Constantinople, tho' he had approved by a Letter the Care which Gregory Nazianzen took of that Church. He died about the End of the year 381. The stile of the Letter produced by Theodoret is simple and natural, and also very significant.

LUCIUS.

Lucius.

ST. Jerome places this Lucius, the Adverſary of Peter of Alexandria, among the Number of Eccleſiaſtical Writers, of whom we have already ſpoken. He ſays, That he governed the Church of Alexandria till the time of Theodoſius: But we have obſerved that he was driven away a little while before the Reign of this Emperor. He adds, That he wrote Letters concerning the ſolemnity of Eaſter, and ſome Books upon different ſubjects.

AQUILIUS SEVERUS.

Aquilius Severus.

AQuilius Severus a Spaniard, of the Race of that Severus to whom Lactantius addreſſed two Books of Letters, wrote a Volume in the form of an Itinerary, which contains all the Hiſtory of his Life in Proſe as well as Verſe. 'Tis entituled, The Cataſtrophe, or the Experiment. He died under the Reign of Valentinian, that is to ſay, about the year 370. This is what St. Jerome has told us of this Author, and 'tis all that we know of him. This ſort of Books which contain the Lives of Authors are pleaſant when they are written of great Men who had a ſhare in the Management of Affairs, or of ſuch Perſons whoſe Lives were full of extraordinary and ſurprizing Accidents; and they are uſeful when they are written of Perſons of great Virtue and Merit: But when no ſuch thing is to be found in them, they are commonly tedious and uſeleſs Books. 'Tis probable that this Life of Aquilius was filled with extraordinary Occurrences, which was the Reaſon why he wrote it, and why he gave it the Title of The Cataſtrophe, or the Experiment. Wherein he probably gives us cauſe to admire the Providence of God in the wonderful Changes that happened to himſelf. This is all that we can ſay by Conjecture, having no certain Knowledge of this Matter.

Aquilius Severus.

EUZOIUS.

Euzoïus.

EUzoïus was the Scholar of Theſpeſius the Rhetorician, together with St. Gregory Nazianzen. He ſtudied in his youth at Cæſarea in Paleſtine, whereof he was afterward Biſhop. He repaired the Library of Origen and Pamphilus, cauſing the Books to be written out upon new ſkins, becauſe the old ones began to rot. He was at laſt turned out of the Church in the time of Theodoſius. He wrote many Treatiſes, which were eaſie to be known in St. Jerome's time. This is what this Father has told us of this Author. St. Epiphanius ſpeaks of him in Hæreſ. 73. and places him among thoſe Biſhops that were purely Arian: And yet he is different from the famous Arian Euzoïus Biſhop of Antioch.

Euzoïus.

St. CYRIL of Jeruſalem.

St. Cyril of Jeruſalem.

ST. Cyril was ordained Prieſt of the Church of Jeruſalem, by Maximus, Biſhop of that City; but if we believe St. Jerome, he would not do the Office of a Deacon, as long as that Biſhop liv'd. After his Death (a), he was placed in his room, by Acacius and the Biſhops of his Party, which rendered his Faith ſuſpected to the Catholicks (b). But he was not long a Friend to Acacius; for the Differences which they had about the Prerogatives of their Sees, quickly broke them in pieces. The Council of Nice had given the Biſhop of Jeruſalem, the firſt place among all the Biſhops of that Province, and yet left the Rites of the Church of Cæſarea entire, which was Metropolis to the Church of Jeruſalem. This Honour gave occaſion to the Biſhop of Jeruſalem, to aſſume to himſelf ſome Privileges, and ſo Maximus of Jeruſalem, took upon him to Ordain Biſhops in Paleſtine, and to Aſſemble a Council of that Province. His Succeſſor, St. Cyril, deſiring to maintain himſelf in the Poſſeſſion of thoſe Privileges, was troubled by Acacius of Cæſarea, who would not endure that the Church of Jeruſalem ſhould aſſume to it ſelf a right which legally pertained to his own Church. To revenge himſelf for this Encroachment, he called a Council in the year 356, wherein he depos'd St. Cyril, under pretence that he had Sold the Ornaments of the Church, and the Sacred Veſſels to relieve the Poor in time of Famine. He placed in his room, Eutychius, who probably was Biſhop of Eleutheropolis. St. Cyril appealed from the Sentence of this Synod, to a more numerous Council; but he was forced to retire to Tarſus, where he continued ſome time with Silvanus, Biſhop of that City, who received him very kindly, and gave him leave to celebrate the Holy Myſteries, and to Preach in his Dioceſs. At this time, there was a Synod held at Melitina, compos'd of Biſhops of Acacius's Party, where St. Cyril was preſent. He came afterwards to the Council of Seleucia, wherein he took part with Baſil of Ancyra, Euſtathius of Sebaſtea, and the other Semi-Arian Biſhops, who treated him as a lawful Biſhop, and gave him a Seat in the Council, in ſpite of all the Oppoſition that was made by Acacius: And Acacius, that he might the better oppoſe his Adverſary, threw himſelf upon the Party of Eudoxius, and by this means, got St. Cyril depos'd anew in the Council of Conſtantinople. 'Twas about this time, that Heremius was ordain'd Biſhop of Jeruſalem, becauſe probably Eutychius, who was already Biſhop of Eleutheropolis, would not leave his Church, to take the See of Jeruſalem. After Heremius, there was one named Heraclius, and to him Succeeded one Hilarius. But at laſt, St. Cyril was reſtored to his See, under the Emperor Theodoſius, after his Ordination had been approved by the Council of Conſtantinople, held in the year 380 (c). He died the year 386, and had John for his Succeſſor.

St. Cyril of Jeruſalem.

St. Jerome aſſures us, That St. Cyril compos'd his Catechetical Diſcourſes in his youth: We have 18 of them extant, addreſs'd to the Catechumens, whereof ſome are quoted by Theodoret (d), by St. John Damaſcene, by Cypariſſiota; and there are 5 others, called Myſtagogick Lectures, for the Inſtruction of thoſe that are newly baptized. Cook, Rivet, Aubertin, and other Calviniſtical Criticks, do all that they can, to prove theſe Catechetical Diſcourſes ſuppoſititious, becauſe they contain many things that diſpleaſe them (e),

(a) After his Death.] Socrates, B. 11. Ch. 38. and Sozomen, B. IV. Ch. 20. ſays, that Acacius of Cæſarea, and Patrophilus of Scythopolis, turned out Maximus, to place St. Cyril in his Room: But St. Jerome who ſpeaks of St. Cyril, after ſuch a manner as ſufficiently diſcovers, that he did not favour him, ſince he treats him as an Arian, tells us, that Maximus was dead, when he was Ordain'd. But he accuſes St. Cyril of perſecuting Heraclius, who was Ordain'd Biſhop by the Catholicks, in the room of Maximus, and of reducing him to the rank of Presbyters. St. Epiphanius, Ruffinus, and Theodoret, ſpeak not a word of this Heraclius: But Socrates and Sozomen, place him as ſecond of the Biſhops whom the Arians ſet up in Oppoſition to St. Cyril. St. Jerome, calls the firſt Irenæus, inſtead of Eremius.

(b) His Faith ſuſpected to the Catholicks.] Ruffinus and St. Jerome, obſerve, that he oftentimes chang'd his Faith and his Communion. As to his Communion, 'tis true; for at firſt, he held Communion with Acacius, afterwards he ſeparated from him; then he communicated with the Biſhops of his Party, at the Synod of Melitina; after this he forſook them, to joyn with Baſil of Ancyra, and the Semi-Arians; at laſt, he re-united himſelf to the Catholicks. But for all this, he did not change his Faith, for he always believed the Son to be like in Subſtance unto the Father, without condemning the term Conſubſtantial. 'Twas Acacius who was ſo changeable in his Faith, for he ſometimes ſigned the Doctrine, the Words being like in Subſtance, and ſometimes condemned this Doctrine, and approved the Error of the Anomœans; but Meletius re-united them all, and made them approve the term Conſubſtantial. We muſt not believe St. Jerome about the Cauſe of St. Cyril, for he was addicted to Paulinus againſt Meletius, and againſt all thoſe of his Party.

(c) The Council of Conſtantinople, held in the Year 380.] This appears by the Letter from the Council of Conſtantinople, produced by Theodoret, wherein the Biſhops declare, that they had approved the Ordination of St. Cyril, becauſe it was performed according to form by the Biſhops of his Province.

(d) By Theodoret, &c.] This Father in his Second Dialogue, cites a long Paſſage taken out of the 4th. Catechetical Diſcourſe of St. Cyril, Biſhop of Jeruſalem, which is word for word found in the 4th. Catechetical Diſcourſe to the Catechumens: St. John Damaſcene, relates alſo a Paſſage taken out of the 11th. in his Orat. 3. de Imag. Cyparitiota Dec. 6. cites the 10th. Catechetical Diſcourſe.

(e) Many things that diſpleaſe them.] The real Preſence, Tranſubſtantiation, the Sacrifice of the Maſs, the Ceremonies, Prayers for the Dead, the Exorciſms, Invocation of Saints, the Honour due to Relicks, the Celibacy of Prieſts, the Veneration of the Croſs, &c. are Opinions which the Calviniſts cannot endure, and they are mightily troubled to ſee them eſtabliſhed by an Author of the 4th. Age of the Church.

and destroy their Errors. But the Conjectures which they alledge to overthrow their Authority, are too slight (f), to call in question the Truth; and the Interest which they have to Oppose them, renders their Censure suspected. Their endeavours are chiefly against the 5 Mystagogical Catechisms, which are not indeed cited by the Ancients, as the first Discourses are. But the Agreement of the Stile (g) shews, that they are the same Author's; and the End of the 18th. Catechetical Discourse (h), demonstrates it clearly: For there he promises to Compose 5 other Instructions after Easter, whereof he tells you the Subjects, which are very near akin to the Subjects of those which we still have. In short, he cites the first in the last; and since the last are promised in the first, and these again quoted in the last, Who can doubt but they are all the same Author's (i)? And since they cannot deny, but the first which have gone under the Name of St. Cyril, ever since Theodoret's time, are Genuine, they must by consequence confess, that the 5 last belong to the same Author.

The Eighteen first Catechetical Instructions are address'd to those of the Catechumens, who are called the Elect, or the Enlightned; that is to say, those that have pass'd through all the other degrees of Cathechumens, and are now instructed in order to receiving Baptism within a little time: For the Antient Church did not give Baptism immediately to all those who desir'd it, but only to those who had given signs of a sincere Faith, and of the change of their Life, by a long Tryal, and by a course of Penance. So when an Infidel offer'd himself to be admitted among the number of Christians, they begun with discovering to him in particular the blindness wherein he had hitherto been, but they did not permit him to enter into the Church to hear the Publick Exhortations. Afterwards when he was sufficiently undeceived of his old Errors, and desired to be instructed in the Truth, he was permitted to enter into the Church, but only to hear the Sermons, without being present, at any of the Prayers: This sort of Catechumens were call'd Hearers, because they heard the Instructions which were given in the Church. The third Rank of Catechumens, was that of those that were present at the Prayers, who were called the Supplicants or the Prostrati, because they were present at the Prayers of the Church till the Offertory, and they kneeled and prostrated themselves on the Ground to receive the Blessing of the Bishop. In the mean time they were instructed in the Doctrine of the Church, and their Behaviour and Actions were carefully inspected, and when they found them dispos'd to receive Baptism, they were permitted to desire it, and to give in their Names, that they might be admitted to it. Those who did so, were call'd Competentes, that is, Competitors; and if their Petition was admitted, they were called Elect; and then they were prepared to receive Baptism by Instructions, by Exorcisms, and by many Ceremonies. These are all the Degrees that can be distinguished among the Catechumens: But commonly the Fathers without insisting on these Distinctions, called those Catechumens, who were either Hearers, or Partakers only of the Prayers; and they gave the Name of Competitors, to those who were in a Condition to receive Baptism. The last are they whom St. Cyril calls, Φωτιζόμενοι, that is, Enlightned, because they were already instructed in the Doctrine of the Church, and had given in their Names at the beginning of Lent, to be baptized at Easter, according to Custom. 'Twas to ground them well in our Mysteries, and dispose them to receive Baptism with Purity, that St. Cyril compos'd those Instructions, as he himself testifies in his Preliminary Discourse, in which he treats of those Dispositions that they ought to bring with them to Baptism, and of the Necessity of hearing Instruction. He exhorts them to Purifie themselves from their Sins, and to embrace a truly Christian Life, if they would have Baptism profitable to them. He admonishes them not to approach this Sacrament, if their Souls were still polluted with heinous Sins, and they persever'd still in their wicked Designs and their sinful Customs. He tells them that they deceived themselves, if they imagined that they should receive the Fruit and Effects of Baptism, while they continued in this state. If ye are still, says he, of the same wicked Disposition of which ye have always been, in vain do ye think that ye shall receive the Grace of Baptism: Ye shall be washed with those Waters, but ye shall not receive the Holy Spirit. Therefore if any of you finds himself troubled with some secret Disease in his Mind, let him take a Remedy. Ye have yet time, the Church offers you a Penance of four days. Ye may, during this time, retire to do Penance, and after that re-enter into the Rank where ye were, To be baptized at Whitsuntide. He adds, That since they cannot receive Baptism but once only, (for none but Hereticks, says he, are re-baptized, because the Baptism which they have received out of the Church is no Baptism) they must take good heed that they do not receive it in vain. After this, he explains the Disposition which they ought to have, that this Sacrament may be profitable to them. God hath said, I require nothing of you but a good Heart: Say not Ye, How is it that my Sins shall be forgiven me? I declare it unto you, it is by Faith and a good Disposition. What is there more easily to be had? forsake then presently your infamous Company, give over your Obscene Discourse, avoid Covetousness, and the love of Riches, come and hear Instruction with Diligence and Delight, be careful to receive the Exorcisms, tho' ye have been already solemnly exorcised. Nothing is more wholsome than this Ceremony; for as the Gold is Purified by Fire, so the Soul is Purified by Exorcisms. He exhorts them afterwards to hear Instruction with Attention. He makes them understand that there is a great difference between Catechizing and Sermons; for if it happens that any one does not apply his Mind to a Sermon, or neglects to hear

St. Cyril of Jerusalem.

(f) The Conjectures which they alledge are too slight.] They say, that there is a Greek Catalogue wherein they are attributed to John of Jerusalem; but of what Authority is a Catalogue, the Antiquity whereof is not known? Can it be opposed to the testimony of Theodoret, who cites those Catechetical Instructions under the Name of St. Cyril, and to that of St. Jerome, who testifies, that this Father wrote one? There is no probability, says Rivet, that the Care of Instructing the Catechumens should be entrusted to a young Man. Why not? If he was capable of it, as it appears St. Cyril was. If there was no probability of it, Why does St. Jerome assure us, that it was so? 'Tis said, adds Rivet, That they were spoken ex-tempore, and St. Jerome says, that he wrote them. A pleasant Objection indeed! as if it were not known that Authors do often set down those Discourses afterwards in writing, which they spoke without premeditation at first: The same Rivet is of Opinion, that those places which concern Celibacy, Virginity, Relicks, the Cross of Jesus Christ, &c. are added in these Catechetical Discourses; what proof has he for this, but only that those things do not please him? He accuses St. Cyril of Blasphemy, because he says, If the Virgin Mary were so much honoured for carrying Jesus Christ the space of nine Months, we ought yet more to honour Christians for keeping their Virginity for very many years. This thought is not exact, 'tis a little too blunt; but such things did often escape the Fathers in their Sermons, and it is capable of a good Sense. Another Objection of Rivet's is this: This Author says, that the Wood of the Cross is amongst us to this Day. Now these Words to this Day cannot agree, says he, to St. Cyril, who might be present at the finding of the Cross. To which I answer, that the Words, to this Day, respect the time which was already past, since the Passion of Jesus Christ. To conclude, all these Catechetical Discourses, have the Character of Antiquity; they are simple and natural, and explain the Doctrines of the Church after the antient Way. The Author says at the beginning of his 6th. Catechetical Discourse, that he wrote 70 Years after the beginning of the Heresy of the Manichees: The Canon of the Sacred Books which he recites, is antient; and the Creed which he makes use of, does not betray his Age: The manner in which he explains the Mystery of the Trinity, shews, that he was a Catholick, but that he managed himself slily; for tho' he always confirms the Divinity of the Son and the Holy Spirit, he does not always make use of the Word Consubstantial. The two Arguments of Rivet, against the Mystagogical Discourses, are as weak as the former. The Ancients, says he, do not distinguish these two kinds of Discourses. But neither do they say, that there was but one: St. Jerome, who is the only Person that speaks of them all, says only, that St. Cyril wrote Catechetical Discourses, without telling how many: The other Authors speak of those which they had occasion to quote. 2. He says, That the last are short, whereas the first are very long. But this is no Argument why they should not be all the same Author's. The three first to the Illuminated, are shorter than the last, and are not much longer than the Mystagogical Discourses. The time, and Matter that he writes about, makes any Author longer or shorter; and after Easter, the Instructions ought not to be so long. Aubertin adds, that Prævotius says he supplied many Letters, and corrected many places. And what follows from thence? Is there any one Book to which the first Publishers have not done the same thing? they have added sometimes half a word, or a whole one, or sometimes some words which they thought necessary. But they cannot be suppos'd to add whole Periods, Pages and Books; and indeed, if ye compare the Edition of Prævotius, with that of Morellus, which preceded it, made by a Manuscript of Monsieur De Mesmes, and with the Latin Versions made from other Manuscripts, you may see that the Differences among them are of very small Consequence, and that they neither alter the Sense nor the Doctrine of this Father.

(g) But the Agreement of the Stile, &c.] There is the same Stile, the same Method, the same Air of Writing. The Stile both of the one and the other is familiar and unaffected: He explains the Mysteries by Passages of Scripture, and moralizes them after the same manner in them all.

(h) The end of the 18th. Catechetical Discourse.] After Easter, says he, with the help of God, you shall hear other Catechetical Lectures; First, about what is done before Baptism. This is the Subject of the First Catechetical Discourse. Secondly, To explain how ye are purified from your sins by the Baptism of Water. That's the Subject of the Second. Thirdly, How ye have received the Seal of the Holy Spirit. That's the Subject of the third. And Lastly, Concerning the Holy Mysteries of the Altar. That's the Subject of the two last. But besides, the Order which he promised to observe in speaking of Holy Mysteries, is that which is observed in these two Catechetical Discourses.

(i) Who can doubt but they are all the same Author's.] Since he cites the first Instructions in the last, and declares at the beginning of the first Catechetical Discourse, that he delayed to instruct them perfectly in Divine Mysteries, till they were baptized; and toward the end of the same Discourse, he says, that he had explained the Creed in the preceding Discourses.

St. Cyril of Jeruſalem.

it, 'tis eaſie to recover that loſs, becauſe he may hear to Morrow the ſame thing; but when all the Myſteries which are neceſſary to be known for receiving Baptiſm are explained in their Order, by Catechizing, if perhaps you neglect to hear any one of them, you cannot return to it again; and there is ſuch an Eſſential Connection of all theſe Myſteries one with another, that if you do not underſtand any one of them, you are in danger of underſtanding nothing of all the reſt. He exhorts them, to ſay nothing to Infidels nor Catechumens of what they ſhall hear, to behave themſelves modeſtly when they come into the Church, before the Exorciſms are begun, and not to entertain themſelves with Profane News; but to read there ſome uſeful Book, to ſing or to pray, and to conſider themſelves always as in the preſence of God, while they are there. He exhorts them to Pray always, that they may ſhun the ſnares of the Devil, and to watch continually over themſelves, leſt they fall into Temptation. Theſe are, ſays he in the Concluſion, the beſt Exhortations and Inſtructions which we can give you, that you may not Build upon Chaff, Hay or Stubble, leſt your Building be conſum'd when it ſhall paſs through the Fire. All that I can do, is to exhort you, 'tis your part to Labour, and God's to Perfect. Raiſe up your Minds, direct your Intentions, prepare your Hearts, it is for your Souls that you fight, and they are Eternal Treaſures which you hope for.

The Firſt Lecture is alſo an Exhortation to thoſe that are to be baptized, to prepare themſelves by a Holy Life and by Good Works, that ſo they may receive the Grace of Baptiſm. It is compos'd upon a Leſſon taken out of the Firſt Chapter of Iſaiah, Verſe 16. which begins with theſe words, Waſh you, make clean, put away the evil of your doings, &c. He exhorts them wholly to put off the Old-man, ſincerely to renounce all Sin, and to ſpend in the Exerciſes of Piety the 40 Days that are appointed to Prepare them for Baptiſm.

The Second is concerning Sin and Penance. He teaches them, That Sin is committed voluntarily by the bad uſe we make of our Free-Will; That the Devil was the firſt Sinner, that afterwards he made the firſt Man, ſin; That by the Sin of the firſt Man all Men fell under Blindneſs and Death; That he who raiſed Lazarus raiſed our Souls, and delivered them from Sin by his Blood; That therefore we ought not to deſpair, whatſoever Sins we have committed, but to truſt to the Mercy of God, and to have recourſe to the Remedy of Repentance. He relates many Examples of God's Mercy towards the greateſt Sinners: He alledges alſo the Examples of the Angels, to whom he thinks God pardoned many Faults. He adds towards the end, the Example of St. Peter, and concludes with theſe words; Theſe are, my Brethren, the many Examples of Sinners whom God hath pardoned, as ſoon as they repented. Do you alſo confeſs your Sins unto the Lord, and you ſhall obtain the Kingdom of Heaven, and enjoy the Heavenly Reward together with all the Saints in Jeſus Chriſt, to whom be Glory for ever and ever.

The Third Lecture is concerning the Neceſſity of Baptiſm, and of Penance which ought to precede it. You muſt prepare your ſelves, ſays he, by purity of Conſcience; for you ought not to conſider the External Baptiſm, but the Spiritual Grace which is given with the Water, that is Sanctified by the Invocation of the Father, the Son and Holy Ghoſt. The Water waſhes the Body, but the Spirit Sanctifies the Soul, that we being purified, may become worthy to approach unto God. You cannot be perfect unleſs you be ſanctified by the Water and the Spirit. So, if any one be baptized without having the Holy Spirit, he receives not the Grace of Baptiſm and likewiſe if any one receive not Baptiſm, though his Converſation were never ſo well ordered, he ſhall not enter into the Kingdom of Heaven. This Diſcourſe is bold, but it is not mine but Jeſus Chriſt's, who has pronounced this Sentence, when he ſaid, Except a Man be born again of Water and the Holy Spirit, he cannot enter into the Kingdom of Heaven. He proves this Truth by the Example of Cornelius, then he ſhews the neceſſity of Baptiſm by Water, and ſays, that none but Martyrs only can enjoy the Kingdom of Heaven without being baptized. [The Ancients generally believed that Martyrdom was that Baptiſm by Fire which John Baptiſt foretold, Matt. 3. 11. and that was the Cup which our Saviour foretold Zebedee's Children that they ſhould drink, and the Baptiſm wherewith they were to be baptized.] He teaches, that ſince Jeſus Chriſt was baptized to ſanctifie the Waters of Baptiſm, we muſt deſcend into the Water to be ſanctified, and as the Holy Spirit did then viſibly appear, ſo now he deſcends likewiſe, though after an inviſible manner, upon thoſe that are baptized, if they be well prepared for it. In ſhort, he ſtill exhorts thoſe to whom he ſpeaks, to prepare themſelves in the Remaining part of Lent, that ſo they may obtain by Baptiſm the Pardon of their Sins, and the Grace of the Holy Spirit.

St. Cyril begins in the Fourth Catechetical Diſcourſe, with the Explication of the Articles of our Faith. He ſays in his Exordium, 'That the Worſhip of God conſiſts in two 'things, in the belief of thoſe Doctrines that Religion teaches 'us, and in the practice of Good Works; that Faith is unprofitable without Good Works, and that Good Works 'will prevail nothing without Faith. He obſerves, That 'the Articles of Faith are oppoſed by Pagans, Jews and 'Hereticks; and Therefore it is neceſſary to propoſe it, 'and explain it to thoſe that enter into the Church.' He ſays, that before he explains them more largely, he will firſt give a ſummary of them, and prays thoſe that are already inſtructed, to hear with Patience his Catechetical Diſcourſes. Afterwards he ſummarily explains the Chief Doctrines of our Religion. He inſtructs them concerning the Divinity, 'That there is but one God only, the Creator of all Things, who is every where preſent, who knows 'all things, who can do all things, who never changes, 'who will reward the Good and puniſh the wicked, &c. 'He adds, that we muſt believe alſo in Jeſus Chriſt our 'Lord, the only Son of God, God begotten of God, like 'in all things to him who begat him, who was from 'all Eternity, who ſitteth now at his right hand and reigneth with him; That we muſt not believe, that the Son 'is of another Nature than the Father, nor confound the 'Perſons of the Father and the Son; That he is the Word, 'and the Word of God, but a Word ſubſiſting, which is 'nothing like to the Word of Men; That this word was 'truly and really united to the Human Nature; That he 'aſſumed real Fleſh from the Virgin; That he was truly 'Man, ſubject to Human Infirmities, and to Death it ſelf; 'That he was Crucified for our Sins; That he was buried in the Grave, and that he deſcended into Hell to deliver the Juſt, who had been ſhut up there a long time with 'Adam; That he was truly riſen from the Dead; That 'being aſcended into Heaven, he was worſhipped by all 'the World, and that he ſhall come again to Judge the 'Quick and the Dead, and to Eſtabliſh an eternal Kingdom. 'Concerning the Holy Spirit, he teaches, That we ought 'to have the ſame Notions of him as of the Father and 'Son: That he is One, Indiviſible and Almighty; That he 'knows all things; That he deſcended in the form of a Dove 'upon Jeſus Chriſt; That he ſpoke by the Prophets; That 'he Sanctifies the Soul in Baptiſm, and that he ought to 'be honoured as the Father and the Son, being one and the 'ſame Divinity. He exhorts his Auditors to hold faſt this 'Creed and gives them Notice, that he will prove it in 'the following Diſcourſe by Teſtimonies of Scripture:' For, ſays he, we ought not to teach any thing concerning Divine Myſteries, but what we can confirm by the Teſtimonies of Scripture. Do not believe what I ſay, if I do not prove it by Holy Scriptures.

St. Cyril, after having informed thoſe whom he inſtructs, what they ought to believe concerning the Divinity, acquaints them with the Knowledge of their own Natures, teaching them that they are compoſed of Body and Soul; That the Soul is Immortal, becauſe of Jeſus Chriſt who has given it Immortality; That it is free, and has the power of doing Good and evil; That it did not Sin before it came into the World; That the Souls of Men and Women are of the ſame Nature; That the Body is the Work of God; That it is not Wicked by Nature; That when it meets with a Holy Soul, it is the Temple of the Holy Spirit, and that we ought to be very watchful, leſt we defile it by Uncleanneſs. He occaſionally takes Notice, 'That 'Virginity is the more perfect ſtate, but that we ought not 'to blame Marriage; That Married Perſons may hope for 'Salvation, provided they uſe Marriage aright; That in 'Order to their living holily in this ſtate, they muſt abſtain 'ſometimes from the uſe of Marriage to give themſelves 'unto Prayer, and that their intention ſhould not be to ſatisfie a brutal Paſſion, but to have Children. He adds, 'That we ought not to condemn even thoſe that proceed 'to Second Marriages, and that this weakneſs ſhould be 'pardoned in thoſe who ſtand in need of this Remedy to 'avoid Fornication.

As to what concerns Abſtinence from Meat, St. Cyril ſays, 'That Chriſtians do abſtain during their Faſts from Fleſh 'and Wine; but that they have no averſion to thoſe things, 'as if they were in themſelves Abominable; That they do 'not abſtain but to Merit the more, by deſpiſing what is 'agreeable to our ſenſe, that they may enjoy the Heavenly 'Feaſt. He abſolutely forbids the eating of things Sacrificed to Idols, and things ſtrangled.' As for Cloths, he deſires that they may be modeſt, and ſuch as may ſerve not to adorn but to cover the Body, and defend it from the Injuries of the Weather. He ſpeaks afterwards of the Reſurrection, and brings examples to ſhew that it is not impoſſible. The Holy Scripture is the laſt thing of which he Treats in this Lecture: He ſays, that the Old Teſtament is part of the Holy Scripture, and exhorts them not to read the Apocryphal Books: He informs them, that there are but 22 Canonical Books of the Old Teſtament, and obſerves, That they have been tranſlated by the LXX. He believes that this Tranſlation was made by Inſpiration, and that the Seventy Interpreters being ſhut up in ſeparate Cells, all their Verſions were found to agree together. He recommends the Reading of the Canonical Books, and Meditation upon them; He reckons amongſt this Number in the Old Teſtament the Book of Ruth, that of Eaſter, Job and Baruch; but he does not reckon thoſe other Books which are not in the Hebrew Canon. The Canonical Books of the New Testament are according to him, The Four Gospels, the Acts of the Apostles, the Seven Canonical Epistles, and the Fourteen Epistles of St. Paul, which in his time and in his Country were at the End of the New Testament, after the Canonical Epistles. He says nothing of the Revelation. He condemns Judicial Astrology, Necromancy, Publick Spectacles, Games, Usury, Covetousness, the other Superstitions of the Jews and Pagans, and the Assemblies of Hereticks.

In the Fifth Lecture, after he has proved by many Examples the Necessity, and Vertue of Faith, he says, That we must continue in that Faith which we have received from the Church, and which is fortified with the Testimony of Holy Scripture. But, says he, because Men cannot read the Scripture, some being hindered by their Ignorance, others by their Worldly Business; therefore all that we are obliged to believe is comprized in a few words. I pray you then to remember to fix it upon your Minds, and to be fully persuaded that this is the only true Faith. Afterwards at your leisure ye may search for the Proofs of it in the Holy Scripture. But at present do you acquiesce in the Doctrine which you have learned by Tradition, engrave it upon your Hearts, that you may persevere in it with Piety: for if you remain in doubt and uncertainty, 'tis to be feared, that the Enemy will work your Perdition, and that Hereticks will overthrow that Doctrine which I have taught you.

The Sixth is concerning the Monarchy, or the Unity of God, against Pagans and Hereticks. He describes the Errors both of the one and the other, and more particularly enlarges upon the Heresie of the Manichees, and gives an account of its Original, Progress and Impiety. He produces a Fragment of the Dispute of Archelaus against the Heretick Manes. He observes, that Men cannot comprehend the Nature and Essence of God.

In the Seventh, he explains how the Name of Father agrees to God. He observes, that he has only one Son by Nature, who is Jesus Christ, and that Men are his Children by Adoption. He takes Occasion from hence to Exhort his Hearers to live worthy of the Title of the Sons of God, and to Honour him, though of his good Pleasure he chose them to be his Children. At the same Time he admonishes them to have a Reverence for their Fathers and Mothers.

In the Eighth he shews, that God is Almighty because he can do all things, and all things depend on his Power.

The Ninth is upon these Words, the Creator of all things visible and invisible. There he shews what cause we have to admire the Greatness and Beauty of God's Works.

The Tenth is upon these Words, in Jesus Christ our only Lord. He says, that in order to the Pious Adoration of the Father, we must Adore the Son also. He explains all the Names that are given him. He maintains, that 'twas the Son who appeared to Adam and Moses. He makes Moral Remarks upon the Name of Jesus, and that of Christ. He produces many proofs concerning Jesus Christ, and places in this number the Wood of the Cross, which, says he, is seen to this Day amongst us, and with those who having taken of it here, have filled the whole World almost with it.

The Eleventh is concerning the Divinity of the Word, and his Eternal Generation. There he refutes the Errors of the Arians, and proves that the Word is of the same Nature with the Father; That he was from all Eternity, and that he made all things: There he calls St. Peter the Prince or the Chief of the Apostles, and the Sovereign Preacher of the Church.

The Twelfth is concerning the Incarnation, where he shews by many Testimonies of Scripture, That Jesus Christ was made Man for the Salvation of Mankind. He quotes some of the Prophecies that foretold the Incarnation of Jesus Christ; and shews, that the time of the Messia's coming, the place where he was Born, his Condition, and the manner of his coming into the World, were foretold; he praises Virginity, and observes, That those who performed the Sacerdotal Office, observed Celibacy.

In the Thirteenth, he relates the Prophecies which concern the Death and Passion of Jesus Christ. He recommends to the Faithful, the signing themselves with the sign of the Cross on their Forehead, in Eating and Drinking, at their going out and coming in, at their lying down &c. He calls this Sign, the Terror of Devils, and the Mark of the Faithful. He says, that it drives away Devils; That it cures Diseases; That it defeats Inchantments, and that at one Day, it will appear in the Heavens when Jesus Christ shall come to judge the World.

He proves in the Fourteenth, the Resurrection and Ascension of Jesus Christ, where he commends the Piety of those Emperors, who built the Church of the Resurrection at Jerusalem, where he was, and adorned it with Gold and Silver.

The Fifteenth is concerning the second coming of Jesus Christ, of the End of the World, and of Anti-Christ, who will come, says he, after the Destruction of the Roman Empire. He says many more particulars of him, which he endeavours to prove by the Prophecies, but the explications he gives of them are not very solid. He observes, that the Schisms which he then saw in the Church, made him fear that the Reign of Anti-Christ was not far off. After this he Discourses of the last Judgment and of the Eternal Kingdom of Jesus Christ. He refutes the Opinion of Marcellus of Ancyra, who had said that the Son should not Reign any more after the Day of Judgment. He makes very curious remarks upon the particle Until, and shews, that it is not always exclusive, as when it is said, That Death reigned from Adam until Moses, where the meaning is not, that it did not Reign after Moses.

St. Cyril of Jerusalem.

The Sixteenth Lecture, is concerning the Holy Spirit. He observes, That we ought to take good Heed, lest we say any thing through Ignorance or Error, which is contrary to the Belief we ought to have concerning the Holy Spirit, because 'tis written, That the Blasphemies which are spoken against him are unpardonable. Therefore he declares, That he will say nothing of the Holy Spirit, but what is said of him in the Holy Scripture, and that he will not enquire by an indecent Curiosity after that which is not written. 'Tis the Holy Spirit, says he, who dictated the Holy Scripture: he hath said of himself what he would have us to know, and what we are capable of knowing about him. He begins with giving an Account of the Errors of Hereticks concerning the Holy Spirit, and afterwards recites what is said of him in the Holy Scripture; he describes his Effects, and attributes to him all the good Thoughts and good Actions of the Faithful.

He continues the same Subject in his 17th. Lecture, where he produces the Testimonies of our Lord concerning the Holy Spirit. He has exactly collected in these two Catechetical Lectures, all that is said of the Holy Spirit in the Old and New Testament. He teaches, that the Holy Spirit is not a Breath form'd by the Mouth of the Father and the Son, but that he is a Person subsistent of the same Nature with the Father and the Son. He calls St. Peter, the Prince of the Apostles, and the Porter of Heaven. He observes, That the Determination of the Council of Jerusalem, was a General or Oecumenical Law, which all the Earth had, and did still observe.

The last of these Lectures which are addressed to the Enlightned, is of the Resurrection, of the Church, and of Eternal Life. 'In the beginning he shews, That the hope of 'the Resurrection is the Foundation of all good Actions, 'because the expectation of this Reward, excites Men to 'labour for it. 'Twas this that made him say, that the 'Faith of the Resurrection is a great encouragement, and 'a very necessary Doctrine.' He brings for Proof of the Resurrection, the Justice of God, which requires, that Sinners which are not punished in this World should be punished in another, and that the Righteous who are miserable here below, should be recompenced in another Life. He says, That all Men have naturally some Knowledge of the Resurrection, and that upon this account, they have a horror of those who rob the Dead. He brings many Illustrations of it taken from the changes in Nature. He does not forget the Example of the Phœnix, for which he cites St. Clement, for his Authority. He observes that the Generation of Man, is no less Wonderful than the Resurrection, and that God who could Create the Universe of nothing, can easily raise a dead Man. After he has employed these Reasons against the Pagans, he alledges against the Samaritans the wonderful effects of the Divine Power, related in the Old Testament, and proves the Resurrection of the Dead by many passages of the Prophets. [This seems to be a mistake; the Sadducees were the only Sect of the Jews that denyed a Resurrection.] In speaking of the Dead Man, raised at the Sepulchre of Elisha, he says, That by this Example we may know, that we ought not only to Honour the Souls of the Saints, but also to shew Reverence to the Relicks of their Bodys, since they have such Power and Vertue. The Second Part of this Instruction, is concerning the Catholick Church. He says, 'It is so called, because it is spread over 'all the Earth; because it universally receives all the Articles of Faith; because it generally cures all Sins; and 'Lastly, because it possesses all Graces, and all Virtues. He 'says, it is called the Church, because it is an assembly of 'the Faithful; That the Hereticks have also their Assemblies 'or their Churches: That to discern the one from the 'other, when you go to any place, you must not ask barely where is the Church, or the House of the Lord, be'cause the Hereticks give this Name to their Temples; but 'you must ask, where is the Catholick Church, because 'this is a Name proper to this Holy Mother of all faith'ful Christians, which is the Spouse of Jesus Christ.' In short, The last part of this Lecture, is of Eternal Life. 'Tis very remarkable that in the Creed which St. Cyril used, there is found Life everlasting, because as we have observed in the first Volume of our Bibliotheca, almost all the antient Creeds, end with the Resurrection of the Flesh. St. Cyril adds to it Baptism, whereof he had already spoken, the Catholick Church, and Life everlasting: He says upon the last Article, That the Eternal Life of Christians is the Possession of the most Holy Trinity. He concludes this Lecture with a Promise to his Auditors, that he would explain after Eaſter, the ſacred Myſteries which they were to receive upon the Chriſtian Altar, and with an Exhortation to rejoyce, because the time of their Redemption, Salvation, and Regeneration approached. St. Cyril of Jeruſalem.

The five other Lectures which are called Myſtagogical, are addreſſed by St. Cyril to the ſame Perſons, after they had received the Grace of Baptiſm. The firſt is about the Vow which is made in Baptiſm to renounce the Devil, his Works and all his Pomps. He declares to his Auditors, the Importance of performing this Vow. He ſays, That the Works of the Devil are Sins, and that his Pomps are Shows, Plays, and prophane Feaſts. There is in this firſt Lecture a Paſſage expreſly for Tranſubſtantiation; For, ſays he, as the Bread and Wine of the Euchariſt, which are nothing before the Invocation of the moſt Holy Trinity, but Bread and Wine, become after this Invocation, the Body and Blood of Jeſus Chriſt. So thoſe Meats which ſerve for the Pomp of the Devil, though they be pure of their own Nature, become impure by the Invocation of Devils. [All theſe paſſages are neceſſarily to be underſtood, according to thoſe Notions wherein the Chriſtians of that Age had been uſually inſtructed.]

In the ſecond, he treats of the Ceremonies and Effects of Baptiſm: He ſays, That the Catechumens after they were unclothed, were anointed from the Feet unto the Head, with exorciſed Oyl; That after this they were conducted to the Laver; That they were asked, if they believed in the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit; That after they had made Profeſſion of this Faith, they were plunged three times into the Water, and that they retired out of it by degrees, at three times likewiſe. He teaches them, That the Baptiſm of Jeſus Chriſt, does not only remit Sins, as that of John the Baptiſt did, but alſo fills the Soul with the Gifts of the Holy Spirit, and makes us the Children of God by Adoption.

The third is of Holy Chriſm, wherewith the Faithful were anointed immediately after they came out of the Waters of Baptiſm. He declares to them, that we ought not to imagine this to be the common Oyl. For, ſays he, as the Bread of the Euchariſt after the Invocation of the Holy Spirit, is no more common Bread, but the Body of Jeſus Chriſt, ſo the Holy Chriſm after Conſecration, is no more common Oyl, but it is a Gift of the Holy Spirit, which has the Vertue to procure the Preſence of the Divinity. So while the Forehead and other Parts of the Body are anointed with this viſible Oyl, the Soul is ſanctified by this holy and quickning Spirit. He obſerves afterwards, that they anointed the Forehead, the Ears, the Noſtrils and the Breaſt.

The fourth Lecture is of the Body and Blood of Jeſus Chriſt; and the fifth of the Celebration of the Euchariſt. Theſe two Catechetical Lectures, are ſo clear, and ſo ſtrong, for eſtabliſhing the Doctrine and Diſcipline of the Church about the Euchariſt; that we cannot excuſe our ſelves from ſetting them down almoſt entire. Take then as follows the Tranſlation of them which has been printed in the Office of the Holy Sacrament.

'The Doctrine of the bleſſed St. Paul alone, is ſufficient to give certain Proofs of the truth of the Divine Myſteries, and the Church having judged you worthy to partake of them, ye are by this means ſo cloſely united to Jeſus Chriſt, that ye are no more, as one may ſay, but one and the ſame Body and Blood with him. For this great Apoſtle ſays, in the place which we have already read, that our Lord in the ſame night wherein he was delivered up to his Enemies, having taken Bread and given thanks to God his Father, broke it and gave it to his Diſciples, ſaying to them, Take and eat, This is my Body. Afterwards he took the Cup, and having given thanks, he ſaid unto them, Take and drink, This is my Blood. Seeing then, that he ſpeaking of the Bread, declared, that it was his Body, who ſhall ever dare to call in queſtion this Truth? And ſince that, he ſpeaking of the Wine, has aſſured us ſo poſitively, that it was his Blood, who can ever doubt of it? And who ſhall dare to ſay, 'tis not true that it was his Blood?

'Jeſus Chriſt being at a certain time in Cana of Galilee, changed there the Water into Wine by his Will only; and ſhall we think, that it is not as worthy of Credit upon his own Word, that he changed the Wine into his own Blood? If he being invited to a human and earthly Marriage, wrought there this Miracle, tho' no perſon expected it from him there, ought not we much rather to acknowledge, that he has given to the Children of the heavenly Spouſe, his Body to eat, and his Blood to drink, that his Body and Blood may be nouriſhment to their Souls? For under the ſpecies of Bread, he has given us his Body, and under the ſpecies of Wine, he has given us his Blood, that ſo being made partakers of this Body and Blood, ye may become one Body and one Blood with him. For by this means we become, as one may ſay, Chriſtiferi, that is to ſay, we carry Jeſus Chriſt in our Body when we receive into our Mouth, and into our Stomach, his Body and his Blood: And thus according to St. Peter, we are made Partakers of the Divine Nature.

'Jeſus Chriſt ſpeaking at another time to the Jews, ſays to them, Unleſs ye eat my Fleſh and drink my Blood, 'ye ſhall have no Life in you. But theſe groſs and carnal 'Men not underſtanding the Words ſpiritually, were offended 'with them, and withdrew from him, becauſe they imagined, 'that he would make them eat human Fleſh by Morſels.' St. Cyril of Jeruſalem. [Theſe Words do ſo fully explain St. Cyril's ſenſe, that they need no Comment. If the Jews were offended becauſe they did not ſpiritually underſtand thoſe Words of Jeſus Chriſt, when he talked to them in the 6th. of St. John; how much more according to this Father's way of reaſoning, would the Diſciples have been offended, if they had underſtood Jeſus Chriſt literally, when he inſtituted the Sacrament of the Euchariſt?] 'There were in the Old Diſpenſation 'Loaves of Bread which were offered before God, and be'cauſe they pertained to that Old Diſpenſation, they have 'ceaſed with it: But now in the New Diſpenſation, 'there is Bread from Heaven, and a Cup of Salvation, 'which ſanctifies Soul and Body. For as the Bread is the 'Nouriſhment which is proper to the Body, ſo the Word 'is the Nouriſhment which is proper to the Soul. Where'fore I conjure you, my Brethren, not to conſider them 'any more as common Bread and Wine, ſince they are the 'Body and Blood of Jeſus Chriſt according to his Word. 'For tho' your Senſe inform you, that 'tis not ſo, yet Faith 'ſhould perſuade and aſſure you, that 'tis ſo. Judge not 'therefore of this Truth by your Taſte, but let Faith make 'you believe with an entire Certainty, that you have been 'made worthy to partake of the Body and Blood of Jeſus 'Chriſt.

'Let your Soul rejoyce in the Lord, being perſuaded of 'it as a thing moſt certain, that the Bread which appears 'to our Eyes is not Bread, tho' our Taſte do judge it to 'be ſo, but that it is the Body of Jeſus Chriſt, and that the 'Wine which appears to our Eyes is not Wine, tho' our 'Senſe of Taſte takes it for Wine, but that it is the Blood 'of Jeſus Chriſt.

'Ye have ſeen that a Deacon gives Water to waſh the 'Hands to the Prieſt that officiates, and to the Prieſts that 'are about the Altar of God. Think you that this was done 'to cleanſe the Body? No, not at all; for we do not uſe 'to be in ſuch a Condition, when we enter into the Church, 'as to ſtand in need of ſuch waſhing to make us clean; 'but this waſhing of the Hands ſignifies, that we ſhould be 'clean from all our Sins; for the Hands ſignifying Actions, 'to waſh our Hands is nothing elſe but to purifie our Works. 'Afterwards the Deacon having ſaid with a loud Voice, 'Embrace and kiſs one another with a Kiſs of Peace, we do 'all mutually ſalute with a holy Kiſs, becauſe it is the To'ken of the perfect Reconciliation of our Hearts, and of 'forgetting all the Injuries that have been received. After 'this, the Prieſt that officiates, ſays with a loud Voice, 'Lift up your Hearts, becauſe in this tremendous Moment 'chiefly, our Hearts ſhould be raiſed up to God, and not 'depreſſed towards the things of this World. Therefore 'the Prieſt requires all thoſe that are preſent at the Sacri'fice, to baniſh from their Minds at this time, all Thoughts 'of the World, and all the Cares of their Domeſtick Af'fairs, that their Hearts may be in Heaven, in the Preſence 'of God who hath teſtified ſo great Love to Mankind. 'At theſe Words of the Prieſt, ye anſwer, We lift up our 'Hearts unto the Lord; and ſo ye profeſs to do what he 'has ſaid. The Prieſt adds, Let us give thanks unto the Lord. 'And we ought indeed, to give thanks to him, that we, 'unworthy as we are of ſo rare and ſo excellent a Gift, 'are honoured with the participation of it; that he of his 'Goodneſs has reconciled us who were Enemies to him'ſelf, and that he deſigns to make us who have been ſo 'great Sinners, become his Children by the Spirit of Adop'tion which he communicates to us. Ye anſwer at theſe 'Words of the Prieſt, 'Tis juſt and reaſonable to give thanks 'unto him: For when we give thanks to God, we do a 'thing which is juſt, and which we are obliged to do; 'but when God beſtows upon us ſo great Bleſſings, he 'does it not out of Juſtice, but our of pure Grace and 'Favour.

'Afterwards, we repeat the ſacred Hymn which the Se'raphims ſing in Heaven, in honour of the Three Perſons 'of the Trinity, that ſo by this moſt heavenly Song, we 'may communicate with the ſublime Hoſt of Angels, and 'that being ſanctified more and more by theſe moſt ſpiri'tual Hymns, we may become the fitter to pray unto ſo 'good and ſo gracious a God, that he would ſend down 'the Holy Spirit upon thoſe things that we offer unto him, 'and that he would make the Bread become the Body of 'Jeſus Chriſt, and the Wine his Blood: For whatſoever 'receives the Impreſſion of the Holy Spirit, is ſanctified 'and changed. [This ſhews againſt thoſe who urge St. Cyril's Words for Tranſubſtantiation, that he did not think the Change of the Elements (whatever it is) depends ſolely upon the Prieſt's repeating the Words of Conſecration.] 'Now when this ſpiritual Sacrifice is ended, and this un'bloody Worſhip which is given to God by means of the 'Expiatory Victim is concluded, then we pray to him for 'the univerſal Peace of all the Churches, for the Tranqui'lity of the whole World, for Kings, for their Armies and 'their Allies, for the ſick and afflicted, and in a word, for

St. Cyril of Jerusalem.

'all those that need God's help. And we say unto God, 'Lord, we all pray unto thee, and offer up this Sacrifice, 'that by commemorating those who are dead before us, 'viz. the Patriarchs, Prophets, Apostles and Martyrs, you 'may receive our Prayers graciously, for the Merit of 'their Prayers: Then we pray for the Holy Fathers and 'the Bishops that are dead, and in short, for all those that 'are departed this Life in our Communion, believing that 'their Souls receive very great Relief, by the Prayers that are 'offered for them in this holy and tremendous Sacrifice which 'is upon the Altar. This I shall easily make you understand 'by an Example: For I know there are many who say, 'What good can it do a Soul which is departed out of this 'Life, whether with Sins or without them, to remember 'it at this Sacrifice? But tell me, I pray you, If a King 'had sent into Banishment some Persons that had offended 'him, and their Friends and Relations should present him 'with a Crown of great Price to appease his Anger, Don't 'you think, that upon their Account, the King would shew 'some favour to the guilty Persons, and at least mitigate 'their Pains? So do we address our Prayers to God for 'those that are dead, tho' they were Sinners, not by pre-'senting to him a Crown, but by offering up to him Jesus 'Christ himself, who was sacrificed for our Sins, that so 'he who is so merciful and good, may become gracious 'to them as well as to us. After this you say, Our Father 'which art in Heaven, &c.

'When the Lord's Prayer is ended, the Priest says, Ho-'ly things are for the Holy; that is, the things which are of-'fered upon the Altar, being sanctified by the Descent of 'the Holy Spirit, are for you that are Holy, by the Infusi-'on of the same Holy Spirit which has been given you; 'and thus it is, that Holy things are for them that are Ho-'ly. Then ye answer, Jesus Christ alone is Holy; He only 'is the Lord and Master. And 'tis not without reason, that 'ye speak after this manner, because indeed, there is none 'truly Holy, but he only who is so of himself, and by his 'own Nature; and as for you, how Holy soever you be, 'you are not so by your own proper Nature, but only by 'the participation of Holiness, by the spiritual Exercises 'which you perform, and by the Prayers which you address 'to his supreme Majesty. After this, you hear most heavenly 'and divine Musick, inviting you to partake of the sacred My-'steries, by chanting forth, these words; Taste and see how good 'the Lord is. Think you now that you are required to dis-'cern this by the sense of Taste? No, by no means; but 'by the Testimony of Faith which is certain, and leaves 'no doubt. For when you take them, ye are not com-'manded to take the Bread and Wine, but to take the Bo-'dy and Blood of Jesus Christ which they represent. [One that believes with the Church of Rome, cannot say that the Bread and Wine represent the Body and Blood of Jesus Christ.] 'Now when you approach to Communicate, you 'must not come there with your Hands expanded, nor 'your Fingers open, but supporting your right hand which 'is to contain so great a King, with your left; you receive 'the Body of Jesus Christ into the Hollow of this Hand, 'saying Amen. Then after you have taken care to sanctify 'your Eyes by the Touch of so Holy and so Venerable a 'Body, you Communicate of it by Eating it. But take heed 'that nothing of it falls aside, considering the Loss of the 'least Crumb, as if you lost some of your Members. If 'any one should give you Ingots of Gold, what care would 'you take to watch them, that nothing of them should be 'lost? What Precaution then ought we to use, to keep the 'least Crumb of a thing that is infinitely more dear and preci-'ous than Gold and Diamonds, from falling down? After you 'have thus Communicated of the Body of Jesus Christ, ap-'proach to the Cup of his Blood, not by stretching forth 'your Hands, but by bowing your selves as it were to adore 'him, and do him Homage, and then say, Amen. Then sancti-'fie your selves by the Touch of the Blood of Jesus Christ 'which you receive, and while your Lips are wet, dry them 'with your Hand, and carry it immediately to your Eyes, 'your Forehead, and your other Organs of sense, to conse-'crate them. In a word, while you wait for the last Pray-'er of the Priest, return thanks to God that he has made 'you worthy to partake of so great and so sublime Myste-'ries.

St. Cyril of Jerusalem.

I shall not stay to make all the Reflections upon these Passages which have been already made by the most able Defenders of the Church, being persuaded that the Plainness of these words exceeds all that can be said, and that Men need only Eyes to convince them that St. Cyril taught the real Presence, and to make them acknowledge, that the Ceremonies of the Mass are very antient in the Church.

We have a Letter of St. Cyril to Constantius, upon the wonderful Apparition of a Luminous Cross, which was seen over the City of Jerusalem, mentioned by Sozomen in Ch. 4. of the 4*th.* Book of his History, where he also observes, that the Emperor was advertised of it by St. Cyril. In this Letter he gives great Commendations to the Emperor Constantius; he says, that the Cross of Jesus Christ was found in the time of the Emperor Constantine; he describes the Apparition of the Sign of the Cross, and concludes with glorifying the Consubstantial Trinity. Rivet rejects also this Letter as a supposititious Writing, and gives no other reason for his Opinion, but the great Praises which it gives to the Emperor Constantius. [Nazianzen commends Constantius in his Invectives against Julian in as high terms as 'tis possible, and yet they were never questioned.] But this is not a sufficient Proof, since we commonly speak so to Princes, and St. Athanasius and St. Hilary did not use to do otherwise, even after this Emperor had declared himself more openly against the Faith of the Church: For this Letter, if it is true, was written a little after St. Cyril was Bishop of Jerusalem.

We have also a Letter of the Presentation of Jesus Christ in the Temple, which goes under the Name of St. Cyril of Jerusalem, and nothing hinders us to attribute it to him. But we cannot say this of the Letter written in the Name of St. Cyril of Jerusalem to St. Augustine, concerning the Miracles of St. Jerome. Tho' this Letter were not so ridiculously written as it is, the Title alone would shew that it is a gross Imposture, since St. Cyril was dead before St. Jerome.

The Stile of St. Cyril's Catechetick Lectures, is simple and natural. 'Tis easie to perceive that they were written in haste, and without much Premeditation. Tho' they do not dive deeply into the Mysteries, yet they explain them very clearly, and they contain much Learning. One may see there upon every Subject a most exact and exquisite Collection of Passages of Scripture. He sets down the Opinions of the Hereticks and refutes them solidly. He makes very judicious Remarks, and explains many Passages of Scripture. I say nothing particularly of his Doctrine, because it is sufficiently explained in the Extracts, which we have taken out of his Lectures.

Joannes Grodecius was the first who translated and published the Catechetical Discourses of St. Cyril, from a Greek Manuscript of Cardinal Hosius, the Pope's Legate at the Council of Trent. They were printed in the year 1564. at Antwerp and at Paris; In the year 1560. at Vienna, and in 1584. at Paris. The Original Greek appeared quickly after the Latin Version, for Morellus printed the 11 first Catechetical Discourses, and the five last in the year 1564, from a Manuscript out of Monsieur de Mesme's Library: They were also printed with a Latin Translation in the same year at Cologne 1564. But at last Prevotius having found the Greek of all the Catechetical Discourses of St. Cyril in the Manuscripts of the Vatican Library, he printed them at Paris by Morellus in the year 1609. This Volume is in Quarto, and the Version of Grodecius in one Page, answering to the Greek Text in the other. 'Twas this Edition which was followed by that of Paris in the Year 1631.

The Letter concerning the Sign of the Cross, was printed apart by Morellus, and since joyned to the Catechetical Discourses of St. Cyril. The Oration concerning the Presentation of Jesus Christ, was printed at Cologne by Birchmannus, in the Year 1598. These Discourses are all in the Bibliotheca Patrum.

St. EPHREM the Syrian, Deacon of Edessa.

St. Ephrem the Syrian, Deacon of Edessa.

ST. Ephrem was of Nisibis, a City of Syria, or of some place thereabout. He was Born under the Reign of Constantine, he embraced a Monastick Life from his most tender youth, and became in a little time the Governor and Superior of many Monks. Coming often to Edessa to visit the Church of that City, he was there ordained Deacon. He came also as far as Cesarea of Cappadocia, where he was known and very well received by St. Basil, who had a most particular esteem for him. 'Tis said, that this Saint taught him Greek, and that he conferred upon him the Order of Priesthood; but this Report is not very certain, since the Ancients assure us, that he died a Deacon. Sozomen tells us, That when he was chosen Bishop of a City, he feigned himself to be Mad, lest they should carry him away by force, and ordain him against his Will. I shall say nothing here of his Piety, his Charity, his Humility, the Austerity of his Life, nor of his other Christian and Religious Virtues, no more than of his remarkable Actions and his Miracles, because those things do not concern my Subject. I shall only apply my self to speak of his Writings, which were so famous according to the Testimony of St. Jerome, that they were publickly read in some Churches after the Reading of the Holy Books, and which were so numerous that the whole World was full of them. He wrote them in Syriack, and they were translated into Greek in his own time. Sozomen observes, that though he had never ſtudied, yet he had ſo many Beauties in his Stile, and ſo many Sublime Thoughts, that the Tracts of his Eloquence might be diſcerned even in the Greek Tranſlation: and St. Jerome aſſures us, That having read the Verſion of his Treatiſe concerning the Holy Spirit, he perceived in the Tranſlation the Fineneſs of his Sublime Genius: St. Gregory Nyſſen, who wrote a Panegyrick upon this Father, inſiſts chiefly upon his Doctrine and Writings. He praiſes the Purity of his Faith, and the Averſion he had to the Hereſies of Sabellius, Arius and Apollinarius. He ſays, That he refuted the Anomœans and the Novatians; and all his Writings are full of ſolid and convincing Proofs. He adds, That he had read and meditated more than any Perſon upon the Old and New Teſtament, and that he had wrote Expoſitions upon all the Holy Scripture, from the Beginning of Geneſis to the End of the New Teſtament; That he had alſo compos'd many lively and Pathetical Exhortations; That Tears and Sighs were very common and familiar with him, as may be ſeen in his Writings. For, ſays he, he does not only ſigh, when he ſpeaks of Morality and the Precepts of Life, but even in his Panegyricks; and all his Diſcourſes are mixed with bemoaning and compaſſionate Expreſſions, which are able to move even the hardeſt Hearts. For who that is Proud, adds he, would not become the humbleſt of Men, by reading his Diſcourſe of Humility? Who would not be inflamed with a Divine Fire, by reading his Treatiſe of Charity? Who would not wiſh to be chaſte in Heart and Spirit by reading the Praiſes he has given to Virginity? Who would not be frighted by hearing the Diſcourſe he has made upon the laſt Judgment, wherein he has repreſented it ſo lively, that nothing can be added to it but the ſame thing? God gave him ſo Profound a Wiſdom, that though he had a wonderful facility of Speaking, yet he could not furniſh Expreſſions for the multitude of Thoughts that came into his Mind. We have ſeen, as the ſame Father ſtill goes on, one of his Sermons, where he calls Apollinarius a Madman. He tells a very pleaſant Story of a trick that St. Ephrem put upon this Heretick. He ſays, that the Heretick had written two Books, wherein were all the Reaſons and Paſſages of Scripture, that he had made uſe of to defend his Error, and which he had committed to the Cuſtody of a Woman; That St. Ephrem pretending that he was of the ſame Judgment with Apollinarius, had borrowed them of this Woman, and that before he reſtored them, he glued all the Leaves faſt to one another: That this Woman ſeeing the Books bound up after the ſame manner, perceived nothing of what was done, but gave them as they were to Apollinarius, to make uſe of them in a Publick Conference which he was to have with a Catholick, and that then the Heretick not being able to open them, was forced to withdraw with ſhame. The quickneſs of St. Ephrem's Wit appeared alſo in the Syriack Verſes which he made in his own Language, in imitation of Hammonius the Son of Bardeſanes, who had compos'd many Hymns which the Syrian Sung with Delight. St. Ephrem perceiving that this Author had cunningly interſpers'd in thoſe Prayers, ſome Errors of his Father, and of the Greek Philoſophers, fearing leſt the Chriſtians of Syria, might fall inſenſibly into theſe falſe Opinions, he endeavoured with all his might to comprehend the Metre of theſe Verſes, and wrote other Books agreeable to the Doctrine of the Church, as Hymns and the Encomiaſticks of the Saints, which were ſo well received by the Syrians, that they Sung them to the ſame Tunes with thoſe of Hammonius. 'Tis ſaid, that he compos'd almoſt 100000 Verſes of this Nature. Sozomen ſays alſo, that he wrote the Life of St. Julianus. To conclude, Photius in Volume 197 of his Bibliotheca, obſerves that he had read 30 Sermons of this Father.

It appears by what we have already ſaid, that Ephrem wrote Commentaries upon all the Bible, Treatiſes of Controverſy againſt many Hereticks, a Book of the Holy Spirit, a great many Diſcourſes and Inſtructions to the People, and to his Monks, ſome Panegyricks, many Treatiſes of Morality, and a great number of Hymns to be Sung in the Church: That all his Writings were compoſed in Syriack, and that the greateſt part of them were tranſlated into Greek while he was living. We have none of his Commentaries upon Scripture, nor his Treatiſes of Controverſy; but we have a great number of Diſcourſes, of Moral Precepts, and of Hymns which have been tranſlated into Greek, and publiſhed by Voſſius towards the end of the laſt Age, under St. Ephrem's Name. Some Criticks, to whom the Books concerning a Monaſtick Life are not agreeable, have pretended that all thoſe Books are Suppoſititious. Notwithſtanding 'tis very probable, that the greateſt part of them are truly St. Ephrem's, becauſe all the Characters that the Ancients give of the Writings of St. Ephrem, agree to theſe; ſo that 'tis eaſie to know them. 1. The Treatiſes of St. Ephrem were full of Figures and Ornaments, but yet without Fineneſs and Art; now theſe are all filled with Exclamations, Interrogations, Compariſons, Antitheſes and other Figures, which are groſly enough employ'd and without choice. 2. He had much Vivacity and Fire, which theſe are all full of. 3. St. Ephrem related many Paſſages of Scripture, and theſe Writings are oftentimes nothing elſe but a Collection. 4. St. Gregory Nyſſen ſays, that they were mixed with bemoaning Expreſſions, with Sighs and Tears; that he ſpoke continually of Weeping even in his Panegyricks: This is properly the Character of the greateſt part of the Diſcourſes publiſhed by Voſſius. 5. The ſame Father ſays, that he wrote Diſcourſes of Humility, Charity, in Praiſe of Virginity, and of the laſt Judgment. There are Diſcourſes upon all theſe Subjects amongſt thoſe that were publiſhed by Voſſius, and have the ſame Character which this Father obſerved in St. Ephrem's Books; that is to ſay, that they are pathetical and moving. 6. He wrote many Hymns upon divers Subjects, and there are among the Books which go under his Name, many Pieces written in Verſe, and of a Poetical Stile. 7. His Teſtament which is related in this Edition, is the ſame with that which is quoted by St. Gregory Nyſſen, who produces two Paſſages out of it, which are word for word in that which was publiſhed by Voſſius. 8. We have among theſe Books, the Life of Julianus, cited by Sozomen, B. III. of his Hiſtory, Ch. 14. In fine, the 49 Sermons of St. Ephrem, whereof Photius made an Extract, are found in theſe Works of St. Ephrem. The ſame Photius quotes a Diſcourſe of Humility divided into a 100 Chapters, which is in the ſecond Tome, a Diſcourſe upon the ſame Virtue which is in the firſt Tome, and a Treatiſe of Virtues and Vices to the Metebian Monks, which is alſo in the firſt Volume, and which contains the ſame Matters in the ſame Order. Theſe Reaſons plainly ſhew, that the greateſt part of the Books, which at preſent go under St. Ephrem's Name, are the ſame with Gregory Nyſſen, Theodoret, Sozomen and Photius, attributed to this Saint. Now what probability is there, that they ſhould take the Works of another Author for thoſe of St. Ephrem? St. Gregory Nyſſen, could not be deceived herein, who lived at the ſame time. What probability is there, that Photius, who was a very able Critick, and who diſtinguiſhes our St. Ephrem from the Patriarch of Antioch, who mentions the Works of the one and the other, in two different places of his Bibliotheca; What probability is there, I ſay, that he ſhould quote a falſe Ephrem for a true one?

'Tis objected, 1. That there is not found in his Works that Fire and Loftineſs which are mentioned by St. Jerome and Sozomen, and that they ſeem to be rather Pious than Learned, according to the Judgment of Cardinal Bellarmin. I anſwer, that tho' there were not found in a Latin Verſion of the Works of any Author made from another Greek Verſion, all that Beauty and Loftineſs which they had in their Original Language, we ſhould not wonder at it: But thoſe who object this, do not rightly apprehend the Senſe of St. Jerome and Sozomen, and have neither a very nice Reliſh, nor a very right Judgment in this matter. For firſt of all, St. Jerome and Sozomen, tacitly confeſs, that the Tranſlation of the Works of St. Ephrem made them loſe ſome part of their Loftineſs; but they only obſerve, that one might perceive ſome ſtrokes of his Vivacity and Eloquence, even in the Tranſlation it ſelf. 2dly. St Jerome ſays the ſame of the Book of the Holy Spirit, and not of the others. Now it may ſo happen, that this ſublime Reaſoning of St. Ephrem, appeared more in his Dogmatical Books, than in his Diſcourſes of Devotion, and in his Edifying Exhortations; ſuch as all thoſe are which are now extant. 3dly. 'Tis not true, that no Vein of Eloquence is to be diſcerned in them. The learned Photius did not think ſo. On the contrary, we may admire, ſays he, in the Exhortations of this holy Man, (which are a part of this Book which we now have) the force wherewith he perſuades, his agreeable manner of expreſſing things, and the pathetical Phraſes that he makes uſe of. It is no wonder, that his Stile and his Figures, reſemble thoſe Homilies which are made off hand, and without premeditation: Neither muſt we throw this fault upon the Author, but upon the Interpreter, becauſe thoſe that are learned in the Syriack Tongue, know that they excel in abundance of Words, and in Figures of Rhetorick; ſo that 'tis hard to ſay, whether it be from their Language, or from his own Invention, that the ſtrength and elevation of his Diſcourſe proceeds. Moreover, we ought not in reading to look only upon the meanneſs of the Words, but to conſider, what Advantage and Profit may be reaped from the things that he has written. This Reflection of Photius, who was a better Critick in this kind, than Rivet and the other Criticks of his way, informs us, that ſeveral ſtrokes of the Elevation and Quick[illegible]s of his Spirit, might be diſcerned [illegible] the Verſion of St. Ephrem's Diſcourſes, and that one might there perceive the Genius of the Syriack Tongue; and that whatever meanneſs there may be in his Stile, it ought to be attributed to the Interpreter, and not to the Author.

Mr. Du Pin, ſeems to have forgot that he had named Cardinal Bellarmin juſt before.

'Tis objected alſo, that thoſe Treatiſes, were written by an Author who underſtood Greek, ſince he cites St. Irenæus, Ch. 8. of the Treatiſe of Virtue, and the Life of St. Anthony written in Greek by St. Athanaſius, in Ch. 10. of the Treatiſe upon theſe words, Take heed to your ſelves: Now St. Ephrem did not underſtand Greek, ſay they, and by conſequence theſe Treatiſes are none of his.

'Tis eaſy to anſwer this Objection. 1. 'Tis not certain that St. Ephrem did not underſtand Greek; on the contrary, 'tis probable that a Man who was often among People that ſpoke spoke Greek, did understand their Language, tho' he was not able enough to write in that Tongue. 2. That though he did not understand Greek, yet he might get the Books of St. Irenæus, translated into Syriack; and 'tis probable, that for the use of the Monks of his Country, he procured a Syriack Version of the Life of St. Anthony, who was looked upon as the Rule of all the Monks in the East.

3dly. They object to us the little Credit that ought to be given to those that have published his Books: They say, We have them not, but as they come through the hands of Modern Greeks, who are too much given to Cheat; and that the Latin Versions were made by Ambrosius Camaldulensis, and Vossius Tungrensis, who were Persons devoted to the Interests of the Court of Rome.

But why is it sufficient thus to alledge general and uncertain Reasons for rejecting any Books? If this be sufficient, What is there that we should not doubt of? the Protestants will have Reason to reject all the Books of the Fathers, which have been published by Catholicks, and Catholicks will have reason to reject all those that have been published by the Protestants. Where shall we be then? This therefore is not the way: But we must suppose that both the one and the other have published the Books which they found in the Manuscripts that fell into their hands; for there is no probability that one Man should be so impudent as to forge many Pieces, and pretend that he found them in Manuscripts; and tho' some Persons should be found capable of doing this, yet 'twere impossible, but their Imposture must be quickly discovered. They must therefore have other Proofs, besides these general Accusations, to reject any Books as suppositious. But besides, when it is said that we have none of St. Ephrem's Writings, but through the hands of the Modern Greeks, that is a mistake. They were translated while he was alive, as appears by what we have already said. And whereas Ambrosius Camaldulensis and Vossius, are accus'd of being Impostors, 'tis easy to justify them by the antient Greek Manuscripts which are to be found in Libraries.

Lastly, Some places of the Books of this Father are produced, which seem to be mean and unworthy of him. 'Tis said, that there is nothing more ridiculous, than what he introduces the damned speaking, We salute you, O Saints, We salute you, O Apostles, &c. They add, That there are Contradictions in them, for in his Confessions, he accuses himself of many Sins, and in his Testament he makes himself Innocent.

To answer this Objection in a word, I might say, That 'tis a very hard matter to avoid, but some weak Thoughts will be found in so great a number of Books of Piety and Devotion. That if one would compare these Books with those of our Age, which are of the same kind, they might see that the latter are infinitely more filled with false Thoughts, than those of St. Ephrem. But the places which Rivet has chosen to oppose to us, are very weak Proofs. The wicked do not Salute the Saints in the Treatise of Hell Torments; on the contrary, they bid them eternally adieu, after they had heard the Sentence of Condemnation: Neither is there any Contradiction between his Testament and his Confessions. He confesses both in the one and the other place with much humility, that he had spent his Life in Sin and Vanity. 'Tis true, that he says in his Testament, that he had not reproached any body, and that he had no quarrel with any of the Faithful; but then he says nothing contrary to this in his Confessions, and though he should have said it, yet he might speak so in humility, as many pious Persons do in this kind of Confessions, wherein they speak oftentimes in the Person of another.

I shall now draw up a Catalogue, with an Account of the Subjects of St. Ephrem's Works, which are divided into three Tomes.

The 1st. Discourse of the first Tome, is of the Dignity of the Priesthood, which he exalts as high as it can be exalted. Towards the latter End, he speaks against those who intrude into the Priestly Office, without being worthy of it, and without being called to it. He observes, that the Sacerdotal Dignity is conferred by imposition of Hands.

The 2d. is an Answer to one of his Monks, who had asked him, who they were that might use that Liberty which St. Paul gives to Marry, rather than to Burn. He answers, that it concerns only those who are not bound, and who live in the World, but not those who have renounced the World, and embraced a Religious Life.

The 3d. is concerning the Softness of Eli the High-Priest, who would not chastise his Sons.

In the 4th. he exhorts Christians to celebrate the Festivals, and to approach the Holy Mysteries with Purity.

The 5th. is concerning Charity towards our Neighbour.

The 6th. is concerning the usefulness of Singing Psalms. There he condemns idle Songs and Dancing.

The 7th. of the Value and Necessity of Prayer.

The 8th. is of Love of the Poor, and of Alms.

The 9th. of Fasting.

The 10th. explains that Passage in the Gospel, There shall be two Men in the Field, the one shall be taken, and the other left. He is of Opinion, that the Just are those who shall be taken, and the Wicked those who shall be left. He seems to explain Hell Fire, Mystically.

St. Ephrem the Syrian, Deacon of Edessa.

The 11th. is concerning the Miseries of this Life.

The 12th. is of the inequality of Happiness. He observes, that tho' all the Happy enjoy the same happiness, yet there are different Degrees of it. He assures his Auditory, That there is no middle between Hell and the Kingdom of Heaven. [Here then by our Author's own confession, is a positive Proof, that an eminent Father of the Fourth Century, disbelieved a middle State, which not only destroys Purgatory, but also the Necessity of Praying to the Saints.]

The 13th. is also of Blessedness.

The 14th. of the contempt we ought to have of the Riches and Pleasures of this World.

The 15th. is against those who every Day do Penance, and always relapse into the same Sins.

After these Discourses follows a Treatise divided into many Chapters, concerning Virtues and Vices. In the Preface he shews great Humility in debasing himself below those that had prayed him to instruct them. Afterwards he discovers to them the good effects of the Fear of God, of the Love of our Neighbour, of Meekness, Patience, Sincerity, Obedience, Hope and Continence; and the bad Effects of the contrary Vices.

After these Instructions, follow 91 Maxims of Piety, and 96 Advices concerning a Spiritual Life, directed to a young Monk.

The 16th. Discourse is against those who forsake a Monastick Life after they have once embraced it, to return into the World.

The 17th. is concerning perfect Self-denial, and concerning the Peace of Mind, which every one should have in Solitude.

The 18th. is of the Sighing of a Soul under Temptation, and of the Tears of Repentance.

The 19th. is of the fear of Death.

The 20th. is an humbling Discourse wherein he acknowledges himself Guilty of many Faults, and prays his Brethren to implore the Divine Mercy for him.

The 21st. is an Exhortation to Christian Vigilance.

The 22d. is an Exhortation to the Practice of good Works.

The 23d. is concerning the Grace of Jesus Christ. He exhorts those to whom he addresses himself, to follow the attractives of Divine Grace, if they would attain to perfection.

The 24th. is concerning Faith, or rather concerning Trust in the Providence of God.

The 25th. is against those who say, that Earthquakes are caused by the Concussions of the Earth, and not by the Providence of God. This discovers that the Author of those Discourses had not much Learning since it may be truly said, that Earthquakes proceed from natural Causes, tho' they are ordered by the Providence of God.

The 26th. is against the Superstitions of the Pagans. There he relates, that when the Plague was at Constantinople, a Physician named Domnus, being desirous to preserve himself by the Superstitions of the Pagans, was seized with the Plague and died, tho' he dwelt in a high Place, where there was very good Air; that one of his Companions named Macedonius, seeing his lamentable Death, quitted the Pagan Religion, and became a Monk. After this, he brings many passages of Scripture to prove that the Plague, and those other Calamities wherewith Men are afflicted, are the effects of God's Vengeance, and we must make our Application to him, to preserve us from them. He observes, that God sends these miseries upon Men, to bring them to the Knowledge of themselves, and to Repentance.

The 27th. is against Pride and a good Opinion of ones self.

The 28th. is against those who having entred into Monastries, are guilty of vices, and particularly of Ambition, Lazineſs, and Disobedience. At the latter end, he Exhorts his Brethren to discharge all the Offices of a Religious Life.

The 29th. is against Detraction.

The 30th. is upon those Subjects which Christians ought to lament.

The 31st. is against Plays and Shows. There he blames those who after they have been present at Divine Offices, go to Dancing and Sing Idle Songs. To Day, says he, they are United to Jesus Christ, and to Morrow they Dishonour him, they Deny him; to Day they are Christians, and to Morrow Pagans; to Day they have Piety, and to Morrow they are Impious; to Day they are Faithful, and the Disciples of Jesus Christ, and to Morrow they are Apostates and the Enemies of God; to Day they hear the Word of Jesus Christ, and to morrow they apply themselves to hear the Voices and Instruments of Musick, which sing or play prophane Songs.

The 32d. is against the Unchaste.

The 33d. is of that Charity wherewith we should reprove our Brethren that are fallen into any Sin.

The 34th. is against Curiosity, and of shunning the occasions of Sin.

The 35th. is against Lewd Women.

The 36th. is of the means of avoiding the Sin of the Flesh.

The 37th. is of the praise of Charity.

St. Ephrem the Syrian, Deacon of Edeſſa.

The 38th. is of the preſervation of this Virtue, and of the Unhappineſs of thoſe that loſe it.

The 39th. is a Deſcription of that unhappy ſtate to which a man is reduced by Concupiſcence. He prays the Lord to give him grace, to preſerve him from ſhipwracks, amidſt the Storms of this Life. He requeſts of him, that his Heart and his Mouth, may be a pure Temple and without ſtain, by the Heavenly Grace; and that it may make his Tongue and Lips to move continually, in Singing forth the Praiſes of God. This Diſcourſe is one of the Nobleſt and moſt Beautiful of them all.

The Four following Diſcourſes are concerning Compunction, or the Remorſe we ought to have for offending God. In the 1ſt. he ſays, that the Grace of God is always ready to enter into our Hearts, whenever they are diſpoſed to receive it, or when our evil Thoughts do not put a Bar to it; That in the mean time, it touches our Soul by the ſweetneſs of its light, and makes it return to it ſelf, and ſeek after the Light; That the Grace of God does never wholly forſake us, and that without Grace, we cannot Repent.

In the 2d. he ſhews, that we ought not to deſpair, and that every one may obtain pardon of his Sin, provided his Heart be pierced with a ſincere Sorrow for his Offence againſt God, and that he change his courſe of Life.

In the 3d. he ſhews, that we ought to bewail this Life, and to rejoyce at Death.

The 4th. is alſo of the ſorrow we ought to have, and the Tears we ought to ſhed in this Life.

The 44th. and 45th. Diſcourſes are about Penance.

The 46th. is about Repentance and Converſion.

The 47th. is of Penance and Patience.

The 48th. is of Patience under the Croſſes, and Adverſities of this Life.

The 49th. is of Conſtancy and Compunction.

In the 50th. he exhorts to Perſeverance and Watchfulneſs, from the Dread of the laſt Judgment, and the Pains of Hell. He ſays, that we muſt always Pray, even while we labour with our Hands, we muſt continually reſiſt Temptation, read the Holy Scripture with attention and Preparation, and live in Silence and Tranquility: He enlarges particularly, on the Praiſes of this laſt Exerciſe.

After theſe Diſcourſes, follow ſeveral Sentences, called the Beatitudes of St. Ephrem, in which he recommends above all things, Chriſtian Vigilance to his Brethren.

After theſe Beatitudes, follow Queſtions and Anſwers upon ſeveral Subjects, as about the Renunciation promiſed in Baptiſm; about the laſt Judgment; about the Different Puniſhments of the Damned.

This is followed with a Treatiſe of Remembring Death, wherein he lays open the Vanity of Riches.

The Second diſcourſe of Death, is attributed to St. Baſil, and is of a different Stile from St. Ephrem's Diſcourſes.

The following Treatiſes are of the Reſurrection, of the laſt Judgment, and the things which ſhall happen when Anti-Chriſt ſhall come; and of the Apparition of the Croſs at the time of Chriſt's ſecond coming. This Relation is ended with Lamentation and Prayers, which are attributed to St. Ephrem.

The Second Tome contains the Life of St. Ephrem, written by Simon Metaphraſtes, choice Sentences drawn from the Books of St. Ephrem; a Diſcourſe of St. Ephrem about his Converſion; a Spiritual Song concerning the praiſe of Learning and Wiſdom; an Epiſtle to a Monk about Patience; four Exhortations to a young Monk concerning a Monaſtick Life; ſix Chapters of Virtues, neceſſary to a Monk; twelve Chapters upon theſe Words, Take heed to your ſelves; fifty Exhortations to the young Monks, wherein he exhorts them to Humility, Obedience, Watchfulneſs, to Labour, Devotion, Meekneſs, Patience, to Charity, Reading, Prayer, Temperance, and the Practice of the other Monaſtical Virtues.

The 49th. is of the Excellencies of a Monaſtick Life above the Secular. Then follow 100 Maxims, Apophthegms, or Examples of the means for acquiring and preſerving Humility, and the other Monaſtick Virtues; a Diſcourſe againſt Covetous Monks; another of the Perfection of a Monk; a Treatiſe of Spiritual Arms, of the Spiritual Combat; an Inſtructive Exhortation about an Aſcetick Life; another Exhortation to Repentance from the ſecond Coming of Jeſus Chriſt; nineteen Advertiſements of the Abbot Ammon, and the Apophthegms of the Antient Fathers, wherein he ſpeaks of St. Benedict.

St. Ephrem the Syrian, Deacon of Edeſſa.

The Third Tome is divided into three Parts. The I. contains a Treatiſe compoſed in imitation of the Book of Proverbs, which is a Collection of Sentences and Maxims for a Spiritual and Monaſtick Life, a Treatiſe of a Religious Life, a Treatiſe of Repentance [or Penance;] a Diſcourſe of the Compunction of the Heart; Another Diſcourſe wherein St. Ephrem, accuſes himſelf of his Faults, and asks forgiveneſs; a Diſcourſe of the Reſurrection, of Judgment, and the Pains of the Impious, with an humble Prayer to God. The ſecond Part contains Panegyricks upon Juſt and Holy Men, whom he propoſes as Examples and Paterns of Virtue. The 1ſt. is upon Noah, where he ſpeaks of Continence; the 2d. is upon Abraham, and Iſaac, where he exhorts to obedience; the 3d. upon Lot, and againſt falſe Confidence; the 4th. in Praiſe of the Patriarch Joſeph; the 5th. upon Daniel, againſt thoſe that ſay, The times are Evil, we cannot ſave our ſelves; the 6th. upon Jonah and the Repentance of the Ninevites; the 7th. upon Elijah, and the Widow of Sarepta; the 9th. upon the Precious Stone that is mentioned in the Goſpel; the 10th. againſt thoſe that ſearch into the Greatneſs of the Divine Nature; the 11th. a Diſcourſe upon our Saviour's Tranſfiguration; the 12th. of the Paſſion of Jeſus Chriſt; the 13th. the Lamentation of the Virgin upon the Paſſion of her Son; the 14th. upon the Croſs of Jeſus Chriſt, where he ſpeaks of the manner of Celebrating Feſtivals among Chriſtians, of the Vertues of the Croſs of Jeſus Chriſt, and the Uſefulneſs of the ſign of the Croſs; the 15th. is of the Praiſes of the Virgin, after which follows a Prayer to the Virgin; the 16th. on the Woman that was a Sinner; the 17th. is a Diſcourſe of St. Chryſoſtom about the ſame Woman and a Phariſee; the 18th. is a Panegyrick upon St. Baſil, which is publiſhed in Greek by Cotelerius, in the laſt Volume of his Monumenta Eccleſiæ Græcæ; the 19th. is in Praiſe of the Forty Martyrs; the 20th. is upon all the Martyrs in the World, who have ſuffered for Jeſus Chriſt; the 21ſt. is upon the ſame Subject; the 22d. is upon Abramius; the 23d. is upon Julianus the Hermit; the 24th. is upon the Holy Fathers that died in his own time; the 25th. is upon the ſame Subject; two Hymns upon the ſame Subject; a Diſcourſe of the Happineſs of thoſe that died in Chriſt, and of the Vanity of this World, of the Uncertainty of Life, and the Different Kinds of Death. The Laſt Monument of St. Ephrem is his Teſtament cited by St. Gregory Nyſſen, which is properly an exhortation of this Father, upon his Death-Bed, addreſſed to his Monks; he deſires them to remember him in their Prayers; he forbids them to keep his Garments as Relicks; he deſires that they would Bury him after a plain manner, and without any Pomp; he conjures them to offer the Sacrifice of the Maſs for him, and enlarges alſo upon the uſefulneſs of Prayers for the Dead, and upon the Vertue of Sacrifice to Blot out Sins; Laſtly, he gives them many wholſome Advices, and heaps Bleſſings upon his chief Diſciples that were preſent at his Death, which happened under the Reign of Valens, in the Year 378, on the Firſt Day of February.

The firſt that publiſhed any of the Books of this Father was Ambroſius Camaldulenſis, who tranſlated ſome of them into Latin, which were printed at Breſcia in 1490. at Strasburg in 1509. and at Cologne, in 1547. Afterwards Gerard Voſſius, or Volkens of Borchloon in Germany, ſearched out all the Works of this Father, and Tranſlated and publiſhed them in Three Tomes. The firſt is dedicated to Sixtus the 5th. in 1581; The Second dedicated to Clement the 8th. in 1593. and the laſt in 1598. Theſe three Tomes were printed in one Volume at Cologne in 1603, and at Antwerp in 1619. Eſchellenſis publiſhed at Rome in 1645, a Song of the Virgin and the Wiſemen attributed to St. Ephrem, tranſlated from the Syriack. Cotelerius publiſhed the Greek of the Penegyrick upon St. Baſil, made by St. Ephrem, in his laſt Volume of the Monuments of the Greek Church, printed at Paris in 1686. 'Twere to be wiſhed that ſome Body would publiſh the Greek Verſions of all the Books of St. Ephrem, which are to be found in Libraries; as alſo the Syriack Text of ſome of his Books.

DAMASUS Biſhop of Rome.

Damaſus Biſhop of Rome.

AFter the Death of Pope Liberius, which happened in the year 369, the See of Rome being vacant for ſome time, by reaſon of the caballing of thoſe that pretended to fill it, Damaſus at laſt was choſen by the greater part of the Clergy and People, and ordained by the Biſhops. But on the other ſide, Urſinus or rather Urſicinus, who was his Competitor for the Popedom, got himſelf ordained by ſome other Biſhops in the Church of Sicinius. This Conteſt cauſed a great Diviſion in the City of Rome, and ſtirred up ſo great a Sedition there as could hardly be appeaſed. The two Parties came from Words to Blows, and a great many Chriſtians were killed in the Churches of Rome upon this Quarrel. The Governor of Rome called Prætextatus, being deſirous to allay the Heat of this Contention, ſent Urſicinus into Baniſhment by the Emperor's Order: But his Baniſhment did not perfectly appeaſe the Quarrel; For the Partizans of Urſicinus aſſembled ſtill in the Churches of which they were poſſeſſed, without ever communicating with Damaſus; and even when the Emperor had ordered that their Churches ſhould be taken from them, they ſtill kept up their Aſſemblies without the City, ſo that it was neceſſary at laſt to drive them quite out of Rome. And yet yet all this did not hinder Ursicinus from having his secret Associates in Italy and at Rome. The Bishop of Puteoli called Florentius, and the Bishop of Parma, were most zealous for his Interests. They were condemned in a Council held at Rome in the Year 372. and afterwards banished by the Authority of the Emperor. However they found Means to return into their own Country, and stirred up new Troubles there. They got Pope Damasus to be accused by one Isaac a Jew. This Accusation was examined in a Council of Bishops held at Rome in the Year 378. which declared Damasus innocent of the Crime that was laid to his Charge. This Council wrote a Letter to the Emperor Gratian, praying him to take some Order for the Peace of the Church of Rome. The Emperor wrote to them, that Ursicinus was detained at Cologne, that he had given Order to banish Isaac into a Corner of Spain, and to force the Bishops of Puteoli and Parma out of their Country. This did not hinder Ursicinus from returning into Italy in the Year 381. where he stirred up new Tumults, and endeavoured to pre-engage the Emperor: But the Bishops of Italy being assembled in a Council at Aquileia, in the Year 381. wrote so smartly to him, that he banished Ursicinus for ever, and left Damasus in peaceable Possession of the See of Rome, in which he continued until the Year 384. St. Jerome places him among the Ecclesiastical Writers, because of the many short Tracts which he wrote in Heroick Verse, to which may be added some Letters of his writing. But there are many other Letters which go under his Name, that are suppositious. I shall first set down those of which there can be no doubt.

Damaſus Biſhop of Rome.

Damasus, Bishop of Rome.

The two Letters of Damasus, directed to St. Jerome, are amongst the Works of this Father. In the first, he exhorts this Saint to write to him; and to oblige him by fixing a Subject, he proposes to him some Difficulties about the Holy Scripture. He observes in this Letter, that he took no Pleasure in reading the Books of Lactantius, because they were too long, and were not filled with the Doctrines of Religion. In the second Letter he desires to tell him the Meaning of Hosanna to the Son of David. But there is another Letter attributed to Damasus, and written to St. Jerome, with the Answer of this Father, that is not to be placed in the same Rank; for the Stile of these two Letters is very different from that of Damasus and St. Jerome, and they contain many Impertinencies and Follies in the Judgment of Bellarmine and Baronius. 'Tis said in the first, that St. Jerome was ordained by Alexander; and 'tis certain that Paulinus ordained him. In the second, 'tis supposed, that St. Jerome exhorted Damasus to order the Gloria Patri to be sung at the End of all the Psalms, as was ordained by the Council of Nice, and as it was practised in the East: But if Cassian is to be believed, this was not practised in the East.

The 3*d*. Letter of Damasus is written in the Name of this Pope and the other Western Bishops assembled at Rome, in the Year 370. concerning the Condemnation of Auxentius, to the Bishops of Illyricum. It is related by Theodoret also, in Ch. 22. B. II. of his Hist. and by Sozomen, Ch. 23. of B. VI. and it is in Latin in the Collection of Holstenius. These Bishops do here confirm the Faith of the Nicene Council, and declare that Auxentius was condemned by the Bishops of France, because of his Heresie. They observe, that the Decision of the Council of Ariminum could not prejudice the Decrees of the Council of Nice, because neither the Bishop of Rome, whose Judgment was chiefly to be waited for, nor Vicentius of Capua, nor many others, had ever consented to it. They say at the End of this Letter, that those who taught another Doctrine, should quickly be turned out of their Bishopricks. They exhort the Bishops of Illyricum to defend the Faith of the Nicene Council with Boldness and Constancy.

The Letter of Damasus to Paulinus, about the Cause of Vitalis, is also genuine, and has a Respect to History, and to what St. Gregory Nazianzen says in his Letter to Cledonius, that Vitalis the Disciple of Apollinarius coming to Rome, surprized Damasus, but that afterwards, this Pope had condemned him. The Letter of which we now speak, was written sometime after Vitalis departed from Rome, about the Year 373. It acquaints Paulinus, 'That he had written to him by this Vitalis, leaving 'him to manage all Things; That he had also sent him Word 'of the same Thing before, by the Priest Petronius; but that he 'was a little troubled when Vitalis was ready to depart; That 'to take from him all Kind of Scruple, lest too great Precaution should hinder those from being received into the Church, 'who had a Mind to return, he had sent to him a Confession 'of Faith, not so much for his own Sake, as for theirs who 'desired to be re-united to the Church of Rome, and embrace 'its Communion, that they might sign it.' Wherefore, he adds, if Vitalis will joyn himself to us, you must oblige him to sign the Nicene Creed, and to profess that he believes, That Jesus Christ took a Body, a Soul, a Mind, and in a Word, a Nature in every Thing like to ours, Sin only, and Concupiscence, excepted; and to anathematize those that should say, That the Word was instead of a Soul in the Person of Jesus Christ, or should dare to affirm, That there were two Sons of God in Jesus Christ, and deny, that he was the same Son of God before and after his Incarnation. He says, that he could freely receive those that should sign this Letter, provided they had before approved the Ecclesiastical Canons, and the Faith of the Council of Nice. He concludes with telling Paulinus, That he doubted not but he had Power to propose the same Things to those that were willing to be restored, and that he had written to him only for this End; that his Consent and Example might render him more bold and free to do it.

Damasus, Bishop of Rome.

'Twas probably at the same Time, and perhaps in Consequence of this Letter, that Damasus sent to Paulinus, the Anathematisms that are set down in Greek by Theodoret, Ch. 11. of the V. B. of his History, and in Latin by Holstenius. They establish the Faith of the Church concerning the Mysteries of the Trinity and the Incarnation, by condemning the contrary Errors. There is one of them against the Translation of Bishops: Vitalis having refused to sign the Declarations which Damasus would have him to sign, this Pope assembled a Council at Rome, in the year 375. where Peter of Alexandria was present, in which he condemned the Heretick Apollinarius and his Followers. The Opinion of Valesius is not without Reason, who thinks that the Decrees which are in the Collection of Holstenius, and which are to be found in the 2*d*. Vol. of the Additions to Labbe's Edition of the Councils, p. 893, 894, and 895. are Part of the Decisions of this Council, and that they were really made against the Error of Apollinarius. These Decrees are signed by Meletius of Antioch, by Eusebius of Samosata, by Pelagius of Laodicea, by Diodorus of Tarsus, by Eulogius of Edessa, by Zeno of Tyre, by Bematius of Mallus, and by 146 other Bishops of the East, whose Names are said to be in the authentical Manuscript of the Vatican. These Subscriptions make it very probable, that these Decrees are a Part of this Tome of the Western Bishops, which was signed in the Year 378. in a Council at Antioch, whereof Mention is made in the fifth Canon of the Council of Constantinople, and in a Letter of the Council of Constantinople, produced by Theodoret. In short, the Bishops of the East having desired Damasus to condemn Timothy a Disciple of Apollinarius, received this Answer, That he was condemned long ago by a Council at Rome, in the Presence of Peter of Alexandria. This Letter is recited by Theodoret, Ch. 10. of the V. B. of his History. It was written about the Year 378. in the Preamble of this Letter, he extols the Greatness of the See of Rome, and speaks of its Preheminence above others.

These are the only genuine Letters of Damasus, that are extant; all the rest that go under his Name, are forged by Isidorus Mercator. They have not the Stile of Damasus, and contain many Things which plainly discover their Forgery. The Letter that goes under the Name of Aurelius Bishop of Carthage to Damasus, as well as the Answer of this Pope, bear the Names of the Consuls, Gratianus the third Time, Equitius the first. Now this Consulship happened in the Year 374. and Aurelius was yet a Deacon when St. Austine returned from Milan to Carthage in 385. and he was not ordained Bishop till 389. 'Tis plain therefore that this Letter could not be written by Aurelius. The Letter of the Council of Africk to Damasus, is taken out of those of Sergius and Martin, and establishes a Doctrine contrary to that which the Africans practised in the Case of Appeals. The Letter to Stephen who is called Archbishop of the Council of Mauritania, is taken out of the Letters of Innocentius, St. Leo, Anastasius, Sergius, Martin I. &c. 'Tis said to have been written under the Consulship of Stilicho, who was not Consul till 16 Years after the Death of Damasus. The Letter concerning the Suffragans, quotes the Canons according to the Version of Dionysius Exiguus. There is also a Canon of the Council of Chalcedon, and some Passages of the Letters of Siricus, Innocentius, Zosimus, Celestinus, St. Leo, &c. The Letter to the Bishops of Italy, is taken out of St. Leo, St. Gregory, Martin I. and Adrian I. the Falshood of it is found out by the Note of the Consulship. Lastly, There are in Ivo Carnutensis and Gratian, some Decrees attributed to Damasus; but one cannot be assured of their Antiquity, upon the Credit of these Authors.

There are besides, above 40 Epigrams, Inscriptions or Epitaphs in Verse, which go under the Name of Damasus, and are produced by Baronius and Gruter, and collected together by Sarrazanius, who has made long Commentaries upon these Pieces. 'Tis not very certain, that all these belong to Damasus, but 'tis no great Matter who is the Author of them, for they contain nothing remarkable. I shall not here stay to prove that the Book of the Lives of the Popes, intitled, The Pontifical of Damasus, is none of his, because 'tis certain by the Confession of all the World, that it was compos'd long after the Death of this Pope.

The Works of Damasus were printed at Rome, in the Year 1630. by the Care of Ubaldinus, who dedicated them to Pope Urban VIII. And Billaine printed another Edition of his Works at Paris, according to that at Rome, in the Year 1672. [His Poems, as Dr. Cave assures us from Olearius's Abacus Patrologicus, were printed at Leipsick, by Andreas Rivinus, in 8*vo*. 1652.]

St. BASIL.

St. Basil.

ST. Basil was of Cæsarea in Cappadocea, and was born about the Year 328. His Father was called Basil, and his Mother Emmelia; who were both Christians. He was educated in Christian Piety, by his Grandmother Macrina; and his Father taught him the Rudiments of Learning. He began his Studies at Cæsarea in Palæstine, from whence he went to Constantinople, to hear the famous Orator Libanius, and at last he went to Athens to perfect his Studies. There he found

Damaſus, Biſhop of Rome.

Gregory Nazianzen, with whom he contracted a moſt intimate Friendſhip. After he had been at Athens ſome Time, he returned into his own Country, about the Year 355, and departed from thence ſoon after to take a Journey into Egypt and Libya, and viſit the famous Monaſtries in that Country. He found the Life of theſe Aſceticks ſo Perfect, that he reſolved to follow their Example; and when he returned into his own Country, tho' his Biſhop Dianius ordained him Reader, he retired into a ſolitary Place in the Province of Pontus, near the Monaſtry of St. Macrinus, where he led a Religious Life. His Brethren Peter and Naucratius, and many others of his Friends, came to ſee him in this Place, and embraced the ſame way of living. He made Rules for them, and ſo became the firſt founder of a Monaſtick Life in Pontus and Cappadocia.

Dianius, Biſhop of Cæſarea in Cappadocia, was one of the Enemies to St. Athanaſius. He had approved the Creeds of Antioch, of Sardica, and Ariminum, made by the Semi-Arians. This obliged St. Baſil to ſeparate from his Communion. He was not reconciled to him, till this Biſhop declared on his Death Bed, that he had always in his Heart believed the Nicene Creed, and 'twas thro' Simplicity that he had ſigned that of Conſtantinople.

After the Death of Dianius, Euſebius was choſen Biſhop of Cæſarea in Cappadocia. He conferr'd the Order of Prieſthood on St. Baſil, who retir'd ſoon after into his Solitude becauſe he had ſome Difference with his Biſhop, who was Jealous of him. But he was reconcil'd to him three Years after, and acquir'd ſo great a Reputation, that after the Death of Euſebius, he was choſen Biſhop of Cæſarea, towards the End of the Year 369. He was no ſooner promoted to this Dignity, but he was perſecuted by the Emperor Valens, who ſollicited him by Modeſtus the Prætorian Præfect to Communicate with Eudoxus, and to embrace the Doctrine of the Arians. But in vain did he uſe Threatnings, for St. Baſil anſwer'd him with a ſurprizing firmneſs of Mind, and would never yield to the Will of the Emperor. This Conſtancy ſo much aſtoniſh'd the Emperor Valens, that when he came himſelf to Cæſarea, he durſt not undertake any Thing againſt St. Baſil, but was preſent on the Day of Epiphany in the Year 371, at the Publick Prayers of the Church of Cæſarea, and offer'd Gifts which were received by the Hand of St. Baſil. He return'd thither once afterward, and had a long Conference with St. Baſil about the Doctrine of the Church. But ſome time after, this Emperor being puſh'd on by the Arians, reſolv'd to turn him out of Cæſarea. 'Tis ſaid, That at the ſame Time when he dictated this Order, his Son fell Sick, and that his Sickneſs made him change his Reſolution; That he ſent alſo for St. Baſil, and at his Arrival, the Emperor's Son was almoſt recover'd; but being afterwards baptiz'd by the Arians, he relaps'd into his Sickneſs and died. After his Death, Valens would yet have ſent St. Baſil into Baniſhment, but was hindred, as is reported, becauſe when he would have ſign'd the Order, the Pen broke three times. This Prodigy made the Emperor give over the Proſecution of this Deſign.

But St. Baſil did not only maintain the Faith with a wonderful Conſtancy, but he alſo endeavoured to procure Peace to the Church. The Eaſt and Weſt were then divided about the Cauſe of Meletius and Paulinus, who were both at the ſame time Biſhops of Antioch. Paulinus communicated with St. Athanaſius, and was ſupported by the Weſtern Biſhops. Meletius was not of their Communion, but was a very good Catholick. He was lawfully ordained Biſhop of Antioch, and was acknowledged as ſuch by all the Eaſtern Biſhops. There wanted nothing but his Reconciliation with St. Athanaſius, to make him be acknowledged by all the Weſtern Biſhops alſo; for the Weſtern Biſhops blindly followed the Judgment of this Biſhop. Wherefore St. Baſil us'd all his Endeavours to reconcile him to St. Athanaſius and Damaſus. He alſo prayed Meletius to yield to Peace. He obliged him to ſend the Deacon Dorotheus to St. Athanaſius, who went into the Weſt as far as Rome, but he could not compaſs his Deſign of reſtoring Peace. He returned thither alſo a ſecond time with a Letter of St. Baſil, and he could obtain nothing but a Deputation of ſome Prieſts, to comfort the Eaſtern Biſhops, who were tormented with the Perſecution of Valens. St. Baſil ſeeing that the Weſtern Biſhops would not make Peace with Meletius, wrote many Letters to them, wherein he complains of their Behaviour. But howſoever it came to paſs, he could not compaſs this Peace between the Eaſt and the Weſt, which was not concluded till nine Months after his Death.

In the mean time, while St. Baſil laboured with ſo much Zeal for the Peace of the whole Church, his own Province was broken in pieces by Diſſentions, which occaſioned him much Trouble and Sorrow. The Emperor having divided Cappadocia into two Provinces, Anthimus Biſhop of Tyana, the Metropolis of that Part, that was newly erected into a Province, pretended that he ought to be the Metropolitan of that New Province, and that he ought to Ordain Biſhops for the Cities that depended upon it; and that he ought not to depend upon the Metropolis of Cæſarea, no more than the Biſhops of the Cities of that New Province. St. Baſil did not conteſt this right with Anthimus in the leaſt; but they were at difference concerning the Extent of this New Province. Anthimus extended the Limits of it further than he ought; and St. Baſil oppos'd his Attempts. They differed chiefly about one little City called Saſima, which lay upon a great Road. Anthimus pretended that it depended upon his Juriſdiction; and St. Baſil to keep it to himſelf, erected it into a Biſhoprick, and gave it to his Friend St. Gregory Nazianzen. But Anthimus was already in Poſſeſſion: Which obliged St. Gregory, being a Lover of Peace, to withdraw from the place, in which he could take no Pleaſure; and he was very Angry with his Friend for making Uſe of him to maintain his own Quarrel.

Damaſus, Biſhop of Rome.

St. Baſil had alſo another Diſpute with Theodotus Biſhop of Nicopolis. Meletius and this Biſhop were invited to come to a Synod which was to be held at Phargama, near Nicopolis. He wrote to Euſebius of Samoſata to be there, and ſent his Letter by Euſtathius of Sebaſtea. The good Correſpondence which St. Baſil had then with this laſt, rendered him odious to Theodotus, and the other Biſhops who deſired no more to have him at their Synod. When St. Baſil knew this Matter, he held a Conference with Euſtathius of Sebaſtea: In which he found that he ſpoke like a Catholick, and he cauſed him to ſign an Orthodox Confeſſion of Faith. After he had uſed this Precaution he came to find out Meletius and Theodotus, and told them what he had done. Theodotus told him, that Euſtathius had ſince denied what he had then approved. St. Baſil anſwered, That he could not believe him ſo Inconſtant; but notwithſtanding to try him, yet anew, he would offer him a very large Confeſſion of Faith, which if he refuſed to ſign, he would then ſeparate from his Communion. Meletius and Theodotus approved of this Propoſal, and the laſt invited St. Baſil to come to Nicopolis; but when he was there, he would not permit him to be at the Prayers of the Church, nor communicate with him at all. St. Baſil ſeeing himſelf thus affronted without Reaſon, retired from Nicopolis, and came to Satala, where he ordained a Biſhop at the Deſire of the Inhabitants. From thence he went to find out Euſtathius, and made him Sign a Confeſſion of Faith, to which he annexed that of the Nicene Creed. St. Gregory Nyſſen ſided againſt his Brother St. Baſil, as appears by the Letters 256, and 259, of this Saint; where he accuſes him of troubling the Peace of the Church, and of laying Snares for him. Some time after, Euſtathius of Sebaſtea, who, upon St. Baſil's Account, was engaged in a Quarrel with Theodotus, declared himſelf openly againſt St. Baſil, joyned the Eudoxians, oppos'd the Faith of the Council of Nice, and the Divinity of the Holy Spirit. St. Baſil underſtanding this, reconciles himſelf to Theodotus, and wrote many Letters againſt Euſtathius.

Theſe are the principal Circumſtances of St. Baſil's Life, and the Affairs which took up the greateſt part of his Time while he was Biſhop. The other Circumſtances which are of leſs Conſequence may be learned from his Letters. St. Baſil died upon the firſt of January, in the Year 379.

The Letters of St. Baſil are the moſt learned and the moſt curious of all his Books, and perhaps of all Eccleſiaſtical Antiquity. They are written with an unimitable Purity, Majeſty and Eloquence, and contain an infinite Number of Things. There one may ſee all the Hiſtory of his Time, deſcribed to the Life, the different Characters of Men's Tempers, the contrary Intereſts of each Party, and the Motives which acted both ſides, and the Intrigues which they made Uſe of for carrying on their Deſigns. The State of the Eaſtern and Weſtern Churches is there deſcribed, in lively and natural Colours. He handles an infinite Number of Queſtions of Doctrine, of Diſcipline, and of Morality; which he decides with much Learning and Prudence. There one may find many Letters of Conſolation or Exhortation, which are very Edifying and Pathetical, and even thoſe which are only Complimental are full of Wit, and of very ſolid and uſeful Thoughts. They are indeed at preſent in ſo great Confuſion, that 'tis not an eaſie thing to read them in order with Delight, and ſo ill tranſlated, that they are almoſt wholly diſguiſed, and can hardly be known by thoſe that underſtand the Beauty of the Original Language. I have begun a Tranſlation of them in Latin and French, which I may perhaps Publiſh ſome time or other with Notes. In the mean time, I ſhall now make ſome Extracts out of them, according to my uſual Method. But to make them more uſeful, I have ranked the Letters according to the Order of Time. If they are ſet according to the ſubject Matter, they may be divided into Hiſtorical and Doctrinal; Letters of Diſcipline, Apologetical Letters, Letters of Inſtruction or Morality, Letters of Conſolation, and Letters of Civility: But I thought it more proper to follow in the Body of our Book the Order of Time; which I have examined as exactly as I could. They ſhall be divided then into two Claſſes: The firſt, ſhall comprehend the Letters that were written in his Solitude, before he was Biſhop: And the ſecond, which will contain far the greater Number, ſhall conſiſt of thoſe which were written after he was Biſhop, which I ſhall diſpoſe in their Order of Time from Year to Year, as near as I can.

The firſt of the Letters written by St. Baſil in his Solitude, is the 19*th*. directed to St. Gregory Nazianzen; wherein he acquaints him with the Reſolution he had taken up to live retiredly, and deſcribes the place which he had choſen for his Retreat, very Pleaſantly, and very Elegantly. This Letter was written in the Beginning of the Year 358.

St. Gregory having received this Letter, did not approve of the Habitation which his Friend had choſen, and from the Deſcription which he had given of it, he imagined that it was a very Melancholy and Frightful Place. He ſignified alſo his Thoughts of it in his 7*th*. Letter to him, and rallies pleaſantly upon the Deſcription he had ſent of it. Wherefore St. Baſil having a mind to draw him to himſelf by ſome more powerful Motive, repreſents to him in his 2*d*. Letter, which is commonly put the 1*ſt*. the Manner of Life which he had embraced.

He

St. Basil. He complains at the first, that he could not yet reap all the Profit from his Retirement which he could have wished; which Unhappiness he attributes to the Habits that he had contracted while he lived in the World; from which he could not yet disengage himself: And he desires him to believe, that he describes in his Letter the manner after which he should live, and not that in which he did live at present. After this, he represents the Miseries of a Secular Life, and the Delights of Solitude. He shews how profitable this Retreat is, provided one's Mind be not too much fastned to the World, after he is parted from it. He gives an account of the Exercises of so Happy a State; which consist in Prayer, in labouring with our Hands, in Reading and Meditation upon the Holy Scripture; and gives Rules concerning the Discourse, the Habits, the Eating and Behaviour of a Monk. This Letter was written in the Year 358.

There are also some other Letters of St. Basil, which are very near upon the same Subject, and were written probably about the same time. The Four first, which are not ranked in the other Classis, are of this number.

The First is addressed to one Chilon; who having renounced the World, had written to St. Basil, to desire some Advice of him, how he should behave himself; which is done in this Letter. He exhorts him to persevere in his Resolution: He Counsels him not to Aspire at first to the highest Perfection of a Religious Life, but to ascend to it by degrees. He particularly recommends to him to abide in Solitude, without going out of it upon any pretence whatsoever, though it were even to be present at the Instructions of the Bishops in the Publick Assemblies of the Church.

After this Letter, follows a short, but very Instructive Exhortation to Young Monks; which contains in few words many Precepts of a Religious Life.

The Second Letter, is to a Monk who had abandoned his Solitary state, to return into the World, that he might put himself in a way of Trade. He deplores his Fall, and Exhorts him to acknowledge it, and to do Penance for his Fault.

The Third, is to a Monk of Jerusalem, who had given a horrible Scandal by carrying away a Virgin consecrated to Jesus Christ. He sets before his Eyes the Happiness of that state from which he was fallen, and the Misery of that to which he was reduced by his Crime. He charges him very sharply for his Enormity, and covers him with Confusion for his Infamous Action. Nevertheless, he concludes with Exhorting him from the Consideration of Death and of Judgment, to beg Pardon of his Fault, to Turn and Repent.

The Fourth of these Letters is address'd to a Virgin, who being consecrated to God by a Vow of Virginity, had suffered her self to be corrupted by a Miserable Man. He represents to her the Enormity of her Crime. He endeavours to terrifie her by the Fear of Judgment and of Hell, and gives her hopes, that she shall obtain Mercy, if she will change her Life and Repent.

The 411. Letter, ought to be joyned to this. It contains many Precepts of a Monastick Life; which, for the most part, are drawn out of the Holy Scripture.

The 165. Letter to Eustathius the Philosopher, was written some time after St. Basil's Retirement. He acquaints him, that since his return from Athens, he had searched for him in all places, but could not meet with him; which Unhappiness he Attributes to the Providence of God, and not to Fortune.

The 166. to one named Julianus, seems to have been written about the same time. He says, that 'tis in a Man's Power to lead a happy and quiet Life, by governing his Passions, and submitting his Mind to all Events that can happen. Neither Loss of Goods, says he, nor Sickness of Body, nor any other troublesome Accidents of this Life can hurt a Virtuous Man, while he designs to walk in the Ways of God, and Meditates upon another Life, who submits to all the Troubles and Crosses of this World; For those who are wholly taken up with the Cares of this Life, are like those Carnivorous Birds, who stoop down to the Earth with the Beasts, though they have Wings to fly in the Air.

The 167. Letter to Diodorus a Priest of Antioch, was also written about the same time. In it he commends the two Books which this Author had sent him. He says, that the Second was very acceptable to him, not only because of its Brevity, but because of the many Thoughts, Arguments and Answers which it contain'd in a very good Method. He commends the plainness of its Stile, which is agreeable, says he, to the Profession of a Christian, who ought much rather to write for the Publick Good, than to acquire Glory to himself. As to the First Book, which was composed by way of Dialogue, he says, That though it was more adorned with Figures, and had greater Variety of Matter; yet he found it tedious to read, and difficult to understand. He takes notice, That the Calumnies of Hereticks, and the Defences of the Catholicks are very useless, and interrupt the Thread of his Discourse.

To this we may joyn the 168. Letter to Eunomius, wherein he rallies this Heretick, who boasted of understanding all things, by putting to him many difficult Questions about things Natural; to which it was impossible to answer. St. Basil.

The 41. and 42. Letters to Maximus the Philosopher, who is, in all probability the same that got himself Ordained Archbishop of Constantinople, were also written by St. Basil, when he was in his Solitude.

The 1st. is concerning the Opinions of Dionysius of Alexandria. He accuses him of Writing some things in his Books, which seemed to be the Seeds of the Error of the Anomœans: yet he confesses that he did it not designedly; but that in disputing against the Heresie of Sabellius, he had too much inclined to the opposite Error, and in proving the Distinction of the Persons, he seemed to admit a Difference of Nature between the Three Divine Persons. After this, St. Basil explains his own Judgment concerning the Trinity. He does not condemn the Opinion of those who say, That the Word is like to God the Father in Substance; nor even of those who say simply, That he is like to his Father, provided they add, that he is in nothing unlike to him; because this Sense falls in with their Opinion who call him Consubstantial. He adds, that this last Term is less capable of an ill sense. He condemns the Bishops of the Council of Constantinople, who contented themselves with declaring, that the Son was the Image of the Father, without adding, That he was in nothing unlike. At last, St. Basil invites Maximus to come and see him, and directly charges him with having too great an Affection for the City and Grandeur of this World. This Letter was written after the Council of Constantinople in 360.

In the 2d. Letter to the same Philosopher, he commends him, and recommends to him the love of Virtue.

The 2d. 3d. and 33. Letters addressed to St. Gregory, who was gone to Nazianzum, were much about the same time.

In the 2d. he observes, that no words are capable of expressing our Thoughts of God, and Admonishes St. Gregory to use all his Eloquence in the Defence of the Truth.

In the 3d. Letter, he pleasantly rebukes St. Gregory, for writing none but Laconick Letters to him; that is to say, such as were short and concise.

'Tis plain, that the Letters of St. Basil to the Emperor Julian, if they are Genuine, were written by this Saint in his Retirement, since the Death of Julian happened before he came out of his solitude. He had known this Prince at Athens, where they had studied together under Libanius. After he was returned to his own Country, he received a very obliging Letter from this Prince, who had not yet forsaken the Christian Religion. This Letter is the 206. But after he had renounced Christianity, he did no longer treat St. Basil after the same manner: but on the contrary, he wrote a Proud Letter to him, and commanded him to send him 1000 l. of Gold for restoring of the Temples. This Letter is the 207th. among those of St. Basil, to which is subjoyn'd the Answer that Julian made when he had read the Book of Apollinarius, I have read it, understood it, and condemned it. But it appears, that those words were added to the rest of the Letter, to which they have no reference at all. The two following Letters contain the Answer of St. Basil to this Letter of Julian; yet they are not two Answers, nor two different Letters, but one and the same Answer, of which some have made two. Cotelerius hath published a little while ago the whole entire and in one Letter only, from a Manuscript of the King's Library. It is in his Second Volume of the Monuments of the Greek Church. This Sentence which is put at the beginning of the First, You did not understand what you read; for if you had understood it, you would never have condemned it, was added after the writing of this Letter, as that was, which is at the End of Julian's Letter. I doubt also, whether the Answer that is attributed to St. Basil, be truly his; and I know not but it may be written by some other Person, who would make a trial how he could Answer Julian's Letter to this Father: And indeed, the Stile of this Letter is not so Elegant as that of the Letters of St. Basil. He writes to Julian, that he is horribly vexed, when he thinks that he is cloathed with the Royal Purple, and that his infamous Head is adorned with a Crown. Is it credible that St. Basil should write to an Emperor with so little respect, and should treat him as a ridiculous, senseless and impertinent Person, as the Author of this Letter does? In short, there is at the end of this Letter, an Inference drawn from an Opinion of Julian's, which is extremely wide, and has scarce any sense, and not according to the Genius of St. Basil, who is nice and exact in his Thoughts, and moderate in his Expressions.

As to the 205. Letter addressed to the same Emperor, 'tis evident that it is Suppositious. The Title of it is, To Julian the Apostate. Would St. Basil ever have directed a Letter to him with this Inscription? 2. The stile of this Letter is very different from that of St. Basil. 3. This Letter is nothing but a confession of Faith. Now to what purpose should St. Basil send a Confession of Faith to Julian? 4. He adds to this confession of Faith, the Invocation of Saints, and Worship of Images. Who ever heard that these Points were put into the Cofessions of Faith of the first Ages? 5. He says, that he Honours and St. Baſil. Adores the Images of the Saints, becauſe it is an Apoſtolical Tradition. Would St. Baſil have ſpoken thus? And is it not plain that this Letter is the Work of ſome Greek, who lived after the Seventh Council?

The Six Letters publiſhed by Hœſchelius, which are the 210, 211, 212, 213, 214, 215, being written to different Perſons, were alſo compoſed by St. Baſil while he was in his Solitude. They contain nothing remarkable.

The 141. Letter of St. Baſil was written in the Year 363. after the difference which he had with his own Biſhop. The Inhabitants of Cæſarea complained that he had retired after his Ordination, and recalled him with very Importunate Letters. St. Baſil wrote to them, to thank them for their Goodneſs to him, and to give them an account of the cauſe of his Retiring. He admoniſhes them not to ſuffer themſelves to be ſurprized by the Artifices of Hereticks; and for a Preſervative againſt them, he explains the Faith of the Church concerning the Trinity, and anſwers ſome Objections which they alledged. He blames thoſe that ſaid only, the Son of God was like his Father; without adding any thing for Explication.

The 4th. Letter to St. Gregory, is the laſt of theſe which St. Baſil wrote in his Retirement before he was Biſhop. It is directed to St. Gregory Nazianzen; wherein he Exhorts him to be very careful to procure the Choice of a Biſhop, in the room of Euſebius Biſhop of Cæſarea in Cappadocia, lately Dead, who might be worthy to fill that Biſhoprick. St. Gregory had reſolved to come himſelf to Cæſarea; but for fear leſt the giving of his Suffrage in favour of St. Baſil ſhould render him ſuſpected, he contented himſelf with ſending two Letters written in his Father's Name; whereof one was addreſſed to the Church of Cæſarea, and the other to the Council aſſembled in that City, wherein he recommended St. Baſil as moſt worthy to ſucceed in the room of Euſebius. Some Authors attribute this Letter of St. Baſil which we have already mentioned, to Euſebius of Samoſata: And indeed, it is not very probable, that St. Baſil ſhould ſo openly pray St. Gregory, to do that which looked ſo like ſoliciting that himſelf might be made Biſhop.

We ſhould joyn to this the Two Letters of St. Baſil to Apollinarius, which were publiſhed by Cotelerius, if they were Genuine; but they are Forged by the Apollinarians, ſince St. Baſil himſelf teſtifies in the 59, 79, and 82. Letters, that he never wrote concerning the Faith to Apollinarius; and that the Letters which were publiſhed under his Name, were Suppoſititious: Which plainly ſhews, that the Two Letters, which go under St. Baſil's Name, and are addreſſed to Apollinarius, which treat of the Myſtery of the Holy Trinity, and which ſuppoſe that St. Baſil and Apollinarius held a great Correſpondence by Letters, are Forged, as well as thoſe of Apollinarius to St. Baſil, which contain Errors not only about the Incarnation, but alſo about the Trinity.

The Second Claſs of St. Baſil's Letters, ought to be of thoſe which were written after he was Biſhop of Cæſarea; Theſe are far more numerous and more conſiderable. The Firſt, are thoſe which he wrote for the Reconciliation of Meletius with St. Athanaſius and the Weſtern Biſhops.

To compaſs this deſign, he wrote about the end of the Year 369. the 56. Letter to Meletius, to diſpoſe him to enter upon a Treaty about it. He did not openly acquaint him with his Deſign, leſt he ſhould be diſcovered; but he ſignified to him, that he deſired he might ſee him to treat about an Affair of great Importance; but being detained by his Brethren, he ſent Theophraſtus to Communicate it to him. The Secrecy which he obſerves in this Letter, plainly diſcovers that this was the Firſt which he Wrote about this Negotiation.

'Tis probable, that about the ſame time, to conciliate the favour of St. Athanaſius, who had written to him immediately after his Promotion; he wrote an Anſwer to him by Letter 47. wherein he gives him an Account of the ſhare that he had in the Perſecution which the Governor of Lybia raiſed againſt this Holy Paſtor; and he acquaints him, That all the Faithful of his Church, looked upon this Governor as an Excommunicated Perſon; that they would have no Correſpondence with him; becauſe 'tis fit, that the Powers who will uſe Violence, ſhould find themſelves unanimouſly condemned by all the Churches.

Meletius having ſignified to St. Baſil, that he would willingly hearken to an Accommodation, this Father wrote to St. Athanaſius at the Beginning of the Year 379, the 48. Letter; wherein he exhorts him to procure the Peace and Union of the Eaſtern and Weſtern Churches, and prays him to begin with receiving the Church of Antioch. He ſupports this Propoſal in three Letters, which in the common Edition, are 49, 50, and 51. The 50th. was written at the deſire of Dorotheus the Deacon, whom Meletius ſent to Negotiate this affair. In it he gives great Commendation of Meletius, and ſays, that all the other Parties which are in the Church of Antioch ought to re-unite to him and to thoſe who adhered to him, as to the principal Body of the Church of Antioch; whereof the reſt are but ſeparate Members. He aſſures him, That the Weſt wiſhed for this Reunion, as well as the Eaſt; as appeared by the Letters brought from the Weſt by Silvanus. He conjures him afterwards to uſe his uſual Prudence for procuring the Peace of all the Churches. In Letter 51. he exhorts St. Athanaſius to write a Letter of Communion to all the Eaſtern Biſhops; and prays him to ſend it, either by ſome Perſons in his own Name, or even by the Deacon Dorotheus. He aſſures him that the Biſhops are Orthodox, and that they deſire to be re-united to him, and he promiſes them, that he will not deliver his Letter, till he has received their Anſwers, and thoſe Aſſurances that he ſhall deſire. St. Baſil.

St. Athanaſius having received theſe Letters, would not write at all, but he ſent one of his Prieſts called Peter, to diſpoſe their Minds to Peace. This Prieſt was very well received by St. Baſil, and he performed his Meſſage as well as he could. But this affair being of too great Conſequence to be ſo eaſily determined; St. Baſil thought it neceſſary to write to Pope Damaſus. Having taken up this Reſolution, he ſent the Deacon Dorotheus to Meletius, by whom he wrote the 57. Letter wherein he tells him his deſign which he had of ſending this Deacon to Rome, and of deſiring ſome Deputies out of Italy. He prays him, if he thought it convenient, to give him neceſſary inſtructions, and to write a Letter in his own Name, and in the Name of all the Biſhops of his Communion, and to direct it to the Weſtern Biſhops. He writes at the end of this Letter, that the Affairs of the Church were in the ſame ſtate; that the Civil Powers would not meddle with them, to reſtore thoſe that were baniſhed; that Euvippus an Arian Biſhop was come, but that he had done nothing yet in Publick, though he had threatned to fetch the Biſhops of his Party from Tetrapolis and Cilicia, to Condemn the Orthodox.

Meletius ſent back Dorotheus, and thought it neceſſary for him to go into the Weſt. 'Tis not certainly known, whether he wrote at that time to the Biſhops of the Weſt, but 'tis certain that St. Baſil then addreſſed his 220. Letter to Damaſus. It has no Superſcription, but 'tis eaſy to ſee, that 'twas addreſſed to the Biſhop of Rome. He begins with ſhewing the Advantage which that Biſhop had to reſtore the antient Union between the Eaſtern and Weſtern Churches: After this, he deſcribes the unhappy State to which the Perſecution of the Arians had reduced the Churches of the Eaſt. He repreſents to Damaſus, that he might give them Eaſe and Comfort, by writing and ſending Deputies to them, to re-eſtabliſh Peace and Union in the Church. He remonſtrates to him, that what he deſired, was not extraordinary, ſince it had been the practiſe of the Saints, and particularly of the Church of Rome. He obſerves to him, that St. Dionyſius had formerly comforted the Church of Cæſarea, by his Letters, and that he had ſent ſome of his Brethren to deliver Chriſtians from Captivity; that now there was more Reaſon to complain of the Miſery of the Church, ſince not only the Captivity of the Body, but that of the Soul alſo was to be feared. St. Baſil, gave this Letter to Dorotheus, to carry into the Weſt, and he ſent his Deacon to St. Athanaſius, to conferr with him about the means of procuring Peace, that ſo after he had met with him, he might Embark from Alexandria, to go into Italy. He charged him alſo with a Letter for St. Athanaſius, which is the 52. and though in it, he ſays, that he referred himſelf wholly to the Prudence of St. Athanaſius as to the Management of this Affair, yet he ſays, that his Advice ſhould be to Write to the Biſhop of Rome, and to pray him, ſince there was no probability of calling a Synod, that he would ſend by his own Authority, Deputies into the Eaſt. He obſerves, that he muſt chuſe ſuch Perſons as were able to endure the Fatigue of Travelling, and who had much Meekneſs, and Moderation to correct the Eagerneſs and Paſſionate Heats of ſome of the Biſhops of the Eaſt: And in fine, who could ſpeak at a fit Seaſon, and accommodate themſelves to the Times. He would have them carry with them the Acts of the Council of Ariminum, and an Account of the Tranſactions in the Weſt, that they may be nulled; that they ſhould come by Sea, without letting any body know of it; that at firſt they ſhould addreſs themſelves to thoſe of his own Communion, before they were pre-engaged by the Aſſociates of Paulinus, the Enemies of Peace: And in ſhort, that they ſhould condemn the Hereſie of Marcellus, of Ancyra. This Letter is the 52. At the end, he conjures St. Athanaſius to ſend forthwith the Deacon Dorotheus into the Weſt; that ſo the Buſineſs might be done the next Year, which was 371. He Advertiſes him alſo, that he muſt take care to recommend to the Deputies from the Weſt, that they be very Cautious, leſt they encreaſe Diviſions inſtead of allaying them, and that they prefer to all things the Good of Peace; and that they do not maintain a Schiſm in the Church of Antioch, out of Affection to ſome particular Perſons.

The Deſire of Peace, and the Fear that St. Baſil had of bringing Perſecution upon the Church, obliged him to be very cautious in his Diſcourſe. Wherefore, tho' he profeſſed to believe, and to defend the Divinity of the Holy Spirit; yet he ſaid nothing of it unleſs he was obliged. And therefore when he was in an Aſſembly of Biſhops held in the year 370. at the Feaſt of St. Euphichius, in the City of Cæſarea

St. Basil. Cæsarea, he discoursed largely of the Divinity of the Father and the Son, and said nothing almost of the Holy Spirit. Whereupon a religious Person who was present at this Assembly, accused St. Basil of betraying the Truth by a Cowardice unworthy of a Bishop, and published this Accusation at a Feast where he was present some time after. St. Gregory Nazianzen, who was one of the Guests at this Feast, endeavoured in vain to defend his Friend; for all the Company blamed him, and at last St. Gregory himself was offended with his Conduct, and wrote to him his Judgment about it in Letter 26. St. Basil having received this Letter by Hellenius, was a little offended with it, and answered him in Letter 33. That he was surprized, that he should so lightly give credit to a Calumniator. He signifies a great Contempt of these kind of Accusations. He invites St. Gregory to come and see him, and says, That what was quickly to come to pass, would serve for his Justification before all the World; because it might be foreseen, that he must suffer for the defence of the Truth, and perhaps should be forced away from his Church and his Country. Which discovers that this Letter was written before the Persecution of Valens, in the year 370.

This Emperor had a design to divide the Province of Cappadocia into two. St. Basil thought it was his duty to defend the Rights of his People, and his Church. For this reason, he wrote to a great Man of his Country called Martinianus, the 376. Letter, to pray him to go to Court and hinder this Division. This Letter was written in the year 370, as well as the 362, which was plainly written upon the same Occasion. The 309. Letter, wherein he declares, that he continued unshaken, tho' he had been attacked by the most powerful at Court, referrs to the Sollicitations which the Prefect Modestus had used to him this year 370, by Order of the Emperor Valens. 'Tis probable, that the Letter 409, wherein he thanks an Eastern Bishop called Innocentius, for what he had written to him, is also of the same year; for 'tis likely that this Bishop wrote to him a little after his Ordination, and that St. Basil took no long time to Answer him.

The Deacon Dorotheus, departed in the year 371, but his Journey had not all the Success, that might have been hoped for. However, the Western Bishops wrote a Letter to the Bishops of the East, which was sent to them by St. Athanasius, but the Contents are not known. It appears also by the Letters of St. Basil, That there came from the West a Deacon named Sabinus, who carried the Letters of the Bishops of Illyricum, Italy, and Gaul.

The Eastern Bishops answered the Letter of those of the West, which they received by St. Athanasius, and that which was brought them by Sabinus: Their Answers are the Letters 61, and 69. In Letter 61, after they have testified their Joy, that they had, when they understood that the Western Bishops were all at present united in one and the same Doctrine, they desire of them help and relief in their Miseries, which they describe in a most lively and natural manner. 'Our Miseries, say they, are known to you, though we 'should not write them, being published over all the Earth. 'The Doctrine of our Fathers is despised; The Tradition 'of the Apostles is overthrown; The new Inventions of 'some particular Persons prevail in the Churches; They 'treat Religion as Sophisters, not as Divines: The Wisdom of this World domineers, and the Glory of the Cross 'is abhorred; The true Pastors are driven away, and ravening Wolves are entred into their places, who tear the 'Flock of Christ in pieces; The Churches are abandoned; 'The Deserts are filled with desolate Christians; The Old 'Men sigh when they compare the time past with the present, and the Young Men find themselves miserable, because they never saw the good things of which they are 'now destitute. These things ought to affect those who 'have any love for Jesus Christ and his Church: But what we 'have said of them, is very far short of the Truth; wherefore, if you have any Charity for us, if you be of the same 'Mind, if you have any Bowels of Pity, come speedily to 'our help; Arm your selves with Zeal for Piety, and deliver us from this raging Tempest.' At the end of this Letter, they make a short Confession of their Faith; wherein they acknowledge that the Holy Spirit is ador'd together with the Father and the Son: And they conclude with the Approbation of what the Western Bishops had done in Conformity to the Canons.

The second Letter upon the same Subject, is written in the Name of Meletius, Eusebius of Samosata, St. Basil, and many other Eastern Bishops, to the Bishops of Italy and Gaul, that is the 69*th*. among those of St. Basil. There they give a Description of their Miseries yet more large, and more moving than the former, and conjure the Western Bishops to help them and bring them Relief; and to send to them speedily a great number of Deputies, who may take their Seats in a Synod, hoping by this means, that they may restore the Faith of the Council of Nice, destroy Heresie, and re-unite the Orthodox; who at present are divided in Communion, tho' they hold one and the same Doctrine. They compare the state of the Churches of the East, to that of Jerusalem, during the Siege of Vespasian; and they say, That as the Jews ruined themselves then by their Intestine Seditions, while the Enemies Army reduced them to the last Extremity; so their Churches were now brought to Desolation, not only by the War of the Hereticks, who openly attack'd them; but also by the Divisions of the Orthodox: That if they desire Assistance of the Bishops of the West, it was for this particular Reason, that Peace might be restored; and in this, they say, consisted the Relief of their Churches. They conclude their Letter with saying, That they commend and approve the Confession of Faith that was made by those of the West, and that they consented to all that they had lawfully and canonically determined in their Synodical Epistle. These two Letters were sent by Sabinus, who they say, is a Witness of all that they affirm. St. Basil.

St. Basil wrote particularly by the same Sabinus to Valerianus Bishop of Illyricum, or rather of Aquileia, the Letter 324; wherein he thanks him for the Charity he had testified in the Letter he had written, and prays him to assist with his Prayers the Eastern Churches, that were afflicted with Heresie and Schism. These are all the Letters of St. Basil written in this Year 371, concerning the Union of the East and the West.

The Letters which he wrote in favour of Eustathius of Sebastea, against Theodotus of Nicopolis, are also of this year 371; because he was at Difference with the former in the year 372.

The first Letter written upon this Subject is the 26*th*. addressed to Eusebius of Samosata: He acquaints him, that Meletius and Theodotus of Nicopolis, invited him to be present towards the middle of June, at a Synod which was to be held at Phargama: He prays St. Eusebius to be present there: He sent him this Letter by Eustathius of Sebastea, and tells him that he waited for an Answer.

Eusebius came not to this Synod, but Eustathius was present there, and St. Basil, before he did communicate with him, would have assurance of his Doctrine; and having had two Conferences with him, he made him agree to the Doctrine of the Church. Being thus persuaded that he was Orthodox, he joyned his Prayers with those of this Bishop, to thank God, who had given them Grace to think and speak after the same manner. The design of St. Basil was to have a Confession of Faith drawn up by Theodotus, or those of his Party, which Eustathius should sign: But Theodotus without enquiring into the Conduct of St. Basil, refused to admit him to his Synod, because he had communicated with Eustathius. St. Basil being to go into Armenia, passed by a Country House of Meletius called Getasa, where Theodotus was present; and after a free Conference between them, it was agreed, That if St. Basil could make Eustathius sign a Confession of Faith, which plainly contained the Doctrine of the Church, he should then continue in his Communion; but on the contrary, he should separate from him, if he refused to sign that Confession. Meletius and his Priest Diodorus, having approved this Proposal, it was also agreed to by Theodotus, who invited St. Basil to go with him to Nicopolis: But when he was arrived there, he would not communicate with him, contrary to his Word which he had passed to him; which obliged St. Basil to withdraw, and to go to Satala, there to regulate some Affairs of Armenia, and Ordain some Bishops. He wrote from thence to Count Terentius the 187. Letter; wherein he gives him an account of those Transactions which had passed. Letter 78. is the Confession of Faith which St. Basil caused Eustathius of Sebastea to sign at this time. It contains the Nicene Creed, and rejects the Error of Sabellius and Marcellus of Ancyra. He speaks also of those Differences in Letter 364. to Atarbius.

He wrote also a little while after, the Letter 239. to Eusebius of Samosata; whom he acquaints with the disgraceful manner wherein he was treated by Theodotus. He says, that he had also a Conference with Eustathius, and that he found him very Catholick. He complains, That the Bishops of the second Cappadocia, lately advanced into a Province, refused to have any Correspondence with him. He rallies his Brother Gregory, and says, It were to be wished that he had a Bishoprick that would agree to his Mind; That he is so zealous and watchful, that he could govern all the Churches of the World; That he was not capable only of great things, but that he gave weight to small matters, and made Affairs of no Importance, pass for matters of the greatest consequence, by his manner of treating them. He complains of a Bishop named Palmatius, whom Maximus had made use of to persecute the Church. He invites Eusebius to come and see him, giving him notice that his Presence was necessary to regulate the Affairs of Cappadocia.

He invites him also by Letter 256, to be present at the Feast of St. Eupsichius, which was the 7*th*. of September, to Ordain Bishops, and to give him advice, about the Cause which his Brother Gregory Nyssen had undertaken against him in the Assembly which was held at Ancyra.

Probably Eusebius of Samosata came not to this Synod of Cæsarea, but he sent thither a Bishop named Sabinus, whose Presence comforted St. Basil under the Afflictions which he had met with at Nicopolis, as he acquaints Eusebius by Letter 253; where he excuses the too great Zeal which Theodotus had testified for the observation of the Canons. He says ſays in this Letter, That he paſſionately wiſhed to ſee and embrace Euſebius. The Letters 252, 255, 260, were almoſt at the ſame time.

The 254th. is to the ſame Perſon, and in the ſame year; but it was written before that which we juſt now mentioned, and at the beginning of the year. He writes to him, That Demophilus was upon the Throne of Conſtantinople, and that he was a Hypocrite; and yet that he had re-united the two Parties; and that ſome neighbouring Biſhops were joyned with him. He deplores the miſerable ſtate of the Eaſtern Churches; and ſays, That God only knows when their Condition may be better.

We have already ſeen that St. Baſil went this year to Satala, to regulate the Affairs of this Church, and that he Ordained a Biſhop there, at the deſire of the Inhabitants. He recommends him to them in Letters 296, and 183; and in 185, he writes to the Church of the Parnaſſians, upon the Death of their Biſhop; and in 186, he does with much Eloquence and Chriſtian Charity comfort the Widow of the Pretor Anatheus, upon the Death of her Husband. This Letter may paſs for a perfect Pattern of true Chriſtian Conſolation.

Athanaſius Biſhop of Ancyra, dying in the year 372, it follows that the Letter 53. of St. Baſil which is addreſſed to him, was at leaſt in the year 371. He complains in this Letter of the Conduct of this Biſhop, who accuſed him of teaching Errors in his Writings, or ſubſcribing to thoſe of others. The Complaint of this Biſhop, made St. Baſil apprehend that ſome Heretick had prefixed his Name to his Works. He declares, That he had written againſt the Anomæans, and againſt thoſe that ſay, The Holy Spirit is a Creature.

The following Letter is written to the Father of this Biſhop, praying him to admoniſh his Son charitably, not to defame his Colleague without reaſon.

'Tis credible that the Letter 381, addreſſed to the Suffragans, was alſo written in the ſame year with the preceding Letters, and probably ſoon after St. Baſil was a Biſhop. He complains in this Letter, That ſome neglected to obſerve the Canons, and to follow the Diſcipline of the Church in the Ordination of Miniſters exactly: He obſerves, that formerly none were choſen, but thoſe whoſe Probity was well known, and of whom the Prieſts and Deacons gave a good Teſtimony to the Suffragans; and that neither were theſe Ordained until the Biſhops of the Dioceſs were firſt advertiſed of it: He complains, That now the Suffragans did not write to the Biſhops; and that they alſo permitted the Prieſts and Deacons to chooſe whom they pleaſed, without enquiring into their Behaviour 'From whence it comes to paſs, ſays he, that there are many Miniſters, and but very few who are worthy of their Miniſtry. To avoid this Abuſe, he ordains, That there ſhould be preſently ſent to him a Liſt of all the Miniſters that are in the Villages, containing the Names of thoſe which have been admitted, and an account of the Life which they lead; That they ſhould be reduced to the Condition of Lay-men, who ſhould be found incapable, and thoſe who had been admitted by Prieſts ſince the time of the firſt Prohibition; and that for the future, none ſhould be admitted but thoſe whoſe Life and Converſation had been well examined. In fine, he declares, That thoſe who ſhould be admitted into the Clergy, without his Approbation, ſhould be thruſt down to the Station of the Laity again.

The 392. to Amphilochius, was written before he was made Biſhop of Iconium, and by conſequence towards the end of 371, or the beginning of 372. 'Tis written in the Name of Heraclides, an antient Friend of Amphilochius. It acquaints him with the Life which he leads under the Conduct of St. Baſil, and invites him to come and ſtay with them.

The 319. to Innocentius may be alſo about the ſame time. He refuſes to charge himſelf with the care of the Eaſtern Churches, which this Biſhop would have him to do.

'Twas probably in the ſame year that St. Baſil undertook to build a Church and an Hoſpital in Cæſarea. Some would have hindered the going on of this Work; whereupon he writes to Elias Governor of the Province in Letter 372; praying him for leave to proceed in his Buildings. The 373, was written to the ſame Perſon in favour of a Receiver, who had neglected to ſend an Account of his Receipts. In the 305, which is to ſome Receiver-General, St. Baſil determines, That an Oath ſhould not be exacted from the Collectors of Taxes; becauſe theſe kind of Oaths bring no great Profit to the Receivers, and accuſtom Men to make falſe Oaths. In the 304. he writes to the ſame Perſon, That the Monks ought to be exempted from paying of Tribute.

In the beginning of the year 372, St. Baſil having found out the Frauds of Euſtathius of Sebaſtea, ſeparated from him, and re-united himſelf to Theodotus. This Separation was begun by two Friends of Euſtathius, called Baſil and Euphronius, who were ſent to St. Baſil, as Spies upon him. Theſe two Perſons having created ſome Trouble to this Saint, he wrote about it to Euſtathius, and prayed him to put a ſtop to the Diſorder which they cauſed in his Dioceſs. This Letter is the 307, which I believe was written to Euſtathius of Sebaſtea, tho' ſome think that it was addreſſed to another Euſtathius Biſhop of Himeria, to whom the preceding Letter is addreſſed. Some time after, Euſtathius being invited to a Council held by St. Baſil, not only refuſed to come thither himſelf, but hindered all thoſe of his Party from going, and declared himſelf in his Diſcourſes, and in his Letters, againſt St. Baſil. He had alſo the Inſolence to write him a Letter, wherein he declared, That he had withdrawn from his Communion, and publiſhed a Writing or Manifeſto againſt him; wherein he accuſes him of the Error of Apollinarius. St. Baſil underſtanding theſe things, acknowledged, but too late, that he had too eaſily given credit to one of the greateſt Cheats in the World. He began to commend the Prudence of Theodotus of Nicopolis; and to reconcile himſelf perfectly to him, he wrote the Letter 196, wherein he gives him a faithful account of all that we have ſaid, and teſtifies the regret he had for truſting to this Impoſtor. He obſerves, that he had publiſhed a Confeſſion of Faith, which was perfectly agreeable to the Opinions of Arius, and accuſes him of re-ordaining Biſhops.

St. Baſil.

A Biſhop of Cilicia named Theophilus, joyned himſelf with Euſtathius, againſt St. Baſil. 'Tis to him that Letter 310. is addreſſed; wherein St. Baſil acquaints him, That tho' he had great cauſe of Grief upon his account, yet he would not ceaſe always to remember him.

The Letter 81. to Euſtathius the Phyſician, was written upon the Separation of Euſtathius of Sebaſtea: For therein he teſtifies what Trouble he endured for the Separation of thoſe who had withdrawn from his Communion; but yet he was obliged rather to ſuffer their Diviſion from him, than do any thing againſt the Truth and againſt his own Conſcience; becauſe there was nothing more dear to him than the Faith, and Hope in Jeſus Chriſt.

In Letter 82. to Patrophilus, who had objected this Separation to him; He ſhews him, that his Enemies were the Cauſes of this Diviſion, and juſtifies himſelf from two Accuſations which Euſtathius had formed againſt him; Whereof the firſt was, That he had formerly written to Apollinarius: And the ſecond, That he had received Diodorus into his Communion. With reference to Apollinarius, he confeſſes, that he had formerly written one Letter only to him; but he ſays, That he did not then believe him to be in an Error; That he could not be reſponſible for his Faults; And, That he had not read his Writings. As to Diodorus, he confeſſes that he received him into his Communion, as a good Catholick, being educated by Silvanus of Tarſus, and who could be charged with nothing. He vindicates himſelf alſo from the Crimes that were imputed to him, in a Writing addreſſed to Dazizus; and at laſt, he accuſes Euſtathius of Sebaſtea, and deſcribes his Life in ſuch a manner as is very much to his diſadvantage. Patrophilus having received this Letter, ſent St. Baſil word that he would not ſeparate from him. St. Baſil thanks him in Letter 85, and admoniſhes him, That for keeping peace, we muſt make choice of ſuch Perſons with whom we may be united; and that we are obliged to break with ſome Perſons with whom Peace cannot be had.

But St. Baſil did not only defend himſelf by Letters written to his Friends; but he wrote alſo a very ſmart Letter upon the ſame ſubject to Euſtathius, which is the 79. There he gives an account of his Conduct and his Doctrine, during the whole time of his Life: He ſhews him, That he could not be accuſed without Injuſtice, for having written almoſt twenty years ago to Apollinarius: He takes Euſtathius himſelf for a Witneſs of his Faith, and asks him, if he could accuſe him of promoting any Error in the Conference which he had with him. He accuſes him of being the Diſciple of Arius and Aëtius. At laſt, he obſerves, That the true Cauſe wherefore he had made this Separation, was not becauſe of the Letter which St. Baſil wrote to Apollinarius, as is pretended; but becauſe his Communion might be prejudicial to thoſe who would acquire Favour and Authority.

'Twas at the beginning of this Year, that St. Baſil wrote to his Brother Gregory Nyſſen, upon a complaint that he had againſt him. He acquaints him in Letter 44, that he was ſurpriſed, that there were three Letters written to him, under the Name of his Uncle Gregory, which were none of his. He gives him to underſtand, that he would come and ſee him, and the Biſhops his Friends, provided they would receive him Honourably. The 45 and 46, are to this Uncle Gregory, upon the ſame Difference.

The Letter 43, goes under the Name of St. Baſil, and is addreſſed to the ſame St. Gregory Nyſſen, in the Editions of St. Baſil: But 'tis in the Second Volume of St. Gregory Nyſſen, under the Name of that Father, and is addreſſed to their Brother Peter; and indeed, it has more the Stile of St. Gregory, than of St. Baſil. The Author of it, explains with much Subtilty, the Difference between the words Hypoſtaſis, and Eſſence; and ſhews that Eſſence ſignifies that which is common to the three Divine Perſons; and Hypoſtaſis, that which is peculiar to each Perſon.

The Letter 263, to Euſebius of Samoſata, was written before Eaſter, in the Year 372. It contains excuſes for not writing to him ſo often as he would. St. Baſil fell Sick about Eaſter, and was afflicted with a Fever, which tormented

St. Basil. mented him till Winter, as appears by the Letters 257 and 258, written at the same time, to Eusebius of Samosata, and by 270, 271, to Antiochus.

This same Year the Persecution of the Arians was begun anew more fiercely than ever. St. Basil speaks of this Persecution in his Letter 5, to Eusebius, wherein he acquaints him, that 'twas raised against the Catholicks of the Church of Tarsus, which was the Centre of Unity to Isauria, Cilicia, and Cappadocia; That the Church was ruined by desperate Persons, and that all things went on from bad to worse, while the Catholicks were amused, and did nothing but look on.

Eusebius answered him, That they must write again to the Bishops of the West, to desire of them some Relief. St. Basil wrote also about it to Meletius, without whose Advice he would undertake nothing. This Letter is the 58, wherein he complains, that Anthimus, Bishop of Tyana, would have Ordained one Faustus, in the room of a Bishop whom St. Basil had Ordained in Armenia. He sent this Letter by Sanctissimus, whom he charged also with a Letter to Theodotus, wherein he complains of the Ordination of Faustus. This Letter is the 195. Afterwards he gave to the same Person three Letters; the First for the Priests of Antioch; the Second for the Monks of that City; and the Last for Pelagius of Laodicea. These Letters are the 199, 200, and 312. There is also a Letter upon the Ordination of Faustus, addressed to Poemeninus, Bishop of Satala, which is the 313.

A little while after, he wrote to Meletius the Letter 59, wherein having defended himself from the Accusation of Eustathius, who accused him of the Errors of Apollinarius; he says, that he had received information, that it was resolved at Court, to deliver him up to the Fury of his Enemies; but that this Order was suspended for some time.

He earnestly prays Meletius to answer the Letter which he had written to him by Sanctissimus, and to send him a Letter for the Bishops of the West, Signed by those who were united with him in Communion and Judgment. He signifies, that the Western Bishops must be Advertised not to receive into their Communion indifferently, all those that come from the East.

The Letter 273, to the Priest Antiochus, who was Nephew to Eusebius of Samosata, which Father Combefis believes to be directed also to Meletius, is upon the same subject. He prays him to Order, together with the Deacon Dorotheus, what must be done for a Re-union with the West. He Counsels him to dictate the Letter himself, that was to be sent thither. He says, That he had Written some time ago to the Bishops of Illyricum, of Gaul and Italy, by the Deacon Sabinus; but he adds, That it would be convenient to send one into the West, in the Name of a Synod of the East. As to what concerns Athanasius, he says, That he is very well inclined to Peace; but he can do nothing, unless Letters of Communion be sent to him: Moreover, That he does ardently desire the re-union, and will do all that is possible for him to procure it. This Letter was written before Easter. He signifies, that he waited for his Answer.

'Twas at this Time, and upon this Occasion, that Letter 70, of St. Basil was written, addressed to the Western Bishops, wherein he prays them to Inform their Emperor of the miseries which the Orthodox suffered in the East, and to send them Deputies. This Letter was to be carried by a Priest named Dorotheus.

While Matters were thus ordered in the East, St. Basil, who was now recovering, as appears by the Sixth Letter to Eusebius of Samosata, fell sick again in Winter. He speaks of this Sickness in his Seventh Letter, and excuses himself for not visiting St. Eusebius from the sharpness of the Winter, and the Death of his Mother. He deplores in this Letter, the unhappy State of the Church, and says, that some would have placed Arians at Ancyra and Neocæsarea, in the room of the Orthodox, but that at last, they had left the Churches in Tranquility.

In the mean time, Evagrius, a Priest of Antioch being returned from the West, brought a Letter, which he would have obliged the Eastern Bishops to Sign; saying, That those which they had written before, were not approved in the West. St. Basil having received Advice of this, wrote to Eusebius of Samosata by his Eighth Letter. There he speaks against Eustathius of Sebastea, and enquires if he was to be present at the Ordination of a Bishop for the City of Iconium, which had formerly depended upon his Metropolis, but did not now since the Division of Cappadocia.

He wrote also at the same time to this Evagrius, who was come from the West, and who had written to him, that he was suspected, because of his Communion with Meletius. St. Basil answered him by Letter 342, That he was very little troubled at what the World thought of him, but that he would labour hard for Peace; and exhorts Evagrius to do the same. He signifies to him, that he was troubled to understand by Dorotheus, that he would not Communicate with Meletius's Party. He declares to him, that as things now stand, he could not send any body into the West.

He writes the same account of the Journey to Rome, to that Dorotheus, whom he had charged with Letter 70. He could not forbear taking Notice, how angry he was with the Pope, and saying, that his Brother Gregory, was not a proper Person to be deputed into the West, because he was too simple to have any thing to do with a Proud Man, and one exalted in Dignity, who by consequence would hardly have Patience to hear him speak the Truth. This Letter is the 150. The Priest went to Rome, however, as appears by Letter 321. St. Basil.

In the mean time, Eusebius of Samosata, who Passionately desired the Peace of the Church, believing that St. Basil neglected to labour in it, wrote a Letter to him, wherein he complains of two Things: First, That he had not come to see him: Secondly, That he had abandoned, as one may say, the Church to its Enemies, by his Slothfulness and Negligence. St. Basil answered him, by Letter 262, That he could not come to see him, because of his Sickness, and that the thing which hindered his good Success, was not the want of Care; but because the Bishops did not agree among themselves, about Matters of Consequence, and he alone could not regulate Affairs, since the Canons did not allow one Bishop alone, to make Regulations of this Nature.

The Letter 265, is almost upon the same Subject. He wrote to him, that he ardently desired Peace, but then it must be a Real one. He advises him to take heed of those that seem to be Catholicks, and yet are not. He declares to him that he would never Communicate with those who did not receive the Nicene Faith, or who believed that the Holy Spirit was a Creature, because he was not willing to approach the Altar, with a Heart full of Dissimulation and Hypocrisy; that for this Reason, he had withdrawn from the Communion of Euvippus; That they ought to be Treated with all mildness, who had not received this Faith; That we should invite them to own it, and shew great Charity and Moderation to them: but that we ought never to be Trimmers, nor remain Neuters in Matters of Faith.

About the End of this Year, the Church of Antioch being afflicted with a rough Persecution, he wrote Letter 60, to comfort it. He proposes the Nicene Creed, as the Rule of Faith. He says, That the Divinity of the Holy Spirit was not there expressly determined, because it was not then directly opposed, but that we ought to condemn all those who admit a Creature in the Trinity.

The Letter 62, to the Church of Neocæsarea, is also of the same Nature; he Comforts it upon the Death of its Bishop. It was written before the foregoing Letter, and at the beginning of the Year. There are some other Letters of St. Basil, which probably were written the same Year 372. that have not so much reference to History.

We may place in this Number, the Letters 274, 275, 276, 277, 278, and 279, to the Governor Modestus, who began to be his Friend about this time. He prays him in this last, to preserve the exemptions of Priests and Deacons.

We may place also in this Time, the Letter 86, to Bosphorus, wherein St. Basil gives an account of the Difference which he had with his Predecessor, Dianius, Bishop of Cæsarea. He says that he had not anathematised him, but that he was extreamly troubled, when he understood, that this Bishop had Signed the Creed of Constantinople; and that for this Cause, he separated from him, but that he returned to his Communion before he died, when he declared, That he had Signed this Creed by Surprize, and without knowing any evil by it.

There is another Letter, wherein he speaks of this Bishop Bosphorus. It is Letter 300, addressed to the Nuns. There he confutes those who accused him of not receiving the Nicene Creed. He approves it, and yet confesses, that there are Catholicks who do not allow of the Word Consubstantial, because they believe that it has an ill Sense. He says, That they ought to be pardoned, because this Term did very much displease the Bishops, who condemned Paulus Samosatenus. He explains the good Sense of this Word, and the distinction of Hypostases. Lastly, he proves the Divinity and Equality of the Father and the Son.

St. Peter of Alexandria, having Succeeded St. Athanasius, in the Year 373, St. Basil did not fail to write to him immediately after his promotion to the Bishoprick. This Letter is the 320. He Congratulates his Exaltation, and exhorts him to follow the Footsteps of St. Athanasius.

Soon after this, Peter was forced away, and the Church of Alexandria was Persecuted most violently by the Arians. Immediately, St. Basil comforts them in a Letter, wherein he deplores their Misery. This Letter is the 71.

Amphilochius was ordained Bishop of Iconium at the End of the Year 372, as appears by the Eighth Letter of St. Basil. 'Twas therefore towards the end of the last Year, or rather at the Beginning of this, that St. Basil congratulated him by Letter 393, and 'twas certainly in 373, that he invited him by Letter 344, to the Feast of St. Eupsichius, which was September the 5th.

The 395, to the same, is also of the same Year. He acquaints him, that he had finished the Book of the Holy Spirit.

St. Baſil. The Letter 363, to Euſebius of Samoſata, was written before Eaſter of the ſame Year, during the ſharp Winter-Seaſon. St. Baſil acquaints him that he was dangerouſly Sick.

Towards the end of this Year, St. Euſebius of Samoſata, was baniſhed into Thrace, and St. Baſil wrote to him the Letters 9, and 251, to Comfort him in his Baniſhment; and the Letter 269, to his Nephew Antiochus, who accompanied his Uncle. The Clergy of Samoſata, being troubled by the Arians, and by the Diviſion of ſome particular Perſons, he Comforts them, and exhorts them to Peace by Letter 280, and praiſes the Senate of that City, by Letter 294. He wrote alſo to Otreius, Biſhop of Melitine, the Letter 316, where he ſpeaks of the Baniſhment of Euſebius.

It was towards the End of this Year, that St. Baſil wrote to the Biſhops of the Sea-Coaſts, and of the Iſles, the Letter 77, wherein he complains, that they had ſent no body to him for Relief in their Miſeries, and prays them to ſend their Deputies and Letters of Communion. 'Twas alſo about the ſame time, that he wrote the Letter 322, upon the ſame Subject to Elpidius. We may place alſo in the ſame time, the Letter 87, which he wrote to a Heretical Woman called Simplicia, who concerned her ſelf to make Remonſtrances to him. He tells her with ſome warmth, that it does not belong to her to judge: That he expected his Judgment from God, he adds, That he ſhould not want Witneſſes to juſtify his Conduct, and that he would not make uſe of Slaves or Eunuchs, whoſe Teſtimony ought not to be taken. He gives a dreadful Character of the Eunuchs of his time.

We cannot find a year wherein we can better place, than in, this, the Letter 184, to Palladius, and to Innocentius, Prieſts and Monks. He informs them, that he is a lover of Peace. He prays God to reſtrain the Authors of Diviſion, and recommends himſelf to their Prayers.

St. Baſil being recovered of his Sickneſs, which had tormented him during the two Winters of the years 373 and 374, went into Piſidia and Iſauria, to regulate the Affairs of thoſe Countries, as it appears by Letter 272. It was before this Journey that he wrote to Amphilochius, the Letter 396, wherein he acquaints him with his Diſeaſe, and prays him to delay their meeting for ſome Days; ſo it was alſo in the ſame Winter, that he wrote the firſt Canonical Letter to Amphilochius, which he could not ſend to him becauſe of his Sickneſs; and St. Amphilochius having ſent to him ſome more Queſtions, wherein he deſired to be informed, St. Baſil anſwered him by the Second, written in the beginning of the year 374. The laſt of theſe Letters was probably written towards the end of this year, after St. Gregory was retired from Nazianzum. We ſhall ſpeak ſeverally of theſe Letters.

The Affairs which he had in Piſidia, concerned the Churches of Iſaurus or Iſauria, which had been diſmembred from their own Province, to be joyned to the Churches of Piſidia and Lycaonia. St. Amphilochius, who was Biſhop of Iconium, the Metropolis of Lycaonia, had written about it to St. Baſil, and prayed him to come thither. This Saint, before he went into that Country, acquainted him by Letter 406, that he did well to take Care of theſe Churches; but yet he did not approve of the Deſign which he had of ſharing them amongſt many Biſhops, leſt the Dignity of a Biſhop ſhould thereby become contemptible. He ſays, that it would be better to chuſe one Man worthy of a Biſhoprick, who might take ſome Prieſts to his Aſſiſtance, than thus to divide a ſmall Territory into many Biſhopricks. He adviſes him to place Pariſh Prieſts in the Towns where there had formerly been Biſhops, before any Biſhop was Ordained, leſt if there ſhould be one Ordained before, he would not approve of this Regulation. In fine, he admoniſhes him to confine the Church of Iſauria within its own Bounds. He adds, That the Affairs of the Church of Nyſſa are in the ſame Condition, and that ſome of his Enemies were gone to Court. He ſubjoyns a Queſtion of Doctrine about the Opinion of Philo, who affirms, that Manna had all ſorts of Taſtes. He ſays, that this Opinion was grounded only upon a Jewiſh Tradition. He adverti ſes Amphilochius, that Sympius had ſent him a Letter of Communion, and that he had anſwered him. This Letter is probably the 398, directed to Amphilochius, but it could not be addreſs'd to him, ſince it appears by this Letter, that he to whom St. Baſil wrote, had been at difference with him, and was reconciled ſome time before, ſince he thanks him for his Reconciliation.

In all probability it was about this Affair of Iſauria, and ſome others of the like Nature, that St. Baſil went into Piſidia and Iſauria; and in the beginning of the year 374, from Piſidia he went to Pontus, a Canton whereof called Dazimone, was furiouſly troubled by Euſtathius of Sebaſte, who had perſuaded many Biſhops to ſeparate from the Communion of St. Baſil. This Saint thought to have found one of his Friends called Hilary, in that Country, but he was gone. He ſignifies in Letter 370, how much he was troubled, that he could not find him. He acquaints him alſo, that the Annomians and Semi-Arians hated him, and loaded him with Calumnies, becauſe of ſome Writings that were falſly attributed to him. In his return he went to ſee his antient place of retirement, near Neocæſarea, where his Brother Peter dwelt. The Inhabitants of Neocæſarea, St. Baſil. believing that he was come to concern himſelf about their Affairs, conceived an Averſion to him, and accus'd him of many things. To refute their Calumnies and undeceive them, he wrote to them three Letters upon this Occaſion.

The firſt, which is the 63, is addreſs'd to the Clergy. He ſays, that they were to blame, to accuſe him of Error, who themſelves propagated thoſe things which were aſſerted by none but Sabellius and Marcellus of Ancyra; that they could have but two Pretences for the Averſion they had teſtified againſt him; Firſt, the changing of the way of ſinging of Pſalms; and Secondly, the Affection which he had for thoſe that profeſs'd a Monaſtick Life. As to the laſt Accuſation, he ſays, that it was very much to his Advantage, that they had this Opinion of him, ſince there were Monks in Egypt, in Paleſtine, and in Meſopotamia; and Monaſteries of Nuns in all Places. As to the ſinging of the Prayers of the Church, he maintains, that in that he followed the antient Cuſtom of the Church; that on the great Feſtivals the People came before Day into the Church; that after Prayer they ſtood up to ſing in two Chorus's, which anſwered one another; that thus the Night was ſpent in ſinging and praying; that at break of Day all the Faithful rehears'd the Penitential Pſalms. He maintains, that this Cuſtom took place in Egypt, in Libya, in Phœnicia, in Paleſtine, in Syria. As to what they objected to him, that it was not in uſe in the time of St. Gregory Thaumaturgus, he anſwers them, that the Litanies or the Prayers which the Faithful uſed at Neocæſarea, were no more in uſe in his time, than this Cuſtom. He adds, that tho' he did not condemn them, yet he thought it more convenient to ask God's Pardon of Sins, by uſing the Words of the Holy Scripture, than employing thoſe of Men's deviſing. He maintains alſo, that it cannot be proved, that the ſinging of Pſalms was not uſed in St. Gregory's time. He blames them, becauſe they themſelves did not obſerve what this great Man did. He tells them, that he prayed with his Head uncovered; That he did not ſwear at all; That he did not reproach his Neighbour; That he did not bear Envy againſt him; That he was neither proud nor quarrelſome, &c. whereby he tacitly objects theſe Faults to thoſe of Neocæſarea. Towards the latter end, he admoniſhes them to lay aſide thoſe Innovations that had crept in amongſt them, to admit the three Hypoſtaſes in God, not to deny the Name of Jeſus Chriſt, and not to miſinterpret the Expreſſions of St. Gregory.

The 64. is directed to the moſt learned of this Church of Neocæſarea. There he deſcribes the Occaſion and Cauſe which obliged him to come near Neocæſarea. He accuſes them of Sabellianiſm, becauſe they admitted but one Hypoſtaſis. He anſwers what they had ſaid in a Letter addreſſed to Anthimus, wherein they alledged a Paſſage of St. Gregory Thaumaturgus, who ſays, That the Father and the Son were two by Conception, but one in Subſtance. He maintains, That this Father did not ſay this, as an Article of Faith; That this Expreſſion eſcaped him in the Heat of Diſputation, and that he never intended to explain his Doctrine about the Myſtery of the Trinity exactly, in a Treatiſe which was made for the Inſtruction of an Infidel. At laſt he aſſerts, that 'tis not ſufficient to ſay, that there are three Divine Perſons, unleſs it be added, that each of them has a particular Subſiſtence by it ſelf.

The Letter 75, is addreſſed to all the Faithful of Neocæſarea, whom he treats with more mildneſs. He complains of them, that having given credit to the Calumnies which were publiſhed againſt him, they had ſeparated from his Communion. He repreſents to them, That he was educated by his Grand-Mother Matrina, who had been amongſt them, and had been inſtructed in the Doctrine of St. Gregory of Neocæſarea; and that ſince that time, he had never Patroniſed the Arians; that he had Letters from St. Athanaſius, wherein he ſaid, That thoſe ſhould be received into Communion, who returned from their Error. St. Baſil adds, That he Communicated with all the Orthodox Churches, and ſo thoſe that would not Communicate with him, were ſeparated from the Church. In ſhort, He does not refuſe to be judged by a Synod. He would even ſubmit himſelf to their Judgment, but upon condition that they ſhould not lightly believe, but examine the Accuſations that were formed againſt him, and his Defences. There is in this Letter a very fine Sentence againſt Calumny. The 204th Letter to Euſtathius the Phyſician, was alſo written by St. Baſil, about the ſame time, to vindicate himſelf againſt thoſe that accuſed him of teaching, that there were Three Gods, becauſe he admitted Three Hypoſtaſes. He juſtifies this Doctrine, and proves the Divinity of the Holy Spirit. This Letter in ſome Manuſcripts is attributed to St. Gregory Nyſſen, and 'tis found among his Works; but 'tis rather St. Baſil's, than St. Gregory Nyſſen's, for it agrees better to him; the Stile is more like his, and the Doctrine is different from that of St. Gregory; ſince the Author of this Letter maintains, That the Soul of Samuel did really come from the inviſible State to ſpeak unto Saul; and St. Gregory expreſly teaches the contrary, in his Book of the Witch of Endor. In the 382, written to Olympas, he complains, that his Enemies had written againſt him, and had imputed imputed to him the Error and the Writings of Apollinarius. He confesses, That this Man was a Heretick. A Bishop named Eulancius had taken part against him with those of Neocæsarea; but he came to himself at last, and wrote to St. Basil, whom he thanks by Letter 281. He defends himself also from the Calumnies of Eustathius, in Letter 346. to Genethlius.

St. Basil being returned to Cæsarea, received there Letters from the East, wherein they acquaint him, that Paulinus's Party had received a Letter from the West, which confirmed to him the Bishoprick of Antioch. This Letter so raised the Spirits of those of that Party, that they would have forced every body else to sign a Confession of Faith, that they might be re-united with them. They did also shake Count Terentius, who had formerly been of Meletius's side, and would have obliged him to consent to this Union. St. Basil being informed of this News, wrote immediately to him the Letter 349, to persuade him not to abandon Meletius. He says, That those of the West were ignorant of the State of the Eastern Churches, and that they knew not the Reasons which St. Athanasius had to Communicate with Paulinus. He declares, That he accuses no Man; That he desires nothing but Peace; That he congratulates those who had brought these Letters from Rome; but that he could not forsake Meletius and his Church, to joyn with a Party that had caused the Schism. Lastly, He refutes the Opinion of those of that side, who admitted but One Hypostasis in the Trinity.

He sent an account immediately to Antiochus, who was at Samosata, of all that had been done since the beginning of this year, and a Relation of what he had learnt from Antioch: This Letter is the 272. About the same time, the Priest Dorotheus, who was gone into the West, contrary to the Counsel of St. Basil, returned into the East, very much dissatisfied with the manner of Treatment that he had met with from Damasus; who reckoned Meletius and Eusebius of Samosata among the Arians. Peter of Alexandria who was then at Rome, wrote about it to St. Basil, signifying to him, That he was troubled that he had received no News from the East, and that Dorotheus had not satisfyed the Bishops of the West. St. Basil answered him by Letter 321, wherein having excused himself for not writing to him before, he complains of the Conduct of Damasus, excuses Dorotheus, and justifies Meletius and Eusebius of Samosata. Some time after St. Basil advises St. Amphilochius by Letter 403, to send a Man of Gravity and Judgment into Lycia, to enquire into the Inclinations of the Bishops of that Country; because he was assured, that they were for the most part Orthodox, and desired nothing more than a reunion with them. He names to him those whom he certainly knew to be Catholicks, to be first consulted. He thanks God that Asia was purged from the Poison of Heresie, and exhorts Amphilochius to take care of his Church. The Letters 402, and 403, to the same Amphilochius, are written in the same year, before the 5th. of September.

About the end of this year, Demosthenes, Lieutenant to the Pretorian Prefect, renewed the Persecution against the Churches of Asia. He caused a pretended Council to be assembled at Ancyra, wherein he procured Hipsius to be turned out, and Ecdicius the Arian to be Ordained in his room.

Demosthenes came afterwards to Nyssa, to force away from thence St. Gregory, whom he would have arrested, under pretence that he wasted the Church's Money. St. Basil thought himself obliged on this occasion to write for his Brother to Demosthenes in the name of all the Bishops of his Province. He gives him to understand, That if he would treat about the Money, the Treasurers were ready to give him an Account of it; but if he accused him of Ecclesiastical Matters, that he himself would examine it, and that he should not send his Brother to be judged out of his own Country. He wrote also the Letter 358. to Abycrius, wherein he prays him to assist his Brother. This happened about Christmass in the year 374; for St. Amphilochius having sent Presents to St. Basil at the time of this Festival, St. Basil thanks him by Letter 404, and tells him, that his Brother was forced to fly.

Demosthenes was not satisfied with forcing away St. Gregory Nyssen upon the Accusation of a profligate Person, but called a Synod of the Bishops of Galatia and Pontus at Nyssa; wherein he got a Bishop Ordained in the room of St. Gregory. From thence the same Bishops went to Sebastea, to place one of their own Party at Nicopolis in the room of Theodorus, who was dead. They chose one Pronto, but the Nicopolitans would not receive him. This happened in the beginning of the year 375; and St. Basil wrote an account of it to Eusebius of Samosata by the Letters 264, and 16. In this last Letter he complains of the Pride of the Bishops of the West, and says, That their Faith was suspected by him, since they acted as they had done formerly, with reference to Marcellus of Ancyra. In the Letter 405, to St. Amphilochius, he describes and deplores the Misery of the Churches; and says, That Asclepius was killed because he would not communicate with Hereticks. And he does the same in the Letter 248. to Elpidius. He speaks also of the unhappy State of the Church in Letter 266. In Letter 297. written to those of Chalcis, he exhorts them to continue firm and constant in the time of Persecution; He tells them, that it was violent in the East, and that it threatned Cappadocia. The Letters 298, and 299, to those of Berœa, are upon the same subject, as well as 303; wherein he comforts the Monks that suffered for the Faith. He says, That their Sufferings shall not be less recompenced than those of the antient Martyrs. We must joyn to these the 326, and 327, addressed to Barsis Bishop of Edessa; who was banished, and the 306. to Eustathius of Himmeria.

St. Basil.

He wrote at the same time the 72. against Eustathius of Sebastea, addressed to the Edessenians. There he describes the lightness and changes of this Heretick; and there he speaks of a pretended Council held at Ancyra at the end of the year 374.

The 73. is written against the same Person and at the same time; for there he observes, That it was now three years since he was accused by Eustathius. He says, That he was unjustly blamed upon the account of the Errors of a Person [Apollinarius] to whom he never wrote but once, and that it was now twenty years since he did it; That those who accused him, did it to please the Powers, to whom they are, and always have been devoted; That the true Reason why Eustathius and those of his Party were offended with him, was not because he refused to receive their Suffragans, as they pretended, but because they would please Euzoius; That they were joyned to the Eudoxians, and called the Orthodox Homo-ousians, though they had formerly made Profession of this Faith, and had also presented it to the Synod of Tyana. Lastly, That they had destroyed the Churches which they had invaded. He concludes this Letter with a Profession of Faith, which rejects the Errors of Arius and Sabellius.

The Letters 190, 191, 192, are written to the People and Clergy of Nicopolis, to comfort and exhort them in the Persecution which they suffered during this year 375, after the Death of their Bishop. In the last he declares to them, that they ought not to acknowledge him for their Bishop, whom the Arians had Ordained among them, tho' he calls himself Catholick, which he cannot be, being Ordained by the Hands of prophane Persons, for the Destruction of the Faith: That this was his Opinion, which, if they would hold Communion with him, they should follow; 'Which he had 'written to them, says he, not that he distrusted them, but 'to remove the doubt of some, and that if any Person should 'get himself Ordained Priest by this Bishop, he should have 'no hope to continue for the future in this Dignity.

Pœmenius Bishop of Satala, went after this to visit the Church of Nicopolis, about the end of this year, or the beginning of the next, and confirmed them in the Resolution of taking a Bishop, and counselled them to choose Euphronius, Bishop of Colonia. St. Basil approved of this Choice by Letter 193, and admonished them not to irritate those of Colonia, who were mightily troubled for the Loss of their Bishop. These he comforted by the Letters 290, 291, wherein, after having praised the Zeal and Affection they had for their Bishop, he shews them, that this Translation was necessary for the good of the Church, and exhorts them not to contest the matter with the Church of Nicopolis, since that Church was their Metropolis, and what respected it concerned them also. In the Letter 164. he exhorts the Nicopolitans continually to adhere and submit to the Bishop which had been lately sent among them.

While the Eastern Churches were tost with these Tempests, those of the West being at last moved with some Compassion for them, sent Priests to Comfort them, and to Testifie, that they did Sympathize with them in their Sorrows. St. Epiphanius, Bishop of Cyprus, who perhaps had seen the 77th. Letter of St. Basil, did the same. St. Basil thanks the former by Letter 74, which is written in the Name of all the Eastern Bishops, and he continues still to desire their Assistance, not so much against the Arians, as against those who under Sheep's cloathing were Ravenous Wolves, and rent the Flock of Christ in pieces without Punishment. He accuses Three Persons in particular. Eustathius of Sebastea is the First; and to render him Odious, he Describes all his Life, and says, That he was instructed by Arius, and was one of his most wicked Disciples at Alexandria; That being returned to Cæsarea, and seeing himself condemned by his Bishop Hermogenes, he had signed an Orthodox Confession of Faith, and afterwards was Ordained Priest; but then after the Death of Hermogenes, he went to Constantinople, where he again made profession of Arianism under Eusebius; That being driven out of this City, he returned into his own Country, where he was forced to retire; That soon after he was made Bishop purely by chance, and then he presently condemned the Nicene Creed in the Council of Ancyra; That the Party whom he joyned with at Seleucia, was known to all Men; That at Constantinople he Consented to the Creed of the Heretiocks; That at last being gone into the West, he carried from Liberius Communicatory Letters to the Synod of Tyana, by means whereof he was restored; that it was not known what Liberius had obliged him to Sign; but presently after he became the Patron of the Hereticks, who opposed the Divinity of the Holy Spirit, and persecuted the Orthodox. The Second whom St. Baſil accuſed to the Weſtern Biſhops, was Apollinarius, whom he ſpared more than he had done Euſtathius; yet he ſays that he had very much troubled the Churches, becauſe he had ſo great a Facility of Writing, that he had filled the World with his Books; That in ſo great a number of Writings, Some Errors could not but creep in; That what he had written of Theology, was not founded upon Scripture, but upon Human Reaſoning; That he had written Fabulous Things of the Reſurrection; That he hath ſo perplexed the Doctrine of the Incarnation, that few of his Acquaintance have retained the Form of antient Doctrine, but on the contrary almoſt all of them have buſied themſelves with uſeleſs and contentious queſtions. Laſtly, Paulinus was very much eſteemed by thoſe of the Weſt; yet St. Baſil ſpares him not, for he is the Third Perſon whom he accuſes in this Letter. He leaves it to the Biſhops of the Weſt to judge, whether his Ordination was lawful or no: But he adds, That that which vexed the moſt part of the Eaſtern Biſhops againſt him, was his following the Error of Marcellus of Ancyra, whereby he maintained, that the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, were but One Hypoſtaſis. He deſires Aſſiſtance of thoſe of the Weſt againſt thoſe who followed theſe Three Men, and prays them to ſend Letters, wherein they might declare, That thoſe who are of their Party ought not to be received into Communion, until they have renounced their Errors. He concludes with ſaying, that it were to be wiſhed, that the Eaſtern and Weſtern Biſhops could aſſemble together to Conſult about thoſe things: but ſince the preſent juncture of Affairs would not permit them to do it, and a Buſineſs of this Nature would not admit any longer delay, they were content to ſend ſome of their Brethren to their Weſtern Brethren, to inform them of that which could not be put into a Letter, and to invite them to aſſiſt the Churches of Jeſus Chriſt. Father Combefis ſays, that it is obſerved in ſome Manuſcripts, that this Letter was never ſent; but we ought not to give much credit to thoſe Kind of Obſervations made by Tranſcribers.

The Letter 325. to St. Epiphanius, is alſo Written to thank him, that he had ſent ſome Prieſts to Viſit and comfort the Churches of the Eaſt: he ſignifies to him, that his Carriage deſerved ſo much the more acknowledgment, becauſe it was a rare thing to find Biſhops at that Time, who had Compaſſion on their Brethren. And becauſe St. Epiphanius had written to him, that he was troubled for the Difference which was riſen in a certain Country which he calls Eleona, St. Baſil anſwers in this Letter, that he had reaſon to wiſh that this Breach were healed; but that he would not have ſuch People made uſe of, who are fit for nothing but to embroil Matters, becauſe they were not acted by the Love of God. ('Tis probable that he ſpeaks of Paulinus's Party.) He adds, that there had been already ſent into that Country, Palladius, a Prieſt of Cæſarea, and Innocentius, a Prieſt of Rome, to ſatisfy the Demands of thoſe of this Country, and determine their Differences, which were probably about the Incarnation; That they had been told, that nothing muſt be added to the Nicene Creed, but the Doxology of the Holy Spirit; That he would add nothing about the Incarnation, becauſe thoſe queſtions tranſcended the Capacity of his Underſtanding. He ſets it down for a Maxim, That when once Men depart from the Simplicity of Faith, by reaſoning about it, then there is no end of the Diſpute, and all the Queſtions which they Handle, ſerve for no other uſe but to trouble the minds of the Humble. Afterwards he exhorts St. Epiphanius, to joyn with Meletius, and aſſures him that St. Athanaſius intended to do it, and that their Union was retarded only by the Malicious Counſel of ſome particular Perſon. He confeſſes, That he did not communicate with thoſe that were after Meletius, that is to ſay, with Paulinus, and thoſe of his Party, not becauſe he thought them unworthy of his Communion, but becauſe they condemned Meletius, in whom there was nothing to be reprehended. He praiſes St. Epiphanius, becauſe he acknowledged Three Hypoſtaſes. He exhorts him to cauſe his Brethren of Antioch, to confeſs the ſame thing, if they had not already acknowledged it. He prays him to procure the Peace of that Church, by re-uniting the Two Parties. Laſt of all, he ſpeaks to him about the Errors of a Sect of Hereticks, called Maguſæans, concerning which St. Epiphanius, had deſired of him ſome Account.

The Letter 55. to St. Ambroſe, was at the ſame time, and probably was ſent by the Deputies, who carried Letter 74, into the Weſt. He writes to him, that he had known of a long time his Judgment, Learning and Virtue; That he bleſſed God for drawing from the Court, a Man Illuſtrious for his Wiſdom, his Dignity and Eloquence, to charge him with the Government of Chriſt's Flock. He exhorts him wholly to extinguiſh the remainders of Arianiſm, if there was any in his Dioceſs, and prays him to continue the Friendſhip which they had begun. Theſe Letters are written at the beginning of the Year 376. 'Twas in this Year alſo that he wrote the Letter 293, to Eulogius, and to the other Biſhops of Egypt that were baniſhed into Paleſtine: 'Tis againſt Apollinarius and Marcellus of Ancyra, whom he charges with the ſame Errors which he had ſpoken of in Letter 74.

The Letter 295, to the Monks, might alſo be at the ſame time, as well as the Letters 337, 338, 339, to Aſcolius, of Theſſalonica. St. Baſil.

The Letter 182. written alſo in the Name of the Churches of the Eaſt to the Weſtern Biſhops, was in the Year 377, or 378. For the Eaſtern Biſhops who deſcribe there in a moſt Elegant manner, the Perſecution which they ſuffered, obſerve that it had laſted 13 Years: But it could not begin before the end of the Year 364, or till 365. They implore in this Letter the Aſſiſtance of the Biſhops of the Weſt, which they declare they had in vain expected and deſired for a long Time.

We refert to thoſe two laſt Years of the Life of St. Baſil, ſome Letters of Doctrine and Diſcipline, the time whereof is not certainly known, but which ſeem to be written towards the end of his Life. We may place in this number the 65, to thoſe of Joſopolis, which is written againſt thoſe who affirmed, That Jeſus Chriſt brought a Body from Heaven, reviving hereby the Error of Valentinus, and who attributed to the Divinity of Jeſus Chriſt the Properties of the human Nature. He refutes their Errors, and proves that Jeſus Chriſt had real Fleſh. He ſpeaks alſo of Redemption by Jeſus Chriſt, and of the Fall of Man by the Sin of Adam.

The 195, to Diodorus then Biſhop of Tarſus, was Written before the Second Letter to Amphilochius wherein it is cited at Canon 63. There a Queſtion of Importance is handled, viz. Whether it be lawful for a Man to Marry his Wife's Siſter after her Death? A Man of St. Baſil's Dioceſs had done it, and alledged for his Juſtification a Letter of Diodorus who defended his Action. St. Baſil anſwers it in this Letter, and oppoſes to Diodorus the Cuſtom of the Church which did not at all permit it. He anſwers a paſſage of Leviticus, Ch. 18. which ſeems to allow theſe Marriages. He anſwers, I ſay, Firſt, That though that were ſo, yet there are many things forbidden in the Goſpel, which the Law permitted; and Secondly, That the Levitical Law does not indeed forbid, but neither does it poſitively allow theſe kind of Marriages. He adds, that if it is not lawful to a Son to Marry his Mother-in-Law, nor for a Father to eſpouſe his Daughter-in-Law, neither ought it to be allowed to a Man to Marry his Siſter-in-Law, no more than to a Woman to Marry the Brother or the next-a-kin to her Husband; becauſe Man and Wife are ſo cloſely united by Marriage, that the Kindred of one become the Kindred of the other. He would not have them object that paſſage of Geneſis, Encreaſe and Multiply, becauſe it does not reſpect the New Teſtament. He obſerves, That Second Marriages are a Remedy againſt Fornication, and not an inlet to immoderate Luſt.

The following Letter to Patergorius is upon a like Subject. He admoniſhes this Prieſt who was 70. years old, to put away a Maid that lived with him, as was ordained by the Canon of the Council of Nice. He proteſts, that tho' he ſhould write to him an hundred Letters, he ſhould always continue ſuſpended from his Miniſtry, 'till he had put her away; and that if notwithſtanding this, he would ſtill intrude upon the Exerciſe of his Office, without amending this Fault, he ſhould be Excommunicated, and ſo ſhould thoſe alſo that received him.

We may joyn to theſe two Letters, the 76. Epiſtle of St. Baſil, to the Biſhops under his Juriſdiction, wherein he reproves a thing which was practiſed by ſome of them, who under Pretence of Piety, received the Money which was offered them by thoſe whom they Ordained. He condemns this Practice as Simonaical, and threatens to depoſe thoſe that ſhould do it for the future. He obſerves, that thoſe Biſhops excuſed themſelves from Simony, becauſe they received not this Money before Ordination, but only after it. But, ſays he, to receive Money before or after, is always to receive it, and under what Pretence ſoever they do it, they always make a gain of Spiritual Gifts: Now to do this in the Church of God, wherein we believe, that we have the Body and Blood of Jeſus Chriſt; to do this there, I ſay, is a ſhameful Traffick. Theſe are the very Words of St. Baſil; I add nothing to them.

The 203, and 204, are addreſſed to thoſe of Tarſus. In them he ordains, That the Macedonians in order to their Reception into the Church, ſhould make profeſſion of the Nicene Faith; and he anathematizes all thoſe that believed the Holy Spirit to be a mere Creature.

The 244, is againſt a certain Biſhop who neglected to puniſh a Rape. He enjoyns him to cauſe ſearch to be made after the Maid; to reſtore her to her Parents; to declare him Excommunicated who had raviſhed her; to throw him out of the Church, him and his Family, for the ſpace of three years; not to ſuffer him to be preſent at the publick Prayers; and in caſe he ſhould ſculk in ſome little Village, with the Woman he had raviſhed, and the Inhabitants would not deliver them, or would defend them, that then they alſo ſhould be interdicted Divine Offices. In the 345, he ſpeaks of a crafty Man, who being ſummoned before the Eccleſiaſtical Tribunal, defended himſelf with ſo much Eloquence, that he made himſelf paſs for an innocent Man. In the 245. he ſpeaks of the manner of Excommunication in his time;

he says, That the Sinner ought first to be rebuked privately. Secondly, in the presence of two Witnesses; and lastly, ought to be accused to the Church; and if he did not then obey, he ought to be Excommunicated. He says, That his Soul was set upon it to separate this Impostor, him and all his Family out of the Church.

The Letter 289. addressed to Cæsarea, a Lady, is about frequent Communion. He begins it with declaring, that it is good and profitable to Communicate every day. He says, That in his own Church there was a Communion four times a-Week, on Sunday, Wednesday, Friday and Saturday, and also on other Days, when the Anniversary of some Martyr is celebrated; That in former times the Faithful themselves Communicated in their Houses, and that this Custom cannot be blamed. That it is still in use in Egypt and at Alexandria, where the Faithful carry the Communion to their Houses; That all the Hermits do the same thing; That we must believe, that the Priest having offered the Sacrifice, and distributed the Eucharist to those that are present, tho' they take it one after another in parcels, yet 'tis always the same. For, says he, in the Church it self, the Priest gives one part of it into the Hands of the Faithful, and they put it into their Mouth; and is not this the same thing, as for them to receive all at once many parts of it from the Hand of the Priest?

It was in one of the last years of his Life, that he invited the Bishops of Pontus, by Letter 291, to come to his Synod which he held at the Feast of St. Eupsychius. There is also a Letter, which is the 337, wherein he blames one of his Suffragans, because he did not come to this Synod, and orders him to come thither for the future. In Letter 302. he commends a Lady called Theodora, whom he calls a Nun: wherein he observes, That 'tis an easy thing to embrace that kind of Life which is conformable to the Gospel, but 'tis not so easy to observe it even in the smallest things, to do nothing but to please God, to preserve her Modesty always in all her Conversation and Behaviour, to eat no more but what is precisely necessary, and to keep nothing that is superfluous: That 'tis not sufficient to attain a perfect Humility, not to be lifted up when we are admired or commended, or when we have some Excellency either of Mind or Body; but in order to Perfection, we must preserve an inviolable Purity, we must pray continually and fervently; in short, we must have Charity for our Brethren, a contrite Heart and an humble Spirit; we must manage our Austerities with Discretion, and always have the Thoughts of a future Judgment present before our Eyes.

The 317. to a Bishop named Optimus, contains an Explication of that Passage of Genesis, Whosoever shall kill Cain, &c. where he first gives the natural Sense of it, affirming, that this passage means only, That whosoever should kill Cain, should deliver him from the Vengeance of God which was seven times more severe than Death. He enlarges afterwards upon the Mystical Sense, and upon the Signification of the number seven, which he takes to denote Remission of Sins. He finds out seven Sins in the Actions of Cain, and seven Punishments of his Sins. He refutes those that think that Lamech killed Cain, and says, That when 'tis said in Genesis, Whosoever shall kill Lamech, &c. the meaning is, that Lamech was more guilty than Cain, because that he having before him the Example of God's Vengeance against a Murderer, was not thereby deterred from this Crime. He adds another Mystical Explication, that for the Expiation of Lamech's Crime, there was not only a necessity of the Deluge which happened in the seventh Generation after Cain, but also of the Death of Jesus Christ which happened seventy seven Generations after Lamech. At last he explains that Passage of the Gospel, wherein Simeon tells the Virgin when he saw the Infant Jesus, That a Sword should pierce thro' her Heart; where, by a Sword he understands the Anxiety and Trouble of Mind, that the Virgin was to endure during the Passion of Jesus Christ. As these Explications will not be relished by all the World, so St. Basil gave them only for the Satisfaction of that good Bishop who had consulted him.

In the 323. to Nectarius, St. Basil admonishes him to hinder all Canvassing at the Election of the Bishops.

In the 335. he congratulates the Bishop Sophronius, because he continued in the Simplicity of the Faith of his Ancestors. He says, That to maintain this Simplicity we must revive the Credit of the Primitive Christians; but now there were few Persons that were free from Curiosity, and would confine themselves to that Simplicity of Faith, which teaches us to believe in the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit.

In the 340. he reproves a Suffragan Bishop, called Timotheus, for concerning himself about Civil Affairs, after he had embraced a Monastick Life. The 343, and 344, are addressed to a Monk called Orbicius; in the second he refutes the Error of those who affirm that the Divinity of Jesus Christ was changed into his Flesh.

The 383. to a Superior, treats of the manner how he should admit a Person who would make Profession of a Monastick Life: He orders him to receive him according to the Rules of the Holy Fathers, after he had taught him to understand the Obligations, the Duties and the Troubles of a Monastick Life.

St. Basil.

In Letter 387. he prefers the Creed of the Council of Nice to all the Creeds that had been made since that Council. He says, That it did not expresly determine the Divinity of the Holy Spirit, because no body had then expresly opposed it; and then he proves that the Holy Spirit is not a Creature.

In the 388. he informs Callisthenes, That he was not obliged to keep the Oath which he had made in heat of Passion to punish his Servants.

In the 391. to Amphilochius, he answers many Questions which this Bishop had put to him. First, he explains that Passage of the Gospel, No Man knoweth of the Day of Judgment, but the Father only; and says, that the Sense of this place is, that the Father knows it of himself, because he is the Fountain and first Principle of this Knowledge, whereas the Son of God receives this Knowledge from his Father, in which sense 'tis also said, That there is none good but God only. He explains in what sense the Scepter was always in the Tribe of Judah, tho' it be said, that Jechonias was the last of the Princes of David's Family. He refutes the Opinion of the Encratites, who affirmed, That it was unlawful to eat of some kind of Meats. He says, That the Triple Immersion observed in Baptism is a Figure of the Three Days that Jesus Christ was in the Sepulchre. He distinguishes Essence from Subsistence; He gives to the three Hypostases of the Divine Persons, the Names of Paternity, Filiation and Sanctification; He condemns those that admit but One Hypostasis, as being not far off from the Heresie of the Sabellians. At last, he says, That Corporeal and Temporal Goods, are not good in themselves, tho' they ought to be preferred to the Evils that are opposite to them: But he averrs that God sends these good things according as he thinks fit for the Good of Men: That there is such a just Man to whom these Evils are necessary, that he may be just; and there is another just Man to whom God gives these Temporal Good Things for a Recompence; and there is such a Wicked Man to whom God denies them, because they would harden him; but there are other bad Men to whom he gives them in order to their Conversion.

In the 399, to the same Person, he says, That the Spirit of a Man is good of it self; but it can apply it self to Good or Evil, and to that which is indifferent; That 'tis given to it to know the Truth; That God is this Truth which it ought to know; And, that he is to be known as far as an infinite Being can be known by a finite Mind. This Letter is against the Error of Aëtius, who believed, that the Essence of God might be perfectly known.

In the following Letter he proposes also one of the Sophisms of this Heretick, who thus objected to the Catholicks: Do you know whom you adore? If you say that you know him, What then is his Substance? If you know him not, How then do you adore him? St. Basil answers, That the Attributes and Operations of God may be known, but we cannot comprehend his Essence nor his Nature: That by Faith we believe his Existence, which also may be known by his Power and its Effects, and yet both Faith and Reason teach us that he is Incomprehensible.

In the 401. he solves also another Sophism of Aëtius, who ask'd Whether Knowledge were before Faith, or Faith before Knowledge. He answers, That Knowledge is the Principle of Faith, because the Existence of God is known by the Creatures; and Faith follows this imperfect Knowledge, as Adoration follows Faith. He proves also, that the Works of God and the Effects of his Power may be known, but that we cannot perfectly know his Essence. He explains many Significations of the Word Know. In the 408. Letter, he speaks of the Relicks of the Martyrs, as well as in 241.

In the 410. he says, That we ought to be content with the Faith, which we made Profession of at our Baptism, and to confine our selves to the Words that are taken out of the Holy Scripture for expressing it; That we should shun all new Expressions, because our Salvation does not depend upon the Words, but the Orthodox Faith.

The 412. is against a Deacon named Glycerius, who had got into Orders, to serve the Cure of a Church in Venesa, together with a Priest. This Deacon after he was Ordained had neglected his Ministry and had gathered together a multitude of Virgins, to whom he had made himself Patriarch: For St. Basil makes use of this very Term, and says, That he had taken upon him the Habit: St. Basil adds, That he did not this for Piety, nor Devotion, but to get Money; That thus he had disturbed the Church to which he belonged, and despised the Parish-Priest that Governed it: That being reproved for this Disorder by the Parish-Priest and the Bishop, he had fled with a Company of Virgins and Young Men, himself being at the head of them; That this happened when there was an Assembly of Bishops in the place, and that he had abused the Parents who demanded their Daughters back again. St. Basil prays him to whom he sent this Letter, who had writ-

St. Baſil. ten to him in favour of this Deacon, to perſuade him to return, to ſend back the Virgins, or at leaſt not to detain thoſe by force who deſired to return. He promiſes alſo Pardon to Glycerius, if he returned with a Letter from him to whom he wrote, and a Reſolution to behave himſelf more Modeſtly; if not, he declares him Suſpended from his Function.

In the following Letter he ſtill preſſes this Friend to procure the Return of Glycerius, and the Young Women whom he had carried away with him, and bids tell them, That they needed fear nothing. At laſt, in the laſt Letter ſuperſcribed to this Glycerius, he exhorts him to return, and promiſes to Pardon his Fault upon their Account that had begged it for him; and chiefly for the ſake of his Pariſh-Prieſt, who had interceded for him. He declares, That he ſhould loſe the Dignity of a Deacon, if he abſented himſelf any longer.

The 417, is written to a Judge, upon a Robbery that was committed in his Church. Some Garments of the Poor were taken away, and the Robbers were diſcovered by thoſe that looked after the Fabrick of the Church; whereupon St. Baſil condemned them to make Reſtitution. Nevertheleſs, they were accus'd before this Judge; and St. Baſil wrote to him, That he had judged them, and that the Cognizance and Puniſhment of any thing that happened in Churches, belonged to Biſhops.

The 418, and 419, are written to a Receiver of the Taxes, to pray to him to relieve the Poor.

Theſe are all the Letters of St. Baſil, which concern Religion; The others are Letters of Civility, of Recommendation, or Conſolation, which have no reſpect to the Affairs of the Church; of which I ſhall here give you a Catalogue.

The Letters of Civility, of Compliment and Congratulation, &c. are the 83, the 142, and thoſe that follow to the 164; the 169, and ſo on to the 181; the 12[illegible] and ſo on to the 244; the 248, 268, 282, 283, 285, 286, 287, 288, and 312; the 328, &c. to 335; the 341, 350, 351, 354, 355, 356, 359, 363, 369, 378, 384, 386, 389, 390, 407, 425, and 426, and the three Letters of Libanius and St. Baſil, publiſhed by Cotelerius.

Thoſe of Recommendation or Requeſt, are the 11, 84, 215, &c. to 220, 221, 232, 236, 237, 247, 248, 267, 333, 352, 353, 357, 360, 365, 366, 367, 373, 374, 375, 376, 377, 380, 381, 415, 416, 420, 421, 422, 423, 424, 427, 428; and the two publiſhed by Cotelerius.

The Letters of Conſolation are 186, 188, 189, 201, 202, 347, 362. I ſay nothing of the Letter to the Emperor Theodoſius, publiſhed by Cotelerius; becauſe 'tis evidently Suppoſititious. All theſe Letters are written very pleaſantly, and they may be compared for their Stile and Wit, to thoſe of the moſt able Writers of Letters.

We have reſerved the Letters of St. Baſil to Amphilochius, to be particularly treated of, becauſe they contain Deciſions upon principal Points of Diſcipline, which are not to be conſidered as the particular Opinions of St. Baſil, but as the Laws of the Church in his time: And therefore they are not written in the form of particular Letters, but after the manner of Synodal Deciſions, which are called Canons.

The 1ſt. of theſe Canons is concerning the Validity or Invalidity of the Baptiſm of Hereticks. St. Amphilochius had asked him particularly, whether it was neceſſary to rebaptize thoſe who had been baptized by the Novatians, or the Montaniſts? He anſwers him, That as to the firſt of thoſe Hereticks, he ſhould follow the Cuſtom of the Churches where he lived; becauſe there were different Opinions upon that Subject. As to the baptiſm of the Montaniſts, he believed that it could not be accounted Valid, and he wonders that the great St. Denys of Alexandria, who was ſo well ſkilled in the Canons, could be Ignorant of this Truth. To explain his Anſwer, he diſtinguiſhes Three ſorts of Perſons that were divided from the Church; The Hereticks who differed in Matters of Faith, the Schiſmaticks who ſeparated upon Points of Diſcipline, and ſome of the Diſobedient Chriſtians who withdrew from the Church. He maintains, that the Ancients were perſuaded that the Baptiſm of Hereticks was abſolutely Void; He adds, that the Pepuzians were Hereticks, and therefore their Baptiſm could not be Valid. As for Schiſmaticks, he obſerves, That St. Cyprian and Firmilian ſubjected them to the ſame Law with Hereticks, becauſe being ſeparated from the Church, they had not the Holy Spirit, and ſo could not give it. He ſeems alſo to like this Opinion well enough: And yet he adds, That ſince the Biſhops of Aſia had thought it convenient to admit the Baptiſm of Schiſmaticks, he would not hinder it. But though the Encratites were Schiſmaticks, he declares, that their Baptiſm ought not to be approved, and that thoſe ought to be rebaptized, to whom they had given Baptiſm, becauſe they gave it with Precipitation, on purpoſe to hinder the receiving of it from the Church. Nevertheleſs he confeſſes, that if the contrary Cuſtom were eſtabliſhed, it ought to be followed; and that the Deciſions of the Ancients ſhould be obſerved. In ſhort, he recommends this upon the whole Matter, That none of thoſe who returned to the Church, ſhould be permitted to approach the Holy Myſteries, 'till they had received the Unction. St. Baſil. [That is, 'till they were Confirmed.]

In the 2d. Canon, St. Baſil condemns to a Penance of 10. years, a Woman that had procured an Abortion, and he judges her to be guilty of Murder, whether the Child had Life or no. He obſerves, that the time of Abſolution ſhould be regulated by the fervour of the Penance, as well as by the length of it.

In the 3d. Canon he declares, That if a Deacon commits Adultery, after he has been received into the Order of Deacon, he ought to be turned out of his Miniſtry: but he would not have him put under Penance, nor ſeparated from the Communion of the Laity, becauſe we ought not to puniſh the ſame Fault twice, and a Clergyman is ſufficiently puniſhed by his Depoſition, and ſo much more than a Layman who is deprived of Communion, becauſe he can be readmitted afterwards into the Church; whereas a Clergyman cannot be reſtored when once he is depos'd: But in concluſion, the moſt Effectual Remedy of all Sins, is to forſake Sin, and abſtain from Pleaſure.

The 4th. Canon is concerning thoſe that are many times Married. He condemns 3d. Marriages as a kind of Fornication; and ſays, That the Cuſtom of his Church, was to Excommunicate thoſe who Married the third time, for Five Years; That in other places, they were only put under Penance for two or three Years. He enjoyns the ſame thing to Bigamiſts, for one or two Years; though he would have neither the one nor the other reduced to the loweſt Penance; but that they ſhould be the firſt Years in the Rank of Hearers; and that the laſt Years they ſhould partake of the Prayers, though they were ſtill excluded from the participation of the Euchariſt, till their Penance was finiſhed, and they had given Signs of their Converſion.

In the 5th. he ordains, That Hereticks ſhould be received who were converted at the Point of Death, provided they gave Signs of their ſincere Repentance.

The 6th. is againſt Concubinage.

The 7th. is againſt Murders, Poiſoning, Adulteries, and againſt other more infamous Crimes. St. Baſil ſays, That all who are guilty of theſe Crimes, are to be treated with the ſame Rigor. However he thinks that we ought to have Pity on thoſe who have done Penance for Thirty Years, and that we ſhould receive them without delay; eſpecially if they ſtill bewailed their Sins, and gave ſigns of Converſion.

In the 8th. Canon St. Baſil treats very largely of Murders, and diſtinguiſhes the different Kinds of them, as well thoſe that are Voluntary, as thoſe that are Involuntary. This Canon is more Curious than Uſeful.

The 9th. Canon is about Divorce. He lays it down as a Principle, That the Law of Jeſus Chriſt is equal both to Men and Women, and that it does not allow of the Separation of a Man and his Wife, but in caſe of Fornication: But he ſays, That the preſent Cuſtom is not altogether agreeable to the Law of Chriſt, becauſe it does not allow Women to Separate from their Husbands upon any account whatſoever; ſo that it ſeems to excuſe from Adultery a Woman that ſhould Eſpouſe a Man whoſe Wife had divorced herſelf; but on the contrary, if it was a Husband that quitted his Wife to Eſpouſe another, that Man ſhould commit Adultery, both he that Married to this laſt Woman, and ſhe that was Eſpouſed to him.

In the 10th. St. Baſil is againſt Ordaining thoſe who had Sworn never to take Orders, though there be, ſays he, a Canon which ſeems to permit it; but he obſerves, that we muſt conſider the Form of the Oath, the terms in which it was conceived, the Diſpoſition of the Perſon that made it, and all the leſſer Circumſtances, to ſee whether he is obliged by his Oath or no; and if no way can be found to diſpenſe with it, then he ought not to be Ordained. After this, he explains a particular Queſtion which had been propos'd to him by Amphilochius; as far as it can be diſcovered by St. Baſil's Anſwer, it ſeems to have been this.

One Cyriacus a Prieſt of the Church of Mindana, whereof Longinus was Biſhop, was obliged by Oath never to quit that Church; yet he was made Pariſh-Prieſt to a Village very near it, which was in another Dioceſs. Longinus ſeeing himſelf deprived of a Prieſt who did very much aſſiſt him, earneſtly deſired his Return, and ſaid, That unleſs he returned to him, he ſhould quit his Church. 'Tis alſo probable, that the Prieſt had ſome remorſe of Conſcience for having violated his Oath. Amphilochius demands of St. Baſil, what was to be done in theſe Circumſtances? and this Saint gave an Advice full of Wiſdom. That they ſhould joyn to the Dioceſs of Mindana, the Territory of Muſſia, where this Prieſt was made Miniſter by the Biſhop Severus: And he ſays, That by this means, he ſtill belonging to the Church of Mindana, might fulfil his Oath, and might aſſiſt the Biſhop Longinus, who had demanded him back again. He blames the Conduct of the Biſhop Severus, who had acted againſt the Canons, in removing a Prieſt from one of his Brethren, and had made him guilty of Perjury.

In

In the 11*th.* Canon, he Ordains, That a Penance of 11 Years, should be impoſed upon him who commits Murder, though it was done without any Premeditated Deſign. St. Baſil.

In the 12*th.* he declares, That the Canons wholly exclude all Bigamiſts from Eccleſiaſtical Functions.

In the 13*th.* he ſays, That the Fathers did not puniſh as Murders thoſe that were committed in War, becauſe they judged that thoſe ſhould be pardoned who were obliged to defend their Country, their Life and their Honour; But he adds, That 'twas adviſable for ſuch as had their hands defiled with Human Blood, to continue three Years out of the Communion of the Church.

The 14*th.* imports, that if he who had been an Uſurer, would diſtribute to the Poor all the Profit he had made by this ſhameful Trade, and keep himſelf from the Paſſion of Covetouſneſs, he might be advanced to the Prieſthood.

The 15*th.* and 16*th.* are not Canons which concern Diſcipline; but an explication of ſome difficulties about the literal ſenſe of ſome paſſages of Scripture, which had been propoſed to him by Amphilochius.

The 2*d.* Letter begins with Canon 17*th.* It contains a Deciſion in favour of one named Bianon, who was ordained Prieſt contrary to the Oath he had made. St. Baſil ſays, that he had already made this Rule for the Prieſts of Antioch, that theſe kind of Perſons ſhould not publickly exerciſe their Prieſtly Function, but only in Private. He adds, That he of whom he there ſpeaks, might have a Diſpenſation from this Law; becauſe he was not at Antioch, but Iconium.

In the 18*th.* St. Baſil obſerves, that the Ancients did not treat the Virgins conſecrated to God who abandoned their Profeſſion, more rigorouſly than Bigamiſts, and that they impoſed upon them only a Penance of one Year; but he adds, That the Church and the number of Virgins increaſing now every Day, it was neceſſary to treat them as Adulterers. He gives this Advertiſement, that he ſpeaks of Virgins which have conſecrated themſelves to God, and renounced Marriage; That their Profeſſion ſhould commence from ſuch an Age, at which they were perfectly come to the uſe of their Reaſon; becauſe no regard was to be had to ſuch Promiſes as were made before that time; That we ought not to admit any into the Number of Virgins conſecrated to God, but thoſe who were 16 or 17 Years old, and even then after they had been tryed a long time, and Paſſionately deſired to be received, and that we ought to reject thoſe who were brought by their Parents before they had arrived at this adult Age, before they had a Judgment ſufficiently ripe, and before they could give any aſſurance of their fixed Reſolution.

In the 19*th.* Canon, St. Baſil obſerves, that Men make no Vow, no Profeſſion of Virginity as Virgins do; That thoſe who enter into a Monaſtical ſtate, ſeem tacitly to embrace Celibacy; but to oblige them to it, it was neceſſary that they ſhould be asked, and that they ſhould make Profeſſion of it: and then if they ſhould paſs to a Voluptuous Life, they ſhould be puniſhed as Fornicators.

In the 20*th.* he ſays, that we ought not to puniſh the Women that Married after they had made Profeſſion of Virginity while they were without the Church, being Infidels, or Hereticks, or Catechumens; becauſe we ought not to ſearch after the Sins committed before Baptiſm, ſince that Sacrament Pardoned them.

The 21*ſt.* is alſo about the Difference which Cuſtom had put between the Faults of Husbands and Wives. He obſerves, that a Man who is unfaithful to his Wife is not looked upon as a Fornicator, provided ſhe with whom he committed the Sin was not Married; That the Husband cannot for this be parted from his Wife, though the Wife might be from her Husband, if ſhe ſhould commit the ſame Sin with a Man. He confeſſes, that 'tis difficult to give a Reaſon for this Proceeding; but he ſays, 'tis the Cuſtom.

In the 22*d.* Canon, he obliges thoſe who have forcibly carried Maids away, to reſtore them to thoſe to whom they were contracted, or to their Parents; and declares, that they muſt not be received into Communion before they have reſtored them. He condemns thoſe who detain the Women whom they have freely or by force corrupted, to the ſame Puniſhment with Fornicators, which is to endure Penance for Four Years; that for the 1*ſt.* Year they ſhall be excluded from the Prayers, and obliged to ſtand at the Church-Gate; that for the 2*d.* they ſhall be in the rank of Hearers; that for the 3*d.* they ſhall be in the number of Penitents; that in the Laſt Year they ſhall be preſent with the People at all the Divine Service, without being capable of partaking of the Oblation.

In the 23*d.* Canon, concerning thoſe that married two Siſters, he refers Amphilochius to that which he had written in his Letter to Diodorus, of which we have already ſpoken.

The 24*th.* is againſt Widows, who being received into the number of Deaconeſſes, Married afterwards. He would have them more ſeverely puniſhed than Bigamiſts, if they be above 60 Years old; but he excuſes them, if they be younger, becauſe it was the Biſhop's Fault, to receive them too young.

By the 25*th.* Canon it is provided, that he who ſhall Marry a Woman after he hath abuſed her, ſhall be put under Penance, but he ſhall have leave to keep her for his Wife. St. Baſil.

In the 26*th.* he declares, that Fornication is never Marriage, and that it cannot lawfully be the Beginning of a Marriage; and therefore it would be better to part thoſe who have committed this Sin, than to Marry them together; but yet if they have a mind to Marry, they ſhould not be hindred, leſt ſome greater Miſchief ſhould follow.

The 27*th.* is upon occaſion of a Prieſt, who through Ignorance was entangled in a Marriage within the Prohibited degrees. St. Baſil thinks that he ought not wholly to be deprived of the Honour and Dignity of Prieſthood: but he forbids him to exerciſe his Function, and would have him be ſatisfied with that place of Honour which is left him, without being able to give the Bleſſing, to diſtribute the Body of Jeſus Chriſt, or to do any part of his Sacerdotal Function.

The 28*th.* Canon is againſt ſome Perſons that had made a Vow not to Eat Pork. St. Baſil ſays, that this Vow was ridiculous; and admoniſhes Amphilochius, to exhort thoſe who made it, not to make any more ſuch kind of Vows, and to allow themſelves to Eat indifferently all kinds of Meat.

The 29*th.* is againſt thoſe great Lords, who take an Oath to prejudice thoſe that are ſubject to them. The ſubſtance of it is, that pains ſhould be taken to correct this Fault; and the means to do it, was to teach them that they ought not to make ſuch kind of raſh Oaths, and that they ought to beware of executing the evil they have ſworn to do.

The 30*th.* Canon is againſt Raviſhers. St. Baſil ſays, that there is no antient Canon that concerns them; but that his Opinon is, that both they and ſuch as are Complices in their Crime ought to ſuffer Penance for three Years time.

The 31*ſt.* declares, that a Woman can never Marry, though her Husband does not appear, as long as ſhe is not ſure of his Death, and that if ſhe does, ſhe commits Adultery. The 36*th.* ordains the ſame thing to Soldiers Wives, who Marry again when they have no more news of their Husbands; yet he thinks them more excuſable, becauſe they have more reaſon to believe that they are Dead.

The 32*d.* ordains, that Clergymen who Sin mortally, ſhould be degraded, but not turned out of Communion.

The 33*d.* That a Woman who takes no care of the Fruit of her Womb, and who is brought to Bed in the middle of the Street, ſhould be puniſhed as one guilty of Murder.

The 34*th.* That Women guilty of Adultery who voluntarily confeſs it, or are partly convicted of it, ſhould not be detained, leſt their crime coming to Publick Notice, ſhould be the cauſe of their Death; but that they ſhould be ordered to ſtay out of Communion, till the time of their Penance be over.

The 35*th.* is, that when a Husband is forſaken by his Wife, it ſhould be enquired whether there was an Fault in him; and if there was not but ſhe only was in the Fault, then they ought not to Deprive the Husband of the Communion of the Church, but only puniſh the Wife.

The 37*th.* is, that if a Man who had eſpouſed another Man's Wife, Marrys another Woman, after the former was taken away from him, he is guilty of Adultery againſt the firſt, but not againſt the ſecond.

The 38*th.* is, that Young Women who follow thoſe that have abuſed them, without the Conſent of their Parents, are guilty of Fornication; And that though it may ſeem, that their Fault is made up when the Parents afterwards conſent to it; yet they ought to be put under Penance for Three Years.

The 39*th.* That ſhe who ſtays with him, whom ſhe had committed Adultery with, is to be accounted guilty of the Crime as long as ſhe continues with him.

The 40*th.* That a Slave who Marries without the conſent of his Maſter, has committed Fornication; becauſe the Contracts and Promiſes of all thoſe, who are under the Power of others, are void without their conſent.

The 41*ſt.* That the Marriage of a Widow that is free cannot be nulled.

The 42*d.* contains this general Maxim, that the Marriages of all thoſe who are under the power of another without his conſent, are not Marriages, but Fornications; and therefore, that the Marriages of the Sons and Daughters of a Family are void without the conſent of their Fathers, as that of Slaves is without the conſent of their Maſters.

The 43*d.* declares, that he who has given a Mortal Wound to another, is guilty of Manſlaughter, whether he firſt attacked him, or did it in his own defence.

The 44*th.* That a Deaconeſs that hath committed Fornication with a Pagan, ought not to be Excommunicated, but only deprived of the Oblation for the ſpace of Seven Years, after which ſhe ſhall be received, if ſhe lived chaſtly during that time.

In the 45*th.* He obſerves that the Name of a Chriſtian will ſtand him in no ſtead, who leads a life unworthy of a Chriſtian.

In the 46*th.* he ſays, that a Woman that without her know-

St. Basil. knowledge espoused a married Man, whom his former Wife was parted from, and afterwards separated from him, may Marry again to another; but that it were better if she continued as she was.

The 47th. Canon is about the Baptism of Hereticks. It seems in some Points to be contrary to the first; but when the Matter is well examined, 'tis easie to reconcile them. He observes, That the Encratites, the Saccophorians, and the Apotactites, ought to be treated as Novatians. Now he seems to have said the contrary in the first Canon, where he affirms, that it was absolutely necessary to re-baptize the Encratites. This Difficulty made an Author of our Age believe, That a Negative Particle must be added in the Canon. The Reason which St. Basil alledges to prove this Proposition, seems to confirm this Conjecture; for he adds, That there are Canons which have regulated what concerns the former, tho' differently, whereas there is none which speaks of the latter. But after a full Examination of the Words of this Canon, I find that 'tis not necessary to change any thing in it. Take the true sense of it as follows: St. Basil says, That the Encratites, Apotactites, and Saccophorians, ought to be treated after the same manner as the Novatians: That is to say, That with respect both to the one and the other, we must follow the Custom of the Church where we live; and the Reason which he gives for it, is, because there is no Rule and Determination about their Cause, since the Canons are found different about the former, and there is nothing ordered about the latter. He adds, That in his Country they were all re-baptized; but if this Rebaptization was forbidden in the Province whereof Amphilochius was Bishop, as it was at Rome; and yet he found the Reasons were convincing, which he had brought to prove that the Encratites must be re-baptized, then he ought to call a Council to make this Regulation.

In the 48th. Canon he counsels Women divorced by their Husbands, not to marry again, since Jesus Christ hath said, That he who putteth away his Wife, except for Fornication, committeth Adultery, when he espouseth another, and is the cause of her committing Adultery by marrying again.

In the 50th. Canon he says, That the Laws do not forbid, but punish third Marriages, and yet the Church looks upon them as shameful Actions.

The 3d. Letter to Amphilochius, is also a continuation of Canons. St. Basil speaks in the Preamble of a Journey he had made a little before into Pontus about the Affairs of the Church. He thanks Amphilochius for the Letters he had written to him; he declares to him, that he desired to see him, and that he would do all that lay in his Power to come and meet him; but that perhaps he might be obliged to go soon to Nazianzum, because of the Departure of St. Gregory who was gone from it, tho' no body knew the Reason of his going. He acquaints him, That he of whom he had spoken before (probably to make him Bishop of some City depending upon the Metropolis of Amphilochius,) was fallen sick; That there was no other Person that he could cast his Eyes upon. He counsels him rather to put into that place, one whom the Inhabitants of the City desired to have, tho' he had been but lately baptized. He repeats what he had said in the 10th. Canon concerning those that had taken an Oath that they would not be Bishops.

The 51st. Canon ordains, that Clergy-men should not be otherwise punished for their Crimes but by Deposition, whether they were in sacred Orders, which are given by Imposition of Hands, or in inferior Orders.

The 52d. is against Women that voluntarily suffer their Infants to perish.

The 53d. ordains that a Widow-Slave that procures her being taken away forcibly to be married again, should undergo no other Punishment but that of Bigamists.

In the 54th. he refers us to what he had said in the former Letter concerning involuntary Manslaughter; He adds, That it belongs to the Bishop's Prudence, to encrease or diminish the Penance according to Circumstances.

In the 55th. he declares, That those who set upon Robbers, ought to be deprived of Communion if they be Laymen, and deposed if they be Clergy-men.

In the 56th. he imposes 20 years Penance upon voluntary Murders; and in the 57th. 11 years Penance upon those that are involuntary. In the 58th. he imposes 15 years Penance upon Adultery; In the 59th. 7 years upon Fornicators. In the 60th. he condemns Virgins who break their Vow of Virginity, to the same Punishment with Adulterers. In the 61st. he imposes one years Penance upon him that shall accuse himself of Robbery, and two years upon him that is convicted of it. In the 62d. and 63d. he imposes the same Penance as upon Adulterers, upon those that commit infamous Crimes. In the 64th. he imposes 11 years Penance upon Perjury. In the 65th. he imposes the same Penance upon Poysoners. In the 66th. 11 years Penance upon those that dig up the Dead. In the 67th. the Penance of Murderers upon those that commit Incest with their Sisters. In the 68th. the Punishment of Adulterers is decreed against those that marry their Kinsfolk within prohibited Degrees. In the 69th. he ordains, That a Reader who shall have to do with a Virgin to whom he was contracted, shall be deprived of his Ministerial Function, and become uncapable of rising to a higher Order. He adds, That if he has committed this Sin with another Virgin than her to whom he was contracted, he shall be deposed, and that the same shall be observed with respect to other Ministers. The 70th. ordains, that Deacons and Priests who have polluted their Lips, if they confess their Crime, shall be suspended for some time from their Ministerial Function. The 71st. That those who shall be convicted of those Crimes without their own Confession, shall be punished as Malefactors. The 72d. That those who meddle with Divination, shall be punished as Murderers. The 73d. That he who has renounced the Faith of Jesus Christ shall not be received until the point of Death. In the 74th. St. Basil tells him, That the time of Penance may be shortned to those who fulfil their Penance with Fervor and Humility. In the 75th. he imposes 12 years Penance upon him that hath committed Incest with his Sister by the same Father and Mother; and says in the 76th. That the same Law should take place against those who marry their own Daughters-in-Law. The 77th. ordains 7 years Penance against those who divorce their Wives, and marry others. The 78th. decrees the same Punishment against those who marry two Sisters, tho' at different times. The 79th. condemns those that marry their Mothers-in-Law to the same Punishment with those that marry their Sisters. In the 80th. he says, That the Ancients spake nothing of Polygamy, because they looked upon it as a brutish Sin, to which they thought that Men could not be subject; he believes it worse than Fornication, and he imposes upon those that shall be guilty of it a Penance of 4 years. In the 81st. he imposes 8 years Penance upon those that being taken by the Barbarians, were forced by Torments to eat of Meats sacrificed to Idols, and 11 years upon those that did it without any constraint. In the 82d. and 83d. he condemns the Perjured, and those that meddle with Pagan Superstitions, to 6 years Penance. In the 84th. and 85th. he declares, That all those Canons are to be understood of those who are willing to do Penance and amend themselves; but for those that continue in their Crimes, we ought to have no Conversation with them, and never to receive them into the Church, lest we be Partakers of their Crimes. There is at the end of this Letter, a Fragment of another Letter of St. Basil, written to the same Person against the Encratites.

St. Basil.

For observing some Order in the other Writings of St. Basil, we may divide them into three Classes. The first shall comprehend those that are upon the Scripture; The second, those that concern Doctrine; and the third, those that are about Morality.

Cassiodorus assures us, That St. Basil made Commentaries upon almost all the Books of the Holy Scripture; of which there remains now but a small Number. The nine Homilies or Sermons upon the beginning of Genesis, are the first of his Works. St. Jerome, Photius and Suidas, mention them. There are added to those nine Homilies, two others about the Formation of Man, which at first were attributed to St. Basil, and afterwards were ascribed to his Brother St. Gregory Nyssen. But they cannot belong to this last, who has treated of this Matter in a particular Work: But there is no convincing Reason, why they may not be attributed to St. Basil upon the Credit of ancient Manuscripts. 'Tis true that those Authors we have just now cited, mention but nine Homilies of St. Basil upon the Hexameron; and that Cassiodorus observes, That he did not explain what concerns the Creation of Man; but perhaps those Authors had not seen these two Homilies, which St. Basil composed long after the others. Besides, let Men say what they please, these have the Stile of St. Basil, and are like enough to the first, tho' they are not altogether so large. After these Homilies, there ought to follow the 30th. Homily about Paradise.

Cotelerius has published in Greek in his first Volume of the Monuments of the Greek Church, a Homily upon these Words in the 6th. Chapter of the Proverbs, Suffer not your selves to be overwhelmed with Sleep, which is not unworthy of St. Basil, and has his Stile and Air.

The first of the 22 Homilies upon some Psalms, which is a Preface to all the Psalms, is wholly the same with the Latin Preface, that is prefixed to St. Austin's Commentaries upon the Psalms: Either therefore we must say, That St. Austin's Preface was translated into Greek, or rather, That St. Basil's was translated into Latin, and plac'd at the beginning of St. Austin's Commentaries. These Homilies are quoted in Nicetas's Catena, and by some others; and there is no doubt but they are St. Basil's. Yet Father Combefis rejects the second Homily upon Psalm 28, which is an Abridgment and Repetition of the preceding, and which is wanting in many Manuscripts. He passes also the same Judgment on that upon Psalm 37; and he affirms, that the Stile of it is different from that of the others. In some Latin Editions of St. Basil, there are published under the Name of St. Basil, Commentaries upon the Psalms; but 'tis plain they are none of St. Basil's, because they are Extracts out of St. Chrysostom and Theodoret.

The

St. Baſil.

The Commentary upon the firſt ſix Chapters of Iſaiah, ſeemed doubtful to Eraſmus, becauſe he thought that they were written in another Stile. Tilmannus who has tranſlated them into Latin, has undertaken to defend them againſt the Conjecture of Eraſmus, and he proves that they are this Father's by the Authority of four Modern Greek Authors, which are Metaphraſtes, Antonius, Maximus, and St. John Damaſcene. Fronto Ducæus adds to theſe four, the Patriarch Taraſius, in his Epiſtle to Pope Adrian, and the Author of the Greek Scholia, upon the Epiſtles of St. Paul attributed to Oecumenius. The Authority of theſe Modern Greeks would be of no great Moment, if this Work had evident Marks of Forgery, or if the Stile of it were altogether different from that of St. Baſil; but it muſt be confeſſed, that tho' it is not ſo elegant as the Work of the Creation, yet it is not much different from the Stile of St. Baſil, neither is it unworthy of this Father. Rivet has found in it a difference of Opinion, which might make it be rejected, if it were more conſiderable. He obſerves, That St. Baſil in his Letter 80. to Euſtathius the Phyſician, affirms that the Witch of Endor made the Soul of Samuel really to return, whereas the Author of this Commentary upon Iſaiah, on Ch. 8. affirms, That it was the Devil who aſſumed the Shape of Samuel. Some have anſwered, That this Epiſtle to Euſtathius, was St. Gregory Nyſſen's, but we have ſhewn, that 'tis rather St. Baſil's. Therefore all that can be ſaid is this, That St. Baſil might change his Opinion about a thing of ſo ſmall Conſequence as this is.

The ſecond Claſs of St. Baſil's Works comprehends his Dogmatical Books. The firſt of theſe Diſcourſes are the Books againſt Eunomius. St. Gregory Nazianzen, St. Jerome and Photius, all aſſure us, That he wrote againſt this Heretick, but they ſay nothing of the Number of the Books. We have at preſent five of them. The three firſt are written in the ſame Stile and after the ſame Method, and there can be no doubt but they are St. Baſil's. The two laſt are more dry and ſcholaſtical; but we ought not to wonder at that. In the firſt he overthrows the principal Arguments of Eunomius; and in theſe two laſt, he inſiſts upon the Refutation of the ſubtleties and ſophiſtical Arguments of this Heretick upon many Paſſages of Holy Scripture, as he had promiſed to do in the ſecond Book. There is no Cauſe therefore to reject theſe Books as ſuppoſititious. They were quoted as Genuine by the Greeks and Latins in the Council of Florence.

The Book of the Holy Spirit to Amphilochius, is that Treatiſe of all the Works of St. Baſil, which moſt of all Diſpleaſes the Proteſtants; becauſe it contains ſuch things as do not favour them. Eraſmus who took great Liberty to condemn every thing that did not pleaſe him, made no ſcruple to reject this, in the Preface which he prefixed to his Verſion. He was wearied with tranſlating it, and the Stile appeared to him perplexed in ſeveral Places. Theſe are the Reaſons on which he grounds his Judgment about this Book to which he had added many things in the ſame Preface; That tho' 'tis true, that there are ſome things in it, which are not unworthy of St. Baſil, and which ſufficiently diſcover that they belong to him; yet there are other things in it which are none of his. The greateſt part of Proteſtant Criticks, being diſſatisfied with that neceſſity of Tradition which this Book evidently proves, have gladly received this Opinion of Eraſmus, and have alſo added ſome other Conjectures of their own to his, to reject this Book entirely. Nevertheleſs, Caſaubon being more impartial than the reſt, has plainly declared in his Writings againſt Baronius, that he was not of Eraſmus's Opinion. And indeed 'tis certain that St. Baſil did write a Treatiſe of the Holy Spirit; he ſays it himſelf in his Letters. St. Gregory Nazianzen ſpeaks of it. St. Jerome and Suidas mention it. Theodoret quotes that Book which we have at this Day, in his firſt Dialogue, and in the Refutation of the Anathematiſms of St. Cyril. After this Author, St. John Damaſcene in his third Diſcourſe of Images, the II. Nicene Council, Act. 4. Photius in the Nomo-canon, Burchardus in the Decretals, Euthymius Zygabenus in his Panoplia, Zonaras and Balſamon in the Nomo-canon, Anaſtaſius of Nice Queſt. 84, and Nicephorus B. XII. Ch. 20. quote it alſo. Moreover, the Reaſons of Eraſmus are very weak: For firſt he accuſes the Author of this Work of raiſing his Stile too high, as if this were not ordinary with Authors, and particularly with Writers of Controverſy. He reproves him for diſcovering his Ability in the Logick of Ariſtotle and Porphyrie. Could he do otherwiſe, having to do with Adverſaries which made uſe of theſe Arms? Laſtly, Eraſmus affirms, That the Stile is different from St. Baſil's; but he pronounces this Sentence upon ſlight Grounds, and without a ſufficient Examination of the Matter; for thoſe who read this Work, find no ſuch difference of Stile in it; but on the contrary they find a great agreement between it and his other Books. Sultetus pretends, that what this Author ſays of the Authority of Tradition, is contrary to the Doctrine of St. Baſil; but it is a Groundleſs Allegation. Neither is it true, that he lays down in this Book other Poſitions than thoſe which he has explained in other places, concerning the deſcent of Chriſt into Hell, and concerning Baptiſm. If Sultetus had well conſidered what he affirmed with ſo much boldneſs, he would have changed his Opinion.

St. Baſil.

No body doubts but the two Books of Baptiſm are St. Baſil's, tho' they be not cited by the Ancients.

The Book of Virginity has the Stile of St. Baſil, and what St. Gregory Nazianzen ſays of St. Baſil's Writings concerning Virginity, does perfectly agree to it. It is alſo cited by Suidas. Yet Mr. Hermant believes it ſuppoſititious, becauſe it is addreſs'd to Letoius Biſhop of Melitine, ſince while St. Baſil was living, that See was poſſeſs'd by Otreius, who lived after the Council of Conſtantinople, as appears by the Law which the Emperor Theodoſius made after this Council. It may be ſaid, that Letoius was his Predeceſſor; but there is more probability that he ſucceeded to him. Either therefore we muſt ſay, that the Dedication of this Book is corrupted, and then we muſt read Otreius for Letoius, or elſe that Letoius was not yet Biſhop.

Among the 31 different Homilies of St. Baſil, there are 11 of them which are Dogmatical: viz. The 9th. wherein he proves that God is not the Author of Sin; The 12th. upon the beginning of the Proverbs; The 15th. concerning Faith; The 16th. upon the Beginning of the Goſpel of St. John; The 17th. upon Baptiſm; The 25th. of the Human Birth of Jeſus Chriſt; The 27th. againſt the Sabellians, the Anomæans and the Arians; The 29th. againſt thoſe who accuſe us of Worſhipping three Gods; The 31ſt. of Free-will. All theſe Homilies have St. Baſil's Stile, and no Body doubts but they are his.

But there is more Difficulty about St. Baſil's Books of Morality. St. Jerome and Suidas mention in general the Aſceticks of this Father; but Sozomen, Ch. 15. B. III. of his Hiſtory, ſays, That they were written by Euſtathius of Sebaſtea. On the contrary, Photius, Vol. 191, of his Bibliotheca, attributes to St. Baſil, the great Rules, ſmall Rules, and their Prefaces.

The Aſcetical Books attributed to St. Baſil, are as follow. The Firſt is a Diſcourſe which may ſerve as a Preface and Introduction to all his Aſcetical Diſcourſes. The Second is a Treatiſe about the Monaſtical ſtate, and the renouncing the things of this World. The Third is a Diſcourſe of the Aſcetical Life. The Fourth is a Treatiſe of Faith. The Fifth is a Treatiſe of the Judgment of God, and a little Preface which in ſome Manuſcripts, makes a part of the Book about Faith. We muſt alſo add two other little Diſcourſes publiſhed by Father Combefis, in the Second Volume of St. Baſil, Reſtored. Theſe Tracts are as preliminaries to the great Aſcetical Treatiſes, which are his Morals, the Aſcetical Book, the Great Rules explained very largely, which are in number 55, the Little Rules abridged, which are continued unto number 313, ſome Canons concerning the Puniſhment of Monks and Nuns, and the Monaſtical Conſtitutions. To theſe Books we may joyn his Epiſtle to Chilo, and the following Letters, as well as 411, and ſome others which concern the Monaſtical State, of which we have ſpoken among the Letters of St. Baſil. 'Tis not certain whether all theſe Books that we have mentioned be St. Baſil's; but 'tis agreed on all hands that the Conſtitutions, and the Aſcetical Treatiſes are his: But many adhere to the Teſtimony of Sozomen, who attributes the Little Rules, and alſo the Great ones to Euſtathius of Sebaſtea. Yet I ſee nothing which can confirm this Opinion, and it ſeems to me that they bear ſo great a Relation to the other Aſcetical Works of St. Baſil, that it may be affirmed with much probability, that they all belong to the ſame Author. Ruffinus who has made an Abridgment of them attributes them to St. Baſil: They are cited under his Name in the 5th. Council; and in ſhort, Photius acknowledges all theſe Treatiſes for Genuine. Even in his time they made but one Body divided into two Parts: The Firſt contained the Diſcourſe of Judgment, and that of Faith which is a Continuation of it: The Second Part contained the Morals, the 55 Great Rules, the 313 Short Rules, and the Titles of theſe Rules. This ſhews that all theſe Books belong to the ſame Author, and that they compos'd but one Book, entituled Aſceticks, whereof the firſt Part is not entire. As to the three Diſcourſes which precede that which is entituled, Of Judgment, they are diſtinct Treatiſes which have no Relation to the other Aſcetical Books: The Treatiſe of Judgment ought to precede that of Faith, and both the one and the other are a Preface to the Aſceticks. The Book of a Monaſtick Life, and the Conſtitutions are diſtinct Works, as well as the Rules concerning the Puniſhment of Monks.

Of the Moral Homilies, the firſt is that about Faſting, cited by St. Auſtin in the firſt Book againſt Julian, where he recites alſo ſome other Paſſages which this Heretick had taken out of a Treatiſe of St. Baſil againſt the Manichees, which we have not at preſent. The ſecond Homily of Faſting, which Eraſmus has condemned too ſlightly, is cited by St. John Damaſcene and by Euthymius. The third Homily upon the ſame Subject publiſhed by Cotelerius, is not unworthy of St. Baſil, tho' it be not ſo Elegant. The Fourth Homily is upon theſe Words, Take heed to your ſelves. The Fifth is concerning Thankſgiving, which ſome have believed not to be St. Baſil's. The Sixth is upon theſe Words, I will pull down my Barns. The Seventh to Rich Men.

St. Baſil. The Eighth upon Famine and Barrenneſs. The Tenth of Anger. The Eleventh of Envy. The Twelfth upon the beginning of the Proverbs. The Thirteenth contains an Exhortation to Baptiſm. The Fifteenth is upon Drunkenneſs. The One and Twentieth was recited at Laciza. The Two and Twentieth of Humility. The Three and Twentieth, that we ought not to ſet our Hearts upon the things of this World. The Four and Twentieth preſcribes Rules to Young People about reading Prophane Books: And the Eight and Twentieth is of Penance. To theſe we may add the Panegyricks, which are the Panegyrick of the Holy Martyr Julita, that of St. Gordus, and that of St. Mamas. There is alſo one upon Barlaam a Martyr of Antioch; but it has more of the Stile of St. Chryſoſtom than of St. Baſil; and 'tis more probable, that it was recited at Antioch, where the Memory of St. Barlaam was held in ſingular Veneration, than at Cæſarea of Cappadocia.

The 24 Moral Homilies collected by Simeon Logothera, are Extracts out of ſeveral places of St. Baſil.

The Latin Diſcourſe of Conſolation, and the Advertiſement to his Spiritual Son, ſeem to me, to have neither the Stile nor Genius of St. Baſil. The Treatiſe of the Praiſes of a Solitary Life, is taken out of the Treatiſe of St. Peter Damian, upon Dominus vobiſcum. I ſay nothing of the Grammar attributed to St. Baſil, which is an Abridgment of Grammar by a Modern Greek.

There remains now no more but the Liturgies attributed to this Father, which are three in Number. The Firſt is in Greek, and Printed by Moretlus. The Second was tranſlated from the Syriack, and publiſhed by Maſius. The Third was tranſlated from the Arabick by a Maronite of Mount Libanus. But tho' 'tis certain that St. Baſil compos'd a Liturgy, as St. Proclus, the Council in Trullo, and Leontius, aſſure us: Yet it cannot be poſitively affirmed, that any one of thoſe which we have is the Liturgy of that Father, as he compos'd it: On the contrary, there is great probability, that it has not been preſerved in its Purity, and that many things have been added and changed in it, as uſually happens to thoſe kind of Works. It is obſerved alſo, that Petrus Diaconus cites a Famous Prayer taken out of the Liturgy of St. Baſil, which is not to be found in any of thoſe Liturgies, which now go under his Name.

The Homilies of St. Baſil upon the ſix Days of Creation, are in Photius's Judgment the moſt Excellent of all his Works. And indeed, he handles this Matter in a very grateful manner; they are filled with many Embelliſhments of Rhetorick, with agreeable Deſcriptions, ſublime thoughts, curious and Learned Remarks, and ſolid Reflexions. He explains the Words of Holy Scripture literally, without having recourſe to Allegories; and yet he ſets off this Explication with ſo many Ornaments, that 'tis very delightful. He reſolves many Queſtions about the Nature and Difficulties of Moſes's Relation: He intermixes from time to time ſome Moral thoughts. It appears that he preached theſe Sermons to his People in the Afternoons.

The Homily of a Terreſtrial Paradiſe, is alſo a continuation of this Work; he deſcribes it moſt Eloquently, and underſtands it in a Spiritual Senſe of a State of Righteouſneſs and Holineſs.

In the Homily upon the Words of the Proverbs, Give no ſleep unto your Eyes, publiſhed by Cotelerius, St. Baſil exhorts to watchfulneſs, and the practice of Good Works.

His Homilies upon the Pſalms are Written in the ſame Stile, but they are more filled with Morality. He departs ſometimes from the Literal Senſe, and does not always apprehend the true Senſe of the Prophet. Yet he does not make uſe of obſcure and forced Allegories; but all that he ſays is Intelligible, Natural, Uſeful, and Pleaſant. The Commentary upon Iſaiah, is not ſo lofty, nor ſo full of Morality, but 'tis very Intelligible and very learned.

The Five Books againſt Eunomius, are a moſt compleat Work of Controverſy; he recites the Arguments and Words of this Heretick, and refutes them very ſolidly and very clearly.

In the Two firſt Books, he refutes the principal Arguments which this Heretick uſed to prove that the Son was not like to his Father. He Anſwers them very clearly, and diſcovers the Falſhood of this Heretick's reaſonings.

In the Third he anſwers the Objections which he made againſt the Divinity of the Holy Spirit.

In the Fourth he proves, that the Son of God is not a Creature, but is truly God.

And Laſtly, in the Fifth he proves the ſame thing of the Holy Spirit.

He handles the moſt Intricate matters of Theology, in a manner very learned and Profound, and yet without perplexing and entangling them with the Quirks, the Difficulties and Terms of the Schoolmen.

He proves alſo the Trinity of Divine Perſons, and their Equality, in the 16*th*. Homily upon the beginning of the Goſpel of St. John, and in the Book againſt the Sabellians.

He particularly Eſtabliſhes the Divinity of the Holy Spirit, in the Treatiſe of the Holy Spirit, addreſſed to Amphilochius. He compoſed it upon occaſion of a complaint that ſome Perſons had made againſt him, that at the concluſion of his Sermons he had ſaid, Glory be to the Father, and to the Son, with the Holy Ghoſt, inſtead of ſaying as ſome do, In the Holy Ghoſt. Amphilochius had asked him the proper Signification of theſe Terms, and the difference between the one and the other Expreſſion. St. Baſil commends him for this Exactneſs, and obſerves that 'tis very uſeful to ſearch out the proper Senſe of the Terms and Expreſſions which we uſe. St. Baſil.

In the 2*d*. Chapter he makes this Obſervation, that thoſe who will uſe different Terms in Glorifying the Father, the Son and the Holy Ghoſt, do it for no other end, but to conclude from thence the Diſſimilitude and Inequality of the Three Perſons of the Trinity.

In the 3*d*. Chapter he ſhews, that the difference of theſe Terms, of whom, by whom, and in whom, have no place but in Philoſophy, and we ought not to uſe them when we ſpeak of the three Divine Perſons.

In the 4*th*. he ſhews, that this Particle, of whom, ſignifies in Scripture the Efficient Cauſe, ſince 'tis ſaid that all things are of God.

In the 5*th*. he ſhews, that the Scripture ſays of the Father, by whom, and of the Son, of whom, and that it uſes the ſame expreſſions when it ſpeaks of the Holy Ghoſt.

In the 6*th*. he anſwers thoſe who affirm, That we cannot ſay, the Son of God is with his Father, becauſe he is after his Father. St. Baſil maintains, that the Son of God is not at all inferiour to the Father, neither in reſpect of Time, nor in reſpect of the place he holds, nor in reſpect of Honour and Glory, being Eternal as the Father, Infinite as the Father, and having a Glory and Majeſty equal to that of the Father.

In the 7*th*. he proves that this Expreſſion, with the Son, is not new; That the Church has uſed it to denote the Majeſty of his Divine Nature, as ſhe has alſo uſed that other, by the Son, to ſignifie the acceſs which we have to God the Father by his Son, and therefore we ought to uſe the former Expreſſion when we ſing the Praiſes of God; and the latter when we thank him for the Favours he has done us.

He explains this Diſtinction in Ch. 8. and there he recites many Names of Jeſus Chriſt.

In 9*th*. he explains his Judgment concerning the Divinity of the Holy Spirit, which he received by Tradition, and which is agreeable to the Doctrine of the Holy Scripture. He proves that the Holy Spirit is a Spiritual Perſon, Eternal, Infinite, Unchangeable, &c. who ſtrengthens us, and gives us life by his Gifts.

In the 10*th*. and 11*th*. he refutes thoſe that would not joyn the Holy Spirit to the Father and the Son. He proves the contrary by the Inſtitution of Baptiſm; and accuſes thoſe that would not add the Holy Spirit to the Father and the Son, Of Violating the ſaving Sacrament of Baptiſm; Of Prevaricating in the Vow which they had made, and of Revolting from the Religion which they had once profeſſed.

In Chapter 12*th*. he anſwers the firſt Exception of his Adverſaries, who ſaid, that Baptiſm given in the Name of Jeſus Chriſt was ſufficient. St. Baſil anſwers, Firſt, that the Name of Jeſus Chriſt denotes the whole Trinity, becauſe it ſignifies the Anointed of the Lord. Now he ſays, that the Word Anointed, deſigns him that does Anoint, and him by whom he is Anointed. Secondly, that Faith is inſeparable from Baptiſm, becauſe Faith is perfected by Baptiſm, and Baptiſm ſuppoſes Faith; That the Profeſſion of Faith precedes Baptiſm, which is as it were the Seal of it. Laſtly, he maintains that 'tis not ſufficient to Baptize in the Name of Jeſus Chriſt, but that we muſt invoke the three Perſons of the Godhead according to Inviolable Tradition, and that we ought to add nothing to, nor take any thing from this Invocation.

In the 13*th*. he refutes a Second anſwer of his Adverſaries, who ſay, that tho' the Holy Spirit were oftentimes in Scripture joyned to the Father and the Son, yet it would not follow from thence, that he was equal to them, ſince the Angels are there ſometimes joyned with God. St. Baſil anſwers, that there is a great Difference between the manner in which the Scripture ſpeaks of Angels, and of the Holy Spirit, becauſe it conſiders the former merely as Miniſters, whereas it conſiders the Holy Spirit as the Fountain of Life, and joyns him with the Father, becauſe of the Unity of Eſſence.

In the 14*th*. he reſolves alſo a third Difficulty: It was objected to him, that tho' Men be re-baptized in the Name of the Holy Spirit, yet it does not follow, that the Holy Spirit is equal to the Father and the Son, ſince 'tis alſo ſaid in Scripture, that they were all baptized into Moſes in the Cloud. St. Baſil anſwers, that this Expreſſion of St. Paul, ſignifies not only, that Moſes and the Cloud were the Figure of the Baptiſm of Jeſus Chriſt, but that the Truth is much more Excellent than the Type.

In the 15*th*. he anſwers a fourth Sophiſm: We are baptized in Water, ſaid the Hereticks, and yet we do not Honour the Water as the Father and the Son. St. Baſil anſwers, that this Objection is ridiculous, and that thoſe who make it are mad; that 'tis not the Water that Baptizes

St. Basil. tizes us but the Spirit; that the Water indeed is joyned with the Spirit, as the Sign of the Death and Burial of the Old Man, but that 'tis the Spirit who gives a new Life; That Baptism is administred by dipping three times into the Water, and by invoking the Trinity three times, to signify our dying to Sin, and the giving of Life; That the Baptism of Jesus Christ is very different from that of St. John, which was only the Baptism of Water, whereas that of Jesus Christ is the Baptism of the Holy Spirit and of Fire. Last of all, he says, that the Martyrs who suffered Death for Jesus Christ, needed not the Baptism of Water in order to their receiving the Crown, being baptized in their own Blood. He speaks also in this place of the Fire of the Day of Judgment, which he calls the Baptism of Fire, that shall try all Mankind.

In the 17*th*. and 18*th*. he shews, that the Holy Spirit is joyned to the Father, and to the Son, as a Person equal, and not as one Inferiour. To prove this he uses the Rules of Logick, having to do with an Adversary, against whom he must use these Arms.

In the 19*th*. he proves, that we would celebrate the Glory and Praises of the Holy Spirit, as we do those of the Father, and of the Son, and that we should give him the same Honours.

In the 20*th*. he refutes the Opinion of those who say, That the Holy Spirit is neither a Lord nor a Servant, but that he is Free. He shews that this Opinion is very absurd; for either he is a Creature or not; if not, then he is God or Lord; and if he is, he must be a Servant, for all Creatures have a Dependance upon God.

In the 21*st*. he shews by many Testimonies of Scripture, that the Holy Spirit is there called Lord.

In the 22*d*. He proves his Divinity by many passages of Scripture.

In the 23*d*. he alledges the Miracles attributed to the Holy Spirit, to prove that he is God.

In the 24*th*. he shews, that we should Glorify the Holy Spirit, as we do the Father and the Son.

In the 25*th*. he answers those who object, that the Scripture never uses this Expression, The Father, and the Son, with the Holy Spirit; and he shews, that to say, The Father, and the Son, with the Holy Spirit, signifies nothing else but, the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Spirit; That the erroneous way which they would have us use, is not to be found in the Holy Scriptures; Glory be to the Father by the only Son in the Holy Spirit; That the Particle in has the same Sense in this Place as the Particle with; That the Fathers made use of the Particle with, as being most proper to oppose the Errors of Arius and Sabellius, and that 'tis less capable of an ill Sense; That notwithstanding he is not tyed up to this Expression, provided we be willing to render Glory to the Holy Spirit.

In the following Chapter, he goes on to explain with much subtlety the Difference between the Particles in and with.

In the 27*th* he proposes this Objection, We ought to receive nothing but what is in the Holy Scripture: But these Words are not to be found, Glory to the Father, and to the Son, with the Holy Spirit. In answer to which, he First sends his adversaries back to what he had said in Ch. 25. Afterwards he adds, 'That in the Church there are some 'Opinions and Practices founded upon the Testimonies of 'Scripture; but then there are also some which are found'ed only upon unwritten Tradition: That the Scripture 'and Tradition have an equal Authority for the establishing 'of Piety and Truth, and that none who follow the Ec'clesiastical Laws resist them: that if we should reject all 'Customs that are not founded on Scripture, we shall 'greatly prejudice Religion, and reduce it to a superficial 'Belief of some particular Opinions. 'Tis easy, says he, to 'give examples of this, and to begin with that which is 'most common. Where find we it Written, that we must 'make the Sign of the Cross upon those who begin to 'Hope in Jesus Christ? What Book of Scripture teaches us, 'that we must turn to the East to make our Prayers? 'What Saint has left us in his Writings, the Words of In'vocation, when we Consecrate the Bread of the Eucha'rist and the Cup of Blessing? For we do not content 'our selves with pronouncing the Words set down by the 'Apostle St. Paul, and the Evangelists, but we add, seve'ral Prayers, both before and after, which we consider as 'having much Efficacy upon the Sacrament; and yet we 'have them not but by Tradition. We Consecrate the Wa'ter of Baptism, the Oyl of Unction, and him also who 'is to be baptized; where is this Written? Is not this a Se'cret Tradition? Is it not Custom which has taught us 'that we must Anoint him who is to be baptized? Where 'has the Scripture taught us that we must use three Dip'pings in baptizing? We must say the same of the other 'Ceremonies of Baptism, as of Renouncing the Devil and 'his Angels. Who has obliged us to do these things? 'Whence have we learned them? Have we them not from 'the Tradition of our Fathers? Who observed them, with'out divulging or publishing of them, being perswaded that 'Silence kept up a Veneration for the Mysteries? What 'necessity was there of putting that in Writing which it 'was not lawful to reveal or to explain to those who were 'not yet baptized?' Afterwards he gives the Reason of some Usages which he had mentioned. He observes also, That Christians pray to God standing from Easter to Whitsunday; that they kneel and afterwards rise up. He gives Mystical Reasons for these Customs, which are so forced, that 'tis easy to perceive, that there is no better Reason to be given than Custom and Practice. Lastly, he concludes, That since there are so many things which we have by Tradition, we ought not to reprehend one simple Particle which the Ancients made use of. St. Basil.

This he proves in the 29*th*. Chapter, where he Alledges the Authorities of St. Irenæus, St. Clemens Romanus, the Two Dionysii, Eusebius of Cæsarea, Origen, Africanus, Athenogenes, Gregory Thaumaturgus, Firmilian and Meletius, besides the Prayers of the Church, and the Consent of the Eastern and Western Churches. Towards the end of this Chapter he complains of the Hardships which his Calumniators make him suffer. In the last, he describes the miserable State of the Church. He compares it to a Fleet of Ships tost with a great Tempest, which is cause of Shipwrack to many of them, and points out the Troubles and Miseries wherewith the Church was afflicted very admirably: This Chapter alone is sufficient to shew that this Book is undoubtedly St. Basil's.

He proves also the Divinity of the Holy Spirit in Homily 17*th*. upon Baptism, and he explains the Faith of the Church concerning the Trinity in Homily 15*th*. of Faith. He enlarges upon the Gifts of the Holy Spirit. He treats also of the same thing in Homily 29. against those who accuse us of worshipping three Gods.

In Homily 19. St. Basil treats of that famous and difficult Question, Why do the Just suffer, and why is there any Evil, if God takes Care of things here below? St. Basil answers, That all this is done by the Permission of God; That Diseases, Calamities, Pain and Death are not real Evils; That Sin which is the only Evil, comes not from God, but from our selves; That God exposes Men to sufferings, either to cure them, or to punish them, or to make them serve for an Example; Or lastly, to make them good and deserving: And moreover, that God is not the first Author of Diseases, Pain and Death, because he created Man free from them, and these things entred into the World only by his Sin. But why (may some object) did not God make him impeccable? He answers, because in order to the honouring of God, and meriting from him, 'twas necessary that we should obey him voluntarily and freely; That the Devil was the cause of his own Perdition, by using his Liberty amiss; That the Tree of Life and Death was placed in Paradise, to try the Obedience of Man; and that it was his own fault that he made an ill use of it. He observes that the Demons dwell in the Air, and are incorporeal.

The 31*st*. Discourse which is of Free Will, has some Connection with the preceding. Therein he teaches, first, That Men deceive themselves, if they imagine that they can overcome Temptations, by the sole Power of their own Liberty, without the Assistance of God; That Free Will can indeed choose for us Good and Evil; but God only can enable us to do Good; That we must therefore beg the Assistance of the Divine Power, which cannot be obtained without refraining from worldly Pleasures: That by the Sin of the first Man, we are become like Beasts; That we must labour to be of the number of the Children of God, and to excite in us the Fire of the Holy Spirit, which Jesus Christ came to bring down upon the Earth, and which descended on the Apostles at the day of Pentecost; That we must pray God that this Fire may descend upon us, that we walking always in the Light, may never fall, and that we may be as the Lights of the World.

In Homily 25. of the Nativity of the Word, he explains the Mystery of the Incarnation. He says, That the Word was not changed by uniting it self to the Human Nature; That he was made Man to redeem us; That he took a Body in the Womb of the Virgin Mary, by the Operation of the Holy Spirit; That his Body was made all at once; That Mary was a Virgin tho' she was married to St. Joseph. After this, he examines this Question, Whether she knew her Husband after she brought forth Jesus Christ into the World? He says, that this is not a Fundamental Article of our Faith; but that those who have a love for Jesus Christ, cannot endure to hear it said, that the Mother of God lost her Virginity, and became the Mother of a Man. He explains the Difficulties which may be raised against this Doctrine, from the Particle, Until that, and from the Character of First-born, which is given to Jesus Christ. Afterwards he explains some Circumstances of the Birth of Jesus Christ. He believes that the Wise Men were Persians; That the Star which they saw was not an ordinary Star, and that they knew it signified the Birth of Jesus Christ, as well by the Prophecy of Balaam, as because they saw the Power of the Devil very much diminished. Lastly, he exhorts his Auditors to celebrate with Joy the Feast of the Nativity of Jesus Christ.

St. Baſil. In the firſt Book of Baptiſm, he proves, Firſt, That we muſt not baptize any but thoſe that are well inſtructed and perſuaded of the Faith of Jeſus Chriſt, and who have renounced the World, their Vices, their Paſſions, and if need be, their Life. Secondly, he ſhews, That in order to Salvation, 'tis not enough to be baptized, but that we muſt alſo keep the Commandments and do good Works. He ſhews afterwards what difference there is between the Baptiſms of Moſes, of St. John, and of Jeſus Chriſt. He ſays, That the Baptiſm of Moſes ſeparated ſome Men from others, but did not pardon them; That the Baptiſm of St. John being received with a Penitent Heart, conferred Remiſſion of Sins; but the Baptiſm of Jeſus Chriſt is much more excellent and efficacious: That by this Baptiſm we die unto Sin and live unto Righteouſneſs; That we are crucified and buried with Jeſus Chriſt; That we are raiſed again together with him; That Sin hath no more Dominion over us; That we are filled with the Holy Spirit, and clothed with Jeſus Chriſt. At laſt, he adds, That after we are baptized, we have need to be nouriſhed with the Food of Eternal Life; that's to ſay, with the Euchariſt, which we ought to receive with moſt holy Diſpoſitions, leſt we ſhould eat and drink our own Damnation.

In the 2*d*. Book he propoſes many Queſtions. The firſt is, Whether he that is baptized be obliged to die unto the World and to live unto God? He anſwers, yes, he is. The ſecond is, whether he that performs the Office of a Prieſt, ought to be pure in Heart? He anſwers, that if Moſes removed from the Sacrifices of the Old Law, all thoſe that were impure, Purity is yet more neceſſary to him that touches the Body of Jeſus Chriſt.

The third Queſtion is, whether it be lawful for one to receive the Euchariſt when he is unclean? St. Baſil anſwers it after the ſame manner as he did the preceding.

In the 4*th*. he teaches, That we muſt obey the Commandments, tho' it ſeems to us, that there were ſome Actions of Jeſus Chriſt or the Saints contrary to them; and that we muſt never ſeek for Excuſes nor Pretences to diſpenſe with the Obſervation of the Law. He adds in the 5*th*. that all Diſobedience to the Commands of God is puniſhable, and that it deſerves the Divine Vengeance.

In the 6*th*. he proves that a Man ſins not only by doing Evil, but alſo by omitting to do Good when we are obliged to do it.

In the 7*th*. he adverti ſes us, That we muſt regulate the Inward Man, before we give unto God any External Worſhip.

In the 8*th*. That we muſt not only perform the things commanded; but alſo do them in the manner which is enjoyned, in the order and time preſcribed.

In the 9*th*. he ſhews, that we ought to ſhun the Society and Converſation of Wicked Men.

In the 10*th*. he treats of Scandal. He defines it, that which ſeduces us from the truth, and draws us into Error or Impiety; or, that which hinders us to obey the Commands of God as long as we live: So that every thing may be called Scandal which is contrary to the Will of God. He adds, That 'tis alſo Scandal to do a thing, tho' it be lawful, when it is the cauſe of the loſs or fall of the Weak. He obſerves alſo, that there is ſometimes a Scandal taken without cauſe.

In the 11*th*. he ſhews, that 'tis never lawful to do thoſe things which are forbidden by the Law of God, nor to obey thoſe that command ſuch things, and that we muſt never uſe our Reaſon to exempt our ſelves from Obedience to the Law of God.

In the 12*th*. he ſhews, That we ought not only to take care of thoſe perſons that are under our Conduct; but that our Charity alſo muſt extend to all other Chriſtians: and that a Biſhop ought in caſe of Neceſſity to help all the Churches.

In the laſt, he proves by Scripture, That we muſt endure all and ſuffer all, even Death it ſelf, rather than fail in our Duty, or diſobey the Law of God. This Treatiſe appears to be rather of Morality than Doctrine; but tho' he treats there of Moral Queſtions, yet he handles them Dogmatically, and founds his Deciſions upon all the Teſtimonies of Scripture which belong to his Subject.

The Treatiſe of true Virginity contains many Precepts for preſerving Virginity. In it he extols very much the ſtate of Virgins, and diſcovers the Dangers to which they are expoſed. There are in this Treatiſe ſome Paſſages which may offend nice Ears; but 'tis to be conſidered, that 'tis addreſſed to a Biſhop, and not to the Virgins themſelves; ſetting that aſide, 'tis very eloquent, and very well written.

In Homily 28. of Penance, he proves againſt the Novatians, that thoſe who have ſinned after Baptiſm, have ſtill the Remedy of Penance; but he admoniſhes them that they ought not to ſin in hopes of doing Penance; that commonly thoſe who ſin with this diſpoſition of Mind are deprived of Repentance; that in truth there is hope of Pardon when they have ſinned; but ſtill it is like a Wound that can be healed, which leaves ſome Scar for ever behind it.

We are now inſenſibly faln into the Homilies of Morality, out of which we ſhall make our Extracts, before we come to the Aſcetical Treatiſes. St. Baſil.

The Firſt is a Homily about Faſting. After he has in the Firſt Part admoniſhed us, that we muſt Faſt with a pleaſant Countenance, then he Exhorts Chriſtians to Faſt, alledging many Authorities and Examples to that purpoſe. He ſhews the Neceſſity of Faſting, and anſwers the Excuſe that is moſt commonly alledged for diſpenſing with it, which is the want of Health or Sickneſs. 'Do not alledge 'to me, ſays he, your Indiſpoſition; Don't tell me that you 'cannot endure Faſting; 'tis not to me that ye alledge theſe 'Excuſes, 'tis to God, from whom nothing can be hid. 'But tell me, can you not Faſt, ſay you? Alas, can you 'fill your ſelves with Victuals, can you charge your Sto'machs with all ſorts of Meats? Do not the Phyſicians 'preſcribe to thoſe that are Sick Abſtinence and Dieting 'themſelves, rather than abundance of Food? How come 'you then to ſay, that you can Eat very much, and that 'you cannot Diet your ſelves?' At laſt, St. Baſil ſays, 'That our Faſting ſhould be accompanied with Abſtinence 'from Evil; that we muſt faſt from our Paſſions and Vices; 'and that without this, bodily Faſting is unprofitable. Take 'heed, ſays he, that you make not your Faſt to conſiſt only 'in Abſtinence from Meats: true Faſting is to refrain from 'Vice. Tear in pieces all your unjuſt Obligations; Pardon 'your Neighbour; forgive him his Debts. Faſt not to ſtir 'up Strife and Contention. You eat no Fleſh, but you de'vour your Brother; You drink no Wine, but you cannot 'refrain from doing Injury to others; You wait till Night 'to take your Repaſt, but you ſpend all the Day at the 'Tribunals of the Judges. Woe be to you who are Drunk 'without Wine: Anger is a kind of Inebriation, which 'does no leſs trouble the Mind than real Drunkenneſs.' He ſpeaks afterwards againſt thoſe who uſe Faſting, to prepare themſelves for larger Drinking and Eating, or who indulge themſelves as much as they can after they have Faſted, as if it were to redeem the time they have loſt. He gives a natural and frightful repreſentation of Drunkenneſs, ſufficient to beget a horror of it; he diſſuades from it alſo from the Conſideration of the Body of Jeſus Chriſt which they are to receive. He ſays, that Faſting and Abſtinence are Ornaments to Cities, ſecure the Tranquility of Publick Aſſemblies, the Peace of Families, and the Preſervation of our Eſtates: He ſays, that to be perſuaded of this, they needed only to compare the Night of this preſent Day in which he Preached, with the Night of the next Day, (From whence it appears that this Day was a Publick Faſt.) At laſt he wiſhes, that in theſe Days wherein Chriſtians are called to the Practice of Faſting, they might learn to know the Efficacy of their Temperance to prepare them for that Great Day wherein God will reward their Virtue.

The Second Homily is alſo an Exhortation to Faſting. Therein he condemns thoſe who allowed themſelves great Liberties in Eating and Drinking before their Faſting. He ſays, that all Chriſtians of all Ages and Conditions are obliged to it. Laſtly, he ſpeaks of the principal Diſpoſition for profitable Faſting, which is to abſtain from Vice.

The third Homily about Faſting publiſhed by Cotelerius, is ſhorter than the two preceding; but it is written upon the ſame Principles, and upon the ſame Subject.

In the Third Homily upon theſe words, Take heed to your ſelves, St. Baſil recommends that Vigilance and Care which one ought to have over himſelf, that is to ſay, over his Soul, and his Behaviour. He ſays, that this Care is neceſſary for Sinners that they may amend their ways, and for the Innocent, leſt they ſhould fall: that the firſt have need to watch over themſelves to cure themſelves. 'You have committed, 'ſays he, a great Sin, you muſt then endure a long Pe'nance, you muſt ſhed bitter tears, you muſt paſs whole 'Nights in watching, you muſt Faſt continually. Though 'you have committed but a ſlight Sin, yet you muſt watch 'over your ſelves to do Penance for it; for it often hap'pens, that thoſe who have but a ſlight Sickneſs, become 'dangerouſly Sick when they neglect it.' After this he ſhews, that this Watchfulneſs is neceſſary to fulfil the Duties of all States and Conditions. He reproves thoſe that watch for the Faults of others, but never think of their own. He ſhews, that this Watchfulneſs is neceſſary to every Man in whatſoever ſtate he is, and that it is a Remedy to all our Evils, and to all our Paſſions. 'If you are ambitious, ſays 'he, if you are lifted up above meaſure, either upon the ac'count of your great Riches, or becauſe of your Nobility; 'if you take Pleaſure in your Beauty, if you are inſpired with a 'Paſſion for Glory, if you are Lovers of Pleaſures, you have 'nothing to do but to take heed to your ſelves, and you may 'know that you are Mortal, that you are Duſt, and ſhall return 'to Duſt. If Anger tranſports you to do brutal Actions, take 'heed to your ſelves, and you ſhall preſently be aſhamed of that 'Condition to which Anger has reduced you. In ſhort, 'this Watchfulneſs which you ſhould have over your ſelves, 'will make you know God. You will find ſome Foot'ſteps of him in your ſelves: your Soul will make you 'know that he is Spiritual; you will admire him who has 'made ſuch an excellent Piece of Workmanſhip, and the more

St. Basil.

'more you consider the Perfections of your Soul and Body, 'the more sublime Idea you will conceive of the Great- 'ness, the Power, and the Wisdom of God.

The 4*th*. Homily, intituled, of Thanksgiving, is about the Joy which St. Paul prescribes to Christians in these words of his Epistle to the Thessalonians: Rejoyce always, pray without ceasing, giving thanks to God for every thing. He explains in what sense Christians ought always to be Joyful: He says, that in order to their having this Joy, they must be like St. Paul; that is to say, they must live in Jesus Christ, and their Joy must not depend upon changes of Fortune, but it must be solid, and depend upon their own Good Conscience, and their hope of Eternal Happiness, which renders those Happy who are most Miserable in the Eyes of the World. He shews, that the Joys of this World are Afflictions to those that are Good; and on the contrary, the Afflictions of this World are an occasion of Joy to them. He explains in what sense Jesus Christ wept, and why the Saints have Power to weep. At last he exhorts all Christians to be no more sad, for the loss of this World's Goods; but on the contrary to rejoyce in the hope of those Good things that are to come.

He continues the same Subject in the following Homily which was made upon the Festival of St. Julita the Martyr. This Saint had a Law-Suit with a Man, which she commenced for all her Estate. 'Twas promis'd her, that she should gain her Cause, if she would renounce Jesus Christ, but she was assured that she should lose all if she should not agree to this Proposition. She answered with Courage: You shall sooner take away my Goods, and deprive me of my Life, than ever make me speak one single Word against my God. This Answer caus'd her to be condemned to the Fire wherein she expired; but her Body could not be burnt by the Flames. This is the History which St. Basil relates in this Sermon, upon which Occasion he pursues the preceding Discourse, and continues the Explication of the Words of St. Paul. He says, that the continual Prayer which God requires of us, does not consist in a vocal repeating of Prayers, but in the Design that one has to do Good. So according to him, if a Man would pray continually, he ought always to be united to God in his Actions and in every thing to follow his Will. At last, he says, that we must thank God and praise him for every thing, and that neither Losses, nor Diseases, nor Wrongs, nor Afflictions, nor the Death of our Relations, nor the other Miseries of this Life ought to hinder us from praising God, and giving him thanks continually; that in Adversity we ought to thank God, because 'tis good for us to be humbled; and we ought to praise him in Prosperity, saying to him in the Words of the Royal Prophet, O my God, what shall I render unto thee for all the Benefits that thou hast done unto me. He recites many Motives of Consolation in Adversity, taken from the Mercies of God, the Hope of future Happiness, the Wisdom of God, the Submission that is due to his Will, and the Miseries of others. And lastly, he assures us that nothing but Sin should make us weep, and that if Charity obliges us to mourn with those that mourn, that is only by a kind of Condescention which should not last long. At the end of this Homily, he reproves those who make themselves drunk to drive away Sadness.

The three following Homilies are about Riches, and against Covetousness. The First is upon the Words of the Rich Man mentioned in the Gospel, who seeing the Superabundance of his Goods, said, I will pull down my Barns, and I will build larger. He begins with this Remark, That Men have two great Temptations in this Life, great Adversity, and great Prosperity. That Job overcame the first, but the Rich Man in the Gospel was overcome by the last. After this he makes Reflections upon the Actions and the Punishment of this Rich Man, and says, they ought to teach us to be bountiful towards the Poor, and to make good use of our Riches. He observes, that we are only Stewards of our Riches; that all we have is for others; that we should imitate the Earth which brings forth her Fruit for others; that the good which we do will turn to our Profit; that 'tis more glorious to give than to receive; that 'tis an accursed thing to withhold Corn for a time of Dearth; that 'tis a piece of Inhumanity to despise the Poor; that Riches are unprofitable if they be not distributed; that the Thoughts of the Covetous are vain and senseless; and that they take a great deal of Pains to heap up Riches which they never enjoy. After this he answers the Objections of Covetous Men. One says, I will give to-morrow, to exempt himself from giving to-day. 'Alas! What do you know whether you shall be a- 'live to-morrow in this place? Another says, I am Poor, 'I have need enough my self of all my Means. Yes, you 'are poor, you are destitute, but it is of Charity, of Be- 'nignity, of Faith, of Mercy. A third says, whom do I 'wrong, I detain nothing but what is mine own; and 'here St. Basil is angry with this wicked Maxim. And I, says 'he, demand of you, Why do you say, that those Riches are 'your own? From whom did you receive them, and from 'whence did you bring them? Did not you come naked out 'of your Mother's Womb, and shall not you return naked 'to the Dust? From whence then did this present Wealth 'come? If you say it came by chance, you are Impious; 'if you confess that you received it from God, tell me, 'why did it fall to your Lot rather than another's? God 'is not unjust in the unequal Division of Goods which he 'makes amongst Men. Why then are you rich, and why 'is this Man poor? 'Tis that you who are rich, may re- 'ceive the Reward of dispensing your Goods faithfully, 'and that the poor Man may receive the Recompence of 'his Patience. And therefore when you appropriate to your 'self that Wealth which belongs to many particular Per- 'sons, and of which you are only a Steward; you are a 'Robber, you detain that which is none of your own. 'Yea, the Bread which you keep to your self, whereof 'you have more than serves for the use of your Family, 'belongs to the Poor who die for Famine; the Garments 'which you keep lock'd up in your Wardrobe, belong to 'the naked; the Money which you hide, belongs to the 'ruined, &c. These are fine Discourses, you will tell me, 'but Gold is yet a much finer thing. Thus does the Cove- 'tous Man talk, when he hears us preach. For, as it is 'some times seen, that the unchast hearing us speak con- 'temptuously of the Passion of Lust, do thereby receive a 'new Fire which stirs them up more violently than before; 'so also the Covetous hearing us discourse against Riches, 'conceive a greater Love and Passion for them. But what 'think they of these terrible Words of Jesus Christ, Go ye 'cursed into Eternal Fire; for I was a-hungry, and you gave 'me no Meat, I was a-thirst, and you gave me no Drink, &c. 'Not only those who take away another's Goods shall be 'then condemned, but also those who do not distribute of 'their Riches to the Poor.

St. Basil.

The second Homily is against those who have an insatiable desire of Enriching themselves. The Subject of this is the History of the Rich Young Man, who went away sad, when our Saviour bid him sell all that he had, and distribute the Price of it to the Poor. He shews by this Example, that 'tis unprofitable to keep the Commandments, if one does not give Alms; and that all other Virtues will avail nothing, if one's Heart be fixed to this World by an immoderate Love of Riches. He shews, that what is necessary, is not very much; and at the same time he proves, that the greatest part of rich Mens Expences are superfluous. He gives a very pleasant List of them in particulars, and which suit well enough with the manners of our Age. He dissuades from Avarice by the fear of Death and of Judgment, and by the meanness of Riches, and the bad Effects which they produce. Afterwards he refutes the most common Pretences which are made use of to excuse Covetousness. The first is founded upon the Uncertainty of what may come to pass: We know not, say they, the Accidents that may happen, or the Necessities we may be reduced to. 'But, says St. Basil, is not the use of your Treasures yet more 'uncertain? And tho' it were not, can you make use of this 'Excuse, while you spend your Wealth upon a thousand 'Superfluities? But I want it, say you, for my Children. 'This Excuse for Covetousness is plausible. You cover 'your selves with the Pretence of your Children, that you 'may satisfy your Lusts. Is it from you, that your Son re- 'ceived Life? Is it not from God who guides and pre- 'serves him? Ought he then to hinder you from obeying 'his Commandments? The Riches that you leave him, 'will, it may be, be the Occasion of his Ruin: Who knows 'whether he will make a good or bad use of them? Is 'not your Soul nearer to you than your Children? 'Tis 'for the good of that, that you should bestow the chief 'Part of your Riches in distributing to the Poor; and then 'afterwards, give to your Children what they stand in need 'of for their Livelihood. Those who have no Children, pre- 'tend the Necessities of this Life, as a Cloak for their 'Avarice. They would use what they have, they would 'neither sell any thing, nor give any thing away. St. Basil 'declares, that this Temper of Mind, is contrary to the 'Respect which is due to the Faith of Jesus Christ, and 'that it makes it void, whilst it forms to it self a Rule 'and Conduct contrary to the Maxims of the Gospel. At 'last, he refutes the Pretence of those who think to exempt 'themselves from giving Alms in their Life-time, by lea- 'ving their Goods by Will as Legacies to the Poor. Mi- 'serable Wretches that you are, says he to them, you will 'not then be liberal and charitable towards Men, till you 'cease to live! What Recompence can you expect for a 'Liberality which comes after Death? O brave Piety to 'practise no good Works but with Ink and Paper! You 'deceive your selves, and you think to fulfil the Com- 'mands of the Gospel in dying. Abraham nevertheless will 'tell you then; My Son, you enjoyed your good things 'and Pleasures in your Life-time: Do not your Actions 'shew, that you could have wish'd your selves to be im- 'mortal; that you might always have enjoyed your Riches, 'and that if you had been so, you would never have re- 'memb'red the Commands of God, and the Precepts of the 'Gospel; and therefore it is to Death, and not to you, 'that the Poor ought to give thanks for the Good you have 'done them. Do not deceive your selves, God will not 'be deceived, he will not be thus mocked; that which is

St. Baſil. ‘dead is not to be offered unto the Sanctuary, offer up a living ‘Sacrifice. He that offers up only the remains of the Sa- ‘crifices is an ungrateful Perſon.

St. Baſil treats alſo of Alms in a Homily, which was made upon the occaſion of a great Famine and Dearth. After he has deſcribed theſe Calamities, he ſays, that the hard heartedneſs of the Rich to the Poor, was the cauſe of them. ‘The Fields are barren, ſays he, becauſe Charity is wax- ‘ed cold.’ He obſerves, that publick Prayers were made, but in ſo bad a manner, and with ſo much diſtraction that they were not heard; That Children were ſent to them, whereas the Heads of Families ſhould have come themſelves, to beg God's Mercy for their Sins. He relates the Example of the Ninivites; he exhorts Perſons of all conditions to give Alms according to their ability. ‘You are ‘poor, ſays he, but you may find many poorer than you: ‘You have Corn for two Days, and there are ſome who ‘have it only for to Day. If you are Good and Charita- ‘ble, divide equally what you have left, with him that ‘has nothing; be never the more backward to give him be- ‘cauſe you have but little left for your ſelves; you prefer ‘your private Intereſt and Advantage to the common danger ‘of many poor People. For though you had no more but ‘one Loaf, if a miſerable Wretch ſhall beg of you one Mor- ‘ſel of it, do not refuſe him, and when you give it to him, ‘lift up your Hands towards Heaven, and ſay theſe Juſt ‘and Charitable Words: “Lord, I have but this one Loaf “which you ſee, and I ſee my ſelf in danger of having no “more; but I prefer thy Commandment to the Love of “my ſelf; and of the little that I have, I give a Charity to “my Brother, who is ſore pinched with Hunger. Give al- “ſo an Alms on your part, O my God, to your Servant, “who runs a hazard of wanting Victuals. I know your “Goodneſs, and put my Truſt in your Sovereign Power, “you will not long delay the Relief of your Liberal Hand, “but ſcatter abundantly in a few Days the gifts of your “Magnificence.” ’Tis certain, adds he, that thoſe who rely ‘upon Divine providence, are like the Springs and Fountains ‘which are not dry'd up by drawing from them, but ſend ‘forth their Waters with a greater Force than before. If ye ‘are Poor, lend your Money upon Intereſt to God who ‘is Rich.’ Afterwards he repreſents the Miſery and Pain of Hunger, and deſcribes in a moſt moving manner the Extremity of a Man languiſhing for want of Food, to beget the greater horror of the Cruelty and Barbarity of Covetous Rich Men, who ſuffer their Brethren to die for Hunger when they are able to aſſiſt them. He obſerves, That in a time of publick Neceſſity eſpecially, we muſt give conſiderable Alms, and that we muſt expiate our Sins by Charity to the Poor. At laſt, he admoniſhes the Poor not to throw themſelves into Deſpair, but to put their Truſt in the Mercy of God, who has ſometimes plentifully fed the Juſt after an extraordinary manner. He exhorts them to ſuffer with Patience like Job, to conſider their Miſery as the Trial of their Virtue, to give thanks to God, to beſtow ſomething to the Poor, even of their Neceſſaries, aſſuring them that this is the way to procure the Multiplication of their Loaves, as God did formerly multiply the Cruiſe of Meal to the Widow of Sarepta.

To theſe three Sermons may be joyned the Homily wherein he proves, That we muſt not ſet our Hearts upon the Riches and Pleaſures of this World. There he ſhews, that the only Care which we ought to be concerned for, is that of our Souls; that we ought to rid our Minds of the Love of Riches, and give bountifully to the Poor. After this he deſcribes a Fire, which it was feared might have burnt down the City: He conjures thoſe that eſcaped this great Calamity, to relieve thoſe that ſuffered, and exhorts theſe laſt to Patience by the Example of Job, whoſe Hiſtory he explains.

The 10*th*. Homily is againſt Anger; where firſt he excites a horror of this Paſſion, by giving a Deſcription of its miſchievous Effects; and then he ſhews, That we can have no juſt Excuſe for this Paſſion of Anger, by ſhewing that all the Pretences which are alledged for it are falſe. The firſt is an Injury which we may think we have received. But St. Baſil ſhews, that we ought not to render Injury for Injury, and that we muſt not imitate our Enemy, nor follow his Footſteps and Example. He adds, That whatſoever outrage has been done to us, we need do no more but remember that we are Duſt, and ſhall return to Duſt, to convince us that we have deſerved all ſorts of Reproaches and Diſgraces: That by ſhewing Meekneſs we revenge our ſelves of our Enemies, that we acquire the Glory of being mild and patient, and that Silence upon this Occaſion deſerves the Rewards of Heaven. Reproaches are another Cauſe of Anger: But St. Baſil ſhews, That even this is ill-grounded, becauſe theſe Reproaches are either true or falſe; if they are true, we are to blame if we trouble our ſelves for them; if they are falſe, our Anger for them gives Cauſe to ſuſpect that they are true. But he called me poor, ſays one: ‘If that ‘be true, ſays St. Baſil, bear with it; if it be falſe, What ‘does it concern you? ’Tis no ſhame to be poor, for you ‘came naked into the World, and Jeſus Chriſt being rich ‘would appear poor in it. He treated me as a Fool and an ‘Ignorant Fellow, will another ſay. Yet many more re- ‘proachful Words were ſpoken of Jeſus Chriſt. But yet, ‘How can we forbear being angry, when we are abuſed, ‘and buffeted, when we are beaten and torn in pieces? ‘Will others ſay. Jeſus Chriſt did alſo ſuffer more than ‘all this, anſwers St. Baſil.’ Laſtly, St. Baſil preſcribes Rules to avoid Anger, as not to think more highly of our ſelves than others, to hearken with a Philoſophical Temper to the Diſcourſes of a Man that is truly angry with Sin, with the Devil, with Error, with the Enemies of God; to practiſe Humility, and conſider the Miſeries of Men. He concludes with ſome New Reaſons to diſſuade Men from Anger. St. Baſil.

The 11*th*. Homily is againſt Envy. In the firſt Part, he reckons up the Reaſons which may inſpire a Man with hatred of this Vice. He ſays, That ’tis a Vice proper to the Devil, which gnaws and conſumes him in whom it is found, tho’ he receives no Profit by it, and which is always accompanied with Melancholy and Vexation of Spirit, and that an envious Man is the unhappieſt Man in the World. Laſtly, he deſcribes all the troubleſome Conſequences, and miſerable Effects of Envy; and he ſays, That the beſt way to cure this Vice, is to have no great Eſteem of the things of this World, to deſpiſe its periſhable Goods, and to place all our Happineſs in the Hope of a future Life, to believe that nothing but Virtue is a ſolid and true Good, and to deſire nothing elſe.

The 14*th*. Homily is againſt Drunkenneſs. It was compoſed upon the occaſion of a Diſorder which happened upon Eaſter-Eve. Probably there had been at that time ſome prophane Recreations; the Men and Women without any Reverence for the Vigils of ſo Holy a Feſtival, had made Feaſts, and the Women had aſſembled, and were come to dance and ſing, even to Places where the Bodies of the Martyrs were kept. ‘St. Baſil having ſeen this Diſorder, ‘was ſenſibly touched as he ſays of himſelf at the begin- ‘ning of his Diſcourſe; That after ſo many Exhortations, ‘after ſeven Weeks faſting, after being preſent ſo many ‘times at the Service of the Church and the Sermons, du- ‘ring the time of Lent, they had deſtroyed in one Day the ‘Fruit of all his Labours. He ſays, that he knew not whe- ‘ther he ſhould hold his Peace, or whether he ſhould ſpeak; ‘That he ſhould have held his Peace, but that he feared the ‘Chaſtiſement of Jeremy, for having refuſed to Preach to ‘an unbelieving and rebellious People; That Drunkenneſs ‘was the Source of this Diſorder, and that he muſt now ‘Preach againſt this Vice.’ This is in Effect the Subject of this Homily, wherein he poſſeſſes Men's Minds with a great Horror of this Crime, and deſcribes the pernicious Effects of it. Towards the end of it, he returns to the Exceſſes of the preceding Day. He cries out againſt their Songs and Dances, againſt their immoderate Laughter, againſt their Apparel, which was neither decent nor modeſt; and he exhorts thoſe of his Hearers who had been of this Company, to cure themſelves of Drunkenneſs by Faſting, to ſing Pſalms inſtead of the merry Songs which they had ſung, to turn their Laughter into Mourning, and their Dancing into Kneeling; and in ſhort, to leave off their ſumptuous and magnificent Apparel, and to put on that which is more agreeable to Modeſty and Chriſtian Humility.

The 22*d*. Homily is of Humility. He begins it with obſerving, That Man loſt his Dignity by the Sin of Adam, and that he cannot recover it but by Humility: That the Devil uſes all his Endeavours to deſtroy this Virtue, and to deprive us of it, by poſſeſſing us with a great Eſteem of Riches, of Honours, and the Advantages of Body and Mind. But he ſhews, That a Man ought not to glory in all thoſe things, which are no ways permanent, but paſs away in a Moment; That the only true Glory of man, is to know God, to be fully perſuaded of his own Miſery, and to believe that we are juſtified only by Faith in Jeſus Chriſt, and that we ought to attribute all to God. This is the great Principle of St. Auſtin about Grace, which St. Baſil explains in this place, adding that we can do nothing without the Aſſiſtance and Grace of Jeſus Chriſt; that ’tis a Folly and Stupidity to think that the Grace of Jeſus Chriſt is a Natural Power; That St. Peter who anſwered with a Spirit of Pride to Jeſus Chriſt, telling him, Though all your Diſciples ſhould be offended yet will I never be offended, was abandoned to human Weakneſs, and ſo fell into Sin. He ſpeaks afterwards of the other part of Humility, which is, not to exalt our ſelves above others, not to eſteem our ſelves more than them, not to deſpiſe them becauſe of their Faults; but to believe our ſelves much greater Sinners than they. He exhorts his Auditors to imitate the Life of Jeſus Chriſt which was a continued Courſe of Actions of Humility; he would have a Chriſtian imitate his Maſter, and give Signs of Humility in all his Behaviour. ‘Your Humility, ſays he, muſt ‘appear in the Plainneſs of your Apparel, in the Modeſty ‘of your Ornaments, in your Gait, in the Frugality of ‘your Table, in the Tone of your Voice, in the Simpli- ‘city of your Furniture, in the Order of your Houſe, in ‘the Manner of accoſting and ſaluting your Brethren. Take ‘heed that you do not diſcover in your Diſcourſe and in ‘your Actions a ſtately and affected Way, and be affable

St. Basil. ‘ to your Friends, mild towards your Domesticks, patient with ‘ the Passionate, and courteous to Inferiors. Comfort the Af- ‘ flicted, visit the Sick, despise no body, be pleasant in your Re- ‘ quests, chearful in your Answers, complaisant and easy to all ‘ the World; do not praise your selves, do not despise those ‘ who praise themselves, hide as much as you can your own ‘ Merit and Virtue, accuse your selves of your Sins without ‘ waiting for the Reproof of others, be not troublesome nor ‘ severe in your Reproofs, neither let them be given in ‘ Anger; condemn not your Neighbour for small Faults, ‘ have a Compassion and Tenderness for those that have ‘ sinned. In short, shun the Praises of Men, by all the ways ‘ that others use to purchase Glory, and think not to please ‘ any but God only. In a word, put on Humility, and by ‘ this means you shall arrive at Glory, Jesus Christ will ac- ‘ knowledge you for his Disciple, and will glorify you.

The Subject of the 21st. Homily which was pronounced at Laciza, in a publick Assembly, is more complex than that of the preceding. There he exhorts those to whom he speaks, to remember the spiritual Discourses which were read to them in the Morning, for finding out Remedies against Temptations. He recommends to them, to have no regard to the Condition of Men in this World, but to consider all Christians as Brethren, to treat the Poor and Rich alike, and the Small as well as the Great, because nothing but Sin puts a Difference between Men. He dissuades them afterwards from the three principal Vices, which are Anger, Envy, and Covetousness. He repeats in this Homily many things which are found in those whereof we have already spoken. He observes in it, that these kind of Assemblies meet every Year; That the People who cannot have Preachers every day who are able to teach them these things, may learn them at least once a-Year by coming to these publick Festivals.

The 30th. Homily is an Exhortation to the Catechumens who delay or neglect to receive Baptism. He says in his Exordium, That tho' one may lawfully receive Baptism at any time, yet the time of Easter is the most proper time for receiving it: That for this Reason, the Church as a good Mother, invites at this time all the Catechumens to receive Baptism. He exhorts them to receive it, First, because if the Jews ran with so much Earnestness to receive the Baptism of St. John, 'tis very fit that they should shew yet more Earnestness to receive the Baptism of Jesus Christ, which is far greater, more excellent, and more effectual than that of his forerunner. Secondly, because 'tis dangerous to delay, and oftentimes Men are surprized by Death, and because without Baptism, we can have no part in the Kingdom of Heaven, nor can we be delivered from the Tyranny of the Devil. ‘ If one were to distribute, says he, Gold and Silver; if he ‘ were to give Temporal Favours in any Place, all the ‘ World would run thither: Wherefore then do ye not run ‘ to Baptism? If one promises to remit all the Debts of a- ‘ nother, will not the Debtor run to receive his Promise? ‘ When therefore the Business is to receive Remission of ‘ your Sins, What Reason have you to delay? If one be ‘ guilty of many Faults, Grace is promised in greater A- ‘ bundance to those who have more Sins. If you be afraid ‘ of sinning, Why do you trouble your self about the time ‘ to come? Seeing you are well conducted through the ‘ time past, after having lived to the World, you must live ‘ to God. Baptism is the sign by which a Christian is ‘ known; it changes a Man entirely. He must not put off ‘ living well till Old Age, which is nothing but to mock ‘ God, by giving him the last years of Life, after he has ‘ bestowed the Prime of his Years upon the Devil and the ‘ World, upon his Pleasures and his Sins. Temperance in ‘ Old Age is no longer a Virtue, 'tis a sign of Weakness ‘ which will never be rewarded. Moreover, he is not cer- ‘ tain that he shall be in a Condition to receive Baptism, ‘ he may die suddenly, he may fall into a Sickness, which ‘ shall take away his Speech and his Senses: 'Tis very dif- ‘ ficult when a Man is sick to lift up his Head to Heaven, ‘ to raise himself, to kneel down, to pray, to hearken to ‘ what is taught him, to understand it, to make profession ‘ of it, to make an Agreement with God, and to renounce, ‘ as he must, the Devil. There is nothing but the Love of ‘ Licentiousness that can dissuade Men from receiving Bap- ‘ tism; because the Laws of Christianity punish Vice severe- ‘ ly, and exact of Men a most regular way of Living: ‘ These require that we should be upright in Heart, mode- ‘ rate in our Words, humble in our Thoughts and Acti- ‘ ons, and pure in our Intentions. They forbid all Passion ‘ and Revenge, they command us to love our Enemies, ‘ to yield to Violence, to suffer Persecution, to die to Sin, ‘ to mortifie our Body, and to be crucified with Jesus Christ. ‘ But, you will say, this is hard and difficult; 'Tis so, but ‘ what Happiness is there in this World, which is easie to ‘ obtain? Who hath ever won the Prize without Trouble? ‘ Can one hope for the Reward of a brave Man by spen- ‘ ding his Life in Pleasures? Can one obtain the Victory ‘ without running? We must enter into the Kingdom of ‘ Heaven through much Trouble and Labour. Those who ‘ do the Works of the Devil, have they less Trouble than ‘ we? Are they more exempt from Labour, &c.

St. Basil. ‘ But, 'tis difficult, say you, to preserve the Treasure of ‘ Grace, and the Innocence of Baptism: Must we then re- ‘ fuse a good thing for fear of being deprived of it? If you ‘ watch over your selves, if you be constant in Praying, in ‘ Fasting, in Singing of Psalms, and in the practice of the ‘ other Exercises of a Christian, you shall preserve your ‘ Treasure.' Afterwards, he represents in a lively manner, the Remorse which they shall have at the Day of Judgment who shall see themselves condemned for want of receiving Baptism. He represents the Despair which shall seize upon them; and concludes from all these motives, that they ought quickly to purge away their Sins by Baptism. This Exhortation is admirably suited to the Christians of our Age, who delay from day to day to do Penance for their Sins, and forsake their Disorders.

The 24th. Homily to Young Men, about Reading Gentile Books is very curious. He does not absolutely forbid the Reading and Study of Prophane Books; but he desires, First, that they would not dwell upon them, and that they would not look upon this Study as the principal Thing of their Life, but that they would be persuaded, that the principal Knowledge is that of working out their own Salvation; and that this Knowledge is to be learnt in the Holy Scripture. 2. That they should Read Prophane Books with Discretion, and not give Attention to the Evil that is in them, but only to the Examples and Discourses which may be Useful, and which lead Men to Virtue. He relates a great Number of Examples and Instructions, which he drew from all sorts of prophane Authors. These are all the Moral Homilies of St. Basil; I have now only to speak of his Panegyricks; for that of Julita is rather a Moral Discourse than a Commendation of that Saint.

In the Exordium of the Panegyrick of St. Gordus. St. Basil says, that Christians celebrate the Festivals of Saints, and praise their Actions, to glorifie God in his Servants, to rejoyce the Righteous, and to excite all the Faithful to their imitation. He observes that the Saints have no need of our praises; That 'tis sufficient to relate their Lives, that so their Virtues may serve for a Pattern to others. He adds, that the Nobility of Extraction, the Family, the Education, the Masters are the Subject of Praise in Prophane Panegyricks; but Christians have no other Subject of Praise, but the peculiar Virtues of those whom they commend. After this, he gives an account of the Life of St. Gordus. He says, that this Saint was of Cæsarea, and that he had the Command of a Hundred Men in the Emperour's Army; That in his time a furious Persecution was raised against the Church, which St. Basil describes; That then this Saint of his own accord quitted his Office of Captain, and retired into a Solitary Place; That after he had been there exercised, purified and prepared for the Combate, he came into the City one Day, when all the People were assembled to see a publick Show which was presented upon the Theatre, and declared who he was; that being led to the Tribunal of the Judge, he made profession of Christianity; that nothing could shake his Constancy, but he went with Courage to the place of Punishment; and that after he was fortified with the Sign of the Cross, he boldly received the stroke of Death. St. Basil describes this History very eloquently, and introduces this Martyr, saying many fine things, and well-worthy of his Constancy. I wonder that he did not excuse his Zeal for coming and presenting himself to the Combat, which seemed to be contrary to Christian Prudence, to the Rules of the Church, and the Determinations of the Holy Fathers. 'Tis believed that this Saint suffered Martyrdom under Licinius.

The History of the Forty Martyrs related in the following Homily, happened also under this Emperor. St. Basil begins it with saying, That the Martyrs could not be praised too much for the Three Reasons which he alledged in the preceding Panegyrick: First, because we testifie by this Remembrance of those who were the Servants of God, the respect we owe to our common Master. Secondly, Because we celebrate the Praises of the Martyrs, that we may make our own Wills suffer Martyrdom. And Lastly, That Men may be induced to imitate their Virtues.

These 40 Martyrs were 40 Soldiers, who being at Sebastea during the Persecution of Licinius, declared that they were Christians. When the Governor of the City saw, that their Constancy could not be shaken, nor they persuaded by fair means, to change their Religion, he ordered them to be exposed in the Night all naked to the rigour of the Air, at a time when a Pond near the City was quite frozen over: They resolved all to endure this Torment with Constancy; but one of them being overcome by Pain, renounced the Faith of Jesus Christ, but he lost his Soul, and could not save his Life; for he was no sooner put into warm Water to bring some heat into him again, but he expired. However, God permitted that the Number of the 40 Martyrs should be compleat, for one of their Guards perceiving the Angels who distributed to each of them a Crown, made profession of being a Christian, and put himself in their Number, and was Baptized in his own Blood, and saved by his Faith. The next Morning they were all Burnt, and their Ashes thrown into the River. This is the History

St. Baſil. of the 40 Martyrs, as it is related by St. Baſil. 'Tis commonly believed that they were expoſed all Night in the Pond; but this proceeds from a miſ-underſtanding of St. Baſil's words, who ſays expreſly, That they were expoſed to the Air in the Middle of the City, at a time when the Pond hard by was all frozen over. 'Tis this which makes the Confuſion. He adds one notable Circumſtance, That the Mother of one of thoſe 40 Martyrs exhorted her Son to ſuffer boldly. Laſtly, he ſays, that thoſe 40 Martyrs protect the City of Cæſarea; that the Chriſtians can find aſſiſtance by their Prayers; that if we ſhould ardently deſire for us the Prayers of one Martyr only, we ought much more to beg the Interceſſion of 40; That whether we be in affliction, or in a joyful condition, 'tis good to have recourſe to them, either to be delivered from Evil, or to be continued in Proſperity; That they hear the Prayers of Mothers who Pray for their Children, and of Women who pray for the Return or Health of their Husbands. Let us pray then together with theſe Martyrs, ſays he, concluding his Diſcourſe, let us joyn our Prayers with theirs.

In the Panegyrick of the Martyr Mamas, which is the 24*th*. he praiſes this Holy Martyr who had been a Shepherd; ſeeing that he probably had but little to ſay of him, he enlarges in this Homily upon the Praiſes of Shepherds, and gives a Catalogue of the Great Men, who had kept Flocks. Towards the end, he make a Digreſſion againſt the Arians: 'tis believed that this Mamas ſuffered under the Emperor Aurelian.

The Panegyrick upon the Martyr Barlaam, is a very ſhort Diſcourſe; wherein he praiſes this generous Confeſſor, who had endured with Conſtancy the Burning of his Hand, rather than ſuffer the Incenſe to fall into a little Box, which was upon the Prophane Altar of an Idol.

The Aſcetical Treatiſes of St. Baſil are very uſeful, not only to the Monks, but alſo to all thoſe that make profeſſion of Piety, and contain the Rules of the Morality of Jeſus Chriſt, which agree to all the World.

The three Firſt Treatiſes which are at the beginning of the Aſceticks, are diſtinct Diſcourſes which have no Reference to them; though the Firſt is entituled, A Preface to the Aſceticks. 'Tis an Exhortation to thoſe who have embraced a Monaſtick Life, wherein he endeavours to perſuade them, that they are engaged as Soldiers in a Spiritual Warfare, and that they ought to fulfil all the Obligations of it. The Second alſo, is, An Exhortation to a Monaſtick Life; wherein he repreſents the Advantages of Celibacy, and of the Practices of Religion.

The third, which is entituled, Of a Monaſtick Life, contains many Precepts which concern thoſe who retire from the World.

Theſe three Treatiſes are diſtinct Diſcourſes, but the two following of Faith and Judgment are the Preface, or the Firſt Book of the Aſceticks. We muſt begin with the Book of Judgment, and joyn to it that of Faith, which ends with a little Preface to the Aſceticks; and all theſe make only one Preface to the whole Work. He declares there, that having been educated in the Chriſtian Religion, and inſtructed from his Youth in the Doctrine of the Holy Books, when he came to the Years of diſcretion, he perceived that there was much Union among the Profeſſors of Arts and Sciences; but that he found great Diviſions in the Church of Jeſus Chriſt, that he was ſometime in doubt which Party he ſhould chooſe; and that meditating upon this Subject, he came to know that the greateſt Evil was Schiſm and Diviſion, which proceeded from the Ignorance and Sin of thoſe who did not obey the Commands of God, and followed not his Law: That having afterwards reflected upon the terrible Judgments of God upon theſe Perſons, he believed himſelf obliged to adhere to the Faith of the Church, and to meditate on thoſe Precepts of the Holy Scripture which concern the manners and behaviour of Men: That being then perſuaded, that nothing but Faith working by Love, would avail any thing, he believed that 'twas Neceſſary after the Explication of the Faith of the Church, and the Doctrine which is to be held concerning the Trinity, to write a Book of Manners.

This Concluſion of the Book of Judgment, ſhews that after it, followed the Treatiſe of Faith; wherein he ſays many fine things concerning the Virtue of Faith, and then Expounds the Doctrine of the Church, and makes Profeſſion of the Divinity of the Son and the Holy Spirit, whom he affirms to be of the ſame ſubſtance with the Father. He Exhorts thoſe to whom he wrote, to keep to the Simplicity of this Faith, which is founded upon the Authority of the Holy Scripture, and he prays God that they may always continue inviolably fixed in it. At laſt, having explained this Faith, he declares, that he has collected into one Body many Precepts taken out of the New Teſtament.

Theſe Precepts are compriſed in 80 Rules, divided into ſeveral Chapters. To theſe muſt be joyned the 84 Great Rules and the 313 Small ones, which are anſwers to ſeveral Moral Queſtions, that comprehend all that is moſt Excellent in Chriſtian Morality. Theſe are they which make up the Body of St. Baſil's Ethicks or Aſceticks, divided into two Books, as we have obſerved. They may be conſulted concerning all the Offices and Actions of a Chriſtian Life. They may be uſeful to all States and Conditions, and one may ſay that St. Baſil has there collected, and methodically digeſted all the Practical Part of the Goſpel. Upon which Account Photius had Reaſon to ſay, that whoſoever ſhall follow theſe Precepts, ſhall undoubtedly be ſaved. St. Baſil.

The Book of the Inſtructions of Monks, and of Monaſtical Conſtitutions, are two Books diſtinct from the Aſceticks, which contain many Precepts and Rules for the Monks, that are not ſo general nor ſo uſeful to all the World as the Treatiſe of Morality.

To know the Genius and Doctrine of St. Baſil, we can addreſs our ſelves to none better than to his Faithful Friend, Gregory Nazianzen. See then how he ſpeaks of him. He compares his Eloquence to a Trumpet ſounding in the Air, to a Divine Word which ſhall be ſpread over the whole Earth, to a wonderful Whirl-wind raiſed after a very Surprizing Manner. He ſays, that he has dived into the moſt hidden Secrets of the Holy Scripture, which he has made uſe of to Inſtruct all Men, and to make them loſe the Reliſh of things preſent, and fall in Love only with things to come. That his Writings are the Object of the Admiration of all Perſons, and the Pleaſure and Study of all Men of worth. The Authors that wrote after him, ſays he, ſay nothing but what they have drawn out of his Works: The Ancients are neglected, and nothing is minded but what he has ſaid anew. In a word, he alone is ſufficient to make an able Man.

'When I read his Treatiſe of the Creation, adds St. Gregory, methinks I am preſent with the Creator; when I 'light upon the Books which he wrote againſt Hereticks, 'methinks I ſee the Fire of Sodom which reduced thoſe 'criminal Tongues to aſhes; when I peruſe what he has 'written of the Holy Spirit, I acknowledge the God whom 'I poſſeſs, and I make no Scruple to publiſh boldly the 'Truth; when I read the Explications of Scripture which 'he has made for the Illiterate, I underſtand the deep Abyſſes of Myſteries; when I hear his Panegyricks of the Martyrs, I deſpiſe my own Body. I fancy my ſelf preſent 'with thoſe whom he praiſes, and I feel my ſelf excited to 'the Combat; when I ſet my ſelf to read the Diſcourſes 'which he has written concerning Morals, and the manner of living Well, my Heart and my Soul are purified 'that they may become the Temple of the Holy Spirit; 'they reform me, they inſtruct me, they change me, and 'lead me unto Virtue.' We are not here to think, that St. Gregory Nazianzen in ſaying all this, heightned the Matter as an Orator, or flattered him as a Friend; what he ſays is very true, and there is not any Author whoſe Writings make a greater Impreſſion than thoſe of St. Baſil: He deſcribes things ſo lively, he explains his Reaſons with ſo much force, he urges them ſo vigorouſly, he makes ſuch loathſome Portraictures of Vice, ſuch perſuaſive Exhortations to Virtue, he gives ſo large and ſo profitable Inſtructions, that 'tis impoſſible to read his Writings, but one muſt feel himſelf Inſtructed and Convinced of the Truth, and he cannot but conceive a Love for Virtue and a Hatred of Vice. His Diſcourſes are not void of Thoughts, and full of Words, as for the moſt Part thoſe of Orators are; but Eloquence is there joyned with Doctrine, they Inſtruct, they Divert, and they Move at once. His Stile is Pure and Significant, his Expreſſions are Lofty, his way of Writing Elegant, Clean and perſuaſive; his Diſcourſes appear always Natural, flowing Gently, and without Affectation: He perſuades Pleaſantly, he explains things with great Clearneſs, he knows how to give them ſo probable a turn, that he may be taken for a Pattern; and he comes near Demoſthenes, and the ableſt Orators of Antiquity, in the Judgment of the learned Photius; and even in the Judgment of Eraſmus, he excells the Antient Greek Orators, and is free from their Faults. He was fit for all kinds of Writings. His Commentaries upon Scripture are moſt Inſtructive and moſt Natural: He excells in his Panegyricks. The force and Subtilty of his Reaſoning appear in his Treatiſes of Controverſy; his Diſcourſes of Morality are Inſtructive and Moving. In ſhort, tho' his Aſceticks have not the ſame loftineſs as his other Works, yet there one may find the ſame Purity of Phraſe, and the ſame Clearneſs; but his Method renders them ſometimes a little obſcure. In a word, whatever Subject he treats of, he does it always very learnedly. He had all the Properties of a Divine, underſtanding perfectly the Holy Scripture, the Tradition of the Fathers, and the Canons of the Church: He was a very able Rhetorician, a very profound Philoſopher, and a very ſubtil Logician. He underſtood alſo the Mathematicks, and his own continual Sickneſs made him a Phyſician: He underſtood Philological learning to Perfection, and made uſe of it to very good purpoſe. He knew all that was moſt Curious in the Poets, the Hiſtorians, and prophane Orators, as may appear from many places of his Writings, and chiefly from his little Tract of reading prophane Authors. In a word, that which is indeed admirable is, that he joyned with this learning, a profound Piety, and a ſingular Prudence. He was Sweet and Affable to all the World, Charitable towards the Poor, and Compaſſionate to others in Miſery. He was accus'd of being Proud,

St. Basil. but St. Gregory Nazianzen who ſuſpected him of this Vice, vindicates him from it in his Panegyrick. He was of a very infirm Health, and ſubject to many Diſeaſes; he ſpeaks of them in the moſt part of his Letters, and alſo in ſome of his Homilies. St. Gregory Nazianzen informs us, that he was pale, that he wore always a great Beard, that he was reſerved in his Speech, often thoughtful and penſive, had a particular way in his Apparel, in his Bed and his Meat, which ſome would imitate after his Death.

The Doctrine of St. Baſil is very Pure and Orthodox. He has explained the Myſtery of the Trinity againſt the Hereticks, clearly and beyond Conteſt: tho' at the beginning he was reſerved in his Expreſſions about the Divinity of the Holy Spirit, yet he always owned it, and never ſpoke contrary to what he thought. He never us'd any other Precaution, but to be ſilent upon that Point, when he thought it not neceſſary to ſpeak of it, or that it would be to no purpoſe. He was one of thoſe who troubled himſelf moſt to diſtinguiſh the three Hypoſtaſes in God; that is to ſay, to prove, that Hypoſtaſis and Perſon ſignify the ſame thing. As to the Myſtery of the Incarnation, he acknowledged in Jeſus Chriſt two Natures without Confuſion, and yet united in one and the ſame Perſon. He rejected the Error of the Apollinarians and Theopaſſians, and maintained with the Church that the Properties of the human Nature do by no means agree to the Divinity. He affirmed ſeveral times, that the Cauſe and Reaſon why the Son of God was made Man, was the Salvation and Redemption of Mankind, polluted by the Sin of Adam. He knew the Greatneſs of that Fall and the miſerable Effects which it produced, as Concupiſcence, Sickneſs, Death, &c. He eſtabliſhed the Neceſſity of the Grace of Jeſus Chriſt without which it is impoſſible to do Good. He is the only Perſon of the Greek Fathers who ſpoke moſt clearly of it, and attributed leaſt to Free-will, tho' he owned it. He admitted the Efficacy and Neceſſity of Baptiſm: Yet he believed that this Sacrament might be ſupplied by Faith and Charity, and by the Baptiſm of Blood, and that it ſignified nothing, at leaſt to thoſe that had not Faith, and were not well diſpos'd to receive it: He mentions the Unction that accompanied it, and approves the Ceremonies that were joyned with it: He called the Euchariſt the Body and Blood of Jeſus Chriſt: Tho' he was of Opinion, that we ſhould Communicate often, yet he requires Holy Diſpoſitions in thoſe who receive this Myſtery. He ſpeaks of the Ceremonies and Prayers that were made uſe of for the Offering, and of the Manner in which it was diſtributed to the Faithful: He obſerves, That they carried it and kept it in their Houſes, and that they believed it was always Conſecrated. He commends Faſting, and ſpeaks of Lent as a Faſt to which we are obliged. He has alſo obſerved, That it was attended with Abſtinence from Meat. He ſpeaks of the Uſage of Invocating Saints and Martyrs. He is perſuaded that they pray for us, and that their Interceſſion is very profitable. He prefers Celibacy to Marriage. He approves of Vows and a Monaſtick State. He acknowledges the Authority of Traditions, as well as that of Scripture. However, he has ſome particular Opinions, as when he maintains in the Firſt Homily of the Creation, that the Angels were created long before the World; and when he affirms in another place, that all Men ſhall be Purified at the Day of Judgment by Fire. But there are very few of this ſort of ſlight Errors in this Author. There were alſo ſome Expreſſions objected to him which appeared Hyperbolical or leſs Exact; but 'tis eaſy to give them a good Senſe. I ſhall not ſtay to make a large Enumeration of his Opinions, which I have explained at length in the Extracts out of his Works. I conclude therefore with giving a Catalogue of the Tranſlations and Editions of the Works of this Father.

The Firſt Edition of the Works of St. Baſil in Greek is that of Frobenius, printed at Baſle in the Year 1532. It contains the Homilies upon the Creation and the Pſalms, 29 different Homilies, the Book of the Holy Spirit, and ſome Letters. After it followed the Edition at Venice made by Sabius, in the Year 1537. in which are added the Three firſt Books againſt Eunomius.

At laſt, in the Year 1551, almoſt all the Works of St. Baſil were printed in Greek at Paris, by the Care of Janus Cornarius; who alſo printed them in Latin by Frobenius in the Year 1549.

Wolfgangus Muſculus made a New Edition at Baſle, in 1565, by Oporinus, and added the Commentaries upon Iſaiah and 20 Letters. Gothofredus Tilmannus a Carthuſian of Paris, was the firſt Roman Catholick that took Pains to make a Latin Edition of St. Baſil's Works. He Revis'd and Corrected the Verſions, and Tranſlated ſome Books over again, and made a larger Latin Edition of St. Baſil than all the foregoing, which was printed at Paris in 1566, and re-printed at Antwerp in 1578, and at Paris by Sonnius in 1603. This is the largeſt of all the Latin Editions of this Father's Writings.

The Firſt Edition in Greek and Latin was in the Year 1618, printed at Paris in three Volumes: In it the Greek Text was Corrected by many Manuſcripts from England, and by ſome out of the King of France's Library. At the End of the third Volume there are the Notes of Fronto Ducæus, and of Morellus, with the various Readings, Collected by Schottus. The laſt Edition of 1638, is not ſo fine and correct as the former: But it contains more by 200 Letters, than had ever been printed before. St. Baſil.

Beſides theſe Editions of the moſt part, or all St. Baſil's Works, there are alſo ſome particular Treatiſes printed apart, ſome in Greek and ſome in Latin, and their Editions are not to be neglected, becauſe commonly the Great Editions are made from them; but 'tis difficult to gather them all together. Theſe are all that I could find. The Homilies of the Creation of Euſtathius's Verſion, printed at Paris by Badius, Corrected by Faber in 1520. Some Homilies tranſlated by Volateranus, printed at Cologne in 1531. The Aſceticks tranſlated by Fumancellus, were printed by Gryphius in 1540. The Rules in 1575 at Cologne, and all the Aſceticks in 1560. The Book of the Holy Spirit tranſlated by Eraſmus, at Baſle in 1532. The Homilies upon the Creation at Leipſick in 1566. The Books againſt Eunomius of Beza's Verſion in 1520. The Diſcourſe of Faſting at Paris in 1613, at Rome in 1532, by Galeſinius. The Homily upon the Nativity, and of Anger, in Greek, at Paris, in 1587. That of Drunkenneſs at Hanover in 1594. The Homily upon the 40 Martyrs, Greek and Latin, by Stenius at Heidelberg in 1604, and with the Notes of Voſſius at Mentz in 1614. The Letter of Communion is in the ſame Volume. The firſt Letter to St. Gregory, at Paris in 1562, of Budæus's Verſion. Some Greek Letters at Venice in 1499. Some others at Paris and Haguenaw in 1528. Some Select Letters by Stenius at Paris in 1531. A Letter to a Virgin upon her Fall by Cartenus at Paris in 1574. The Canonical Epiſtles with Balſamon in 1561. The Letters of Julian, at Amſterdam in 1567. The Letter or the Treatiſe of Reading prophane Authors, at Strasburg in 1507; at Baſle in 1532; at Paris in 1533, and 1621; at Rome in 1594. The Treatiſe of a Solitary Life, at Paris in 1631. The Liturgy in Latin, tranſlated by Hervetus, at Venice in 1548, in Octavo; in Greek in the ſame City, in 1601, and 1620; at Antwerp and Paris in 1560; that of Maſius by Plantin, in 1569; that of Victorius Scialagh the Maronite, at Ausburg in 1604; the Grammar at Florence in 1513; at Baſle in 1562 and 1585, in Octavo. The Diſcourſes of St. Baſil Collected by Simeon Logotheta, or Metaphraſtes, by Morellus, in 1556, 1558, and at Franckfort in 1598. The third Homily of Faſting, and the Homily upon the 8th. Chapter of the Proverbs, publiſhed by Cotelerius in his firſt Volume of the Greek Monuments, and ſome Letters in the third. [Dr. Hammond publiſhed a Prayer made by St. Baſil, for Forgiveneſs from God to theſe who have done us wrong, in Greek, from a Manuſcript in the Bodleyan Library, in his Practical Cathechiſm.]

I have nothing further to do, but to ſpeak a Word or two of the Tranſlators of the Works of St. Baſil. Ruffinus has made in Latin an Abridgment of his Aſcetical Rules. Euſtathius and Dionyſius Exiguus tranſlated his Homilies upon the Creation. After them Argyropilus tranſlated it anew, and his Tranſlation reviewed by Tilmannus, is that which is printed in the Greek and Latin Edition. The Homilies of Faſting, and thoſe upon Iſaiah, and the Books of the Holy Spirit, are of Eraſmus's Verſion. The Tranſlation of the firſt Homily againſt Covetouſneſs is by Volateranus. The Book of Virginity was tranſlated by Ambroſius Camaldulenſis.

Beza and Georgius Trapezuntius tranſlated the Books againſt Eunomius; the Aſceticks are tranſlated by Fumancellus; the Letters to Amphilochius by Hervetus; the Letter to Chilo by Tilmannus. The laſt Letters were tranſlated by Hoeſchelius. Father Combefis took care to print in 1674, the Tranſlation of St. Baſil's Sermons; and it had been very happy if he could have ſpoken Latin as well as he underſtood Greek. The ſame Father before his Death made a Review of the Greek Text of all the Works of St. Baſil, and their Verſions, which was printed at Paris in 1679. This Work may be of great uſe for making a new Edition of St. Baſil: It would be very advantageous to the Church, and the Commonwealth of Learning, that any one ſhould undertake it. In general, one may ſay, That all the Tranſlations which we have mentioned are full of Faults, ſome more, ſome leſs: Some of them muſt be corrected exactly, and others done anew; the Greek Text ſhould be reviewed and corrected by many Manuſcripts, and the Books ought to be ranged almoſt in the ſame Order that we have uſed in our Extracts, and ſome Notes added to explain the Text, and ſome Obſervations upon the Hiſtory and Diſcipline: 'Tis a Work that I would willingly undertake, if God ſhould give me Strength; if I could think that it would be well received by the Publick, and that ſome Printer would be willing to be at the Expence of it. We ſee every Day multitudes of little French Books appear in publick, and ſcarce any antient Books printed, either in Greek or Latin. The Bookſellers indeed ſay, 'tis not their Fault, but the Fault of the Publick, becauſe the former ſell well and go off, and they are enriched by them; whereas the latter remain in their Shops, and ſo they are undone; the Fault therefore is to be attributed to the Giddineſs of Men in this Age, who have loſt all Reliſh of Antiquity, and are pleaſed with nothing but Novelty: True and ſolid Learning is not in Faſhion in this Age, but Men ſatisfy themſelves

St. Baſil. with a ſuperficial Knowledge of things: The Study of any thing that is ſolid is laid aſide; and Antiquity is learned from the Moderns, and 'tis rare for any one to go up to the Fountain-head. This is a moſt deplorable Unhappineſs to Learning in general, and 'tis to be feared that this ſuperficial Study of things, will throw us into a worſe State, than the Ignorance and Barbariſm of the preceding Ages.

But ſince French Books ſell well, the greateſt part of the Letters and moral Homilies of St. Baſil, ought at leaſt to be turned into French, which would be no leſs uſeful, and more pleaſant than the Aſcetical Books which have been tranſlated by Monſieur Hermant, who has alſo written in French the Life of this Saint after a moſt Exact and Learned Manner. St. Baſil.

St. GREGORY NAZIANZEN.

St. Gregory Nazianzen. ST. Gregory of Nazianzum, was born in this City, in the Year 318. [He was born at Arianzum a ſmall Village near Nazianzum, where his Father had an Eſtate.] His Father called Gregory had been engaged amongſt ſome Hereticks, who were called Hypſiſtarians, becauſe they profeſſed to worſhip only the moſt high God, and yet they obſerved ſome Ceremonies of Pagans and Jews. His Wife Nonna converted him, and cauſed him to be baptized by Leontius Biſhop of Cæſarea in Cappadocia, about the time that the Council of Nice was aſſembled. Soon after he was choſen to be Biſhop of Nazianzum, and governed that Church for the ſpace of 45 Years. His Son Gregory applied himſelf to the Study of human Learning; he began his Studies in Paleſtine, and from thence went to Alexandria, where he ſtudied Rhetorick, and at laſt to perfect himſelf, he went to Athens about the end of the year 344. After he had ſtayed there ſome time with St. Baſil, he departed from thence after him to return into his own Country; where he was baptized, and took Care of his Father's Affairs. After this he retired with his Friend St. Baſil into ſome ſolitary places in Pontus; but he was obliged to leave this Retirement to return home to his Father's Aſſiſtance. The Old Man being ſurprized had ſigned the Conſtantinopolitan Creed; whereupon the Monks and other Catholicks of his Biſhoprick ſeparated from his Communion, and the Diviſion had continued, if St. Gregory the Son had not come to Nazianzum, and reſtored Peace there. In this Journey 'twas, that he was Ordained Prieſt by his Father; and after he had reconciled their Minds, he returned again to his Retirement, out of which, nevertheleſs, he ſometimes came to preach unto the People.

St. Baſil being Biſhop of Cæſarea, Ordained him, as we have already ſaid, Biſhop of a little City called Saſima, but he was quickly diſguſted with ſo tedious a Habitation, and departed from it in great Anger againſt his Friend. [Dr. Cave ſays, that he never went to ſee it.] He returned to Nazianzum, where he was obliged to take Care of that Church in Conjunction with his Father, and to be as it were his Coadjutor; which he did upon Condition, that he ſhould not be his Succeſſor: And therefore his Father being dead, he withdrew from Nazianzum, leſt he ſhould be detained there by Force. He went to Seleucia, and from thence to Conſtantinople; where he arrived about the year 376, and found the City full of Arians, who ſtirred up the whole City into an Uproar againſt him. He entred into the Church of Anaſtaſia, which was the only Church then remaining to the Orthodox; he aſſumed the Government, and took Care to inſtruct them, and to preſerve this little Flock. Being very eloquent, he converted in a little time a great number of Arians, and encreaſed the number of Catholicks. Peter Biſhop of Alexandria underſtanding this good Succeſs of his Labours, wrote to him very honourable and candid Letters, and confirmed him in the Biſhoprick of Conſtantinople. While things were in this Condition, one Maximus a Cynick Philoſopher, attempted to get himſelf made Biſhop of Conſtantinople; and finding a Prieſt that joyned with him, he gained Peter of Alexandria, who Ordained him Biſhop of Conſtantinople. Thither he came afterwards in the year 379, with ſome Mariners, accompanied by ſome Biſhops of Egypt, and entred by Force into the Church. The Clergy and People having a great Affection for St. Gregory Nazianzen, ran into the Church, and drove Maximus out of it, who went to wait upon the Emperor Theodoſius; but not being received favourably by him, he was forced to return to Alexandria, where he did all that lay in his Power to uſurp the See of that City. But having no better Succeſs there than at Conſtantinople, he retired into the Weſt, and preſented himſelf before the Council of Aquileia, where he ſhewed the Communicatory Letters which he had from Peter of Alexandria; and the Weſt being perfectly governed in all Matters relating to the Eaſt by the Church of Alexandria, he was kindly received there, and the Council wrote in his Favour to the Emperor.

In the mean time St. Gregory who loved Retirement, bid Adieu to his People, recommending to them, that they ſhould keep the Doctrine of the Trinity, and remember him; but his People being reſolved not to ſuffer his Departure, he was forced to promiſe them, that he would continue at Conſtantinople, till the coming of the Biſhops, who were quickly to aſſemble there. The Emperor Theodoſius having made his publick Entry into Conſtantinople, in the Month of November, 380, drove away from the Churches Demophilus the Arian Biſhop, and ordered St. Gregory to enter into the Great Church. The People urged him to take his place in the Epiſcopal Throne, but he would not do it; and to quiet the Tumult, and the Acclamations of thoſe that were preſent, he told them wiſely, that they muſt in the firſt place give thanks to God for the great Happineſs that had befallen the Church. After this he continued in the Government of the Church of Conſtantinople, and was confirmed in this See by the Authority of the firſt Council of Conſtantinople, whereof Meletius was Preſident. But after his Death, the Eaſtern Biſhops, who had hitherto maintained St. Gregory, began to murmur againſt his Ordination, being diſſatisfied with his oppoſing the Ordination of Flavianus in the room of Meletius. When he heard them ſpeak of it, he propoſed to reſign, which Propoſal being received with greater Eaſineſs than he expected, he was forced entirely to reſign the Biſhoprick of Conſtantinople. When the Egyptians arrived he did it with a great deal of Generoſity, tho' he was extremely troubled to quit ſo dear a Church; for he never ſpoke of it afterwards but with Grief, and teſtified a kind of Indignation againſt thoſe Biſhops who forced him away from this See. He withdrew immediately to Nazianzum, where he died about the year 389. St. Gregory Nazianzen.

The principal Writings of this Father are his Diſcourſes or Sermons, which are compoſed with great Art and Eloquence. We have 55 of them extant.

The 1ſt. is an Apologetical Diſcourſe, wherein he gives an Account of his retiring into Pontus immediately after he was Ordained Prieſt, and of his Return to Nazianzum. He fled for fear of being made Biſhop, and therefore in this Diſcourſe he blames thoſe who would all on a ſudden mount up into the Epiſcopal Throne, and carry on Intrigues to obtain that Dignity. I am aſhamed, ſays he, of thoſe who being no more perfect than others, (nay, I pray God they be not worſe) dare with ſacrilegious Hands, and a prophane Spirit approach the Holy Myſteries, and who endeavour to obtain the Sovereign Dignity of Prieſthood, when they are not in a Condition even to come near to Holy Things. They puſh forward and involve themſelves in much trouble, that they may have acceſs to the Holy Table, not conſidering it as an Employment that engages them to Virtue, but as a means to live at their own Eaſe: In ſo much that they never think of diſcharging their Office after an unblameable manner, but of exerciſing ſuch a Dominion as ſhall be ſubject to no body. Never did this Ambition reign more in the Church of Jeſus Chriſt than it does at preſent. I know it will be in vain for us to endeavour to put a Stop to it, but I count it a Duty of Piety to teſtify our Deteſtation and Shame of it. Afterwards he deſcribes very eloquently, the Difficulties and Troubles of the Epiſcopal Office. He ſays, That this Office is more troubleſome and painful than can be imagined; That 'tis a moſt difficult thing to govern Souls; That 'tis the greateſt and rareſt thing in the World, to know how to command well; That nothing is more dangerous than an Obligation to anſwer for others; That a Biſhop ought not only to be free from Faults, but alſo to be very virtuous; That he ought to be ſtill perfecting himſelf from day to day, and that Virtue ſhould be natural to him, for if it be forced it will not continue long; That the Science of Governing Men without Violence and Fear is the Science of Sciences, ars artium, ſcientia ſcientiarum; That 'tis infinitely more difficult to cure Souls than to heal the Diſeaſes of the Body, becauſe the Cure of the Soul depends entirely upon the Will of the Sick; That the Phyſician of the Body has leave to uſe Iron and Fire, and the moſt violent Medicines, for recovering the Health of the Body; but the Love which Sinners have for themſelves will not allow theſe ſort of Remedies to be uſed, when their Souls are under Cure; That they ſhun them; That they are reſolved to continue in their Sins, and are ingenious to hinder their Recovery; That they hide their Sins or excuſe them, or elſe impudently defend them; That the Phyſicians of the Body know by ſenſible and external Signs, the Diſeaſes which they undertake to cure; but the Phyſicians of Souls have inviſible and hidden Maladies to heal; That the End of the Phyſician for the Body is to reſtore Health, which puts Men in a Condition to enjoy the Good Things and the Pleaſures of this World; but on the contrary the Deſign of the ſpiritual Phyſician is to withdraw Men's Affections from this World, and fix them upon God; That for this End God was made Man, and ſuffered ſo much upon Earth. From all this he concludes, That the Profeſſion of a ſpiritual Phyſician sician is more difficult than the Practice of an ordinary Physician. He adds also to prove the same thing, the great Diversity of spiritual Diseases, and the different Dispositions of those who are to be cured, who require an infinite number of different Remedies. 'Some, says he, will be reformed by Discourse, and others by Example; Some must be pushed forward and others kept back; Praises are useful to some, but others have need of Rebukes; Some must be exhorted, and others must be chid; Some must be reproved in Secret, and others in publick; Some must be severely punished for small Faults, and others must be gently handled; Some must be frighted with the fear of the Judgment of the Great Day, and others must be allured with Hopes of Mercy: In a word, great Moderation must always be observed and all Excess avoided. Lastly, he represents the Difficulties of discharging the Duty of Preaching as we ought, which he calls the first and principal Employment of the Ministers of Jesus Christ.' He says, That all the World undertakes to preach, and yet 'tis a Folly to believe that all those who undertake it are capable of it; that this sacred Ministry, requires a sublime Soul, a perfect Knowledge of the Doctrines of the Church, and a very good discerning Faculty. He declaims against those who thrust themselves into this Ministry, before they have meditated long upon the Holy Scripture, and studied their Religion. He proposes as a Pattern to Preachers, the great Apostle St. Paul; he Collects together a great many Passages of Holy Scripture against False Prophets, against Priests that are unworthy of their Function, and against those that abuse the Word of God; he does not forget the Charge which Jesus Christ draws up against the Pharisees; That they were like painted Sepulchres which appeared outwardly very Fair, but inwardly were full of Filthiness; and then he makes this important Reflection. 'This, says he, is what I think upon Day 'and Night: These are the Thoughts which macerate me, 'which consume and confound me. I am so far from 'dreaming of Governing others, that I think of nothing 'but appeasing the wrath of God, and purifying my self 'from my own Faults. One should be pure himself before 'he undertakes to Purifie others; he should be filled with 'Wisdom, before he attempts to Instruct others; he must 'have Light that he may be able to Communicate of it 'to others; he must not be far from God, who would 'draw others to him; he must be Holy, that he may Sanctifie others; he must be Prudent that he may give them 'Advice. But when shall we be so, will the People say, that 'are always ready to undertake every thing, who build 'those Buildings slightly which presently fall down again? 'when will you place your Lamp upon a Candlestick? 'when will you improve your Talent? This is what they 'say who have more Friendship for me than Piety. You 'ask me when I shall be in a Condition to guide others: 'I tell you, that the Oldest Age is not too long a Term 'to prepare ones self for so Excellent and so Difficult an 'Employment; That 'tis better to be slow than forward 'in this Case; That tho' I have been Consecrated to God 'from my Infancy; tho' I have Meditated from my Youth 'upon the Law of God, tho' I have been Exercised in the 'Practice of Virtue, yet I acknowledge my self altogether uncapable of Governing a Church, chiefly at a time, 'when the best thing a Man can do is to shun it, that he 'may escape the Tempest, wherein all the Members of 'the Church are divided, Charity seems to be wholly extinguished, Bishops have but the empty Names of Bishops; 'all the World publickly Slights them, and some Defame 'them; there is no fear of God remaining, but Impudence 'Reigns every where, and 'tis counted a piece of Piety to 'treat others as Impious. Our Judges are Enemies to God, 'Holy things are trampled under Foot, and the Mysteries 'are laid open to the Prophane. Strangers and Infidels, 'who were not permitted to enter into our Churches, do 'now come even into the Sanctuary. The Gate is opened 'to Detraction and Calumny, and he that rails best at his 'Neighbour, passes for the Honestest Man. The faults of 'others are observed, not to bewail them, or bring a Remedy to them; but, on the contrary, to make such Bloody 'Reproaches as increase the Wickedness of those who 'have committed them. Men are not judged good or Evil 'by their Virtues or Vices, but by the Friends they have 'on their side. The same thing is praised to Day and blamed to Morrow, some admire what others detest, and all 'their Sins are easily pardoned who are willing to embrace 'Impiety. This is the height of Iniquity to which we are 'arrived: But 'tis not the People only who are thus disorderly, but the Curse of the Prophet seems to be fulfilled, The Priest is become like the People.' After this he deplores the Misery of the Catholicks, who are divided, and contended about useless and trivial Questions. He observes, That one is obliged, when the Faith is the matter under debate, both to separate from those who teach Impiety, and to suffer any thing rather than approve it; but that 'tis a folly to break the Peace, and stir up troubles about Questions which are not of Faith. At last he returns to his Subject, and having represented the Dangers which one runs in the Priestly Office, the difficulty there is of Discharging it well, and the terrible Judgments of God upon those that perform it amiss; he concludes, That he had reason to prefer a Solitary Life, Calm and Free from Cares, to a Life full of Troubles and Dangers. But after he has justified his Retiring, he gives the Reasons why he returned into his own Country. The First is the Affection and Friendship which he had for his Country-men. The Second is the Assisting of his Father and Mother. The Third which he explains by the comparison of Jonas, is his fear lest he should resist the Will of God, who seemed to call him to the Priestly Function. Here he gives two admirable Rules about the Conduct which Men ought to observe, either for avoiding or accepting of Sacred Orders. He says, we must be afraid of engaging our selves rashly; but then we must also be afraid of refusing the Call of God, and that we may keep the middle between these two extreams, we must be of such a Disposition, that we neither seek after Ecclesiastical Dignities, nor refuse them when they are offered, if we know our selves Capable. That 'tis Rashness to seek after them, and Disobedience to refuse them; but we must neither condemn those who shun them for fear, nor those who accept them from a Principle of Obedience; That the Dignity of the Priesthood astonishes some, and others trust to the assistance of him who calls them; That Abraham obeyed readily; That Moses refused to obey; That Isaiah immediately obeyed the Command of God who ordered him to Prophesie, but Jeremiah excused himself from doing it by Reason of his Youth. 'These Reasons, 'adds he, Charm me, they bend my Soul, they soften my 'Heart, I can no longer resist, but I humble my self under the Almighty Hand of God, and accuse my self of 'Sloth and Negligence: If there was any fault in it I beg 'Pardon; I have been Silent, but I shall not always hold 'my Peace; I have now retired to consider my self and 'to indulge a little to my grief, but I will now praise 'God in the Assemblies of his People; I will be yours, 'my Brethren; I will be yours O Holy Flock; I submit 'to you, my Father, I offer you the Sacrifice of Obedience; but give me your Blessing, guide me by your Prayers, lead me the way by your Judgment: Let us beg of God 'all the Graces Necessary to Conduct the Flock together 'in the way of Eternal Salvation.' He wrote this Discourse at his leisure time, about the Year 362.

St. Gregory Nazianzen.

St. Gregory Nazianzen.

The 2*d*. Discourse of St. Gregory Nazianzen, is upon the Nazianzenes neglecting to come to hear him Preach, when upon their Invitation he had left his Solitude to live among them; he complains of their Negligence, and desires them to behave themselves answerably to the Affection that he had for them. St. Gregory Preached this Sermon immediately after he was Ordained Priest in the Year 362.

The 3*d*. Discourse is against the Emperor Julian, where he employs all the Torrents of his Eloquence. He observes, That this Emperor did in vain endeavour to hinder the Christians from Studying good Learning, and applying themselves to the Liberal Sciences, since this could not hinder them from Confessing the Name of God. He bewails the unhappiness of those who were overcome by the Persecution of this Emperor; he praises the Providence of God who had destroyed him. He relates that Gallus and Julian having undertaken each of them to build a Church in honour of the Martyrs, this last could not compass his Design, and that his Structure fell down while it was a building, which St. Gregory does not fail to attribute to the Vengeance of God, who would not suffer the Martyrs to be honoured by him who was to make so many himself. He says, that while Julian followed the Study of Learning he discovered what he had in his Mind; that he Disputed eagerly for the Pagan Opinions; That he loved every thing which alienated Men from the Christian Religion, and that he did not conceal his Opinions from those that were inclined to the same Impiety with himself; That after his Brother Gallus was Created Cæsar, all Asia, was a School of Impiety to him; That he had the most pernicious and dangerous Masters, that he could find out, and that he busied himself in Magick.

St. Gregory declaims against Constantius, and accuses him in a Rhetorical way for leaving the Empire to Julian. But he excuses him afterwards, to whom he gives excessive Praises, by saying, That he was Surprized; That he gave way too much to his own goodness and Natural Easiness; and that in short, it was not in his power to hinder Julian from being Emperor, who seized the Government against his will; That he revolted from him, and that Constantius was troubled at his Death; That he had even raised Julian to the Dignity of Cæsar. He says, that after Julian had usurped the Empire, he perfectly declared against Christianity; That he effaced his Baptism by impure Blood, and prophaned his Hands by Sacrifices, as if it were to wash and purifie them from the unbloody Sacrifice of Christians, by which they partake of the Body, the Divinity, and Sufferings of Jesus Christ. He relates, that one Day this impious Man while he was Sacrificing, saw a Cross encircling the Entrails of the Sacrifices; That at another time, having entred into a subterraneous Place to Consult with the Devil, being frighted.

St. Gregory Nazianzen.

frighted with the Noiſe which he heard in the Cave, and the Spectres which he ſaw, he made the Sign of the Croſs without thinking of it; That at this Wonder-working Sign, all the Devils fled and the Noiſe ceaſed. Then St. Gregory deſcribes the Arts which Julian, uſed againſt the Chriſtians. He ſays, That Julian being perſuaded that open Perſecutions did not only encreaſe the conſtancy of Chriſtians, and that the Martyrs did Honour to their Religion, he had recourſe to Impoſtures and Tricks; that he allowed the People to Abuſe and uſe Violence to the Chriſtians, and reſerved to himſelf the ways of Moderation, to allure and perſuade them; That he changed his Court and gained the Soldiers over to his Side; That he removed Chriſtians from all Offices, that he enticed ſome by hope of rewards, and ſeduced others; That he ſent ſome of them into Baniſhment, and in ſpight of his affected Gentleneſs he had exerciſed the greateſt Cruelties upon others. He adds, that this Tyrant had a Deſign to ſhut our Chriſtians from all Protection of the Law, and to forbid them to make uſe of it, alledging this for a Reaſon, That their Law commanded them to bear Injuries Patiently, and to render ~~Evil for~~ Good. for evil

St. Gregory anſwers this Raillery, by ſaying, that if Chriſtians had a Law, which obliged them to bear with Evil, yet there was no Law in the World which permitted any to do it. And beſides that, there were among Chriſtians Two ſorts of Precepts; that ſome of them do ſo oblige that it is abſolutely neceſſary to obey them; but there are others which do not oblige, but Chriſtians are free to fulfil or not to fulfil them; that all the World cannot arrive at that perfection which conſiſts in the Obſervation of the Evangelical Counſels, and that one may be ſaved, by obſerving only what is commanded as neceſſary to be done. In this place he makes a Digreſſion about the Moderation which Chriſtians obſerved when they were in Power, and this he expoſes to the Cruelties which the Pagans have exerciſed. There was a Time, ſays he to the Pagans, when we had the Authority in our Hands as well as you; but what have we done to thoſe of your Religion, which comes near to what the Chriſtians have ſuffered from you? Have we taken your Liberty from you? Have we ſtirred up the Fury of the Mobile againſt you? Have we put Governors in Places on purpoſe to condemn you to Puniſhment? Have we attempted the Life of any Perſon? Have we removed any Body from the Magiſtracy, or from their Offices? In a Word, have we done any of thoſe things to you which you have made us ſuffer, and which you have threatned againſt us? I cannot conceive how St. Gregory could reconcile all thoſe things with what he had ſaid before, that Conſtantius did very ill to ſuffer Julian to live, and leave the Empire to him, becauſe he was an Enemy to the Chriſtian Religion, and was to Perſecute it; and that in this, Conſtantius made a very ill uſe of his Gentleneſs and Goodneſs. Afterwards he ſpeaks of the Prohibition which Julian had given to Chriſtians, to ſtudy human Learning. It belongs to us, ſays he, to Diſcourſe, it belongs to us to underſtand the Greek Tongue, as it belongs to us to Adore the Gods: But as for you, Ignorance and Barbariſm is your Portion; and all your Wiſdom conſiſts in ſaying, I believe. St. Gregory anſwers him, that the Pythagoreans who had no other reaſon to give for what they affirmed, but the Authority of their Maſter, would not have jeſted in that manner, upon what the Chriſtians anſwer when they are ask'd about their Doctrine, This is what I believe; that this only ſignifies, that 'tis not lawful to doubt of what is Written by Perſons Divinely inſpired, and that their Authority is of greater force than all the Reaſons and Arguments of the World; but that it does not follow from thence, that Eloquence, Terms of Art, and Skill in Languages, belong only to thoſe who Profeſs to acknowledge many Gods: 'For, ſays he, if this be ſo, either the Greek Tongue 'is confined to the Religion, or to the Nation: It cannot 'be ſaid, that 'tis confined to the Pagan Religion; For, 'Where is that commanded? Who are the Prieſts that 'have enjoyned us to Study human Learning as an Action of Religion? neither can it be ſaid, that 'tis confined 'to the Nations that profeſs to Adore falſe Gods: for it 'will not follow, becauſe the Greek Tongue has been uſed 'among thoſe that profeſs the Pagan Religion, that therefore it is ſo confined to them who profeſs that Religion that others cannot make uſe of it. This is as if one 'ſhould ſay, that working in Gold cannot be exerciſed but by Painters, becauſe there were ſome Painters 'that were Gold-ſmiths likewiſe: He concludes, that 'Language cannot be confined to a Profeſſion, nor an 'Art, nor a Religion, but that they are common to all 'thoſe that can make uſe of them.' He adds ſeveral Curioſities about the Invention of Letters and Sciences, about the Origin of Sacrifices, about Pagan Ceremonies, and the infamous Actions which the Poets attributed to their falſe Gods. He occaſionally anſwers an Excuſe, which the Pagans make to cover the Folly of their Poets, alledging, that they invented what they ſaid concerning their Divinities to pleaſe the People, but that under theſe Veils there was a ſecret Senſe and hidden Myſtery. St. Gregory confeſſes, that there may be in Religion hidden Myſteries, and ſuch Diſcourſes as all the World does not underſtand; and he acknowledges, that there are ſome of this Nature among Chriſtians; but then he maintains, that the Veils, Repreſentations, the Appearances, and the Figures which conceal theſe Myſteries and Truths ought to have the Character of Honeſty and not of Infamy: That otherwiſe this was to do like one that would conduct a Man to a fine City through a Bog, or that would bring a Man into Harbour, by leading him over the Rocks: And beſides, that there was no Example produced by the Poets which excited to Virtue, but on the Contrary, they inclined all Men to Vice, whereas the Chriſtian Religion teaches nothing but Virtue and Perfection. St. Gregory Nazianzen.

The 4th. Oration is alſo an invective againſt Julian. There St. Gregory repreſents the Viſible Judgments which God made uſe of to puniſh his Impiety, as well as the ſenſible manner of protecting his Church, and defeating the Deſigns of this Impious Man. He relates firſt, that when Julian would have had the Jews rebuild the Temple of Jeruſalem, there aroſe ſuch a Storm as drove away thoſe that undertook the Work, and that having retired into a neighbouring Temple, there came forth a Fire which conſumed them. He adds, that there appeared a Sign of the Croſs in the Heavens, which was a Mark of the Victory which Jeſus Chriſt had gotten over theſe Impious Men; and that all thoſe who ſaw it, or ſpoke of it, found their Clothes marked with this Sign. He ſays, that this Miracle, was ſo publick, that many who ſaw it embraced immediately the Chriſtian Religion, and were baptized.

But if the Power of God appeared in this Miracle, his Vengeance clearly appeared in the miſerable Death of Julian. Before he departed to march againſt the Perſians, he made a Vow, That if he returned Conqueror, he would reduce all Chriſtians under the Power of the Devil: But God who confounds the Deſigns of the Wicked, did not ſuffer him to return from this Journey. For being unſeaſonably engaged, he found himſelf encompaſſed with the Army of his Enemies, and having mounted up into a high place to diſcover it, he received a Stroke of which he died. St. Gregory ſays, that ſome reported that he was pierced thorough by a Dart from his Enemies, and others, that it was done by one of his own Soldiers, or that one of his own People thruſt him thorough with a Sword. He obſerves, that at his Death he would have it believed that he was become a God, and that he ordered his moſt faithful Friends to throw his Body into the River, to make it believed that he was ranked among the Gods; but this was not put in execution. St. Gregory afterwards makes a Compariſon between the Funeral Pomp of Conſtantius and Julian; wherein he obſerves that the Funeral of Conſtantius was accompanied with the Ceremonies of the Church, with the publick Prayers ſung in the Night time, with Wax-lights and the other Honours which the Chriſtians were wont to pay unto the Dead. He excuſes this Emperor, as to the ſuſpicion of Arianiſm, and throws all the Fault upon the great Officers of his Court. He affirms alſo, that after his Death, Angelical Voices were heard to celebrate his Praiſes. He deſcribes the Manners, the Temper, and the Vices of Julian. He ſays, that he always had a bad Opinion of him; he makes a very diſadvantageous Repreſentation of him; he admires the Providence of God, who relieved his Church, heard her Prayers, and confounded the Deſigns of the Pagans; yet he deplores their Miſery; he exhorts Chriſtians who enjoy Repoſe at preſent, to remember the time of their Affliction, and to conſider it as a Warning from God, that they ſhould ſin no more. Upon this Occaſion he deſcends to Morality, and exhorts the Chriſtians to whom he ſpeaks, to celebrate the Feſtivals after a Chriſtian manner, and to bear Injuries patiently. About the end of this Diſcourſe he returns to his Subject, and Invective againſt Julian. Theſe Diſcourſes were written ſome Years after the Death of Julian; and they contain more Strokes of Eloquence, than Principles of Theology and Morality.

The 5th. Diſcourſe is an Apology addreſſed to his Father upon his Retirement. He confeſſes, that he had retired for Love of a ſolitary Life, but that the Friendſhip he had for his Father, and the Reſpect he owed to his Old Age, had obliged him to return. He ſays, that his Father called him back, that he might aſſiſt him in the Government of his Dioceſs, and for that end had given him the Unction of Holy Orders. This Diſcourſe was in the Year 362.

The 6th. Diſcourſe was ſpoken before St. Gregory Nyſſen, who was come to ſee St. Gregory Nazianzen, ſometime after he was Ordained Biſhop of Saſima. He complains in the beginning of this Diſcourſe, that St. Baſil had in a manner violated the Laws of Friendſhip, by obliging him to accept of this new Biſhoprick. About the end, he exhorts thoſe that heard him, to purify themſelves from their Sins, and to ſubdue their Paſſions, in Imitation of the Holy Martyrs whoſe Feſtival they celebrated. He ſays, that the beſt way of ſolemnizing their Feſtivals, and the greateſt Honour they could do them, was to live regularly and holily. He declaims againſt the Exceſſes, and Buſineſs that was done at the Assemblies on these Festivals. He praises the Martyrs, and gives them the Title of Mediators. He concludes with praying to God, to perfect the great Flocks, and preserve the little ones, and to comfort him by his Grace, and guide him by his Illumination, and assist him in feeding the Flock of Jesus Christ. 'Tis plain, that this Discourse was spoken by St. Gregory in the year 371, at a solemn Festival of some Martyrs, after St. Basil had Ordained him Bishop of Sasima in the year 371.

The following Discourse which was spoken before St. Gregory the Father and St. Basil, was also at the same time, and upon the same Subject. He declares with what Difficulty he had accepted the Bishoprick of Sasima, and prays them to assist him with their Prayers and Advices in the Government of his Dioceſs.

In the 8*th.* Homily, he directs his Discourse to the People of Nazianzum, about his Father's choosing him to be his Coadjutor. In it he represents the Obligation that lies upon one to do Service to the Church when he is capable of doing it; and repeats again the Rule which he had proposed in his first Discourse, That we ought not to seek after Offices, but neither should we refuse them, when we are called to them, and they do not exceed our Abilities. He adds, that he intended now to join with his Father, to take care of the Church of Nazianzum, but that he would by no means be obliged to succeed him, and that no body could ever force him to it. That those who command must do it voluntarily, as those who obey must obey willingly, ut volentes volentibus præsint; which is most necessary, says he, amongst the Clergy, where we do not use Dominion but Instruction. Volentium enim non coactorum, pietatis sacramentum est. This Discourse was in the year 372.

In the 9*th.* Discourse which was at the same time, he speaks to the People of Nazianzum, in the Presence of a Magistrate, who took care to make an Assessment of the Taxes. In it, he first gives the Reason of his Silence, and then exhorts Christians to withdraw their Affections from the Things of this World, and to labour only for Eternity, by purifying themselves with good Works. He recommends to Pastors to take care of their Sheep. And to the Faithful to submit themselves to their Pastors. He admonishes the Men of Learning, not to trust to their Knowledge and Eloquence, not to affect Knowledge more than is necessary, not to grasp at all Learning, but only so much as may serve them for teaching Truth and Righteousness.

After this, he addresses himself to the Judge, and tells him, That we must render to Cæsar the Things that are Cæsar's, and to God, the Things that are God's; that is to say, that we must render to Cæsar the Tribute that belongs to him; and to his Ministers, the Rewards which the Law has appointed them; and that more than that does not belong to them. He prays him in particular, to treat his People with Gentleness and Humanity in the Assessment which he was to make. He makes a pleasant Observation, that Jesus Christ came into the World at a time when a Tax was made, or an Assessment of all the Inhabitants of the Earth, to shew that God is always present at those Actions; That he was made Man, and did himself pay Tribute to comfort those that are in Bondage, and to teach them to bear it patiently: But withal, That by thus abasing himself, he taught the Kings and Potentates of the Earth, to treat those that are subject to them with Mildness and Moderation: That Servitude it self was a Burden heavy enough, which should not be encreased by Rigor; That Tribute was an Effect of the first Man's Sin, because War which occasioned Tribute, was a Consequence of the first Sin, and a just Punishment of God; but that it ought not to be augmented by over-charging and ill-using the Miserable. He adds, That God makes in the other Life a Book, or if it be lawful to use the Term, a Roll, wherein all Men are set down, without any Distinction of their State and Condition: That there Men shall be treated after the same manner, as they have treated others, and that if the Judge to whom he addresses his Speech, would be favourably treated there, he must treat his People favourably and civilly. After he has spoken to him with this Freedom, he bestows many Commendations upon him; and prays him to exempt the Poor, the Clergy and the Monks. These Men, says he of the last, who are no ways allied to this Earth, who have nothing but their Bodies, and do not so much as possess that entirely, who have nothing for Cæsar, and have all for God, that is to say, who can give nothing but Prayers, Hymns, Watchings and Tears, of which Seizure cannot be made: These Men, I say, who are dead to this World that they may live to Jesus Christ, who have crucified their Flesh with Jesus Christ, and even parted, as one may say, their Soul from their Body. This is an excellent Description of the antient Monks, which gives us a great Idea of their Poverty and how much they were disengaged from the World.

The 10*th.* Discourse of Gregory Nazianzen is a Funeral Oration upon his Brother Cæsarius, wherein he relates his principal Actions, and makes a Panegyrick upon them. In it he commends him, and comforts his Father and Mother. He observes, that the same Ceremony is renewed every year for the Dead. Towards the end, he discourses of the State of the Souls of the Just, from the time of their Death until the Day of Judgment. He says, that he was informed by the Discourses of the Learned, that holy Souls which are acceptable to God, being delivered from the Bands of this Body, feel an ineffable Joy and Pleasure by considering the Blessedness which they are one day to receive; that they go directly to God, and that they know already, as it were in an Image and Representation, the Happiness they shall receive after the Resurrection of the Body. He adds, that he had often seen in a Dream his Brother all over glorious: Whether it was, says he, that the Imagination represented him thus, or that this Apparition was real. He concludes with a Moral Discourse, wherein he shews, that we ought to be so far from Mourning for the Dead, that we ought rather to mourn for our selves, and sigh, because we continue so long upon Earth. He wrote this Discourse sometime after the Death of his Brother, which happened in 368.

St. Gregory Nazianzen.

The 11*th.* Discourse is a Panegyrick upon his Sister St. Gorgonia, who died sometime after her Brother. In it he has given an excellent Description of her Virtues, of her Prudence and Wisdom in the Government of her Family; of her Humility, her Zeal, her Charity to the Poor; of her Care for Adorning Churches, her Mortifications, her Diligence in Prayer, her Submission to the Will of God, her Constancy in her Sickness, and her manner of dying which was worthy of a Christian. He observes, that she was baptized a little before she died; but that she had led so holy a Life, that Baptism did not confer any Grace upon her, but was only the Seal of those Graces which she had received. Yet we must not believe that she was not baptized till her last Sickness; for St. Gregory says, that in a former Sickness, when she saw that the Remedies which were used, gave her no Relief, she went into the Church, and there having prayed near the Altar, she mingled with her Tears, what she had reserved of the Antitypes of the precious Body and Blood of Jesus Christ, and that she was cured immediately. This Action, which St. Gregory calls a pious piece of Impudence, shews that she was baptized some time before her last Sickness. Towards the end of this Panegyrick, he describes the happy State of just Souls which are departed out of this Life; he makes no doubt but they enjoy the Company of Angels, and a most perfect Knowledge of the Three Persons of the Holy Trinity. This Discourse was spoken about 370.

The following Discourse is about the Reconciliation of the Monks of Nazianzum with his Father, which was made, as we have said, about the Year 363. He congratulates their Reunion, and proves the usefulness and necessity of Peace. See how he describes the Habit of Monks, and the Austerity of their Life. 'All that I have seen, says he to 'them, brings to my Remembrance upon the account of 'this Fraternal Division, your Watchings, your Fastings, 'your Prayers, your Tears, your Knees hardened with 'bearing the weight of your Bodies, your beating of your 'Breasts, your deep Sighs, your Tears shed in singing forth 'continually the Praises of God, your Hair cut short and 'neglected, your naked Feet, your Habits which have no-'thing of pride, your Girdle which adorns without being 'an Ornament, your short Cloaks buttoned back, that 'bold Gate, that modest Eye, that pleasant Smile, that calm 'Discourse, that Silence which is more instructive than all 'Discourse, those regular Austerities, those Riches in Pover-'ty, that Glory under Contempt.

The 13*th.* Discourse is also about the Benefits of Peace. In this as well as the preceding Discourse, he makes some Digressions about the Faith of the Church against Hereticks, and he concludes this with a Prayer for their Conversion.

The 14*th.* is upon the same Subject, where he speaks against the Error of Apollinarius.

The 15*th.* was preached after a great Hail which fell in Pontus in the Year 372, which wholly ruined the Country. In it he exhorts the People of Nazianzum, to acknowledge that this Judgment was a just Punishment of their Sins; that they ought to consider God as full of Mercy, when they compare it with the Vengeance which God will inflict upon the Reprobate in the other World. He sets down in particular, some of those Sins which God has punished by this Scourge, as the oppression of the Poor, whose Goods were seized upon either by Fraud or Violence, the Usury whereby they had enriched themselves and robbed the Poor, their forgetfulness of God, their rigour towards the Poor, the Contempt which they had shewn of the Exhortations of their Preachers, their vain Confidence in Riches, the Covetousness of the Rich which inclines them to keep up their Corn in their Granaries, that they may sell it dear in a time of Scarcity, their sumptuous Apparel and Houshold-Furniture. He exhorts them all to implore the Mercy of God towards them, by their publick Prayers, their Fasting, their Penance, and their giving of Alms. He ends this Discourse with praying his Father to appease the Wrath of God by his Prayers, and to beg of him Food for the Body, after he has prayed for the Food of the Soul.

The 16*th.* Discourse of St. Gregory Nazianzen, is a famous Oration of the Love of the Poor and of Poverty. He wrote it particularly in favour of the Poor in the Hospital which St. Basil had built in Cæsarea, and he spoke it at some solemn Festival about the Year 363. He shews in this Diſcourſe that the Love of the Poor and Poverty is a moſt excellent Virtue: After this he deſcribes in a moſt pathetical manner the miſerable State of the Poor and Sick: He propoſes very preſſing Motives with a great deal of Eloquence, for touching the Heart of the Rich, and inclining them to aſſiſt the Poor and Sick; and he urges with much clearneſs and ſtrength, the moſt convincing Reaſons for perſuading them that they are obliged to it. He concludes with ſaying, that Alms-giving is not only a Duty of Piety, but of Neceſſity; that it is not only a Counſel, but alſo a Precept.

The 17*th.* Diſcourſe is about ſome Differences that happened at Nazianzum, between the People and the Governor. St. Gregory appeaſes the People in the firſt part of this Diſcourſe, and exhorts them to ſubmit without fear to the Orders of the Governor; and in the ſecond part, he ſpeaks to the Governor with a wonderful Frankneſs to incline him to Mildneſs and Clemency. He tells him, that he ſhould not take it ill, that he ſpoke to him with freedom; that the Law of God ſubjects him to the Commandment of his Biſhop. 'For, ſays he, the Church has an Authority of 'her own, which is far Greater and more Excellent than 'that of Princes, unleſs you will ſubject the Spirit to 'the Fleſh, and Heaven to Earth. He adds, that he did not 'doubt but he would take in good part the Liberty where-'with he ſpoke, ſince he was one of the Sheep of his Flock. 'I will not therefore, ſays he, make a long Diſcourſe. You 'Command by Jeſus Chriſt; 'tis by him that you exerciſe 'your Authority; 'tis he who has given you the Sword 'that you carry; but he has not given you ſo much Power 'for any other end, but to terrify the Wicked and threaten 'them with Puniſhments. Take care then that you preſerve 'this truſt with purity: You are the Image of God, but 'ſo are all Men in ſome Senſe. They are all your Bre-'thren, have compaſſion on them, imitate the Mercy of 'God, join Mildneſs with Terror, temper your Threatnings 'by giving ſome hopes; many times Men compaſs their 'Deſigns better by Gentleneſs than by Violence.' He uſes many other Arguments of this nature, to mollify the Wrath of this Governor, whoſe Threatnings had frightned the People of Nazianzum. At laſt, he ſays, that if theſe Reaſons did not move, but ſtill he ſhould want ſome more powerful Motive, that he would take the boldneſs to offer him Jeſus Chriſt, and thoſe Myſteries of Salvation which he communicated with the ſame Mouth with which he now defired this favour: In ſhort, he conjures him to grant this Favour to the Church of Jeſus Chriſt, and to conſider, that God will treat him after the ſame manner, as he ſhall treat thoſe who are ſubject to his Dominion. This Diſcourſe is a Maſter-piece of Eloquence, which ſeems to have been recited in the Year 372.

The 18*th.* Sermon is the Panegyrick of St. Cyprian the Martyr. There are in this Panegyrick ſome things that relate to the Life of St. Cyprian Biſhop of Carthage, as what concerned his Studies, his Learning, his Accompliſhments, his Baniſhment and his Death: But there are other Circumſtances which cannot agree to him, as when he obſerves, that he of whom he ſpeaks was a Senator, who made Love to a Chriſtian Lady of Quality, called Juſtina; that he would have made uſe of Magick to corrupt her; but this Lady having recourſe to Jeſus Chriſt, and the Virgin Mary, to be delivered from this Perſecution, the Devil entred into the Body of St. Cyprian, who was not diſpoſſeſs'd till his Converſion. 'Tis certain that this Accident, and ſome others which St. Gregory Nazianzen relates in this Diſcourſe, happened not to the Biſhop of Carthage: And yet he does expreſly declare, that he of whom he ſpeaks was Biſhop of that City. It muſt therefore be owned, that St. Gregory compos'd this Panegyrick out of ſome falſe Memoirs, wherein theſe Circumſtances were added to adorn the Life of this Holy Martyr by a pleaſant Story: Howſoever, St. Gregory greatly values this Hiſtory, and beſtows many Praiſes upon the holy Martyr, whom he deſigns to commend. He ſays, that his Aſhes wrought abundance of Miracles, and he exhorts his Hearers to honour this Saint by their Virtues and their good Works. He concludes with a Prayer, which he addreſſes to him, wherein he deſires his Aſſiſtance and Protection for governing his Flock, and conducting thoſe of whom he had the Charge. This Diſcourſe ſeems to have been written when St. Gregory was Coadjutor to his Father, that is to ſay, about the Year 372.

The 19*th.* Diſcourſe of St. Gregory Nazianzen, is a Funeral Oration upon his Father, which he ſpoke in the preſence of his Mother and St. Baſil. He addreſſes his Speech to St. Baſil after this manner: 'You cannot be come to 'Nazianzum but for three Reaſons; to ſee us, to Viſit the 'Flock, and to provide a Paſtor for it. You will ſatisfie 'the firſt by your good Offices in comforting us with a 'Funeral Oration, wherein you may celebrate the Virtues 'of my Father, and at the ſame time ſhew us, that we muſt 'deſpiſe this Mortal Life, and look upon Death as an aſ-'ſured Harbour, which ſhelters us from the Storms and 'Tempeſts of this Mortal Life. Thus you may comfort 'us: But how will you comfort this Flock? You may do 'it, Firſt, by promiſing that you will take upon you the 'care of Governing it: Secondly, by ſhewing that we are 'not abandoned by this good Paſtor, and by perſuading us 'that he is with us, that he is here preſent, that he ſtill 'watches over his Flock, that he takes care of it, protects 'and defends it. For I do not doubt (they are his own 'words) but he being now much nearer to God, does a 'great deal more for his Flock by his Interceſſion, than he 'did upon Earth by his Teaching.' After this he gives an Account of his Father's Life, and makes a Panegyrick upon his Virtues: Neither does he forget thoſe of his Mother Nonna, whom he comforts towards the end of his Diſcourſe, by letting her ſee that ſhe ought not to value this Life, nor fear Death, and by promiſing to aſſiſt her all the reſt of her Days. It ſeems that all St. Gregory's Brethren were dead, and that he was left alone. There are many remarkable things in this Oration of St. Gregory, but chiefly what he ſays of his Father's Celebrating the Euchariſt tho' he were ſick; and that one day when he was in his Bed, he conſecrated the Elements which were upon the Altar before the People, repeating as little of the Prayers as he could; and that having pronounced the Words of the Conſecration of the Euchariſt, and given the People the Bleſſing, he lay down upon his Bed again. What he ſays of Elections, is alſo of great conſequence to Eccleſiaſtical Diſcipline. He declares, that his particular Advice was, that for avoiding Conteſts and Canvaſſings, the Elections ſhould be reſerved to the principal part of the People, that is, to the Clergy, or at leaſt that they ſhould have the better ſhare in them. We muſt not forget the Deſcription which he has given of that Magnificent Church, which his Father built at Nazianzum. This Panegyrick was in the Year 373.

St. Gregory Nazianzen.

Tho' St. Gregory diſcharged very well the Offices of Natural Affection, by making Funeral Orations upon his Brother, his Siſter, and his Father; yet one may ſay, That he excelled himſelf in diſcharging the Offices of Friendſhip, by his Funeral Oration upon his Friend St. Baſil, which is the 20*th.* of his Diſcourſes. There he deſcribes the Life, the Labours, and the different Employments of this Saint exactly: He praiſes his Piety, his Faith and his Virtues, and forgets nothing of all that could be ſaid to his Advantage. It may be obſerved in all the other Funeral Orations, that the Church in the time of St. Gregory Nazianzen believed, that the Martyrs and Saints enjoyed already Eternal Happineſs, and the Viſion of God; that they took Care of Men upon Earth, that they Interceded for them, and that it was very profitable to Pray to them, for the obtaining of Spiritual and Temporal Favours. St. Gregory could not have ſpoken this Funeral Oration until after his Return from Conſtantinople in 381.

[By the Character which Mr. du Pin himſelf gives of St. Gregory Nazianzen, it appears that he was a Man of very great warmth of Fancy; and ſo it is no wonder if when he believed that Saints were after Death received up into Heaven, that he ſhould in ſome warmer parts of his Harangues, ſuch as Allocutions to the Saints from their diſconſolate Friends below, or Proſopopœia's, where they are introduced Comforting or Strengthning thoſe whom they left behind, ſay ſeveral things that are not too ſeverely to be ſcanned. His ei τις ἀθάνατος ſhews, that he queſtioned even in his higheſt Flights whether thoſe Saints whom he was then Commending, underſtood what he ſaid. And the Conſequences are then too manifeſt to be inſiſted upon; ſince no Man ever calmly taught, that the Bleſſed above can ſo far concern themſelves as to intercede for the Faithful below, that queſtions whether theſe Happy Beings have any Knowledge of what is done upon Earth: Only this muſt be ſaid, that the Exceſſive Honours which were paid to Saints and Martyrs upon their Anniverſaries brought in all thoſe Corruptions which afterwards grew ſo very Scandalous.]

The Panegyrick upon St. Athanaſius was ſpoken at Conſtantinople. There he relates with much Exactneſs and Eloquence the principal Actions of St. Athanaſius, and excites our Admiration of his Doctrine, his Conſtancy, his Firmneſs, his Zeal for Religion, his Love of Peace, and his other Virtues. This Diſcourſe is the 21*ſt.* The preciſe time when it was ſpoken is not known; but 'tis certain that it was at Conſtantinople, which he deſigns clearly enough, when he ſays, that he was in a City very much corrupted, where there were Arches and Theatres.

The Diſcourſe in praiſe of the Maccabees, follows after the Panegyrick of St. Athanaſius. He obſerves at the beginning of this Diſcourſe, that tho' many did not honour the Maccabees, as Saints, becauſe they lived not ſince the coming of Chriſt; yet they are worthy of the ſame honour with the Martyrs who ſuffered after Chriſt; nay, and their Actions are more admirable. 'For, ſays he, if they ſuffered 'Martyrdom before Chriſt's coming, what would they not 'have done, if they had come after him, and had had the 'Death of Chriſt for an Example? He adds, that no Man 'before the coming of Chriſt, was accompliſhed with all 'Virtues, without having Faith in Jeſus Chriſt.' He deſcribes afterwards the Martyrdom of the ſeven Brethren, and the Conſtancy of their Mother, and extols thoſe Actions with the moſt beautiful ſtrokes of Eloquence: then he ſends the Reader to the Book which Joſephus wrote upon this this Subject. The time is not known when this Panegyrick was recited. St. Gregory Nazianzen.

The 23*d.* Discourse which bears at present the Title of a Discourse in the praise of Hero the Philosopher, or barely of a Philosopher, was according to St. Jerome's Testimony, a Panegyrick upon Maximus the Philosopher, composed by St. Gregory before he had any difference with him. We have seen that St. Basil also commended this Philosopher in the Letters which he wrote to him. St. Gregory in this Panegyrick represents the Idea and Pattern of a Christian Philosopher: There he praises a solitary Life, and yet prefers Labour and Business before unprofitable Study. He observes, that the Church was become more Illustrious by Persecutions: He describes the Miseries which it suffered under the Emperors, Constantius, Julian and Valens. He describes the horrible Tragedy that was acted in the Church of Alexandria, when Lucius invaded it, to force away Peter of Alexandria the Successor of St. Athanasius, very particularly. He says, That this Philosopher was then torn with scourges and sent into Banishment. Towards the End he explains the Faith of the Church about the Mystery of the Trinity. This Oration must have been spoken or written at Constantinople in the Year 378.

The 24*th.* Discourse is addressed to the Egyptians, who were come to Constantinople. St. Gregory Nazianzen praises the Piety of the Faithful of Alexandria, testifies a great deal of Respect for the Memory of St. Athanasius, a great Esteem for his Successor Peter who then possessed the See of Alexandria, and a great Love for the People of Alexandria, whom he makes no scruple to call his People. He declares, that he would willingly be united in Communion with the Christians of Alexandria, and because they made some Difficulty of joyning with him, he expounds to them his Doctrine concerning the Mystery of the most Holy Trinity, and insists chiefly upon proving the Divinity of the Holy Spirit. This Discourse was spoken in the Year 379, before Maximus was Ordained Bishop of Constantinople by the Egyptians.

The 25*th.* Discourse is against the Arians: He begins it with declaring, that they ought not to Glory in their Multitude, nor despise his little Flock, because it preserved and maintained the Purity of the Faith. He represents in the following Discourse the Troubles and Confusions which the Arian Heresie produced, and charges them with all the Outrages and Cruelties, which they had exercised against the Catholicks. He shews, that neither the Magnificence, nor Grandeur, nor Riches, nor Power of the Arians rendered their Cause more acceptable in the sight of God. He vindicates himself from the Reproaches thrown upon him of coming to Constantinople to make Disturbances: He says, That he did not come thither of his own accord as those who now run after the Promotions of the Church; that he was called to the place; that he only followed the Guidance of the Holy Spirit; and that after he came to Constantinople, he did not imitate those who were insatiably Covetous; that he had commenc'd no Law-suit against the Arians, neither for their Churches, nor for the Ecclesiastical Revenues, tho' they were unjustly possess'd both of the one and the other; that he had Persecuted no Body; that he had suffered patiently all manner of Injuries and evil Treatment. After he has shewn these things, he makes an Elegant Comparison between the Arians and the Catholicks of Constantinople. 'They have, says he, the Temples, but we 'have the God that dwells in them, and we our selves are 'the Temples; they have the People for them, we have the 'Angels for us; they have for their Portion Assurance and 'Rashness, we have the Faith on our side; they have Threatnings, we have Prayers; they Persecute, and we Suffer; 'they have Gold and Silver, and we are in possession of the 'Holy Doctrine: But our Flock is little? Yes, but it does 'not go to throw it self upon Precipices; our Sheep-fold is 'narrow, but it is well-guarded against Wolves; it does 'not lie open to Robbers, and Strangers cannot enter into 'it. This little Flock which will every Day grow greater 'by the Grace of God, gives me no Cause to fear. I see 'it, I count it easily; I know my Sheep, and they know 'me; they hear my Voice, they answer me; I call them 'and they follow me, and they will not follow Strangers, 'they will not follow Valentinus, Montanus, Manes, Donatus, Sabellius, Arius, Photinus; and they continue stedfast in the Faith of the Trinity, in whose Name they were 'baptiz'd.' This Discourse was spoken by St. Gregory, some time after he was come to Constantinople.

In the 26*th.* Discourse, he exhorts those of his Party to observe Moderation in their Disputes with Hereticks. He there lays down a great many very Wise and useful Maxims. He observes, that Peace is the greatest Good than can be enjoyed; that Schisms and Heresies have been raised up by Men of great Wit, but turbulent and designing; that those Men, are the Cause of Wars, Seditions, and other Mischiefs, both to the Ecclesiastical and Civil Society; that we ought neither to be too hot, nor too remiss in the Defence of the Faith; that upon the whole Matter, the Order established in the Church between the Pastors and their Sheep, between the Clergy and the Laity, must be inviolably observed; that 'tis often much better to be silent than to speak of Mysteries, because it is very Difficult to comprehend and explain them; and that 'tis very rare to find Ears fit to hear them, and Minds capable of bearing them; That when we are obliged to speak, we should do it with much Humility and Modesty; That the common People should content themselves with believing, and leave Disputes to the Learned; That Faith and Religion are for the Ignorant as well as for the Learned, and for the Poor as well as the Rich; That the Learned themselves ought to shun useless Questions and Disputes; That among the Hebrews, it was not allowed to all the Jews indifferently to Discourse of the Law, but they chose such to do it as were judged Capable of it; That some Men had one Gift, some another; in short, That those who take upon them to Dispute and Teach others, being push'd on by a Zeal for the Faith, should not condemn those who by a reasonable Precaution and wholsome Fear are hindred from adventuring to do the like. He concludes all these Reflections in these Words: 'If you will all obey me, as well 'Young as Old, as well Clergy as Laity, as well Monks 'as those that are barely the Faithful, you will give o'ver this vain Ostentation of shewing your Knowledge by 'Disputes, and you will rather take care to draw near to 'God by an upright and prudent Conversation, by the Purity 'of your Manners, by your edifying Discourses, that so at 'last you may obtain Eternal Life.' 'Tis not necessary here to observe, that this Discourse was spoken at Constantinople. St. Gregory Nazianzen.

In the 27*th.* Discourse St. Gregory vindicates himself against those who accused him of Ambition. In his Exordium, he enquires after the Reasons, why the People of Constantinople were enticed and as it were charmed by his Preaching. He says, that it could not be his Learning which allured them, for they were satisfied that he had but little of it; That it could not be the Doctrine which he taught them, since he was not the first who had preached it to them, neither had he preached any thing to them which they had not learned formerly from St. Alexander their Bishop: 'That neither can they say, that he had gained 'them by Artificial and Flattering Discourses, as for the 'most part, says he, they do now a-Days who are of the 'Priestly Function, who have made an Art of Preaching the Word of God, who have brought the Arts of the 'Bar into the Church, and the Ornaments of the Theatre 'into the Chair of the Truth. You know, adds he, and God 'is my Witness, That we are so great Strangers to this 'Fault, that they rather accuse me of Rusticity, and of not 'knowing the World, than of being a Flatterer, and seeking to please Men, since I sometimes Reprove too severely even those who are most Affectionate to me, when 'they do any thing that I think not reasonable. You know 'how I mourned, how I cryed, when ye placed me against my 'Will upon the Throne, violating the Laws of the Church 'for the Love that you shewed me. I used so great Freedom with those who appeared most zealous for me, that 'they withdrew in Anger, and changed their antient Friendship all of the sudden into hatred against me. Why then 'have you so great a Passion for me, but only, First, Because you chose me your selves, and called me to your 'Assistance; and Secondly, Because you have acknowledged, that I was neither Ambitious, nor Fierce, nor Passionate, nor Proud, nor given to Flattery; and Thirdly, Because you have seen how I have suffered for you all, both 'from those that openly attacked me, and from those that 'so cruelly laid secret Snares for me.' After this he vindicates himself from the Charge which his Enemies drew up against him, upon the account of his Eloquence. He says, that 'tis Envy which makes them speak thus. He justifies himself also from the Ambition whereof he was accused; and shews, that he did not ambitiously aspire after the See of Constantinople; That he had met with nothing there but Labour and Fatigue; That if he had been free to choose, he should have preferred his Solitude before so painful an Employment; That he was not engaged in it for any other Reason but only to assist the Church of Constantinople which was then without an Orthodox Bishop; That he would not trouble himself, tho' Men should Censure him for having other Motives than really he had; That God knows what his true Intention was; That he never sought to please Men but God only; That he loved Goodness for Goodness sake, without any prospect of worldly Interest. At last, He addresses his Speech to all Estates of Men, and makes this brave Remonstrance to them: 'You 'Kings of the Earth have a Respect for your Crown; Consider the Excellency of Power which is entrusted with you: 'All the World is subject to your Empire, but the Heavenly things are above you; 'tis God only who governs 'them: Be you as Gods with respect to your Subjects, make 'your Empire to consist in this, and not in Gold, in Silver, and in Arms. You Great Men of the Age, who 'possess the most considerable Offices in the State, be not 'lifted up because of your Power, look not upon things 'Temporal as if they were Eternal: Be you faithful to the 'Emperors, but above all things be faithful to God. You 'that are Perſons of Quality make your Manners anſwerable to your Nobility. You Wiſe Men, you Philoſophers, you Orators, how can you pretend to Wiſdom and Eloquence, if you do not Adore him who is the Author and Fountain both of the one and the other? You that love Riches, hearken to the Prophet, who Admoniſhes you not to truſt to the abundance of your Riches; know that you rely upon a Frail thing. You that ſpend your time in Diverſions, mortifie your ſelves by refraining from ſome things, aſſiſt your Sick Brother with that which you have too much of. In ſhort, all you that are Citizens of this Second City of the World, which hardly yields to the Firſt, Govern your ſelves after ſuch a manner, that you may be the Firſt in Virtue, and not in Debauchery and Licentiouſneſs.' This Diſcourſe was ſpoken ſome time after Theodoſius, and the People had forced St. Gregory Nazianzen to aſcend the Epiſcopal Throne of Conſtantinople, at the End of the Year 380.

The following Diſcourſe, was ſpoken after Maximus had endeavoured to render himſelf Maſter of the Epiſcopal See of Conſtantinople. St. Gregory had retired for ſome time into the Country to refreſh himſelf: When he returned, being certainly informed of all that was done againſt him in his Abſence, he made a Diſcourſe to his People againſt this Philoſopher: And Firſt, in the Exordium of his Diſcourſe, he declared the Joy he had upon his Return to his Flock, from which he had been ſeparated, and then he falls very ſeverely upon Maximus, and ſhews, that he was unworthy of the Epiſcopal Throne which he aſpired to: Afterwards he draws a Portraiture of a True Philoſopher to ſet it againſt that which he had made of Maximus, and deſcribes the ſeveral Offices of all Conditions. He returns to his Subject again, by ſaying, That he feared not his Enemies in the leaſt: 'For what will they do to me ſays he? 'How will they provoke me? They ſay that I am Ignorant: 'I know no other Wiſdom but the fear of God and the keeping his Commandments. They blame me for Poverty; 'alas, would to God, that I could even part with that 'little which I poſſeſs. They force me away from my Biſhoprick; but did I ever think it a happineſs to be a Biſhop? 'They will take from me one of the chief Sees, and one of 'the Principal Churches in the World. But is it not at 'this time a piece of Prudence to ſhun great Dignities, 'ſince upon their Account all Churches are embroiled and 'overthrown, and upon their Account the whole Earth is 'divided? Alas, would to God, adds he, that there were 'no places of Dignity in the Church, no Precedencies, no 'Tyrannical Prerogatives, and that none would diſtinguiſh 'us but by our Virtue. But at preſent, what Miſchiefs do the 'Diſputes about Prerogative and Place, bring upon the 'Church! How many People are deſtroyed for theſe Conteſts? I ſpeak not only of the Laity but even of the Biſhops. What more will they do unto me? they will hinder me from approaching to the Altars: But I know another Altar, whereof this is but a Figure which can neither be demoliſhed nor broken. Will they drive me away from my Houſe? Will they hinder me from diverting my ſelf? Will they alienate my Friends from me? 'I have no other Houſe but that which the Piety of another Shunamite offered me. As to what concerns Pleaſures, all the Evil that I wiſh to thoſe that deſign Evil to 'me, is, that they may enjoy no other Pleaſures than what 'I take. As for my Friends, I have ſome that will not forſake me, even tho' they ſhould be ill intreated upon my 'Account. There are others whoſe Pride I have endured 'for a long time. Peter has denyed me, and it may be he has 'not yet bewailed his Fault.' He concludes with deploring the Miſery of his Church.

The 29*th*. Sermon begins with a Declamation againſt thoſe who thruſt themſelves into places of Governing the People, and Preaching the Word of God without being capable. Afterwards he explains the Myſtery of the moſt Holy Trinity very exactly. Above all things he recommends to them that Chriſtians ſhould hold the Simplicity of Faith, without endeavouring to fathom and comprehend its Myſteries. This Sermon was preached at Conſtantinople.

The 30*th*. Sermon is about the Election of Eulalius Biſhop of Doara. This Diſcourſe is ſhort, and contains nothing Remarkable. It was ſpoken about the Year 372.

In the 31*ſt*. Diſcourſe having ſpoken of the Myſtery of the Incarnation, he explains the Anſwer of Jeſus Chriſt to the Phariſees, in Ch. 19. of St. Matthew's Goſpel, concerning Divorce. He ſays upon this place, that Jeſus Chriſt condemns the Cuſtom which permits Husbands to forſake their Wives, and does not permit Wives to forſake their Husbands, becauſe in the Sight of God there is no Inequality between the Man and the Woman. He obſerves, That a Bill of Divorce permitted Husbands to ſend away their Wives for all ſorts of Reaſons; but that Jeſus Chriſt did not permit it except only in caſe of Adultery. He ſays, That Marriage is commendable, when the Parties are contracted with a deſign of having Children; but he prefers Virginity to Marriage. He explains in what Senſe 'tis ſaid, That all Perſons are not capable of Celibacy. Though he owns the Free-will of Man, yet he confeſſes, that God muſt give a Will to do Good, and enable us to obtain the Victory. He occaſionally rejects the Opinion of Origen concerning the Pre-exiſtence of Souls. Laſtly, he exhorts his Auditors not only to preſerve the Purity of Faith as well as of their Bodies, but alſo to contribute according to their Power to the Eſtabliſhment of Sound Doctrine. He addreſſes himſelf chiefly to the Emperor, and tells him, that if he thought that he did great Service to God, by hindering Murders, Adulteries, and Robberies by his Edicts, he might yet do him greater Service by making an Edict in Favour of the Catholick Faith. This Diſcourſe was in the Year 380.

St. Gregory Nazianzen.

The 32*d*. Diſcourſe is an Oration which he made to the Biſhops of the Council of Conſtantinople in the Year 382. Where, after he has made his Apology for governing the Church of Conſtantinople, by deſcribing the wonderful Effects he had produced in that Church, he prays them to grant him a Succeſſor, with as much Earneſtneſs, as others deſire the Greateſt Sees.

The Reaſons which he alledges for obtaining Permiſſion to retire, are Firſt, his great Age, the Quarrels of Churches and Biſhops, the Envy that ſome bore to him, the Diviſion of the Eaſt and the Weſt, and his Love of Retirement and Solitude. He adds ſome other reaſons which tend to the Confuſion of his Enemies, ſuch as the Perſecutions which he had endured with Patience, his Frugality, his Modeſty, his Humility. At laſt, he conjures them to create another Biſhop who ſhould be more agreeable to the reliſh of the World. Here he repreſents very naturally, the Luxury, Ambition, and Arts which were but too common among the Biſhops of the great Sees. At laſt he bids Adieu to his Dear Anaſtaſia, to the other Churches of Conſtantinople, to the Council, the Clergy, the People, and to the Court. Theſe Adieu's are pathetical to thoſe that had an Eſteem of him, and are very picquant to thoſe that were his Enemies, and wiſhed that he would abdicate his Charge. 'Tis plain that this Diſcourſe is the laſt of thoſe which he ſpoke at Conſtantinople.

The Five following Diſcourſes are Entituled, Of Theology, becauſe St. Gregory Nazianzen explains there what concerns the Divine Nature, and the Trinity of Perſons: there he Treats of the Rules which ought to be obſerved in the Adminiſtration of the Word of God. He ſays Firſt, That this Function does not ſuit all Men; that he who diſcharges it muſt be pure in Heart and Mind; That he ſhould not apply himſelf to it but with a ſedate Temper; and Laſtly, that he ought not to treat of thoſe Matters before Pagans, nor before thoſe who have no ſenſe of Religion, and who think of nothing but Pleaſures. He adds many fine things about the Diſpoſitions and Qualifications that are neceſſary to a Divine. He blames thoſe who having their Hands tied, that is, who do no Good Works, yet have a wonderful Itch to prate, and thoſe who think to be great Divines, becauſe they underſtand the Subtilties of Ariſtotle's Logick, and the Gentile Philoſophy, which they make uſe of nothing to the Purpoſe when they Diſcourſe about Myſteries.

In the 2*d*. Diſcourſe he enquires what may be conceived concerning the Nature of God. He ſays, that his Exiſtence is known by the Creatures; That his Immenſity, Spirituality, and his other Attributes are known; but that it does not follow from hence, that his Eſſence and Nature can be comprehended; which he proves againſt Eunomius in the ſecond Diſcourſe of Theology, which contains many great Notions concerning the Nature and Attributes of God.

In the 3*d*. he proves the Equality of the Three Perſons and the Divinity of the Son, and Anſwers the moſt part of Eunomius's Sophiſms. The 4*th*. continues the ſame ſubject; and in the 5*th*. he proves, That the Holy Spirit is a Divine Perſon diſtinct from the Father and the Son; That he proceeds from the Father, and that he is not begotten as the Son, tho' he be of the ſame Subſtance and the ſame Nature. He obſerves towards the end of this Diſcourſe, That under the Old Teſtament the Father only was diſtinctly known; that the Son is clearly revealed in the New; that in it alſo there are found paſſages enough to prove the Divinity of the Holy Spirit, but that it was fully cleared by the Tradition of the Church. Theſe Diſcourſes ſeem alſo to have been ſpoken at Conſtantinople. And thus we are come to the 38*th*. Sermon upon the Feſtival of the Birth of Jeſus Chriſt. In it St. Gregory admires the Wonders of the Myſteries of the Incarnation: He deſcribes the Fall of the Firſt Man, which he ſuppoſes to have been the Cauſe of the Incarnation of Jeſus Chriſt, and reckons up the Advantages which Mankind received by this Myſtery. At laſt, He teaches Chriſtians to Celebrate the Feſtival of Chriſtmas, by purifying themſelves from their Sins, by imitating the Virtues of Jeſus Chriſt, and particularly his Patience and Humility.

The 39*th*. Diſcourſe is a Sermon upon the Feſtival Of Lights, that is, upon the Feaſt of Epiphany, on which alſo the Solemnity of the Baptiſm of Jeſus Chriſt is obſerved. There he ſpeaks of the wonderful Effects of this Baptiſm, which had the Virtue of purifying us. He diſtinguiſhes many ſorts of Baptiſm; viz. The Baptiſm of Moſes, the Baptiſm of of St. John, the Baptism of Jesus Christ, the Baptism of the Martyrs, and the Baptism of Penance which he calls a Laborious Baptism; and taking occasion from this last he Discourses against the Error of the Novatians. Last of all, he adds also to this Baptism which we have already mentioned, the Baptism of Fire, wherewith he says one may be Baptized in another Life.

The following Discourse was spoken the next Day. 'Tis an Instruction about Baptism to those that are to be Baptized: There he observes the excellence of Baptism and its marvellous Effects. He sets down and explains the different Names that are given to this Sacrament. He observes, That it consists in two Things, the Water and the Spirit; that the washing the Body with Water, represents the Operation of the Spirit in purifying the Soul. He says, that Baptism is a compact which we make with God, by which we oblige our selves to lead a new Life; that 'tis very dangerous to break the Promise which we made at Baptism, for there is no more Regeneration, nor perfect Renovation to be hoped for afterwards; that we may indeed cover the Wound by a multitude of Tears and Sighs, but that it would be much better not to need this Second Remedy, because it is very difficult and troublesome; and that we can have no assurance but Death may surprize us before our Penance be finished. You, says he, addressing himself to the Ministers of Jesus Christ, you can, as the Gardener mentioned in the Gospel, pray the Lord to excuse the barren Fig-Tree yet a little longer, you can desire him that he would not cut it down, and that he would permit you to Dung it, that is to say, to impose as a Penance upon it Weeping, Watching, lying upon the hard Ground, Corporal Mortifications and making humble Satisfaction; but what certainty have you that God will pardon him. Wherefore, my Brethren, being buried by Baptism with Jesus Christ, let us rise with him, let us descend with him into the Waters, that we may ascend with him into Heaven. He proves afterwards, that we ought not to delay the receiving of Baptism, and refutes the vain pretences of those who delay it. He says, that Infants are to be Baptized to consecrate them to Jesus Christ from their Infancy. He distinguishes Three sorts of Persons that are Baptized; the First, are those who do Evil wilfully and with Delight; the Second, are those who commit Sin with some reluctancy, and without approving it; the Third, are those who live well before they are Baptized, either because they are Naturally inclined to Virtue, or because they would prepare themselves for Baptism. He distinguishes also Three Sorts of Persons among those who do not receive Baptism. Some are Impious and Malicious who live in the greatest Excesses, and have no Veneration at all for Baptism: Others have a great deal of Respect for this Sacrament, but they delay to receive it either thro' Carelessness, or that they may still have the greater liberty to sin: The last are those who cannot receive it, either because of their Infancy, or because of some sudden Accident. As to the first, he makes no doubt but they shall be most grievously punished, not only for their other Crimes, but also for despising Baptism. As to the second, he says they shall be less punished because they are not kept from Baptism by Malice, but by Negligence or Folly. As to the last, he says, that they shall never partake of Glory, but neither shall they suffer the Punishments of Hell; because tho' they were not baptized, yet they were free from Sin, and it may be said of them, that they rather suffered the Loss than were the Cause of it. He says also in the following Discourse, that Infants must be baptized, tho' there be no danger of their death. After this he enlarges upon the Effects of Baptism, and upon the divine Fire which purifies us. He concludes according to his Custom, with an Explication of the Trinity. In this Discourse he mentions Unction, and some other Ceremonies of Baptism. These three Discourses were spoken at Constantinople in 381.

The 41*st*. Sermon is the first Sermon upon the Feast of Easter, which is very short and contains nothing remarkable. It was spoken at Nazianzum.

In the 42*d*. Sermon upon the same Festival, having repeated some part of what he had said about the Incarnation of Jesus Christ, in his Oration upon the Feast of Christmas he explains the Ceremonies of the Jewish Passover, which he applies to the Passion of Jesus Christ. This place shews that his Allegories are very far fetched. The rest of his Discourse is a Repetition of what he had said in his Sermon upon the Nativity, concerning the Impiety of Heretick, and an Exposition of the Faith of the Church. 'Tis thought that this Sermon was composed by St. Gregory at Nazianzum, after he returned from Constantinople.

The 43*d*. Discourse was spoken at the Feast of the Dedication of the Church of St. Mamas, which was near Nazianzum. There he discourses of this Dedication which he calls the New Sunday. He exhorts his Auditors to Virtue, and concludes with saying something of the Life of St. Mamas. This Discourse was made when St. Gregory Nazianzen was Coadjutor to his Father.

The 44*th*. Sermon of Pentecost begins with an Instruction about the manner of celebrating these Feasts, after which follow his Commendations of the Number Seven: The rest of the Discourse is about the Holy Spirit and his Gifts.

St. Gregory Nazianzen.

These are all the Sermons of St. Gregory Nazianzen. The following Treatises are not Sermons but Letters.

The 45*th*. is a Letter written to a Monk called Evagrius, who could not conceive how the Divine Nature or Substance could be simple, being composed of Three Persons. St. Gregory resolves this Difficulty, by saying, That the Essence of God is most simple, and that the Persons tho' distinct, yet are not separated, nor really distinguished from the Divine Essence, which is common to the Three. He explains this by many Examples.

The 46*th*. is a Letter to Nectarius, who was his Successor in the Throne of the Church of Constantinople; where he bewails the Unhappiness of the Church which is attacked by an infinite number of Hereticks. He writes particularly against Apollinarius, whose Errors he relates as they were taken out of one of his own Books. He accuses him of teaching, That the Word assumed Flesh from all Eternity; of affirming, That the Divinity of Jesus Christ supplied the place of a human Soul, and that it may be said to have suffer'd and to die as well as the Humanity. After this he observes, that it is not lawful to assemble at the publick Prayers with Persons of these Opinions: Then he exhorts Nectarius to act vigorously against the Hereticks, and to pray the Emperor that he would suppress the Liberty which they now had of meeting and preaching.

The 47*th*. Discourse is an Allegorical Explication of the Four Animals mentioned in the First Chap. of Ezekiel. The Greeks doubt whether this Book be St. Gregory's: And indeed the Stile is very confused, and every thing is handled without any Order or Design, and it seems to be patched up of various Pieces; which makes me believe, with Jacobus Billius, that this Discourse is unworthy of St. Gregory.

The 48*th*. Sermon attributed to St. Gregory, is a Discourse in praise of the Martyrs, published by Leunclavius, which is in Greek in the last Edition. This Discourse seems not to me to have St. Gregory's Stile. Some have attributed it to St. Chrysostome.

The 49*th*. Discourse of Faith, which is said to be a Translation made by Ruffinus from the Text of Gregory Nazianzen, is the Work of some Latin Author, who quotes the Holy Scripture according to the Old Latin Vulgar Version. The Prologue of Ruffinus which is at the beginning, is a Preface to the Apologetick, and the Seven Discourses of this Author, and not to the Version of the Treatise of Faith. The same Judgment is to be given of the following Treatise, concerning the Faith of the Council of Nice, which is not to be found in many Manuscripts. The first Treatise is quoted under the Name of St. Gregory by St. Austin in his third Letter; but it must certainly be another Gregory than this of Nazianzum: For undoubtedly this Work is a Latin Author's, since in two places he speaks of the Greeks, as not being one himself. The Reason, or the Word, says he, is called by the Greeks λογος; and in another place, This is what the Greeks call Homousion. This Treatise therefore must be some Latin Author's who was called Gregory: And there is none to whom it agrees better than to Gregory of Bætica, of whom we have already said, that he wrote a Treatise of Faith. Some have attributed it to St. Ambrose, others to Vigilius Tapsensis; but the Citation of St. Austin shews that it could not be written by this last, and that it was not written by the first. The following Treatise is also the same Author's, being written to explain the former, as Monsieur Quesnel has shewn in his 14*th*. Dissertation upon the antient Code of the Roman Church, where this Treatise is inserted.

The 51*st*. and 52*d*. Treatises are two Letters to Cledonius, which St. Gregory wrote against Apollinarius, after he returned to Pontus, as is observed by the antient Author of his Life. In the first of these two Letters, St. Gregory complains of Apollinarius, that he and his Disciples published new Doctrines, and that they boasted of their being received by a Synod of Western Bishops, tho' they were condemned in it, and explains the Faith of the Church about the Incarnation, and plainly rejects not only the Errors of Apollinarius, but also those that have been since published by Nestorius, by Eutyches, and by all the other Hereticks. He gives to the Virgin, the Name and Title of, The Mother of God. Afterwards he refutes the Objections of Apollinarius, and observes another Error of this Author concerning the Trinity. He affirms, towards the end of this Letter, that we ought not to communicate with this Heretick. In the 2*d*. Letter he discovers the Tricks and Subtleties which the Apollinarians used to make People believe that they were Orthodox. Towards the end of this Letter he has these excellent Words: 'O strange Folly! He pretends to preach 'that Wisdom which has been discovered since Jesus Christ. 'What pity 'tis! For if the Gospel was not known till a-'about 30 Years ago, then the Gospel was of no use, for '400 Years that the Church has been established: In vain 'have Christians believed and so many Martyrs suffered; 'in vain have so many holy Bishops governed the Church.

St. Gregory Nazianzen.

The Paraphraſe upon Eccleſiaſtes was written by St. Gregory Thaumaturgus, as we have obſerved in ſpeaking of this Father's Works. But we muſt add here to what we have ſaid in that place to prove it, that not only St. Jerome teſtifies in his Book of Eccleſiaſtical Writers, that St. Gregory Thaumaturgus wrote a Treatiſe upon Eccleſiaſtes, but that he cites this Treatiſe as his, in his Commentary upon the 4*th*. Chapter, where he quotes a Paſſage which is word for word in the 4*th*. Chapter of this Paraphraſe.

The Poems of St. Gregory Nazianzen were the Fruits of his laſt Retirement; he wrote them in the laſt years of his Life: In them is to be found all the Fire and Vigor which one would deſire in the Works of a young Man, and all the Thoughts which the Practice of Virtue, for the ſpace of many Years, could inſpire into an Old Man of conſummate Piety.

The 1*ſt*. is a Poem which contains the Hiſtory of his own Life from his Birth, till his departure from Conſtantinople. There never was any thing of this kind written more pleaſantly, more elegantly, and more naturally than this Life is. In the firſt part he deſcribes his publick and known Actions, where he ſays many things which are very uſeful to explain the Hiſtory of the Council of Conſtantinople, and the Diviſions of the Eaſtern and Weſtern Churches; and there alſo he diſcourſes againſt the Ignorance, the Pride, and the corrupt Manners of the Biſhops of his time.

In the 2*d*. Part he deſcribes the Diſpoſitions of his Mind: The former Part relates to Hiſtory, and this to Morality; and as there are in the former Part many Circumſtances that belong to Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory; ſo this contains many Chriſtian and Moral Thoughts. The former is written in Iambick Verſe, the latter in Hexameters.

In his Poem of the praiſe of Virginity, he handles with much Wit and Eloquence, the Queſtion about the Preheminence of Celibacy above Marriage; and that he may explain this Queſtion the more pleaſantly, after he has enlarged upon the Praiſes of Virginity, he makes an excellent Proſopopœia, wherein he brings in married Perſons, and thoſe who obſerve Celibacy, ſpeaking for both their Opinions; each of them ſays all that can be ſaid on their ſide in favour of their State, but the latter have the better.

The 3*d*. Poem contains many Precepts for Virgins; he recommends to them Silence, Modeſty, Retirement, Labour, and other Virtues neceſſary for a Virgin. Theſe two Poems are in Hexameter Verſe.

In the 4*th*. Poem he bewails in general the Miſery of Mankind, cauſed by the Sin of Adam, and relates ſome Circumſtances of his own Life. This is in Elegiacks.

In the 5*th*. having deſcribed the Croſſes and Sickneſſes which he had endured in his Life; he ſubmits himſelf to the Will of God, and offers to him the Remainder of his painful Life.

The 6*th*. is upon the Vanity and Uncertainty of this mortal Life.

In the 7*th*. he bewails his Miſeries, and prays to God to deliver him from them.

The 8*th*. is upon the ſame Subject.

In the 9*th*. he deſcribes a Dream, which he had about the Church of Anaſtaſia.

In the 10*th*. after having deſcribed the Lightneſs and Hypocriſy of the Biſhops of his time, he congratulates himſelf upon his Departure from Conſtantinople.

The 11*th*. Poem deſcribes the Vices of wicked Biſhops, and deplores the Diviſion of the Church; there he obſerves, that Perſecutions encreaſed the Church; but Abundance and Riches have done it great Prejudice.

In the 12*th*. which is addreſſed to the Biſhops of the Council of Conſtantinople, he deſcribes after what manner he was forced away from that City, and teſtifies his Joy, for that God had recalled him to his Retirement.

In the 13*th*. he deſcribes the Miſery and Weakneſs of human Nature.

He continues the ſame Subject in the 14*th*. wherein he deſcribes the Miſeries of Life and the Horror of Death, to teach Men to love nothing but Jeſus Chriſt, and to have no Affection for any thing but the Treaſures in Heaven.

The 15*th*. is alſo upon the ſame Subject, wherein he repreſents the Uncertainty and Inſtability of this mortal Life and of worldly Riches, to convince Men that there is nothing ſolid here below, but the Love of Jeſus Chriſt.

The 16*th*. contains the Beatitudes of the Goſpel, and the Rules of a Chriſtian Life.

In the 17*th*. he wiſhes many Imprecations upon himſelf, if he ſhould wander from the Faith of Chriſt, and the Precepts of the Goſpel.

The 18*th*. is againſt the Deſires of the Fleſh.

The 19*th*. is againſt the Devil.

The 20*th*. is an Exhortation which he made to himſelf, to ſtir himſelf up to Converſion.

The 21*ſt*. is an Imprecation upon the Devil, and an Invocation of Jeſus Chriſt.

The 22*d*. is a Prayer to God, to be delivered from this Life of Sin and Death.

The 23*d*. is a Reflection upon the Uncertainty of Life, and the Contempt we ought to have of it.

The 24*th*. and 25*th*. are upon the Weakneſs and Miſery of our Nature.

St. Gregory Nazianzen.

The 26*th*. is of the Deſire of God.

The 27*th*. and 28*th*. is a Lamentation upon the view of his own Miſeries and Sins.

The 29*th*. is a Prayer to Jeſus Chriſt.

The 30*th*. is a kind of Epitaph.

The 31*ſt*. is a Prayer of a Penitent Perſon.

The 32*d*. is a Farewel to the Devil.

In the 33*d*. he makes a Catalogue of the Books of the Holy Scripture. He diſtinguiſhes thoſe of the Old Teſtament, into Hiſtorical, Poetical and Prophetical; he reckons 12 Hiſtorical, viz. The Five Books of Moſes, Joſhua, Judges, Ruth, the two Books of Kings, the Chronicles, and Ezra. He reckons Five Poetical, the Book of Job, the Pſalms of David, Eccleſiaſtes, the Proverbs, and the Song of Salomon; and five Prophetical, which are the 12 leſſer Prophets that make but one Book only, Iſaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel and Daniel; which in all make the number of 22 Books, according to the number of the Hebrew Letters. Afterwards he reckons up the Books of the New Teſtament, which are the Four Evangeliſts, upon whom he has this Obſervation, that St. Matthew wrote for the Hebrews, St. Mark for the Greeks, St. Luke for the Athenians, and St. John for thoſe who penetrate into the moſt Sublime things. He joins with the Four Evangeliſts the Fourteen Epiſtles of St. Paul, thoſe of St. James, the two Epiſtles of St. Peter, and the three of St. John, and that of St. Jude. He concludes with ſaying, that theſe are all the Books of the Holy Scripture, and that all others are Apocryphal.

In the 34*th*. he deſcribes the Plagues of Egypt.

In the 35*th*. he turns the Decalogue into Verſe.

In the 36*th*. the Names of the 12 Patriarchs are put in Verſe, and thoſe of the 12 Apoſtles.

In the 37*th*. and 38*th*. he reconciles the two Genealogies of Jeſus Chriſt, by explaining the Opinion of Africanus. 'Tis a very ſurprizing thing, that he could put this Critical Queſtion into Verſe, and make all the Names of the Genealogies of Jeſus Chriſt come into Feet, and yet he has done it, and handſomly enough.

In the following Poems as far as the 46*th*. he turns ſome part of the Hiſtories of the Goſpel into Verſe.

In the 46*th*. he prefers a Monaſtical Life to an Hermetical.

In the 47*th*. he prays Helenius to eaſe the Monks of Taxes.

In the 48*th*. he exhorts one Julianus a Magiſtrate to Almsgiving.

The 49*th*. is written in the Name of Nicobulus the Son, who deſired of his Father, that he would ſend him to ſome famous Academy to follow his Studies there.

The 50*th*. is an Anſwer made in the Name of this Father who exhorts his Son to ſtudy.

The 51*ſt*. is written on the Name of the Son of Vitalianus, to appeaſe the Anger of his Father.

The 52*d*. is againſt a lewd rich Man.

The 53*d*. is a Prayer of St. Gregory as he went into the Fields.

The 54*th*. is of the Silence which he kept during the time of Faſting: there he deſcribes the Miſchiefs which too great deſire of ſpeaking produces, and the Advantages of Silence.

The 55*th*. is a Hymn to Jeſus Chriſt upon the Feaſt of Eaſter, after he had kept Silence all the time of Lent.

In the 56*th*. he gives to one Olympias a Woman ready to be Married, ſome very uſeful Precepts for her good Behaviour in Marriage.

The 57*th*. is upon his Departure from Conſtantinople.

In the 58*th*. he proves the falſhood of Human Virtue, and ſhews, that without the Grace of God, all our Endeavours are unprofitable to our Salvation. Without the aſſiſtance of Jeſus Chriſt, ſays he, a Man cannot walk in the Way of Salvation: Therefore we muſt take heed that we do not attribute to our ſelves what does not belong to us; we muſt not truſt our own ſtrength, how enlightned ſoever we be; we muſt not deſpiſe thoſe who appear to be leſs advanced than we in the way of Virtue, as if we were nearer the Deſign and End of our Courſe. He adds many other Reflections, very proper to beat down the Pride of Man, and to humble him under the Almighty Hand of God.

The 59*th*. is a bitter Satyr againſt the Monks, who live diſagreeably to the Rules of that State, tho' they wear the Habit.

The 60*th*. is an excellent Prayer in a time of Sickneſs.

In the 61*ſt*. he exhorts Nemeſius Governor of Cappadocia, to forſake Paganiſm, and embrace the Chriſtian Religion.

The 62*d*. is a Collection of very uſeful Chriſtian Thoughts and Maxims for the Conduct of our Lives.

The 63*d*. is againſt the Pomps, the Ornaments, and ſumptuous Dreſſes of Women; and particularly he applies himſelf to condemn their Painting.

The 64*th*. is an Epitaph upon St. Baſil.

After this there are ſeveral Sentences or Moral Thoughts, which contain the principal Offices of Life.

A Deſcription of Human Life, and ſeveral Rules or Maxims of Morality.

St. Gregory Nazianzen.

The following Poem is Dogmatical. St. Gregory explains the principal Articles of the Christian Religion; and he treats of the Unity of God, of the Trinity, of the Divinity of the Son and the Holy Spirit, of the Creation of the World, of Angels and Devils, of the Nature and Origin of the Soul, of the two Testaments, of the Cause and Effects of the Incarnation of Jesus Christ, and of the Baptisms of Water and of Blood. After this comes a Treatise in Verse upon Virginity, many exhortations to his own Soul, and Prayers to God.

There are besides 33 Poems written in Iambick Verse upon different Subjects, a Treatise against Apollinarius, and some other separate things: the Tragedy, entituled Christ's Sufferings, wants very much of the Beauty, the Judgment and the Gravity of St. Gregory's Pieces, and so 'tis not without reason that the Criticks judge it unworthy of him.

We have in the second Volume of St. Gregory Nazianzen, at the end of his Poetical Works, a Discourse of this Saint about Bishops; and tho' we have it now only in Latin, yet 'tis plain that 'tis a Translation of a Genuine Treatise of St. Gregory's. There he relates after what manner he came to Constantinople, and the Troubles he suffered there for the Establishment of the Faith, he complains of the Ingratitude of the Bishops who forced him away from thence; and then he gives a very disadvantageous Character of them, wherein he represents them either Ignorant and Stupid, or Proud and Ambitious, or Covetous, who think of nothing but heaping up of Riches by all kinds of Ways, or Hypocrites who under the appearance of Virtue conceal the greatest Immoralities.

There is in the greatest part of St. Gregory Nazianzen's Letters, more Wit, Learning and Eloquence, than Doctrine concerning Religion and the Discipline of the Church; yet there are some of them, wherein he pursues some Moral thoughts with a great deal of Eloquence; as in the 17*th*. wherein he reproves Cæsarius because he stayed in Julian's Court.

The 18*th*. wherein he discourses of the Inconstancy and Frailty of human Life.

The 19*th*. and 20*th*. concerning the Reconciliation of St. Basil with Eusebius his Bishop.

The 22*d*. and 23*d*. are written in the Name of his Father to procure the Election of St. Basil to be Bishop of Cæsarea.

The 26*th*. is about the Calumny that had been raised against St. Basil, for his disguising his Opinion about the Divinity of the Holy Spirit.

The 31*st*. and 32*d*. wherein he complains that St. Basil had made him Bishop of Sasima.

The 37*th*. wherein he Comforts St. Gregory Nyssen upon the Death of his Brother.

The 38*th*. to a Lady who would force a Bishop away from his Bishoprick, under Pretence that he owed her very considerable Sums of Money, having formerly managed her Estate.

The 43*d*. wherein he reproves St. Gregory Nyssen, because he applied himself more to the Study of human Learning than of the Holy Scriptures.

The 59*th*. wherein he declares, that he was afraid of all Ecclesiastical Assemblies, Because I never saw, says he, the End of a Council which was happy and pleasant, and which did not rather encrease the Evil than diminish it. But this Censure which he wrote when he was vexed with the Council of Constantinople, which had not treated him very favourably, ought not to pass for a Rule, but only for a Testimony of his resentment which came from St. Gregory in his Passion.

The 59*th*. and 71*st*. wherein he exhorts his Brother and Posthumianus to make Peace between the Bishops.

The 63*d*. wherein he exhorts a Particular Person to embrace the Christian Philosophy, and to despise the things of this World.

The 64*th*. 66*th*. 67*th*. and 70*th*. wherein he exhorts another Person to bear his Pains and Sickness patiently.

The 81*st*. is an Excellent Exhortation to Patience, and some others. But the most considerable of them all is the 219, to Theodorus the Bishop of Tyana, which might be placed amongst the Canonical ones: The Bishop to whom he writes had consulted him about an Oath, or an Asseveration made in Writing in a certain Affair: He who made this Agreement not willing to hold it longer, cited him with whom he had agreed, before a Judge, and made void the Compact in Court. Now it was asked whether this Man should be treated as a perjured Person, since he had not made a Solemn Oath, according to the ordinary Forms. St. Gregory answers in this Letter, that he is not at all of their Opinion, who think that no Oaths but those which are made with the Mouth, and according to the usual Forms, by laying their Hands upon the Holy Gospels, do oblige in Conscience, and that Asseverations made in Writing do not bind after the same manner: 'For, says he, if Contracts 'made in Writing do more bind a Debtor than bare verbal Promises, Why shall not Oaths set down in Writing 'have at least as much Force, as those which are spoken 'with the Mouth? In a word, is an Oath any thing else, 'but the Affirmation of him who promises, or who assures 'any thing?' From whence he concludes, that this Man who had brought his Action in Law, to have this Compact dissolved, which he was obliged by Oath to fulfil, tho' he gained his Cause, yet was guilty of Perjury, and ought to do Penance for his Sin. This is a very useful Admonition in our time, wherein there is scarce any heed given to Oaths and Affirmations that are made in Writing, as if they were nothing but mere Formalities of Law, and not truly and properly Oaths. St. Gregory teaches the same thing in the Poem made against those who Swear often, where he says upon this Subject, Is one less obliged by writing than by his Words? and tho' he should not have touched the Gospels, yet does he owe ever the less Reverence for God?

St. Gregory Nazianzen.

The Letters of St. Gregory are in number 242, if we comprehend in that number the 10, last published by Sirmondus; but there are some of St. Basil's which are mixed among them, as the 30*th*. the 206*th*. and 207*th*. His Testament tho' Antient and Genuine relates only to his Domestick Affairs, and contains nothing but the Disposal of his Estate. This is all that we have to say in particular of the Works of Gregory Nazianzen: The Judgment which may be made of them in general is this:

It cannot be doubted, but this Author won the Prize of Eloquence from all the rest of his Age; for he does certainly excel them for the Purity of his Words, the Nobleness of his Expressions, the Ornament of his Discourse, the Variety of his Figures, the Justness of his Comparisons, the Beauty of his Reasonings, and the Sublimity of his Thoughts. St. Jerome and Suidas say, that he imitated an antient Author called Polemon, but we may say, that his Stile approached very near to that of Isocrates. How lofty soever it be, it is Natural, flowing gently, and pleasantly; his Periods are full, and hold up to the End; he has a wonderful abundance of Words, and unparallelled easiness of Expression, and a most agreeable turn of Wit. His Orations are compos'd with much Art and Method, for in them he uses such Characters as are most agreeable to his Subject and his Auditors, so that one may say of him, that he was one of the most perfect Orators of Greece, yet he affected too many Antitheses, Allusions, Similitudes, Comparisons, and certain other Fineness of Oratory, which seem to render it Effeminate. Sometimes also his Thoughts and Reasonings and false; but then 'tis covered with the sparkling of his Expressions, and involved in the multitude of his Words. He is extremely Copious, and says but few things in many Periods. There are great numbers of Philosophical thoughts interwoven in his Sermons, and they are full of Illustrations taken from History and Fables. He teaches Morality in such a manner as is more proper for Philosophers than the common People; but he is very Sublime and very Exact in the Explication of Mysteries, a Quality which made him deserve the Name of the Divine by way of Excellency. He had much Piety, but little skill in Managing of Business. He was so passionate a Lover of Retirement, that he could not for a considerable time apply himself to any Employment that hindered him from it. He easily undertook great things, but he quickly repented of his Undertakings. He had in his Life-time three Bishopricks, and yet it cannot be said that he was lawful Bishop of any one of them. For he would not have that of Sasima to which he was Ordained; and he did not accept of that of Nazianzum, but only for a time, to be Coadjutor to his Father, but upon Condition that he should not Succeed him. When he came to Constantinople, he had no design to be Bishop of that Church, neither did he take the Title upon him. 'Tis true that he was afterwards placed upon the Episcopal Throne by the Emperor and some Bishops; but he was at last forced to leave it. He was of a Morose and Satyrical Humour; he loved Raillery and spared no body; but chiefly the Bishops that were not worthy of their Ministry, or that did not lead a Life agreeable to their Holy Orders.

These are the Editions of the Works of this Father. In the year 1504, Aldus Manutius, a Printer at Venice, published one part of his Greek Poems; In the year 1516, he published sixteen Orations, and nine more in 1536. Afterwards all the Works of St. Gregory Nazianzen were collected together and printed in Greek at Basle by Hervagius in the year 1550. The antient Version of Ruffinus was printed at Leipsick, about the year 1522, without any Name. The Translation of Billibaldus Pircheymerus was printed at the same time with the Greek at Basle by Hervagius in 1550. In 1571, Leunclavius translated 19 Orations which were printed by the same Printer. But all these Versions being very imperfect, Jacobus Billius Abbot of St. Michael of the Hermitage, who was one of the ablest Men of the last Age in the Greek Tongue, made a new Version of St. Gregory's Works, which was first printed at Paris in 1569, and at Cologne in 1570; but the Edition of the same Version which Genebrard published at Paris in 1583, and dedicated to Pope Gregory the XIII. is much more large and more exact. 'Tis this Verſion which has the Greek Text on one ſide, in the Paris Edition in two Volumes, made by Morellus in 1609. Then there followed in the Edition of the Greek Text, the Corrections and Notes which Billius made on the Margin of St. Gregory at Baſle, and 'twas reviewed by many Manuſcripts. The firſt Volume contains the Life of St. Gregory Nazianzen, written by Gregory the Prieſt, the Orations and Letters of St. Gregory, together with an Addition, which contains the Greek Text of the Oration to the praiſe of the Martyrs, ſome Letters, and the Greek and Latin Teſtament of St. Gregory, with the Notes of Morellus, and ſome Critical Obſervations upon the Text, the different Readings and many Corrections. The ſecond Volume contains the Poems which had been already publiſhed by Billius, with his Verſion in Verſe, and ſome others tranſlated by Morellus, the Treatiſe of Biſhops, and the Latin Commentaries of Elias Cretenſis, Nicetas Serronius, Pſellus, Cyrus, and Billius upon all the Works of St. Gregory Nazianzen. This Edition is one of the faireſt in Greek and Latin, that ever was printed at Paris: In it the Greek Text is printed very neatly and exactly, the Latin Verſion is noble and elegant. The Beauty of the Latin Verſe is little inferior to that of the Greek, and the Diſcourſes are ranged in a very good Order; yet there are ſome Faults in the Text. The Verſion is not always literal and faithful enough, and the Order of time is not exactly obſerved, neither in the Letters, nor in the Orations. There remains now nothing for me to do, but to take notice of the particular Editions of ſome diſtinct Pieces of his Works. We have his Theological Orations tranſlated by Moſſellanus, printed at Paris, by Chivallon, in 1532; 38 Orations of Pircheymerus's Verſion, printed at Baſle in 1551; ſome others tranſlated by Gabriellius at Antwerp in 1575; ſome Greek Sermons at Ausburg in 1587; three Sermons with Corrections upon the Text of St. Gregory Nazianzen, printed at Antwerp in 1573; the Homily of Whitſunday, Greek and Latin, at Leipſick in 1582; the Oration of The Love of the Poor, tranſlated by Zinus in 1550, printed by Vaſcoſanus; the ſame Oration with the Apologetical Diſcourſe, and the Sermon upon the Birth of Jeſus Chriſt by Engubinus, printed by Plantin in 1513. The two Invectives againſt Julian, and ſome other Works at Eaton, in 1610; the Sermon upon Eaſter tranſlated by Oecolampadius; the Oration upon St. Athanaſius, at Paris in 1627; ſome ſelect Poems printed at Rome in 1592, and 1599; the Tetraſtick Verſes at Venice in 1562; the Poems tranſlated by Billius, with the Notes of Cyrus, at Paris in 1562; the Poems about Definitions tranſlated and publiſhed by Hoeſchelius, with the Tranſlation of Leunclavius, in the Printing-Houſe of St. Andrew in 1591; ſome Poems by Plantin in 1556; the Poems of the Rules of Life collected by Sambucus, by Plantin in 1568; the Poems about Principles at Amſterdam in 1568; the Poem of his Life with the Tranſlation of Billius in 1598; the Poem of the Canonical Books at Paris in Latin in 1561; ſome Odes in 1603; the Tragedy Of Jeſus Suffering in Greek at Rome in 1542, and at Louvain in 1544: His Letters printed with thoſe of St. Baſil, and tranſlated by Comanus; two Letters to Themiſtius printed apart; the Letter to Nicobulus printed alſo apart in 1597; the Teſtament publiſhed by Leunclavius at Frankford in 1596, at Eaton in 1610; by Briſſonius in his Forms, by Baronius in his Annals; and laſtly, by Sirmondus, at the end of the Edition, Greek and Latin, of 1609.

St. GREGORY NYSSEN.

St. Gregory Nyſſen.

ST. Gregory Biſhop of Nyſſa a City of Cappadocia, Brother of St. Baſil, was born about the year 339. He did not embrace a ſolitary Life, as his Brothers Baſil Peter and Naucratius did, but continued in the World, and married a Wife called Theoſebia (a). He profeſſed at firſt Rhetorick, and with much difficulty quitted that Employment to enter into Orders (b). He was made Biſhop ſome time after St. Baſil in the Year 371. But he did not continue long in peaceable Poſſeſſion of his See; for he was quickly perſecuted by the Emperor Valens, and forced away from his Church in 374, by Demoſthenes who ſubſtituted in his Room a ſad Wretch, as we have already obſerved in the Life of St. Baſil. He returned with the other exiled Biſhops in the year 378, and was reſtored to the Poſſeſſion of his Epiſcopal See. He appeared after this with Splendor at the General Council of Conſtantinople in the year 382, where he was choſen to make a Funeral Oration upon Meletius the Patriarch of Antioch, and delegated to be one of thoſe Biſhops who ſhould viſit the Dioceſs of Pontus, as appears by the Law of the Emperor Theodoſius, and as St. Gregory himſelf teſtifies in his Epiſtle to Flavianus. 'Tis believed that he was preſent alſo at a Council held in this City in the year 383, and that he ſpoke there the Diſcourſe againſt the Anomœans, which is entituled, A Diſcourſe about Abraham, or, of the Divinity of the Son and the Holy Spirit. In 385, he preached alſo at Conſtantinople the Funeral Oration of the Empreſs Placilla. In ſhort, his Name appears in the Liſt of Metropolitans in the Council held at Conſtantinople for the Dedication of the Church of Ruffini in the year 394. But it is certain he died ſoon after.

This Father wrote many Books which are Commentaries upon Scripture, Dogmatical Treatiſes, Sermons upon the Myſteries of Religion, Diſcourſes of Morality, Panegyricks upon the Saints, Funeral Orations, and ſome Letters concerning Diſcipline.

The firſt Book upon the Scripture is a ſmall Piece upon the Creation, wherein without inſiſting upon the Queſtions which St. Baſil had explained before, he endeavours principally to explain the Senſe of the Words of Geneſis, and the Order of the Creation.

The ſecond Book of St. Gregory Nyſſen is his Treatiſe about the Formation of Man, divided into thirty Chapters, wherein he handles many Queſtions more curious than uſeful concerning the Creation of the World, the Formation of Man, the Nature and Origin of his Soul, concerning the Reſurrection, and the Structure of a human Body. There he teaches, that the Soul is a Spirit which is equally in all parts of the Body; he refutes the Opinion of Origen concerning the Pre-exiſtence of Souls before the Body, and maintains that they are formed in the ſame Moment with the Body. He thinks, that in the State of Innocence there would have been no Generation, but that Men would have multiplied by ſome other means.

St. Gregory Nyſſen.

The two following Homilies about the Formation of Man are St. Baſil's, as we have already obſerved. There is alſo a Homily in the ſecond Volume, upon the ſame Subject, wherein he explains all the Senſes in which it can be ſaid, that Man was created after the Image and Likeneſs of God. We may place among the number of Commentaries upon the Old Teſtament, the little Tract of the Witch of Endor, wherein he explains a part of the 28*th*. Chapter of the firſt Book of Samuel, and proves that it was not truly the Soul of Samuel that appeared to Saul, but that it was the Devil who aſſumed the Likeneſs of this Prophet.

The Book of the Life of Moſes is an Allegorical Explication of all the Actions of this Lawgiver to the Jews, from whence he draws either Moral Inſtructions, or ſome Reflections upon Religion; upon which account 'tis alſo entituled, Of a perfect Life.

The Two Treatiſes upon the Inſcriptions of the Pſalms, are more uſeful than the preceding. In the Firſt, he treats of the End, the Order, and the Diſtribution of the Pſalms. He affirms, that their End is to teach the way of Virtue which leads to Happineſs; That they are uſeful and delightful to all ſorts of Perſons, in what State and Condition ſoever they be, and whatſoever their Diſpoſition be. He divides the Pſalms into Five Parts, the Firſt ends at the 40*th*. Pſalm, the Second at the 71*ſt*. the Third at the 88*th*. the Fourth at the 105*th*. and the Fifth continues to the End of the Pſalms. He is of Opinion that the Pſalms contained in the Firſt Part were, compoſed to diſſuade Men from Vice, and induce them to Virtue; That thoſe which are in the Second, repreſent the Thirſt and Ardour of thoſe who have any Knowledge of Virtue, and any reliſh of its Sweetneſs; That thoſe of the Third Part deſcribe the State of thoſe Perſons who are advanced to the Knowledge of Divine things; That thoſe of the Fourth raiſe Men's Minds above all things in this World; That thoſe of the Fifth elevate a Man to the higheſt top of Perfection. There is more Wit than Solidity in theſe Reflections, as well as in the Interpretations of the Titles or Inſcriptions of the Pſalms, which he has given in his Second Part, and are almoſt all of them Allegorical. The ſame Judgment ought to be made of his Homily upon the 6*th*. Pſalm which follows this Treatiſe.

The Eight Homilies upon Eccleſiaſtes are leſs forced, more uſeful and more natural: Thoſe upon the Canticles are wholly Allegorical; but this Book cannot otherwiſe be explained. He wrote alſo upon the Proverbs, as he teſtifies at the beginning of the Homilies upon Eccleſiaſtes;

(a) He married a Wife called Theoſebia.] In the Oration of St. Gregory Nazianzen in Commendation of St. Baſil, he very clearly obſerves, That St. Gregory Nyſſen was he of the Four Brethren that was engaged in Marriage; and the ſame St. Gregory in Ep. 95. comforts St. Gregory Nyſſen upon the Death of Theoſebia, wherein he ſpeaks of his Wife.

(b) With much Difficulty quitted that Employment to enter into Orders.] St. Gregory Nazianzen reproves him in Ep. 34. for that he having diſcharged the Office of a Reader in the Church, ſeemed willing to embrace his antient Profeſſion, addicting himſelf wholly to the Study of Rhetorick and Human Learning.

but that Commentary of his is loſt. Poſſinus has promiſed his entire Commentary upon Eccleſiaſtes.

The Firſt Diſcourſe of Prayer is concerning the Neceſſity of it, and the manner wherein we ought to pray. The four other Diſcourſes are an Explication of the Lord's Prayer, as the following Treatiſe is an Explication of the Beatitudes: He always interweaves his Moral Reflections with a multitude of Allegories, Compariſons, and Hiſtories, which render them leſs profitable and more tedious.

In the Homily upon the Words of Chap. 15. of the 1ſt. Epiſtle to the Corinthians, When all things ſhall be ſubdued unto God even the Father, then ſhall the Son himſelf alſo be ſubject unto him, Which is the Firſt in the Second Volume; he refutes the Conſequences which the Arians draw from this Paſſage, and ſhews, that by the Subjection of the Son, we muſt not underſtand a State of Servitude, but the Immortality and Happineſs of the Human Nature of Jeſus Chriſt.

The Longeſt and moſt Excellent of all the Dogmatical Works of St. Gregory Nyſſen, is his Treatiſe againſt Eunomius, divided into Twelve Books (c), wherein he refutes a part of what this Heretick had aſſerted in his Apology in anſwer to St. Baſil. St. Gregory compoſed this Book after the Death of this Father, as we learn from the Letter at the beginning of it, which is addreſſed to his Brother Peter of Sebaſtea. At the beginning of the Firſt Book, he defends the Perſon and Conduct of St. Baſil againſt the Calumnies of Eunomius: He deſcribes the Life of this Heretick and that of his Maſter Aëtius, and afterwards refutes the Impious Reaſonings of this Heretick, and explains the Paſſages of Scripture which he alledges to prove his Errors. Photius aſſures us, that in this Book St. Gregory did far excel the other two Authors which have Written againſt the ſame Book of Eunomius, as well for the Beauty and Sweetneſs of his Eloquence, as for the Strength and Multitude of his Arguments. He particularly praiſes the laſt Book which in his time was conſidered as a diſtinct Treatiſe.

His great Catechetical Diſcourſe is an excellent Treatiſe of the manner, in which the Jews, Pagans, and Hereticks are to be Inſtructed, to Convince them of the Truth of our Religion. St. Gregory Nyſſen obſerves in the Preface, That the reaſons which are to be uſed againſt Pagans, who deny the Unity of God, are different from thoſe that muſt be alledged againſt the Jews who oppoſe the Trinity, and that the Method which is to be followed in refuting the Hereticks who oppoſe the Divinity of One of the Three Perſons, ſhould be different from that which is obſerved in proving the Trinity againſt the Jews: That in Diſputing both againſt the one and the other, we muſt uſe Principles agreeable to reaſon, in which they and we are agreed; That when one Diſputes againſt an Atheiſt he muſt prove the Exiſtence of a God by the Creation of the World; and when he has to do with a Pagan who admits many Deities, he muſt prove to him that there is but One, becauſe God muſt be abſolutely perfect, and there can be no more of this Nature but One. With reſpect to the Jew, he would have us endeavour to make him underſtand the Divine Word, by comparing it with the Word of Underſtanding, or the Reaſon that is in Men, and give him alſo ſome Idea of the Holy Spirit by comparing him to the Breath that is in us, and then after that he would have us to prove the Exiſtence of the Divine Word by the Teſtimonies of Holy Scripture. To make the Incarnation appear probable to the Jews and to the Gentiles, he ſhews them, That Man has fallen from the State wherein he was created; That his Nature is corrupted by Sin; That it cannot be ſaid, that God is the Author of Evil; That therefore Man muſt have fallen by his own fault, and by abuſing his Liberty; but that Man being once fallen, muſt be raiſed up again by him who created him; and thus it was reaſonable that the Word who created him, ſhould come himſelf to raiſe him from his Fall, and ſave him from his Shipwrack. Afterwards he anſwers all the Difficulties which are propoſed againſt the Incarnation; he ſays, that it was not unworthy of God to be born of a Virgin, to Eat, to Drink, to Die, and to be Buried, becauſe theſe things are neither criminal nor diſhonourable; That the Divinity being united to the Human Nature did not loſe its Divine Perfections, as the Soul does not loſe its Spiritual perfections by being united to the Body; That the Union of Soul and Body to compoſe a Man is no leſs incomprehenſible than the Union of the Divine and Human Nature in Jeſus Chriſt; that the Miracles of Jeſus Chriſt, his extraordinary Birth and his Reſurrection are evident Proofs of his Divinity; That the Reaſon which moved him to become Man, was his Good-will towards Men, and his Compaſſion towards Mankind; That his Divinity always continued impaſſible and Incorruptible; That the Incarnation of Jeſus Chriſt was the moſt natural Remedy for us miſerable Sinners, and moſt agreeable to the Goodneſs, the Juſtice, the Wiſdom and Power of God; that he came at ſuch a time when Wickedneſs was arrived to its higheſt pitch; that he called all Men, but by calling them to the Faith he did not take away their Liberty; and this was the Reaſon why many of them ſtill periſhed; that Men ought not to be compelled and forced to do Good, for this would take away the praiſe of good Actions, and the blame of bad ones; that Chriſt ought to die, that he might be wholly like unto us, and that he might confirm our Reſurrection by his own; that all that he did after his Reſurrection firmly proves his Divinity. Afterwards he ſpeaks of Baptiſm and the Euchariſt; He ſays of Baptiſm, that there are Three things in this Sacrament which conduct us to Immortal Life, Prayer, Water, and Faith; that the regeneration which is wrought in Baptiſm ought not to be attributed to the Water, but to a Divine Vertue; that by dipping the Perſon under Water Three times, the Death and Reſurrection of Jeſus Chriſt is repreſented; that without Baptiſm, no Man can be waſhed from his Sins, becauſe by it the Divine Vertue is rendred effectual, in conſequence of that which he believes to depend upon Free-will; that as the Soul is united to God by Baptiſm and by Faith, ſo the Body is united to God by the Euchariſt. This is the Doctrine of St. Gregory Nyſſen, who ſays, that the Body of Jeſus Chriſt entering into us, is an Antidote or Preſervative againſt Sin; that it changes and transforms us into him, and communicates unto us Incorruptibility. Afterwards he enquires, 'How it is poſſible, that this Body which is diſtributed alone to ſo many 'Millions of the Faithful over all the Earth, ſhould be 'entire in each of theſe, and in each part which they receive, and yet not ceaſe to remain ſtill entire in it ſelf: 'And he anſwers, that the Body of Jeſus Chriſt having 'been the Habitation of the Word of God, was changed 'into a Divine Dignity: And therefore I have reaſon to 'believe, ſays he, that to this Day the Bread being Sanctified by the Word of God, is changed into the Body of 'the Word of God: For here the Bread is Sanctified by 'the Word of God and Prayer, not that 'tis preſently turned into the Body of God by eating it, but becauſe it is 'transformed and changed at the ſame time into his Body, 'as the Word has ſaid in theſe Words, This is my Body.' He adds, that this Fleſh of Jeſus Chriſt is communicated to us, and is changed into us by means of the Bread and Wine which God hath changed and transformed into his Body, by Vertue of the Sacred Benediction. He ſpeaks in the following Diſcourſe of Regeneration. He thinks that it depends in ſome manner upon our Will and free Pleaſure: And ſhews that it is unprofitable, unleſs after we have received the Sacrament, we lead a Life free from Sin. At laſt, he Diſcourſes of the reward of thoſe who have lived well, and the puniſhment of the Wicked. He affirms, that the Fire of Hell is of another Nature than the Fire upon Earth. There are at the end ſome Periods added againſt the Heretick Severus. Some Proteſtant Criticks have called this Book in Queſtion, whether it was St. Gregory's or no; but the ableſt, as Caſaubon and Albertin have been forced to acknowledge it, becauſe they found it quoted oftentimes by Theodoret in his Dialogues, and taken notice of by Euthymius Zigabenus.

St. Gregory Nyſſen.

In the Book of Faith addreſſed to Simplicius, St. Gregory treats of the Trinity. There he proves the Divinity of the Son and the Holy Spirit, and Anſwers the principal Objections of the Hereticks.

The Diſcourſe which was formerly Entituled, Of Great Abraham, is now, Of the Divinity of the Son, and the Holy Spirit; there he anſwers the Anomæans, whom he compares to the Epicureans and the Stoicks; he makes alſo a great Digreſſion in praiſe of Abraham, wherein he deſcribes the Sacrifice of his Son very naturally.

In the Treatiſe addreſſed to Ablavius, and entituled, That we muſt not ſay there are Three Gods, he ſhews that the Three Divine Perſons cannot be called Three Gods, but that they are one God only.

The Treatiſe to Euſtathius, and that of the difference of Hypoſtaſis and Nature are upon the ſame Subject; but they are found, as we have already ſaid, among the Letters of St. Baſil, and it is probable that the Firſt was written by him.

The Latin Treatiſe which contains the Paſſages of the Old Teſtament, to prove the Divinity of the Son againſt the Jews, is not St. Gregory Nyſſen's ſince St. Chryſoſtom, who lived after St. Gregory, is cited in it.

The Treatiſe of Common Notions addreſſed to the Greeks, is a ſcholaſtical Treatiſe about the Terms, by which the Ancients uſed to explain the Myſtery of the Trinity.

There are two little Tracts of St. Gergory Nyſſen's againſt Apollinarius; the one very ſhort in the Firſt Volume, which is probably nothing but a Fragment; the other a little longer in the Second Volume. There he refutes ſome Objections of this Heretick; and proves, that it is the ſame Word which appeared to the Patriarchs, and which aſſumed real Fleſh in Time, and which is ſo intimately united to the Human Nature, that what agrees to God is attributed to Man.

(c) His Treatiſe againſt Eunomius, divided into Twelve Books.] There are ſome who have reckoned Thirteen; but they have inconveniently divided the Fifth Book into Two. Theſe Books are quoted according to the preſent Diviſion by Theodoret, and the Sixth Council. St. Jerome in his Catalogue Teſtifies, That St. Gregory Nyſſen read this Diviſion of his Treatiſe to him.

St. Gregory Nyſſen.

In the little Tract againſt the Manichees, St. Gregory proves againſt theſe Hereticks, that Evil is not an uncorruptible and uncreated Nature, no more than the Devil who is the Author of it. He Demonſtrates this by Ten Syllogiſms.

In the Treatiſe of Deſtiny he particularly diſputes againſt Judicial Aſtrology, which makes our Actions depend upon the Courſe and Influence of the Stars.

In the Treatiſe of the Soul which is in the Second Volume, he firſt relates the different Sentiments of Philoſophers and Hereticks concerning the Original and Nature of the Soul, and then proves that it is a Spiritual and Immortal Subſtance which is united to the Body, which Penetrates, and actuates it. He compares this Union to that of the Divine and Human Nature in Jeſus Chriſt, and rejects the Opinion of Origen concerning the Aſcenſion and Deſcent of Souls.

The Second Treatiſe of the Soul and the Reſurrection, which is in the Third Volume, is a Dialogue which St. Gregory is ſuppoſed to have had with his Sister Macrina, after the death of St. Baſil their Brother. There he proves the Immortality of the Soul. He is of opinion that it will diſtinctly know its Body at the Day of Judgment. He explains the Story of the wicked Rich Man and Lazarus Allegorically. There he refutes the Tranſmigration of Souls, and proves the Reſurrection.

In the Treatiſe addreſſed to Jerius concerning the untimely death of Infants, he endeavours to anſwer this Queſtion, Why God ſuffers Infants to die before they come to the Uſe of Reaſon? The moſt general Reaſon that he offers is, that he does it to prevent thoſe Sins that theſe Infants would have committed, if they had come to the Age of Diſcretion. And becauſe it may be Objected to him, Why then does God permit ſo many wicked Perſons to live, who had been more happy if they had never been, or if they ſhould have died ſooner? He Anſwers, that God permits it, Firſt, becauſe he draws Good out of the Evil which they do; Secondly, becauſe their Puniſhment ſerves for an Example of God's Juſtice.

Some Criticks have queſtioned whether the Book of Virginity was St. Gregory Nyſſen's: The only reaſon which they alledged for calling it in Queſtion, is, becauſe the Author was Married: But this reaſon is ſo far from proving what they intend, that it rather proves the contrary, ſince it is certain that St. Gregory Nyſſen had a Wife, as we have already ſhewn. He deſcribes in this Treatiſe the Advantages of Virginity, and the Inconveniencies of Marriage; nevertheleſs he does not deſign to condemn Marriage. He adds, that the Chriſtian Virginity does not only conſiſt in the Purity of the Body, but alſo in the Purity of the Soul. He recommends Temperance, and the ſhunning of Pleaſures and Voluptuouſneſs, and gives many Rules and Examples of Chriſtian Virtues.

The Sermons or Homilies of the Myſteries have much of the Nature of Dogmatical Treatiſes. Thus in the Sermon upon the Nativity; having exhorted the Faithful to Celebrate this Feſtival with joy; he explains ſome Queſtions about the Incarnation, and clears up ſome Circumſtances about the Nativity. He follows the ſame Method in the Five Sermons upon Eaſter, which are filled with many Allegories. In the Sermon of the Aſcenſion of Jeſus Chriſt, he explains the 23*d*. and 24*th*. Pſalms.

In that of Whitſunday, he exhorts Men to make themſelves worthy to receive the Holy Spirit.

In that upon the Feſtival of the Baptiſm of Jeſus Chriſt, he treats of the Spiritual Regeneration which is wrought by Baptiſm, and exhorts thoſe that are newly Baptized, to lead a pure Life and free from Sin.

In the Diſcourſe of the preſenting of Jeſus Chriſt in the Temple, of the Purification of the Virgin, and of Simeon, he makes many Allegories upon theſe Myſteries.

The Diſcourſes of Morality are leſs Allegorical and more uſeful than thoſe that we have ſpoken of already. The Subject of thoſe which we now have is as follows.

In the Oration upon his Ordination, St. Gregory diſcourſes of the Miſeries of the Church, and the little Faith which was to be found among the Chriſtians of his time. He condemns the Diviſions which were in the Church, and the Sophiſms that were uſed about Myſteries. He exhorts Men to Pray for the Gifts of the Holy Spirit and to diſpoſe themſelves to receive them.

In the Diſcourſe againſt thoſe that delay Baptiſm, he exhorts the Catechumens to receive Baptiſm preſently without delaying it from day to day, as many Catechumens do. He invites them to draw near to Baptiſm, that they may be delivered from their Sins. He terrifies them with the fear of Death, the time whereof is uncertain. He makes them aſhamed of continuing ſo long in the Rank of Catechumens. He inſpires them with a Deſire of receiving Baptiſm, by repreſenting to them the Graces which it conveys, and the wonderful Effects which it produces. He thinks that it would be better to ſin after Baptiſm, than to die without it. He refutes the Pretence of thoſe, who delay to receive Baptiſm, becauſe they find themſelves ſtill inclined to Sin: He ſays, that they deceive themſelves, if they think that after they have ſpent their Life in Pleaſures and Debauchery, they ſhall be purified by receiving Baptiſm at the point of Death. He diſtinguiſhes, as St. Gregory Nazianzen did, three Sorts of Perſons with relation to another Life. The firſt Sort are the Saints and Righteous who are happy; The ſecond, are thoſe who ſhall neither be Happy nor Miſerable; The third, are thoſe who ſhall be puniſhed for their Sins. He places in the ſecond Rank thoſe who delay their Baptiſm till the Point of Death. This is a ſingular Opinion of his, and does not agree with the Holy Scripture; which has made ſome believe that this Treatiſe was not St. Gregory Nyſſen's: But it has his Stile and Air, and is not much different from his Doctrine, nor from that of St. Gregory Nazianzen in the Diſcourſe which he made upon the ſame Subject.

St. Gregory Nyſſen.

The Diſcourſe of Penance (d) contains two Parts: the firſt againſt thoſe who reprove their Brethren with much ſharpneſs, and condemn them upon ſlight Grounds; and the ſecond againſt thoſe Sinners who do no Penance, or do it very negligently. He proves by the Example of Jeſus Chriſt who convers'd among Phariſees and Sinners, that Sinners are not to be treated with much rigour, nor to be condemned raſhly. He adds, that by uſing them hardly we throw them into Deſpair; that we ought to conſider that we are all Sinners; that God invites all the World to accept of his Grace; that we ought to ſupport the Weak, according to the Example of Jeſus Chriſt; that the greateſt Sinners have obtained Mercy; and that God is always ready to pardon thoſe who are penitent. He ſhews afterwards, that Harſhneſs and Rigour do not agree with the Laity, who by condemning others with too much Severity, condemn themſelves; nor with Biſhops and Prieſts, whoſe Character ſhould be Mild and Charitable, as he proves by the Examples of Moſes and Jeſus Chriſt. He obſerves, that a good Paſtor ſhould do as the Gardener mentioned in the Goſpel, who prayed his Maſter to ſpare the barren Fig-tree a little longer, and that he ſhould follow the Example of Moſes, who continually begged pardon of God for the People of Iſrael; and whoſe Affection went ſo far, that he wiſhed he might be blotted out of the Book of Life, if God would pardon the Sins of his People. He ſubjoins the example of the prodigal Son, and ſays, that from thence we ought to learn to open the Church to penitent Sinners, and to treat them with Mildneſs and Charity. But after he has ſaid theſe things againſt the too great Severity of ſome Miniſters of the Church, who deſpis'd thoſe that came near them as Supplicants, who would not regard them in their Afflictions, who ſhunned and repuls'd them; he exhorts Sinners to Repentance by the example of the Woman that was a Sinner who is mentioned in St. Luke. He ſays, that they muſt imitate her Weeping, her Tears, her Humility and Penance. He declaims againſt thoſe Penitents, who lived after the ſame manner that they us'd to do before they were in a State of Penance. 'They have, ſays he, the ſame Gravity in 'their Countenances, the ſame Magnificence in their Ap- 'parel, they fare as Sumptuouſly as they did before, they 'Sleep, as well as they did, they mind the ſame Buſi- 'neſs as before; in ſhort, they take upon them the name of 'Penitents, and do no Actions of Penance. They are by 'their own Fault debarred from the ſacred Myſteries, and 'from the Communion of Holy things, and they take no 'care, nor are any ways ſollicitous to be readmitted to 'them; on the contrary they ſeem to deſpiſe them, and 'look upon them as very vile things.' After this he ſhews by the Compariſon of one who was debarred from a King's Table, and of one that being Sick deſired to be healed, how great the Folly is of thoſe who never think of doing Penance. 'You, ſays he, whoſe Soul is ſick, why do not you 'run to a Phyſician? Why do you not diſcover your Sins to 'him by Confeſſion? Why do you ſuffer your Diſeaſe to 'encreaſe till it be inflamed and deeply rooted in you? 'Re-enter into your own Breaſts, reflect upon your own 'Ways. You have offended God, you have provoked your 'Creator, who is the Lord and Judge, not only of this 'Life, but alſo of the Life to come. If you be ſick with 'Pleaſures, you muſt cure your Diſeaſe with Faſting and 'Abſtinence; if your Soul is ſick with Luſt, you muſt uſe 'continence for a Remedy. Covetouſneſs is like a Fever 'that conſumes us, drive it away by giving of Alms and 'by Libetality; this is the Remedy of a Soul that loves 'Riches immoderately. Have you taken the Goods of another? Make Reſtitution. Are you ready to periſh by Ly- 'ing? Avoid the danger you are in by the love of Truth. 'You are in Error and Hereſie; blot out this Sin by em- 'bracing the Faith of the Church; for what is doing Pe- 'nance, but effacing and deſtroying the Evil we have done? 'Enquire into the Diſeaſe wherewith you are ſeized, be (d) The Diſcourſe of Penance.] This Diſcourſe as well as that of Faſting, and the Panegyrick upon St. Stephen, belong to Aſterius Amaſenus, to whom Photius attributes them in Vol. 27. of his Bibliotheque. See what we have ſaid of them, when we give an account of the Works of this Father, where we have retracted what we ſaid upon this Subject in the Firſt Edition.

St. Gregory Nyssen.

'sorry for it, afflict your selves and communicate your Affliction to your Brethren, that they may be afflicted with 'you, that so you may obtain the Pardon of your Sins. 'Shew me bitter Tears, that I may mingle mine with yours. 'Impart your trouble to your Bishop, as to your Father, 'he will be touched with a sense of your Misery, as Jacob 'was when he saw the Coat of his Son Joseph stained with 'Blood; or as David was upon the Death of his Son Ab-'salom: Discover to him the most secret Corners of your 'Heart; shew this Physician your most hidden Wounds, 'he will take care of your Honour and your Health. The 'time of our Death is uncertain; my Brethren, let us pre-'vent the Hour of our Death by our Vigilance, as Men 'use precaution against the Diseases of the Body before the 'Dog-days; let us endeavour to recover the Groat, which 'we lost by our negligence.

The Discourse of Benevolence and Liberality towards the Poor, contains the most convincing Reasons, the most pressing Motives, and the most lively Expressions which can be employed to excite Men to give Alms to the Poor, and to help them in their Necessities.

In the Discourse against Usurers, he shews that Usury is forbidden by the Laws of Charity, especially when he to whom the Money is lent, is poor.

In the Discourse about Fasting which was preached at the beginning of Lent, he exhorts the Faithful to fast exactly during this time. In the Sermon against Fornication, he gives a frightful Representation of that Sin.

The Discourse against those who hardly endure Reproofs, teaches That Humility and Submission wherewith they should receive the Chastisement of the Church. St. Gregory discourses there against those who despise Excommunication. He gives a frightful Description of the Soul of an Excommunicated Person; and says, that it cannot partake of Glory, nor enter into the Kingdom of Heaven; that we must not imagine that Excommunication is an Invention of the Bishops; that it is an antient Law of the Church, the Custom of our Fathers founded upon the Scripture which first introduced it: He shews the Necessity of it. Towards the end he observes, that he did not wonder that many were troubled to bear his Rebukes, and murmured against him; that this Abuse had been of a long time, but he was resolved to bear with Patience the Reproaches of others.

We may place at the Head of the Funeral Orations and the Panegyricks of St. Gregory Nyssen, the Discourse wherein he proves, that we ought not to be troubled at the Death of the Faithful, because it delivers them from this mortal and miserable Life, that they may enjoy immortal Life and eternal Happiness.

In the Funeral Oration upon Pulcheria the Daughter of Theodosius, after he has aggravated the Loss which he suffered by the Death of this young Princess, he shews that they should comfort themselves, since she is now happy.

In the Panegyrick upon the Empress Flaccilla, he describes the Virtues of this Princess, and represents the Happiness which she enjoys in Heaven.

In the Panegyrick upon the Martyr St. Stephen, after he has given an Account of the History of his Martyrdom and praised his Constancy, he refutes the Enemies of the Divinity of the Son and the Holy Spirit.

There are three Discourses of St. Gregory Nyssen in Honour of the 40 Martyrs, wherein he relates their Martyrdom, and praises their Constancy.

In the Panegyrick upon the Martyr Theodorus (e). having described the Honours which the Church bestows upon Saints and Martyrs, and the Rewards which they enjoy, he relates the Martyrdom of Theodorus, and concludes with addressing a Prayer to him, for obtaining the Graces and Blessings of God by his Intercession.

In the Panegyrick upon St. Gregory Thaumaturgus, he praises the excellent Virtues of this great Saint; he relates many of his Miracles, whereof some are very extraordinary. Suidas names this Panegyrick among St. Gregory's Works, and there is no reason at all to doubt of it.

The Panegyricks upon St. Basil, Meletius and St. Ephrem, contain nothing but the Life and Praises of those great Men. To these Orations we may joyn the Life of St. Macrina his Sister.

The Canonical Epistle to Letoïus contains the Rules or Laws of Penance. St. Gregory there distinguishes three sorts of Sins, which refer to the three Faculties of the Soul, Reason, Lust and Anger. He says, that the greatest Sins are those which belong to the Spirit of a Man, such as Idolatry, Judaism, Manichæism and Heresie. He would have those that voluntarily fall into these Crimes be deprived of the Sacraments till the Hour of Death: But, he says, that those who have been forced by the Rigor of Torments to commit some of these Crimes, ought not to be punished more severely than Fornicators. He ordains also, that those who deal in Magick, Witchcraft and Divination of things to come, should be treated as wilful Apostates, if they have practised this Art thro' Infidelity; but he would have them treated as those who yield under the Rigor of Torments, if they have used it only thro' too much Credulity, or in hope of some considerable Gain. He says, that as to what concerns the Sins of Lust, they may be referred to Adultery and Fornication; and that Fornication is a kind of Adultery. He refers to Adultery the Crimes which are against Nature. He imposes nine years Penance upon simple Fornication, and double the time upon Adultery; yet he leaves to the Bishop a Liberty of moderating or lengthning the Penance according to the Disposition of the Penitent; and he would have those treated more gently who confess their secret and hidden Sins. In short, as to the Sins which proceed from Anger, he says, that tho' the Scripture reproves all Sins severely, yet the Fathers have made no Laws but against Murder. He imposes 27 Years Penance for wilful Murder; and for involuntary Murders, the same space of time as for Fornication; yet he allows this Penance to be diminished according to the Fervour of the Penitent. In general he observes, that all those who fall sick before they have perfectly finished their Penance, should be reconciled at the point of Death, and be admitted to receive the Sacraments; yet upon Condition that they fulfil their time of Penance if they recover their health.

St. Gregory Nyssen.

As for Covetousness, he says, That tho' this Crime be another kind of Idolatry, yet there are no Canons made to subject the Covetous to Penance; and therefore it is sufficient to purify them from this Crime by Instruction and Prayer. As for Robbery, he says, there are two sorts of it; that which is done publickly and by force of Arms, and that which is done secretly: That those who are guilty of the first sort, ought to be put under the same Penance as Murderers; but as for those who steal another's Goods in secret, it was sufficient that they should restore them and give Alms to the Poor. He looks upon the Action of those who dig up the Dead as a very great Crime, and puts them under the same Penance as Fornicators.

At last, he says, that tho' Sacrilege was one of the Crimes which was punished under the Old Law by stoning the Person that was guilty of it; yet this Punishment was mitigated under the New Law, and that now sacrilegious Persons were treated less harshly than Adulterers. He concludes with this Advertisement to Letoius to whom he writes, that he should chiefly consider the Disposition of the Person that does Penance, because it is not the Length of time, but the Conversion of the Person and Change of his Life which cures the Sin.

Some Criticks have doubted whether this Letter was St. Gregory Nyssen's; but there is no reason to reject it, and it has been owned by the Greek Church, as appears by the Council held in the Emperor's Palace which approves the Canons of St. Gregory Nyssen, and by the Commentaries of Zonaras and Balsamon who acknowledge it to be genuine; and besides 'tis sufficiently evident that 'tis the Work of an antient Author.

In the Letter of the Profession of a Christian, he shews that it consists in imitating Jesus Christ, and he explains in what sense this can be done.

In the following Letter to Olympius, he explains particularly wherein Christian Perfection consists, and makes a particular Enumeration of all the Offices and Virtues of a perfect Christian.

The Treatise concerning the End which Christians ought to propose to themselves, is almost upon the same Subject. St. Gregory proves, that the End of all Christians should be to shun Vice, to practise Virtue, to purify themselves from their Sins, to beg the Grace of Jesus Christ, to be humble, to be charitable, to be diligent in Prayer, to despise the World, and to fix their Affections upon God. This Treatise is addressed to the Monks.

In the Letter to Flavianus, he complains of the evil Treatment he had received from Helladius Bishop of Cæsarea.

In the Letter concerning Pilgrimages to Jerusalem, he dissuades Christians from undertaking lightly these kind of Journeys, because of the Abuses which happen in them. There have been great Disputes occasioned by this Letter: Some have believed it supposititious; others have maintained that what is there said respects only the Monks and the (e) The Panegyrick upon the Martyr Theodorus.] Some Criticks think that this Panegyrick is supposititious. First, because the Author of this Discourse, prays the Holy Martyr to hinder the Incursions of the Scythians: Now, say they, the Scythians had not made any Incursions into Armenia, 'till 100 Years after the Death of St. Gregory, under the Reign of Anastasius. Secondly, the Author says, that Theodorus was of the Country of Job, that is, of Arabia, and yet his is a Greek Name, and 'tis said in the same Panegyrick that he was of Amasea in Cappadocia. But 'tis easy to answer the first Difficulty, for the Scythians had made Incursions into the Roman Empire in the time of St. Gregory Nyssen, as appears by St. Jerome Ep. 30. and by Cedrenus, who says that they entred into Thrace under the reign of Valens. The second Objection has no Difficulty, for the Author of this Panegyrick does not say, that Job was of Arabia, nor that Theodorus was of the same Province with Job, but only that they were both of the East.

St. Gregory Nyſſen.

Nuns. But firſt, there are no Arguments ſtrong enough to reject it, and the moſt learned Catholicks have acknowledged it as a genuine Work of St. Gregory's: And in the ſecond place, ſome Reaſons which are uſed to diſſuade Men from Pilgrimages to Jeruſalem, reſpect all Chriſtians in general. In the mean time, 'tis no ways probable, that St. Gregory Nyſſen, who was ſo very much devoted to the Saints, ſhould abſolutely condemn the Piety of thoſe who travelled upon a good Deſign to viſit the Holy Places, eſpecially ſince this Practice was authorized and approved from the beginning of the Fourth Age of the Church. It muſt therefore be ſaid, that he did not condemn it but upon the account of the Abuſes and Superſtitions, which began in his time to creep into theſe kind of Devotions, of which he was a Witneſs in his Journey to Jeruſalem. Thus St. Jerome who was very much devoted to the Holy Places, in his 13*th*. Epiſtle, diſſuades Paulinus Biſhop of Nola, from a Journey to Jeruſalem upon the ſame Reaſon that St. Gregory uſes. And to ſhew that St. Gregory could have no other Aim or Deſign, one needs but compare this Letter with the following to Euſtathia, Ambroſia and Baſiliſſa wherein he acknowledges, that 'tis a Happineſs to ſee the Holy Places, provided a Man repreſents the Death and Sufferings of Jeſus Chriſt by his own Actions to himſelf. He complains in this Letter, that the Church of Jeruſalem was no more exempt from Diviſions than other Churches, and explains towards the latter end the Myſtery of the Incarnation. There he teaches, that the Divinity was not changed into the Humanity, but that the Divinity was united to a Nature like to ours, that it aſſumed a Body and a Soul, and was never ſeparated from them; that the Virgin ought to be called the Mother of God, and not the Mother of a Man. He rejects the Opinion of the Millenaries. He complains of ſome that would not communicate with him in the Journey which he made to Jeruſalem. At laſt, he exhorts thoſe to whom he writes, who were at Jeruſalem, to continue firm in the Faith of their Fore-Fathers, and not to prefer Novelties to the antient Doctrine received from their Fathers by Tradition.

St. Cyril in the Book written to Evoptius, quotes a Paſſage of St. Gregory taken out of his Commentary upon the Epiſtle of St. Paul to the Philippians, which can be no other St. Gregory but this of Nyſſa. The eight Books of Nemeſius's Philoſophy have formerly been attributed to him; but now it is generally agreed that this was a groſs Error.

Tho' St. Gregory Nyſſen profeſſed Rhetorick, and Photius aſſures us, that his Stile is lofty and ſmooth; yet one may ſay, that he came not near the Eloquence of St. Baſil, and St. Gregory Nazianzen. His way of writing is affected, and his Stile is no ways natural; he ſpeaks more like a Declaimer than an Orator; he is always abſtruſe either by Allegories, or abſtracted Reaſonings; he mingles Philoſophy with Divinity, and makes uſe of the Principles of Philoſophers, both in his Explications of Myſteries, and in his Diſcourſes of Morality: Upon which account his Works are more like the Treatiſes of Plato and Ariſtotle, than thoſe of other Chriſtians. He follows and imitates Origen in his way of Allegorizing, and there are alſo ſome of this Author's Errors in his Works, about the Nature of Souls, and the end of the Pains of the damned; but he rejects and refutes them expreſly in other places: 'Tis very probable therefore that the places wherein theſe Errors are to be met with were added ſince, which Germanus the Patriarch of Conſtantinople ſhews in a Book, out of which Photius relates an Extract in Vol. 218. of his Bibliotheca; wherein he proves as well by what goes before thoſe places, as by what follows after them, and by an infinite number of contrary Paſſages, that thoſe places which agree with the Doctrine of Origen concerning the end of the Pains of the damned, were either added, or corrupted by the Diſciples of this Author. He obſerves alſo, that the like happened to the Conference about the Soul with Macrina, to the Catechetical Diſcourſe, and the Book of the Perfection of a Chriſtian: And he ſhould have added alſo the Treatiſe about Infants who die before they come to the Uſe of Reaſon. It may be ſaid alſo, that St. Gregory Nyſſen having his Head full of the Books and Principles of Origen, could not always be ſo careful but ſome of his Errors would ſlip unawares into his Reaſonings, tho' he was not really of his Opinion, and he rejected them at other times when he was more attentive. Yet 'tis plain that there is an Addition at the end of the great Catechetical Diſcourſe, wherein mention is made of the Heretick Severus.

St. Gregory Nyſſen.

'Twas a long time before the Works of St. Gregory Nyſſen were all collected together into one Body. The Firſt Editions have only the Eight Books of Nemeſius's Philoſophy. In 1536. Aldus Minutius printed at Venice three Greek Orations, and in 1537, the Greek Text of the Book of the Formation of Man; and the Verſion of this Book made by Dionyſius Exiguus, was printed with the Treatiſe of the Life of Moſes, and the Eight Books of Nemeſius, at Cologne, in 1551. The Book of the Life of Moſes, tranſlated by Georgius Trapezuntius, was printed at Baſle in 1521. In 1544 Camerarius publiſhed a Verſion of the Homily upon Abraham. In 1550, Zinus publiſhed a Verſion of ſome Moral Homilies, which was printed by Vaſcoſanus. The Conference about the Soul, tranſlated by Augerius, was printed at Paris in 1557. Laurentius Sifanus collected together and tranſlated ſeveral Treatiſes of St. Gregory Nyſſen's, and cauſed them to be printed at Baſle in 1562. In 1567, Leunclavius made a new Tranſlation of the Book of the Life of Moſes. In 1564, Hoeſchelius cauſed the Greek Text of ſome Orations of St. Gregory Nyſſen to be printed at Ausburg. In 1567, the Book of Virginity was printed at Rome tranſlated by Galeſinius, together with Five Orations; the ſame Book was alſo Tranſlated by Livineius, whoſe Verſion appeared in 1574. The Diſcourſe of Purification and of the Soul was printed at Cologne in 1568. The Edition of the Year 1562 was re-printed at Baſle in 1571. There was added to to it the Expoſition upon the Canticles tranſlated by Leunclavius, and the Letter to Flavianus. The Edition of Nivelle of the Year 1573, is larger, and contains the Verſion of almoſt all the Treatiſes of St. Gregory Nyſſen which had been then publiſhed: Since that Edition Maximus Margurius, cauſed the Verſion of the Book of Perfection, and of the Letter to Letoius, and of the Book upon the Titles of the Pſalms, to be printed at Venice in 1585. The Letter to Letoius was alſo printed at Venice in 1589, together with the Notes of Antonius Auguſtinus, and at Paris with thoſe of Balſamon in 1561; at Ausburg together with the Homily of the Divinity of the Son and Holy Spirit, tranſlated by Hervetus, in 1591. The Book of Perfection of Zinus's Tranſlation, was printed at Venice in 1575. In 1593, Hoeſchelius printed in Greek at Amſterdam, the Book of the Chriſtian Profeſſion, and that of the Life of Moſes, the Treatiſe againſt Apollinarius, and that of Faith. Fronto Ducæus printed in Latin at Ingolſtadt in the Year 1598, the Treatiſes againſt Apollinarius, of the Witch of Endor, the Diſcourſe upon the Reſurrection of Jeſus Chriſt, that of St. Gregory upon his Ordination, his Book againſt the Manichees, the Treatiſe of Deſtiny, and the Oration againſt Uſurers. The Book of the Title of the Pſalms in Greek and Latin, tranſlated by Gretſer was alſo printed at Ingolſtadt in 1600, the Treatiſe about the end of a Chriſtian, was publiſhed by Morellus in the Year 1606, the ſame Year appeared in Greek and Latin the Letter about Pilgrimages to Jeruſalem, and that to Euſtathia, Ambroſia, and Baſiliſſa, the firſt printed by Morellus, and the laſt by Robert Stephens with Caſaubon's Notes; both the one and the other were printed at Hanover, the firſt in 1607, with the Notes of Du Moulin, and the ſecond in 1611. In 1605, Fronto Ducæus printed a New Latin Edition of the Works of St. Gregory Nyſſen, which contains all that had been publiſhed. At laſt, in 1615 there came out a Greek and Latin Edition of the Works of this Father which was printed in Two Volumes by Morellus, with the Notes of Fronto Ducæus; but becauſe in this Edition there was not the Firſt Book againſt Eunomius, nor the Greek of the Moral Orations, therefore there was a Supplement made at the End of St. Baſil's Works printed in 1618. The laſt Edition in 1638. was Copyed after this, where the ſame Verſion of the laſt Homilies is put twice, once by it ſelf apart, and once over againſt the Greek. This Edition was done very negligently, and it is very uncorrect.

St. CÆSARIUS.

St. Caſarius.

Cæſarius the Brother of St. Gregory Nazianzen, after having finiſhed his Studies at Alexandria, came to dwell at Conſtantinople, and paſſed the greateſt part of his Life at Court in the Quality of Phyſician to the Emperor. He continued alſo ſome time with Julian, but finding himſelf ſollicited to quit the Chriſtian Religion, he retired into his own Country. After the Death of this Emperor he returned to Court and came into Credit again under the Reign of Valens. He was honoured with the Office of Treaſurer of Bithynia. He was like to have periſhed in the Earthquake which happened at Nice, where he loſt part of his Goods. He died at Court in the beginning of the Year 369, and made the Poor his Heirs.

St. Caſarius.

There is no great probability, that a Man who lived as Cæſarius did, ſhould compoſe Dialogues upon the moſt ſubtile Queſtions of Philoſophy and Divinity; yet Four of them are attributed to him, which ſome have thought were written in his Name by St. Gregory Nazianzen; but they can neither be the ones nor the others. For, Firſt, it is not credible, that Cæſarius who ſpent his Life at Court, and was but a ſimple Catechumen; ſhould be the Author of thoſe Queſtions, which ſuppoſe the Writer of them to be very well vers'd in the moſt ſubtile parts of Theology. Secondly, the Title of theſe Dialogues imports that the Author of them was Secretary to the Emperor, and that he had taught twenty Years at Conſtantinople; which cannot be be said of the Brother of St. Gregory Nazianzen, who was not Secretary, but Treasurer, and who did not profess Theology at Constantinople but Physick. Thirdly, St. Gregory Nazianzen in his Funeral Oration says not a Word of his Skill in Theology, nor that he had written about Religion. Fourthly, this Treatise has neither the Stile nor Genius of the Writers of the Fourth Age. Fifthly, it cites St. Gregory Nyssen, who died long after Cæsarius, and Maximus an Author of the Seventh Age. All which does plainly shew, That it can neither belong to Cæsarius nor St. Gregory Nazianzen, whose Stile is as different from the Author's of this Dialogue, as the Stile of Demosthenes is from that of the Declamations of Aphthonius.

Photius says, that 'tis easy to perceive, that the Stile of these Dialogues, is the Stile of a young Man who had learned some Rudiments of Rhetorick, and was proud of that little knowledge which he had in Divinity and Philosophy; that his Sallies of Wit are most of them unpleasant; that he often makes use of Poetical Terms, and without any reason varies from the Common Construction; that his Stile however is clear enough, and that there are few things to be blamed in his Doctrine. These Dialogues contain 195 Questions and Answers about Matters of Theology and Philosophy, more Subtile and Curious than Useful and Profitable. In Photius's time, there were 220 of them. There are still in many Manuscripts thereabouts more or less, which plainly shews that these Questions were written by some Modern Greeks, who loved to busie their Minds with these sort of Questions, and to publish them under the Names of Antient Authors. Leunclavius was the First who translated these Questions, and his Version was printed at Basle in 1571. Afterwards Elias Elingherus, Library-Keeper of Ausburg published in 1626, 78 of these Questions in Greek and Latin. Last of all, Fronto Ducæus published the Greek Text and Version of 195 Questions and Answers, divided into Four Books, and those were printed in the Addition to the Bibliotheca Patrum in 1624, and in the Eleventh Volume of the Edition in 1644.

St. Cæsarius.

St. AMPHILOCHIUS.

St. Amphilochius.

ST. Amphilochius an intimate Friend of St. Basil and St. Gregory Nazianzen, was of Cappadocia. Having for some time professed Rhetorick, he afterwards attended the Bar, where he discharged the Office of an Advocate and a Judge (a). Leaving this he retired into a solitary place of Cappadocia, called Ozizala, and after he had led there for some time a very Holy Life, he was in the Year 375 Ordained Bishop of Iconium the Metropolis of Lycaonia, a Province of the Diocess of Asia, bordering upon Cappadocia. When he was Bishop he took Care not only of his own Church, but also of the affairs of the Neighbouring Churches. He was present at the Council of Constantinople, and there the Care of the Ecclesiastical Affairs of his Country was committed to him. About the Year 383, or 384, he held a Council at Syda against the Massalians which Photius mentions in Vol. 52. Theodoret relates in Ch. 16. of B. V. of his History, that St. Amphilochius petitioned the Emperor Theodosius to prohibit the Hereticks to hold their Assemblies in Cities; That the Emperor judging his Petition too Rigorous, denyed it; but Amphilochius returning some time after to the Palace, and seeing Arcadius his Son close by the Emperor Theodosius who had already been proclaimed Emperor, he Saluted the Father without Saluting the Son; that Theodosius thinking he had failed in his Duty through Inadvertence, commanded him to Salute his Son, to whom St. Amphilochius made answer, that it was enough that he had Saluted him. Whereupon Theodosius fell into a Passion, and declared how much he was offended with him for his neglecting of his Son; that then Amphilochius discreetly told him, You cannot suffer an Injury to be done to the Emperor your Son, and do you suffer those who dishonour the Son of God? that the Emperor being surprized with this Reply made a Law; wherein he forbids Hereticks to hold their Assemblies any longer. Theodoret says, that this happened after Theodosius's Return into the East, that is, about the Year 392. But it is much more probable, that St. Amphilochius spoke thus to the Emperor, sometime after the Council of Constantinople in the Year 382, since it was then that the Law of Theodosius was made against Hereticks, forbidding their Assemblies. The Year of Amphilochius's Death is not certainly known. St. Jerome in his Book of Ecclesiastical Writers written in 392, mentions him as one then living. There also he mentions a Treatise of the Holy Spirit, which St. Amphilochius had read to him a little while before, wherein he proves that the Holy Spirit was God, Adorable and Almighty.

The Works of this Father have been quoted with Commendation by the Councils and the Ancients. The Councils of Ephesus and Chalcedon, produce some Testimonies out of them against the Errors of Nestorius and Eutyches, but they do not tell us, out of what Book they are taken. Theodoret in his Dialogues produces others which are taken out of the Homilies upon these Words of the Gospel; My Father is greater than I; and upon these other Words, The Son can do nothing of himself; and out of a Homily upon these other Words of Jesus Christ in St. John Chap. 5. He that heareth my word and believeth on him that sent me hath eternal life; and out of a Homily upon these Words of Jesus Christ in St. Matth. Chap. 26. My God, let me not drink of this Cup; out of a Discourse against the Arians, which is the same with that upon these Words, My Father is greater than I, as appears by Leontius; and out of another Sermon upon the Word, the Son of God. Facundus in Ch. 3. of B. XI. of his Treatise, cites Four Passages out of St. Amphilochius, whereof the First is taken out of the Homily upon these Words, My Father is greater than I; the Second out of the Homily upon these Words, He that believeth in him that sent me hath eternal life; the third out of the Homily upon these Words, I ascend to my Father and my God; and the Last out of the Homily upon these Words, Let me not drink of this Cup. The seventh Council in Action Five, quotes a Fragment of St. Amphilochius against the Books written by Hereticks who bear the Name of the Apostles. Leontius and Anastasius Sinaita quote also some Passages of St. Amphilochius. St. John Damascene produces some Passages taken out of two of his Letters, whereof one was address'd to the Suadrenses and the other to Seleucus. There is also a Fragment and a Question concerning the Flesh of Jesus Christ which is thought to have been extracted by Photius, and an other Fragment of a Letter written to the Deacon Pancarius. Barlaam has also collected some Passages taken out of the Letter to Seleucus, out of the first Sermon upon these Words, No Man knows either the day or the hour of judgment; out of another upon these Words, The Child Jesus grew; out of another upon these Words, Destroy this Temple. These Fragments have almost all been collected together by Father Combefis, who has also published the entire Works, as many as could be found, under the Name of Amphilochius, and printed them at Paris in 1644.

St. Amphilochius.

These are Eight Sermons, a Poem upon the holy Books, and the Life of St. Basil.

The 1*st*. Sermon is upon the Nativity of Jesus Christ.

The 2*d*. is upon the Circumcision, wherein he enlarges upon the praise of St. Basil.

The 3*d*. is upon the Purification of the Virgin the Mother of God, upon Anne and Simeon.

The 4*th*. is a second Sermon upon the Virgin and Simeon, which is not written by St. Amphilochius Bishop of Iconium the Friend of St. Basil, but by another Amphilochius Bishop of Syda, who was present at the Council of Ephesus; for this Sermon is written directly against Nestorius, and is of a Stile different from the former.

The 5*th*. is upon Lazarus.

The 6*th*. upon the Woman in the Gospel that was a Sinner.

The 7*th*. which had been formerly printed at Antwerp in 1598, is of the Holy Saturday.

The last is about Penance. This has not the same Stile as the others.

The Author speaks against the Heresie of the Iconoclasts, and relates Fabulous Stories, from whence it appears that this Homily is the Work of some Modern Greek. It cannot be certainly known of any one of these Sermons, that it belongs to St. Amphilochius of Iconium, rather than Amphilochius Bishop of Syda.

The Poem to Seleucus has the Stile of St. Gregory Nazianzen, whatever Father Combefis says to the contrary, and it is very probable that it was written by this Father under the Name of Amphilochius. There he makes an Enumeration of the Canonical Books which is not different from that which is in the 33*d*. Poem: For tho' he speaks of the Book of Esther and the Revelation, yet he does not put them in the Rank of those Books which all the world receives for Canonical; he only observes, that some have admitted them, and others have rejected them.

The Life of St. Basil attributed to Amphilochius, translated into Latin by Cardinal Ursus, whose Translation was printed by Rosweydus, published in Greek and Latin by Father Combefis, contains many Fables, and many Particulars of (a) Advocate and a Judge.] St. Gregory Nazianzen recommends to him the Affairs of his Friends in Letters 19, 106, 160. and it appears by Letter 106, that he was accus'd for not doing Justice.

St. Amphilochius.

the Life of St. Baſil contrary to the truth of Hiſtory (b), ſo that it is plainly the Work of a Modern Greek. Father Combefis, who endeavours to maintain its Authority againſt the Opinion of Poſſevinus, Baronius and Bellarmin, ſays, that ſome places in it are added and corrupted, but that the Body of the Work is Amphilochius's; which he does not prove at all, nor can it appear probable to thoſe that read it, who will neither find in it the Stile, nor the Genius of the Fourth Age of the Church. The Life of St. Amphilochius written by Metaphraſtes, is alſo of no great Authority: Wherefore one may ſay, that excepting the Fragments produced by the Councils of Epheſus and Chalcedon, by Theodoret and Facundus, all the other Diſcourſes publiſhed by Father Combefis under the Name of Amphilochius, are either manifeſtly ſuppoſititious, or at leaſt very doubtful. But we muſt not ſay the ſame of the Letter publiſhed by Cotelerius in his ſecond Volume of the Monuments of the Greek Church, p. 98. It is a Synodical Epiſtle written to the Biſhops of another Province. The Biſhops in whoſe Name St. Amphilochius wrote it, declare, that they wiſhed St. Baſil had been preſent at their Synod; but he being detained by a grievous Sickneſs, they would be ſatisfied if he would ſend to them his Book of the Holy Spirit. They add, that they receive the Faith of the Nicene Council; but that tho' the Fathers of this Council had ſaid, that we muſt believe in the Holy Spirit, as in the Father and the Son, yet they had not explained the Divinity of the Holy Spirit, becauſe this Queſtion was not then diſputed. Afterwards they explain themſelves more clearly upon this Subject. They prove the Divinity of the Holy Spirit by Baptiſm; they ſay, that we muſt acknowledge in God but one Nature only, and three Hypoſtaſes. At laſt, they exhort thoſe to whom they write to maintain the Faith and the Peace of the Church, and to ſing the Doxology, Glory be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghoſt; and add, that 'tis in vain to reject the Communion of the Arians, if they do not believe the Divinity of the Holy Spirit. This Letter has relation to the 403 Letter of St. Baſil, wherein he writes to Amphilochius to ſend Deputies into Lycia, to inquire into the Faith of the Biſhops of that Country, who were for the moſt part Orthodox. Probably Amphilochius did as St. Baſil deſired him in this Letter, and theſe Deputies brought a Letter from the Biſhops of Lycia to which St. Amphilochius anſwers by this.

St. Amphilochius.

(b) Contrary to the Truth of Hiſtory.] The Author of this Life ſuppoſes, that St. Baſil was Biſhop in the time of Julian, that Libanius was of Julian's Retinue, that when this Emperor was killed, he was converted in a few Days after, and retired with St. Baſil. Now 'tis evident that St. Baſil was not Biſhop in the Emperor Julian's time, and that Libanius was ſo far from being converted after his Death, that he wrote a Panegyrick in his praiſe. All the Hiſtories which are related in this life are Fabulous, and do no ways agree with what the Ancients have ſaid of St. Baſil. In a word, No body can read this Piece but they may preſently diſcover its Impoſture.

MAXIMUS.

Maximus.

THis Maximus was a Philoſopher of Alexandria, who procured himſelf to be Ordained Biſhop of Conſtantinople, and did all that he could to force away from thence St. Gregory Nazianzen. He wrote a Book of Faith againſt the Arians, which he preſented to the Emperor Gratian at Milan; this he did in all probability, when he came into the Weſt after he had been driven away from Conſtantinople and Alexandria. St. Gregory Nazianzen gave him at firſt great Praiſes, but afterwards he blackened his Reputation in a wonderful manner. The Weſtern Biſhops protected him, but thoſe of the Eaſt declared his Ordination null, and made void all the Ordinations that he had made, by the fifth Canon of the Council of Conſtantinople.

Maximus.

EUSEBIUS VERCELLENSIS.

Euſebius Vercellenſis.

Euſebius born in Sardinia was Reader of the Church of Rome, and afterwards Biſhop of Verceilles. Pope Liberius ſent him Delegate to the Emperor Conſtantius after the Fall of Vincentius of Capua. He was preſent at the Council of Milan, from whence he was baniſhed into the Eaſt, and ſent away into Scythopolis, where he ſuffered very much from Patrophilus the Arian Biſhop of that City. He obtained his Liberty under the Reign of Julian, and was preſent at the Council of Alexandria held by St. Athanaſius. He was delegated by this Council for reſtoring Peace to the Church of Antioch, but he could not compaſs his Deſign, becauſe of the Ordination of Paulinus, which was raſhly made by Lucifer; for this was an hindrance to the Reconciliation. And therefore having blamed the Conduct of Lucifer he returned into Italy, where he took a great deal of Pains to re-eſtabliſh the Faith. He died in the Year 370. St. Ambroſe made a Panegyrick upon him. The Title of Martyr is commonly given to him: But St. Ambroſe, St. Jerome, St. Gregory of Tours, and all the Ancients give him no other Title but that of Confeſſor; and St. Ambroſe ſeems to prefer Dionyſius of Milan before him, becauſe he died in Baniſhment.

Euſebius Vercellenſis.

We have a Letter of this Biſhop written in the time of his Exile, and ſent to his own Church, together with a Proteſtation againſt all the Violences of Patrophilus. There is alſo among the Fragments of St. Hilary, a Letter to Gregory Biſhop of Elvira, written in 363, and a little Note that he wrote to Conſtantius before he went to Milan. St. Jerome teſtifies, that he tranſlated into Latin the Commentaries of Euſebius of Cæſarea upon the Pſalms. It is probable that he wrote it in his Exile, where he learned the Greek Tongue, and publiſhed it after his Return.

MELETIUS.

Meletius.

Meletius was of Melitine. He was at firſt engaged in the Party of the Acacians, and ſigned their Confeſſion of Faith in the Council of Seleucia. St. Jerome, Socrates, Sozomen, and Theodoret, ſay, that he was firſt Ordained Biſhop of Sebaſtea, a City of Armenia, in the Council of Conſtantinople in the Year 360. After that, if you will believe Socrates, he was tranſlated to Berœa, and from thence to Antioch: But it is more probable, that he was never Ordained Biſhop of Berœa, and that when he could not be received at Sebaſtea, he retired to Berœa, from whence he was called to Antioch, after Eudoxius had quitted that See to go to Conſtantinople. The Arians thinking that he would be of their Opinion, propoſed him for Biſhop of that City in a Council held at Antioch in 361, and the Orthodox knowing him better than the Arians, conſented to his Election. Some time after the Emperor Conſtantius, who was then at Antioch, deſired thoſe Biſhops that were moſt able to diſcourſe in publick, to explain theſe Words of Scripture; The Lord Created me in the Beginning of his Ways for his Works; and ordered their Expoſitions to be written down, that they might be obliged to make them the more exact. George Biſhop of Laodicea did firſt explain thoſe Words, and diffuſed all the Poiſon of his Errors. Acacius Biſhop of Cæſarea, did next give an Explication, which held the middle way between the Impiety of Arius and the Catholick Doctrine. But Meletius propoſed the Orthodox Doctrine of the Church. 'Tis alſo ſaid, that his Arch-Deacon having ſtopped his Mouth, he made known his Doctrine by Signs. The Arians aſſembled immediately to Depoſe him, and having Ordained in his Room an Arian named Euzoius, they cauſed Meletius to be baniſhed to the Place of his Birth. Then the ſounder part of the People ſeparated themſelves from thoſe that were infected with the Error of Arius, and aſſembled in the Church of the Apoſtles, which was in the Old City. But beſides the Catholicks, there were at Antioch a ſmall number of the antient Orthodox, who after the Depoſition of Euſtathius continued without Biſhops. Theſe would not be reunited to Meletius and thoſe of his Party, tho' they had ſeparated themſelves from the Arians: Lucifer coming to Antioch after the Death of Conſtantius, ordained Paulinus for their Biſhop; but they were but few in number, and Meletius's Congregation was more numerous. When all the Orthodox Biſhops after the Death of Conſtantius had liberty to return to their Dioceſſes, Meletius returned to Antioch; but Euzoius continued Miniſter of the Churches, till the Acacians were reconciled to Meletius under the reign of Jovian, and made profeſſion of the Orthodox Faith in the Council of Antioch in the year 363.

Meletius.

Under the reign of Valens, Meletius was perſecuted again and ſent into Baniſhment, but he was no leſs odious to the Orthodox of the Weſt than to the Arians. For the Church of Alexandria and the Churches of the Weſt, ſupported Paulinus and thoſe of his Party, and would have no Communion with Meletius. We have already ſeen the Trouble and Labour that St. Baſil underwent to reconcile

Meletius

Meletius. Meletius to them, yet he could not compass his Design while he lived. But nine Months after his Death, it was agreed between Meletius and Paulinus, that whensoever one of them two should die, no Person should be Ordained in his Room, but the Surviver should continue sole Bishop of the Place. Meletius coming in the year 380, to the first Council of Constantinople, in which he presided, died in that City to the great grief of all the Bishops. After his Death the Eastern Bishops, without any regard to the Agreement made with Paulinus, chose in his room Flavianus. This Election renewed the Schism of the Church of Antioch, which was not ended even at the Death of Paulinus which happened in the year 389, for before he died he Ordained Evagrius for his Successor. This Difference was carried to the Council of Capua, which named Theophilus and the Bishops of Egypt for Judges in this Cause. But Flavianus refusing him addressed himself to the Emperor, whom he persuaded of the goodness of his Cause. This Conduct of Flavianus very much disgusted the Western Bishops, as St. Ambrose informs us in the ninth Letter of his first Book. However he had so much Interest, as to hinder the placing of a Bishop in the room of Evagrius who died in 393, and he reconciled himself to the Western Bishops in 398, by means of St. Chrysostome who persuaded Theophilus to make up this Peace. Yet there were still some obstinate Persons at Antioch, who notwithstanding the Agreement of the whole Church, would keep up a Faction by themselves, and would neither be reconciled to Flavianus nor to his Successors; so difficult it is to bring those back to the Church, who have gone astray thro' too much Zeal for Religion, and have made a Separation under pretence of Purity of Doctrine, and Strictness of Discipline. St. Epiphanius has preserved for us in Hæres. 73. the Discourse of Meletius which contains clearly the Doctrine of the Church, and the proofs of the Eternity and Divinity of the Word. We may attribute to him also the Creed of the Council of Antioch in the year 393, related by Socrates Ch. 25. of B. III. of his History. These Monuments are authentick Proofs that Meletius was a Catholick, which was acknowledged by almost all the Fathers, and even by St. Athanasius. Neither can any one blame him for the Holiness of his Life; but his Ordination for some time was encumbred with great Difficulties: First, because it was believed, that he was translated from one Church to another; Secondly, because he was chosen and Ordained by the Arians, to whose Party he was addicted. But as to the first Difficulty, besides that we have in Antiquity some Examples of Translations that have been approved of, when they were made for the Good of the Church, as the Event did plainly shew this to be: It cannot be said, properly speaking, that Meletius was translated from one Bishoprick to another. For tho' he had been Ordained Bishop of Sebastea in Armenia, yet the People of that Church not being willing to receive him, he was obliged to withdraw immediately to Berœa. Now the Canons are so far from forbidding to give Bishopricks upon such Occasions to those who could not take possession of that which was designed for them, that on the contrary they ordain, that if it can be done, another Bishoprick should be given unto them as soon as possible. The other Difficulty is of much greater Consequence, and upon it especially those grounded their Separation who would not communicate with him. They said, that they could not acknowledge for a lawful Bishop one that was Ordained by Hereticks. But it must be considered that when he was Ordained, Constantius was Master of the Empire, and the Church of Antioch could have no Bishop that was Ordained by others; that tho' Acacius of Cæsarea and the other Eastern Bishops were in an Error, yet they were neither deposed nor deprived of their Bishopricks, and therefore they might act in such Matters as concerned the Government of the Church; that when the Bishops Ordained by Hereticks returned to the Church, she left them almost always in possession of their Sees; that the Orthodox had consented to the Ordination of Meletius; that all the Catholick Bishops of the East approved it; that Eusebius of Samosata, and Eusebius of Verceilles acknowledged his Ordination to be valid; and in short, that the Council of Constantinople put it past all doubt. But if we ought to approve the Ordination of Meletius, what can we say of that of Paulinus, but that it was done with much Indiscretion and Rashness? As to that of Flavianus, it cannot be altogether approved, since it was made contrary to an Agreement concluded between Meletius and Paulinus. Yet the Eastern Bishops may be excused, because perhaps they had no hand in this Agreement, and they foresaw that the People of Antioch could never agree with Paulinus. In a word, the Ordination of Evagrius can be approved by no body, since it tended only to perpetuate the Division and Schism in the Church of Antioch.

Meletius.

DIODORUS Bishop of Tarsus.

Diodorus Bishop of Tarsus. Diodorus a Priest and Monk of Antioch, the Scholar of Silvanus of Tarsus, Master of St. John Chrysostome, and Theodorus of Mopsuestia, after he had acquired a great Reputation in Antioch by his Conduct and Prudence, was Ordained Bishop of Tarsus in the year 375. While he was yet but a Priest, he took care of the People of Antioch, in the absence of Meletius, who was then banished under the Reign of Valens, and maintained the Orthodox Faith in this Church. After he was Bishop, he was present at the Council of Constantinople, and was one of those that were chosen to take care of the Eastern Dioceses. He was very skilful in the Knowledge of the Holy Scriptures, and wrote Commentaries upon almost all the Books of the Bible. He was one of the first Commentators that applied himself to a literal Explication, without amusing himself with Allegories. He was highly esteemed of by all the great Men of his Age, who wrote very obliging Letters to him, and have given very authentick Testimonies of his Doctrine and his Piety. One part of these Letters may be seen in Facundus Ch. 3. of his 4*th.* Book. But in the following Ages Men did not give so favourable a Judgment of this Man's Doctrine, for he was accused of teaching in his Writings the Errors of Nestorius, as they were afterwards called. It may be for this Reason that none of his Works are preserved. We have nothing but a very considerable Extract out of his Treatise Of Destiny, produced by Photius in Volume 223 of his Bibliotheca, and the Argument of another Treatise Of the Holy Spirit produced by the same Person in Volume 102. Theodoret also in his Commentaries upon Genesis, Quest. 20. p. 22. and Quest. 21. p. 25. produces two other Fragments of this our Diodorus.

St. Basil in Letter 167 speaks of two Books of this Author's writing against the Hereticks, whereof the second was composed by way of Dialogue. St. Jerome mentions his Commentary upon St. Paul. Socrates and Sozomen assure us, that he made Commentaries upon almost all the Books of the Bible. Leontius in his Third Book quotes a Book of this Author written against the Sunousiasts, that is, against the Apollinarists. Suidas has given us a Catalogue of his Works taken out of Theodorus, which is as follows. 'An Explication of all the Old Testament, of Genesis, 'Exodus, and upon the Psalms, and upon the Four Books 'of Kings, upon the Chronicles, upon the Proverbs; a Trea'tise of the Difference between Allegory and Contempla'tion; a Commentary upon Ecclesiastes, upon Canticles, 'upon the Prophets; a Chronicle wherein he has correct'ed some Faults of Eusebius; Commentaries upon the Four 'Gospels, upon the Acts, upon the Epistle of St. John; a 'Treatise to prove that there is but one God in the Trini'ty; a Book against the Melchisedecians; a Treatise against 'the Jews concerning the Resurrection of the Dead, one 'of the Soul against several Errors; a Treatise of Destiny 'against the Astrologers, where he speaks of the Globe of 'the World, and of Providence; and a Treatise wherein 'he proves that invisible things were made at the same time 'with the Elements, tho' they were not made of them; a 'Tract to Euphronius, by way of Question and Answer, 'against Aristotle's System.' He says nothing in this Catalogue of the Book of the Trinity, nor of the Treatise against the Apollinarists.

Diodorus Bishop of Tarsus.

The Treatise of Destiny was divided into Eight Books and 53 Chapters. There he refutes all the Follies of judicial Astrology, and shews that the World had a Beginning and was Created, that Man was endowed with Free-will, that God was not the Author of Evil, and that the World is governed by Divine Providence. Photius makes a particular Enumeration of the Subject of each Chapter in this Work, wherein he produces some part of his Reasonings. He had reason to ridicule the Proposition which this Author had advanced, That the Heaven was not round, supposing that if it were so, the Astrologers would have some good Ground for their Opinion of Fatality: For as he observes, the Figure of the Heaven has nothing in the World to do with this Question.

Photius observes, that the Stile of this Author is pure and clear; but St. Jerome says, that it is not lofty, and that he could never reach the Eloquence of Eusebius Emisenus, tho' he endeavoured to imitate it, because he was not skilled enough in human Learning. Facundus who quotes this Passage of St. Jerome, says only Eusebius, without adding Emisenus. Now if one should thus read the Text of St. Jerome, it would be more convenient to understand the Writings of Eusebius of Cæsarea, whom Diodorus rather imitated than those of the Bishop of Emesa, because the Works of Diodorus have no great relation to his Books, whereas they had a great affinity to those of Eusebius of Cæsarea, either for the Matters which he treated of, or for the Manner or Stile wherein he treated of them. For the Extracts which Photius has produced out of his Treatise of

Deſtiny, are very like to ſome Books of the Evangelical Preparation or Demonſtration of Euſebius of Cæſarea. The Judgment which St. Baſil has given of this Author's Stile may be ſeen in Letter 167, of which we have given an Abridgment in St. Baſil's Life. As to what concerns his Doctrine of the Incarnation, we could better judge of it, if we had his Books; but there is no great probability, that one who was prais'd, eſteemed and cheriſhed by Meletius, St. Baſil, St. Gregory Nazianzen, St. Epiphanius, and even by St. Athanaſius, and his Succeſſors Peter and Timothy of Alexandria; who was alſo conſidered in a General Council as one of the moſt Learned and moſt Orthodox Biſhops of all the Eaſt; and in ſhort, who was Maſter to St. Chryſoſtom, ſhould be guilty of ſo groſs an Error as that of Neſtorius. 'Tis true that he had for his Scholar Theodorus of Mopſueſtia, and that he was Accus'd of the ſame Error with Neſtorius; and that he was Condemned as Convicted of this Error after his death in the 5th. Council. But beſides that there have been ſome Perſons who have undertaken to juſtify him: Yet if it ſhould be granted that he was guilty of this Error, it would not follow that he learned it of his Maſter, ſince we daily ſee Heretical Diſciples, who have had Orthodox Maſters. Should not the Faith of St. Chryſoſtom, rather ſerve to juſtify Diodorus, than the Error of Theodorus to condemn him?

Diodorus Biſhop of Tarſus.

HILARY the Deacon.

Hilary the Deacon.

Hilary of Sardinia, Deacon of the Church of Rome, was deputed by Pope Liberius, together with Lucifer Biſhop of Calaris, and the Prieſt Pancratius, to go to the Emperor Conſtantius, after the Synod of Arles, in the Year 353. He was baniſhed after the Council of Milan, and afterwards he joined with Lucifer's Party, whereof he was one of the moſt zealous Defenders. 'Tis this Hilary, who is called in St. Jerome's Dialogue againſt the Luciferians, The Deucalion of the World, becauſe he would Regenerate and Renew by a Second Baptiſm, thoſe that had been baptized by Hereticks.

Tho' there has been no Book printed under the Name of this Hilary, yet the Learned have attributed to him the Commentary upon the Epiſtles of St. Paul, which bears the Name of St. Ambroſe, and the Queſtions upon the Old and New Teſtament, which are at the end of the 4th. Tome of St. Auſtin. Theſe are the Reaſons which have moved them to attribute to him the Commentary upon St. Paul's Epiſtles. Firſt, St. Auſtin in Ch. 4. of the 4th. B. to Boniface, cites under the Name of St. Hilary an Explication of this Paſſage of St. Paul. 'Twas from him all Men ſinned, which is taken Word for Word out of this Commentary. Now this Hilary whom St. Auſtin quotes, could neither be Hilary of Syracuſe, nor St. Hilary of Arles, ſince they were after St. Auſtin. No more can it be ſaid, that the Author of theſe Commentaries was Hilary of Poictiers, becauſe the Stile and the Verſion which he makes uſe of, are no ways like to the Stile and Verſion of theſe Commentaries, and there are ſome Opinions in the one, which are different from thoſe in the other. This Commentary therefore cannot be attributed to any but this Hilary of Sardinia. Beſides, the time and Circumſtances agree wonderfully to him; for he ſays on Ch. 3. of the 1ſt. to Timothy. That tho' all the World was God's, yet the Church whereof Damaſus at preſent was Governor, is called his Houſe. Which plainly ſhews, that this Commentary was written by one Well-affected to the Church of Rome, who liv'd in Damaſus's time: And therefore it cannot with any reaſon be attributed to Remigius of Lyons, but moſt probably was written by this Hilary whom we now ſpeak of.

Yet Petavius thinks that it cannot be attributed to him for two Reaſons; Firſt, becauſe this Author ſpeaks in favour of Damaſus, and 'tis not likely that a Man engaged in the Luciferian Schiſm which favoured Urſicinus, ſhould acknowledge Damaſus lawful Biſhop of Rome. Secondly, becauſe upon Chap. 1. of the 1ſt. Epiſtle to the Corinthians, he blames the Novatians and Donatiſts who re-baptized, and ſays, that to believe that the Grace of Baptiſm depended upon the Perſons who gave it, was injurious to the Baptiſm of our Saviour. Now the principal Error of Hilary the Deacon, according to the Teſtimony of St. Jerome, conſiſted in this, that he would have thoſe Re-baptized who had been baptized by the Arians. This objection cannot be anſwered, but by ſaying, that this Hilary did at laſt return into the Boſom of the Church under the Pontificate of Damaſus; but this ſuppoſition is contrary to the Teſtimony of St. Jerome, who ſays in his Book againſt the Luciferians, that this Deacon died out of the Church. This Man, ſays he ſpeaking of Hilary the Luciferian, being dead, his Sect ought to die with him, becauſe he being but a ſimple Deacon, could ordain no Perſon to ſucceed him. Wherefore it muſt be granted that we have no abſolute certainty, that this Book belonged to this Hilary of Sardinia.

Hilary the Deacon.

The Commentary upon the two firſt Chapters of the Epiſtle to the Hebrews, is an Extract out of the Commentary of St. Chryſoſtom, which is not made by the ſame Author as that upon the other Epiſtles.

'Tis thought that the Queſtions upon the Old and New Teſtament which have been formerly printed under St. Auſtin's Name, in his 4th. Tome, were written by the ſame hand as theſe Commentaries. To prove it, 'tis ſaid, firſt, that the Author of theſe Queſtions lived at the ſame time as the Author of the Commentary, for he ſays in Qu. 44. that he wrote 300 Years or thereabouts, after the Deſtruction of Jeruſalem, and he ſpeaks of Photinus as an Author then living. He ſpeaks alſo of the Devaſtation of Pannonia which happened in 351, and the Famine of the Year 363, as Calamities which happened in his time. Secondly, 'tis thought, that he ſpeaks in Qu. 115. of Sardinia, as his own Country. And in ſhort, ſome maintain that there is ſo great an agreement both in Stile and Doctrine between theſe two Treatiſes (a), that it cannot be doubted but they are written by the ſame Author. Which muſt be underſtood of the 47 Queſtions upon the Old Teſtament, the 50 upon the New, and the 36 upon the one and the other which are all written by the ſame Author, and not of the other following Queſtions, which are for the moſt part a repetition of what had been ſaid in thoſe that went before.

But whoever was the Author of theſe Queſtions they are full of Falſities and Errors (b), and almoſt all of them are of very little uſe. The Commentary upon the Epiſtle of St. Paul is better done, and has more ſenſe in it: It is clear, plain and literal, and gives the meaning of the Text of St. Paul well enough; but it gives very different Explications from St. Auſtin (c), in theſe places which concern Predeſtination, Vocation, Grace and Free-will.

(a) There is ſo great an Agreement both in Stile and Doctrine, &c.] Compare Queſt. 7. with the Commentary upon Ch. 6. to the Epheſians; Queſt. 13. with Comment. upon Ch. 5. to the Rom. Queſt. 18. with Comment. upon Ch. 9. to the Rom. Queſt. 21. with Comment. upon Ch. 6. and 11th. of the 1ſt. Ep. to the Corinth. Queſt. 23. with the Comment. on the 7th. Ch. of the Ep. to the Rom. Queſt. 24. with the Comment. upon the 1ſt. Ep. to the Corinth. Ch. 11. Theſe two Authors make often uſe of the ſame Words and in the ſame Senſe; as, Diffidentia, to ſignify incredulity, and the Words Prævaricandi, Meliorandi, &c.

(b) Full of Falſities and Errors.] A Catalogue of them may be ſeen in the Cenſure which the Doctors of Lovain have prefixed to this Work; one of the chief of them is their Opinion, that Melchiſedeck was the Son of God.

(c) Different Explications from St. Auſtin.] For this one needs only read almoſt all the places of St. Paul, which concern Predeſtination or Grace. Particularly the Commentaries upon the 5th. and 9th. Chapters of the Ep. to the Romans, upon the 2d. of the Ep. to the Philippians, and the Queſtions, 13, 24, 47, 115, 223, where he propoſes Maxims which are a little Pelagian.

PRIS-

PRISCILLIAN and Matronianus, Tiberianus and Dictinius his Disciples.

Priscillian, and his Disciples.

PRiscillian whom St. Jerome places among the Number of Ecclesiastical Writers, was the Author of a Sect which was accus'd of many Impieties. Sulpitius Severus who knew more of the History of the Priscillianists than any Ecclesiastical Author whatsoever, gives this Account of them: that towards the End of the fourth Century, one Mark originally of Egypt, being leavened with the Principles of the Gnosticks and Manichees, came into Spain to spread his Errors there; that at first he had for his Disciples a Woman called Agapa, and one Elpidius a Rhetorician; and that these were the Persons who instructed Priscillian; that he was a Person of Quality, Rich, Powerful, Quick and Restless, but very Eloquent and very Learned; that he acquired much Learning by hard Study, and that he had a wonderful Easiness in speaking and Disputing. Happy had he been, adds Sulpitius Severus, if he had not corrupted his fine Parts by joining with a wicked Faction. He had many good Qualities of Body and Mind. He endured with ease, Watchings, Hunger, and Thirst. He had no desire to be Rich, and lived with much Frugality; but he was proud, and prophane Learning had puffed him up intolerably. 'Tis said that he had formerly exercis'd the Art of Magick. This Man having as we have said, embraced the pernicious Doctrine of Marcus and Elpidius, drew many Persons of his own Country after him, either by persuading them with Reasons, or flattering them with Caresses. Women who naturally love Novelty, and have commonly much Curiosity, and but little Steadiness, flocked after him in great Multitudes, to be admitted among his Party. In a word, he procured the Love and Respect of all the World, by the show of Humility which appeared in his Clothes and his Countenance. Spain began to be infected with the Venom of this Heresie, and even some Bishops were corrupted with it. There were particularly two of them called Instantius and Salvianus, who were engaged by Oath into the Faction of Priscillian. But Hyginus Bishop of Corduba their Neighbour understanding it, informed against them to Idacius of Merida, who kindled, as one may say, the Fire of Division by the Rigour which he us'd, and irritated Men's minds without putting a stop to the growing Evil. In short, after many Disputes, the Synod of Saragoza was Assembled, at which the Bishops of Aquitaine were present; and these Hereticks not daring to appear there were condemned for their Contumacy. Sentence was given against the Bishops Instantius, Salvianus, and against Elpidius and Priscillian. 'Twas also added, that all those who should receive them into Communion, should expect the same Condemnation with them. Ithacius Bishop of Ossobona was entrusted with the Publication of this Sentence, and with the Management of the Excommunication against Hyginus the Bishop, who being the first that oppos'd Priscillian and his Disciples, was afterwards himself corrupted, and received them into his Communion. But Instantius and Salvianus, without any regard to the Judgment of the Council of Saragoza Ordained Priscillian Bishop of Avila. Then the Bishops of the other Party had recourse to the Authority of the Emperor, and obtained of Gratian an Edict, wherein the Priscillianists were condemned to be driven out of the Churches, and to be banished out of the Cities where they dwelt. Instantius and Salvianus being chased away out of their own Country, went to Rome and Milan; but they were rejected by Damasus, and St. Ambrose. After which they had recourse to the Emperor, and obtained of him a Rescript, wherein he permitted them to return to their own Country, and ordained, that their Churches should be restored unto them. They returned into Spain with this Edict and having gained the Proconsul, they forced away Ithacius. He fled into France, and carried his Complaints to the Tyrant Maximus, who was entered as a Conqueror into the City of Triers: This Prince caus'd Priscillian and his chief Disciples to be carried to a Synod held at Bourdeaux, in the Year 384, in which Instantius was Depos'd; and when they would have proceeded to Judge Priscillian also, he appealed from them to the Emperor Maximus, who committed the Judgment of this Affair to the Prefect Evodius, who having Convicted Priscillian of Witchcraft and Uncleanness, made his Report of the whole Matter to Maximus, who condemned him and his chief Followers, to have their Heads cut off, which was done in the Year 385. Some have thought that Priscillian was Innocent, and that he was unjustly oppress'd by the Faction of Ithacius, whose Conduct was disapproved by the most Pious Bishops of that time. It seems that St. Jerome favours this Opinion in his Catalogue, where he speaks of Priscillian in these Words: Priscillian Bishop of Avila was Executed in the City of Triers by the Commandment of the Tyrant Maximus, having been oppress'd by the Faction of Hilatius (it must be read, Ithacius,) and Idacius: He wrote many Tracts whereof some are come to our Hands. Some accuse him even at this Day of the Heresie of the Gnosticks, of Basilides and Marcion; but others vindicate him, and maintain that he held none of these Errors that are charged upon him. 'Tis true, that the same St. Jerome in a Letter to Ctesiphon, speaks of Priscillian as a notable Heretick, which made Monsieur Quesnel think, that this place of St. Jerome's Book of Ecclesiastical Writers was interpolated. This Conjecture, which is not founded upon the Authority of any Manuscript would be of some moment if it were not known that St. Jerome does often speak differently of one and the same Person. Perhaps St. Jerome's way of speaking of him in his Catalogue, gave occasion to put Priscillian and his Disciple Matronianus into some Martyrologies, and to rank them among the Holy Martyrs.

Priscillian, and his Disciples.

St. Jerome speaks of this last after this manner: Matronianus of Spain, a learned Man, and one that was comparable to the Ancients for Poetry, was also put to Death with Priscillian, Feliciſſimus, Julianus and Euchrotia, who were all of the same Party. We have some of his Works in Verse, which are Evidences of his Wit and Parts. Sulpitius Severus called this Disciple of Priscillian, Latronianus, for Matronianus

Tiberianus of Bætica was also an Author of this Sect, Who wrote, says St. Jerome, an Apology to vindicate himself from the Suspicion of Heresie whereof he was accused together with Priscillian. His Stile is swelling and affected. After the Death of those of his Party, being overcome by the tediousness of a long exile, he married a Virgin consecrated to Jesus Christ.

Dictinius was a Priest who had been accused of the same Error, and condemned for it in the Council of Langres. St. Ambrose wrote Letters in his favour to procure his Restauration, But upon condition that he should condemn what he had done, and that he should continue Priest without being capable of rising to a higher Dignity. Nevertheless he did not perform these Conditions, for he continued still in his antient Error, and got himself ordained Bishop of Asturica Augusta. Being cited upon this account to the First Council of Toledo in the Year 390, together with Symphosius who Ordained him, he did not appear before the Synod; but appearing afterwards at a Second Synod held about the Year 400, where Symphosius declared, that he was forced by the People to Ordain Dictinius, and Dictinius himself made a Solemn Recantation of his Errors, whereupon they were both absolved. He wrote some Treatises for the Error of the Priscillianists, which are mentioned by St. Leo, in a Letter to Turribius. What we have said of the Restaurtation of Dictinius, seems to be contrary to the Testimony of Idacius, who says, that Turribius was placed in the room of Dictinius after he was Deposed for his Heresie; but St. Leo declares very plainly in the Letter which we just now cited, that Dictinius died a Catholick. From whence it appears, that Idacius, (the Author of the Chronicle, who lived in the Fifth Age of the Church, and is different from him of whom we have now spoken) was deceived, and that Turribius succeeded Dictinius after his Death, and not after his Deposition. For to say, as Monsieur Quesnel does, that the Acts of the Council of Toledo, are falsified or that Dictinius relapsed a second time after his retractation, is to alledge that which has no Foundation, which is contrary to the Testimony of St. Leo, who affirms that this Bishop died a Catholick, and that we may have a Veneration for his Memory after his Retractation.

ITHACIUS, or IDACIUS.

Ithacius, or Idacius.

THis Idacius or Ithacius, Sirnamed Clarus, Bishop of Ossobona, a City in the Province of Bætica, was, as we have already said, one of the greatest Enemies of the Priscillianists. St. Isidore of Sevil observes in his Book of Ecclesiastical Writers, that he wrote a Book by way of Apology, against the detestable Doctrines of Priscillian, wherein he discovers the Witchcraft and Infamous Crimes of those Sectaries, and shews, that a certain Magician called Mark, a Native of Memphis in Egypt, was the Disciple of Manichæus and Master of Priscillian. The same Author adds, that this Idacius was deprived of the Communion of the Church, together with the Bishop Ursacius, upon the account of the Death of Priscillian, whose Accusers they had been, and that he being sent into Banishment, ended his Days there under the Reign of Theodosius and Valentinian. St. Isidore makes no mention of the Books against Varimadus, which bear the Name of Idacius; and indeed they do not belong to this Author but Ithacius, or Idacius.

Ithacius, or Idacius. to Vigilius Tapſenſis, as we ſhall ſhew when we come to ſpeak of Vigilius: This Apologetick of Idacius is loſt. St. Iſidore obſerves that it was well written. [Idacius and Ithacius are not too different Names for the ſame Perſon as here ſeems to be implied; for in Sulpitius Severus they are conſtantly divided.] Ithacius, or Idacius.

FAUSTINUS.

Fauſtinus. GEnnadius aſſures us that Fauſtinus, a Prieſt (or a Deacon according to others) wrote to the Empreſs Flaccilla Seven Books againſt the Arians and Macedonians, wherein he refutes and confounds them by the very ſame Paſſages that the Hereticks uſe to eſtabliſh their Blaſphemies. This work was a long time attributed to Gregory of Bætica; But at laſt the true Author of it was owned and it was printed under the Name of Fauſtinus, with a Letter to Flaccilla.

The ſame Gennadius ſays alſo, that this ſame Fauſtinus, wrote a Petition, which he preſented with the Prieſt Marcellidus, (or rather Marcellianus) to the Emperors Valentinian and Theodoſius, which ſhews evidently that he was engaged in the Schiſm of the Luciferians. Sirmondus publiſhed this little piece in the Year 1656. Before the Petition there is a Preface written by the ſame Fauſtinus, wherein he gives a little Hiſtorical Abridgment, in favour of his own Party. There he relates that under the Reign of Conſtantius, almoſt all the Biſhops attempted to condemn St. Athanaſius; that Liberius of Rome, Euſebius of Verceilles, Lucifer of Calaris, and St. Hilary of Poictiers, refuſing to approve this unjuſt condemnation, were ſent into Baniſhment; That Damaſus who was then Deacon of Rome, pretended he would accompany Liberius, but returned again immediately; That the Clergy of Rome in the preſence of the People took an Oath, not to receive another Biſhop while Liberius lived; that notwithſtanding this, in a little time after, the Clergy choſe the Archdeacon Felix to fill his Place, that Liberius having conſented to Impiety, [by ſubſcribing an Arian Confeſſion of Faith] returned about three Years after and was reſtored to the Poſſeſſion of his See, and that Felix was driven away from Rome; Upon whoſe Death, which happened Eight Years after Liberius came back, he received into Communion thoſe of the Clergy that had been of Felix's Party; That he died alſo in a little while after, and then the Prieſts and Deacons who had been Faithful to Liberius in his Baniſhment choſe Urſicinus in his room; but the perfidious Party choſe Damaſus an ambitious Man, who had always aſpired to the Epiſcopal Chair; That this Man had committed all ſorts of Cruelties and Outrages againſt thoſe who adhered to Urſicinus, and at laſt had driven them all out of the City. That ſince this time thoſe of the Orthodox Party had been abuſed, diſperſed and Baniſhed, and that two of them called Marcellinus and Fauſtinus preſented this Petition to the Emperors Valentinian, Theodoſius and Arcadius.

They complain in this Petition of the Perſecutions and Cruelties which they ſay they ſtill ſuffer from their Enemies; they affirm, that no Error nor Hereſie can be charged upon them, and then accuſed their Adverſaries of having been formerly Hereticks, or of having conſented to the Condemnation of the Faith of the Church. They deſcribe the miſerable end of Arius, to beget a Horror of his Impiety, and they ſay, that God hath by this viſible Judgment approved all that was done in the Council of Nice. They relate afterwards what paſſed in the Councils of Seleucia and Ariminum, and how the Biſhops were forced to Sign the Heretical Confeſſions of Faith; They bewail their Unhappineſs, and praiſe the Faith and Conſtancy of Paulinus of Triers, of Euſebius of Verceilles, of Lucifer of Calaris, and a very ſmall number of Biſhops, who choſe rather to ſuffer all things than do any thing againſt their Conſcience. They deſcribe the Defection of Oſius Biſhop of Corduba, and ſay, that he died by a Viſible Judgment of God, for pronouncing Sentence againſt Gregory of Bætica, who had always boldly defended the Faith. They ſay, that the ſame thing happened to Potamius of Oſſobona. They add, that theſe viſible Judgments of God do plainly ſhew, that thoſe who would not Communicate with the Biſhops that were defiled with theſe Crimes, are ſo far from being guilty of Impiety, that they do great Service to the Church; that the great Number of thoſe who communicate with them ought to be no Prejudice to others, ſince this Conduct is contrary to Scripture; that the pretence of promoting Peace ought not to make us own Apoſtates for Lawful Biſhops; that the Inconſtancy of the Catholicks, has given occaſion to Valens to embrace the Arian Faction. They repreſent afterwards, in a moſt Odious manner, the Cruelties which they ſay were committed againſt their Party in different places of the World, and they conjure the Emperor to put a ſtop to this Perſecution by his Edicts. Not, add they, that we are afraid to Suffer or to Die, being perſuaded, that when we die for a good Cauſe, we ſhall enjoy after our Death great Tranquility, and have a perfect certainty of our Bleſſedneſs. But we give you Notice of this Diſorder, for fear leſt the Blood of Chriſtians, if it ſtill continue to be ſhed, bring down the wrath of God upon your Government. Tho' the complaints of theſe Two Prieſts were injurious to the Church, yet Theodoſius was moved by them, and granted a Reſcript in their Favour addreſſed to Cynegius the Prætorian Prefect, wherein he teſtifies his Indignation againſt the manner of treating them, and ordains, that the Biſhops Gregory of Spain, and Heraclides of the Eaſt, who were mentioned in their Petition, and all thoſe who communicate with them be ſuffered to live in quiet. This Petition muſt have been preſented after the Year 383, becauſe Arcadius to whom it is addreſſed, was not admitted a Partner of the Empire till that Year, and the Reſcript muſt be before 388, which was the Year wherein Cynegius died. It ſeems to have been Preſented while Damaſus lived, who died in the Year 384. Fauſtinus.

There is ſome probability, that Fauſtinus preſented the Confeſſion of Faith which goes under his Name in the Roman Code, publiſhed by Monſieur Queſnel at the End of the Works of St. Leo, along with this Petition. I know very well, that this learned Man pretends, that this Confeſſion of Faith was made about the Year 379, before the Council of Conſtantinople; but his Conjectures are not convincing: He attributes to the Prieſt Marcellinus, the Confeſſion of Faith which precedes this in the New Code; but this is alſo a Conjecture that is not abſolutely certain.

The Stile of Fauſtinus in his Treatiſe of the Trinity, is very plain and ſimple: He contents himſelf with producing Paſſages of Scripture, from which he draws conſequences to prove the Doctrine of the Church, and with anſwering the Objections of the Arians; but the Stile of his Petition is ſwelling and pathetical. In it you may ſee the Humour and Genius of all Reformers, who glory in their ſmall number, who blame the multitude, who rend in pieces the Reputation of thoſe who are promoted to Dignities, who teſtify their Indignation againſt the higher Powers, who make a ſhow of much Firmneſs and Conſtancy, of a great Contempt of this Life, of Honours and Riches; who look upon themſelves as unblameable, and attribute to the Divine Vengeance all the fatal Accidents which happen to thoſe that are not their Friends; who are always complaining of being perſecuted and ill-uſed; who exaggerate the Evils which they juſtly ſuffer, and affect to ſhew a great Zeal for Piety and Religion.

[Every Reader muſt needs ſee that theſe Reflexions were inſerted here more for the ſake of the Proteſtants than of the Luciferians: Either all Abuſes ought always to be tolerated, or a Reformer is not to be blamed upon the ſcore of his Office: And when Men ſet up for Reformers, the Cauſe only is to be conſidered not the Pretences; which if it be juſt, they have no reaſon to be aſhamed of any of theſe things here urged againſt them as Marks of Obloquy; if their Numbers are ſmall, they ought to ſhew by a proportionable Firmneſs of Mind, that they place their Confidence in a Being that is ſuperior to any Powers here below; and if they find fault with the multitude who do not joyn with them, they act according to their own Principles, ſince all Men who think themſelves to be in the right, muſt believe that their Adverſaries are miſtaken; their ſtanding to their own Aſſertions cannot reaſonably be interpreted to be injurious to Men in Eminent Places: Conſtancy, Contempt of the World, of Life, Riches and Honours, are Virtues, which, when ſupported by a good Cauſe, are glorious Ingredients in the Characters of the greateſt Saints; and therefore are favourable Prejudices for all thoſe Reformers in whom they are to be found; if they are too apt to attribute the ill Succeſſes of their Enemies to Divine Vengeance, they are not ſingular, ſince all Parties and even all Religions conſtantly practiſe it; if they are hardly uſed they may reaſonably complain of their Uſage; and Mr. du Pin knows that his Church has always taken very particular Care that her Adverſaries ſhould never complain againſt her for Perſecuting without juſt Cauſe, whilſt they believe themſelves to be in the right: Reformers, as all Men naturally do, will aggravate their Sufferings, that they may lay load upon their Perſecutors; and laſt of all, every Man is tempted to think his Adverſary's Zeal for Religion to be only hypocritical.

If we conſider what good Succeſs theſe two Luciferian Prieſts had in their Buſineſs, we ought not haſtily to condemn them: Theodoſius the Great always ſhewed an unſhaken Zeal for the Orthodox Faith; and his Carriage towards St. Ambroſe who cenſured him for his haſty and cruel Orders againſt the Theſſalonians, was an Evidence how very much he reverenced the Orders and Diſcipline of the Church; and beſides, if we reflect upon the Accounts which Ammianus Marcellinus gives us of the Differences between Damaſus and Urſicinus, they will ſeem to plead for Urſicinus's Party. His being a Heathen is no Prejudice againſt him in this Matter, becauſe he was not a Bigot againſt the Chriſtian Religion; ſo that it rather gave him the Advantage which all Neuters have of judging impartially of both ſides.]

PHILA-

PHILASTRIUS.

Philastrius

PHilastrius Bishop of Brescia, flourished under the elder Theodosius, and was one of the Bishops in the Council of Aquileia. St. Austin says, That he had seen him sometimes with St. Ambrose. We have his Life written, as is thought, by St. Gaudentius his Successor. He died before St. Ambrose, about the Year 387 (a).

He wrote a Treatise of Heresies, wherein he reckons 20 Heresies before the Birth of Jesus Christ, and 128 afterwards to the Year 380, in which he wrote, and tells in a few Words the principal Errors of each of them. St. Austin observes at the Beginning of his Book about Heresies, that it was a surprizing thing that Philastrius who was much less learned and less exact than St. Epiphanius, should reckon up many more Heresies than he did; from whence he concludes, that these two Authors could not have the same Notions of Heresie, because indeed it is very difficult to give a just Definition of it. Wherefore, adds St. Austin, in giving the Catalogue of Heresies, we must carefully avoid these two opposite Extreams, whereof one is to make those Heresies that are not, and the other is to omit those Heresies which really are such. 'Tis a rare thing for those who make the Catalogues of Heresies to fall into this Fault, but the first is very common, and Philastrius was more subject to it than any body. For he feigns a Multitude of Heresies that never were (b), and sometimes he puts in the number of Heresies those Opinions that are true, or at least problematically disputed (c). And therefore we need not wonder, that he made so numerous a Catalogue of Heresies, which he also multiplied, by mentioning one and the same Heresie many times.

Philastrius

The Stile of this Author is mean and flat; he had no great Learning, and has committed many gross Faults (d) in this little Tract, which is not written with any Exactness: Yet there are some remarkable things in it (e).

This Treatise was printed at Basle in 1528; and at Helmstadt in 1611, and in 1614, and with St. Austin's Book of Heresies, in several places, and in the Bibliotheca Patrum.

(a) About the Year 387.] The Author of this Life, says, That he died before St. Ambrose. In Heresie 36, 'tis said, that he wrote in the year 430, but 'tis plain that this was the Mistake of a Figure, and that they put a C for an L, which would make it just 380.

(b) Heresies that never were.] As the Nazareans, the Heliognosis, the Adorers of Mice, the Muscaronnites, the Troglodites in the Old Testament, the Fortunatians, the Baalites, the Celebites, the Molochites, the Tophites; making several Sects of Hereticks, of the Abominations committed by the Jews, and the Sacrifices of the People that were their Neighbours. But nothing is more pleasant than his Invention of the Heresie of the Puteorites, which he founds upon that Passage of Jeremy. They have forsaken me the Fountain of Living Water, to make to themselves broken Cisterns. That which he founds upon the 8*th*. Ch. of Ezekiel is not better grounded. Never any but he mentioned the Heresies of Judas, of the Passalorinchites, the Rhelorians, the Discalceati, and some others: Of one and the same Heresie, he many times makes many; and, in a word, he reckons the number of Heresies, not by the Sects, but by every particular Opinion. In our days, he might have multiplied at a much greater rate the number of Heresies, by counting as many Errors as have been invented by one or other.

(c) He puts in the number of Heresies those Opinions that are true, or at least problematical.] As in Haresi. 26, that the Soul of Samuel was brought back by the Witch of Endor; in the 59*th*. the Error of the Millenaries; in the 79*th*. that the Elements shall not perish; in the 88*th*. that the Epistle to the Hebrews may be St. Luke's or St. Barnabas's; in the 63*d*. that there are more than 7. Heavens; in 94, that there is no other Earth but this; in 96, that the Likeness of Man to God may be explained with relation to his Body; in 97, that the Breath which God inspired into Man was his Soul; in 101, that Earthquakes are natural Effects; in 102, and 111, that the Names of prophane Gods may be given to the Stars; in 110, that the number of Years since the Creation is not certain; in 126, that David was not the Author of all the Psalms; in 129, that the Stars are fastned to Heaven; in 137, and those that follow, that we may follow another Version besides that of the Seventy, and some others; in the 56*th*. he condemns those that admit Ecclesiasticus as a Canonical Book.

(d) Many gross Faults.] There are an infinite number of them in this Book; take some few of them. He places the Ophites, the Gaïanites, and the Troglodites among the Hereticks which were before Jesus Christ, which is an Error in Chronology. He says, the Samaritans came from a King called Samarius, the Son of Canaan. What a strange Mistake is here! He says, that Mercurius Trismegistus came to the Celts, and taught them to adore the Sun. He affirms that the God Accaron was a Fly. He supposes that not only Simon Magus, Basilides, &c. but also Cerdon, Marcion, and many other Hereticks, published their Errors while the Apostles were alive; a wonderful Mistake in Chronology. There are many more in it of this Nature.

(e) There are some remarkable things in it.] He confirms in many places the Immortality and Spirituality of the Soul, and chiefly in Heresie 122. In Haresi. 87. he admits as Canonical the two Epistles of St. Peter, that of St. Jude, and the three Epistles of St. John. He explains the Mystery of the Trinity in Haresi. 91, 92. He discourses of Grace in Haresi. 97. He says very curious things about the Diversity and Gift of Tongues in Haresi. 103, 104. He rejects in 105, the Opinion of those who thought that the Day of Judgment should happen 363 years after Jesus Christ. In 106, he rejects the Opinion of those who imagined, that the Sons of Men spoken of in Genesis, were Angels. In the 112, he laughs at those that say there are many Worlds. In Haresi. 116. he plainly admits Original Sin. In 121, he rejects the Opinion of those, who believed that Jesus Christ descended into Hell, and preached the Gospel there to all the Damned, and that those of them who believed in him were saved. In 129, he explains the Eternal Generation of the Word. In 124, he teaches that Men ought to run in the ways of Virtue, and to desire what is good, but they ought not to do it with Pride and Haughtiness, for they should acknowledge that they cannot deserve Salvation by their own Works, but by the Mercy of Jesus Christ; that it is indeed in our Power to run, but we ought to hope for greater things from God; and therefore we ought not to magnifie our selves, and say, I can be a Martyr, I can be an Apostle, but we must add, If Jesus Christ will: Because it is from him that we obtain these Graces, and they are not to be acquired by a vain Presumption. In Haresie 144, he observes that the Church celebrates Four solemn Fasts, before Christmas, before Epiphany, before Easter, and before Whitsunday. I leave the other Observations to those who will take the pains to read this little Tract, whose Brevity is one of its best Qualities.

TIMOTHY of Alexandria.

Timothy of Alexandria.

TImothy the Successor of Peter of Alexandria, who was present at the Second Council of Constantinople, wrote the Lives of the Monks of Egypt, which is mentioned by Sozomen Ch. 29. of B. VI. of his History. Facundus in Ch. 2. of B. IV. cites a Letter of the same Timothy addressed to Diodorus of Tarsus.

We have now the Responses or Canon-Laws of this Bishop, upon which Balsamon, has written Commentaries. The Questions that were proposed to him, were Questions about Customs and Practices of the Church, and his answers are very judicious.

In the First he says, that those young Catechumens ought to be Baptized, who being present in the Church with the Faithful had received the Eucharist.

The Second and Third concern those that are possessed by an evil Spirit; he says, that those Catechumens ought not to be Baptized who are afflicted with this Evil, until the Point of Death. As to the Faithful, he would have them permitted from time to time to approach the Holy Mysteries, provided the Devil do not seduce them to Discover these Mysteries, or to blaspheme them.

In the 4*th*. he says, that these Catechumens may be Baptized, who have lost their Wits by Sickness.

In the 5*th*. he counsels married Persons to abstain from the use of Marriage, on that Day in which they intend to Receive the Communion.

Timothy of Alexandria.

In the 6*th*. and 7*th*. he would not have Women Baptized, nor receive the Communion, but at certain times.

In the 8*th*. he exempts Women newly brought to Bed from the Fast of Lent: Because, says he, Fasting was not appointed but to afflict the Body, and therefore where the Body is already afflicted, they may take what is necessary for it.

In the 9*th*. he says, that the Clergy ought not to use the Publick Prayers in the Presence of the Arians and Hereticks, if they have a Design to forsake their Heresie: He takes notice, that the Deacon was wont to say with a loud Voice, before he saluted the People, Let those who do not Communicate withdraw.

In the 10*th*. he exempts sick Persons from the Fast of Lent, and permits them to eat Oyl in that time.

In the 11*th*. he says, that a Clergy-man ought not to marry Persons contrary to Law.

In the 12*th*. he excuses Nocturnal Illusions, when they do not proceed from a Voluntary Cause.

In the 13*th*. he would have Persons that are Married abstain from the use of Marriage on Saturday, and Sunday, that they may be capable of receiving the Communion.

In the 14*th*. he says, that an oblation may be offered for thoſe that kill themſelves through madneſs, having loſt the uſe of their reaſon; but becauſe this Pretence is often alledged to procure an Offering for thoſe that kill themſelves knowingly, therefore the matter ſhould be well examined.

The 15th. Queſtion is of great Conſequence. It was asked, ſuppoſing a Wife to be perfectly Fooliſh and Mad, ſo that ſhe muſt be bound, Whether an Husband, who, ſays he, cannot contain himſelf, may lawfully Marry another Wife? He anſwers, that this Action would be Adultery in him, and that nothing elſe is to be ſaid upon the Queſtion.

In the 16th. it was asked, whether a Perſon that faſted in order to Communicate, having by chance ſwallowed down a drop of Water, either in bathing himſelf, or in waſhing his Mouth, ought to Communicate or no? He anſwers, that he ought to do it ſo much the rather, becauſe 'tis the Devil that uſes this Artifice to hinder his receiving the Communion. Timothy of Alexandria.

In the 17th. he ſays, that thoſe who hear the Word of God and do it not, are in ſome meaſure excuſable if they be angry with themſelves for their Omiſſion, and accuſe themſelves of it.

In the laſt, he ſays, that Men begin to ſin, when they come to the uſe of Reaſon, and ſo ſome begin to ſin, at Ten Years of Age; ſome ſooner and ſome later.

NECTARIUS.

Nectarius.

Nectarius who was choſen Arch-Biſhop of Conſtantinople in the Year 382, after St. Gregory Nazianzen withdrew, paſſes for the Author of an Homily upon the Feſtival of the Martyr Theodorus, Printed at Paris by Nivelle in 1554, together with ſome Homilies of St. Chryſoſtom. He diſcourſes in this Homily of Alms-giving and Faſting. Nectarius died in 397. He could not be very skilful in Divinity, having ſpent all his Life at Court, and being only a Catechumen when he was choſen to be Biſhop. Nectarius.

GELASIUS of Cæſarea.

Gelaſius of Cæſarea.

ST. Jerome places Gelaſius, Succeſſor to Euzoius Biſhop of Cæſarea in Palæſtine, amongſt the Eccleſiaſtical Writers. He aſſures us, that he had an exact and Polite Stile, but that he would not publiſh his Works. Photius in Vol. 89. aſſures us, that he read the Continuation of the Hiſtory of Euſebius, Written by Ruffinus, Tranſlated into Greek by this Author. He obſerves, that he was the Nephew of St. Cyril of Jeruſalem, and that this Father was his Fellow-labourer in the Tranſlation of this Hiſtory, Theodoret in his firſt Dialogue quotes with commendation a Paſſage of this Author, taken out of a Homily upon the Apparition of Jeſus Chriſt, which proves the diſtinction of the Two Natures in Chriſt. Gelaſius of Cæſarea.

SIRICIUS.

Siricius.

Siricius ſucceeded Pope Damaſus in the Year 385, and governed the Church of Rome till the Year 398. the Letters of this Pope, are the Firſt Decretals which are truly the Pope's whoſe Name they bear.

The Firſt Letter he wrote ſoon after he was promoted to the Pontifical Dignity, in Anſwer to Himerius, Biſhop of Tarracon, upon ſome Queſtions which he had propoſed to Damaſus Predeceſſor to Siricius.

The Firſt Queſtion was, Whether the Arians muſt be Re-baptized, who were re-admitted into the Church. Siricius anſwers, that this was by no means to be permitted, becauſe the Apoſtle forbids it, becauſe the Canons condemn it, and becauſe it was forbidden by the Conſtitutions of his Predeceſſor Liberius, which were ſent to all the Churches of the World, after the Annulling of the Council of Ariminum. 'Wherefore, adds he, in obedience to what was 'Ordained, by a Synod, We reconcile them to the Church, 'as well as the Novatians and other Hereticks by Invocation of the Holy Spirit, and by Impoſition of Hands 'made by the Biſhops: This is the Method which all the 'Eaſt and all the Weſt obſerves, and you cannot vary from 'this Practice, but you will deſerve to be ſeparated from 'our Society by a Synodical Sentence.'

The Second Queſtion propoſed by Himerius, was about the time wherein Baptiſm ought to be Adminiſtred. Siricius thinks, that in this we ſhould follow the Cuſtom of the Church of Rome, that this Sacrament ſhould not be Adminiſtred but at Eaſter and Whitſuntide; yet he excepts Infants, and ſuch as are in danger of their Life, who ſhould be relieved with all ſpeed. 'For fear, ſays he, leſt we be guilty 'before God of the loſs of thoſe to whom we have re'fuſed Baptiſm. He would have this Law obſerved by all 'the Biſhops, and threatens thoſe who ſhall not obſerve it, 'to ſeparate them from the Apoſtolick Rock, upon which 'Chriſt has built his Univerſal Church.' Yet this Law was never punctually obſerved, neither in the Eaſt nor in the Weſt; and nevertheleſs the Biſhops who did not obſerve it, were never upon this Account ſeparated from the Apoſtolick Rock upon which Chriſt built his Univerſal Church.

The Third Queſtion is concerning thoſe who having received Baptiſm had fallen into Apoſtacy. Siricius ordains, that if they acknowledge their Fault, they ſhould do Penance for the reſt of their Life; but that the favour of Reconciliation ſhould be granted them at the Point of Death.

The Fourth Queſtion was, whether a Man could Marry a Woman that was promiſed to another. Siricius anſwers, that we muſt not ſuffer it to be done, becauſe it was a kind of Sacriledge to Violate the Bleſſing which the Prieſt or Biſhop gave to her that was to be Married.

The Fifth concerns Penitents who have relapſed into the Sins of the Fleſh, after they had compleated their Penance and were reconciled to the Church. Siricius ſays, that ſince they have no further the benefit of Penance, he thinks it convenient to give them leave to be preſent at the Prayers of the Church; but upon condition that they ſhall be kept back from the Holy Table, that is, from the participation of the Sacrament of the Euchariſt; yet he would have this Viaticum granted them at the point of Death. He ordains that the ſame method ſhall be obſerved towards Women that fall into Sins of this Nature. And in fine, as to Monks and religious Perſons guilty of Uncleanneſs, he Ordains, that thoſe deteſtable Perſons ſhall be ſeparated not only from the Aſſemblies of the Church, but alſo from the Society of Monks, and that being ſhut up in Priſon, they ſhall bewail their Sin all the remainder of their Life, that ſo they may be capable of deſerving the Communion of the Church at the Hour of Death. Siricius.

After this, he ſpeaks in the 7th. Canon againſt thoſe Perſons who being in Orders do not obſerve Celibacy. And he declares, that if for the future any Biſhop, Prieſt, or Deacon ſhall not continue unmarried, he is to hope for no more pardon, becauſe it was neceſſary to cut off with the Knife thoſe Sores that could not be cured by other Remedies.

The 8th. Canon is againſt thoſe who get themſelves Ordained after they have had ſeveral Wives.

In the Ninth, Siricius obſerves the ſeveral Degrees thro' which one muſt paſs before he arrives at the Prieſthood. He ſays, that he who devotes himſelf to the Service of the Church, ſhould be Baptized very young, and placed among the number of Readers; that if he behaves himſelf diſcreetly till he be 30 Years old, he may during that time be made an Acolyth and Sub-deacon, provided that he does not Marry above once, and then he does not Marry a Widow; that after he ſhall be ordained Deacon, if he obliges himſelf to live unmarried; Five Years after the Order of Prieſthood may be conferred upon him; and that in fine at the end of Ten Years, he may be made Biſhop. Thus Siricius diſpoſes of their time, who are deſigned for the Clergy, from the Firſt Years, of their Life: But for thoſe that would enter into Holy Orders when they are already come to Years, he ſays, in the Tenth Canon, that immediately after their Baptiſm, they ſhould be placed in the Rank of Readers or Exoriſts, and Two Years after they ſhould be made Acolyths and Subdeacons, at the end of Five Years Deacons, and ſome time after Prieſts, and afterwards Biſhops, if the People and the Clergy ſhould chuſe them. Theſe Rules are very fine in ſpeculation, but it was never ſeen that they were exactly obſerved, and indeed it had been very difficult to do it.

In the 7th. he declares, That every Clergyman who ſhall marry a Second Wife or a Widow, ſhall be turned out of Holy Orders, and reduced to Lay-Communion.

In the 12th. he obſerves, that no other Women muſt be ſuffered to dwell with the Clergy, but thoſe whom the Council of Nice has allowed.

In the 13th. he ſpeaks of the Ordination of Monks. 'We wiſh, ſays he, and deſire, that thoſe among the Monks 'who are recommended by the Holineſs of their Lives

'and Siricius.

'and the Purity of their Faith, may enter into the Clergy, 'upon condition that they pass thro' the Inferior Orders, 'that they be not Ordained Deacons or Priests till they 'come to a good Age, and that they do not ascend all of the 'sudden into the Episcopal Chair, but only after they have 'continued the time prescribed in each of the sacred Orders.

In the 14*th.* he says, that as a Clergyman is not permitted to do publick Penance, so neither should a Lay-man be allowed, after he has done publick Penance, to enter into the Clergy. At last, he ordains in the last Canon, that considering the greater part excuse themselves as not knowing these Laws, that their Ignorance be pardoned; but upon condition that the Penitents and Bigamists who have been Ordained, shall continue in that Order wherein they are, without being capable of ascending higher. He concludes these Canons with threatning the Condemnation of the holy See to all Metropolitans who did not observe these Laws; and ends his whole Letter with exhorting Himerius, to observe the Canons and the Holy Decrees, and to publish them in Spain.

The second Letter of Pope Siricius furnishes us with a good Example of the antient Manner of Judging used by the Holy Apostolick See: There he acquaints the Church of Milan, that having assembled all his Clergy, he had condemned Jovinian and his Followers, with the Advice and Consent of the Priests, Deacons, and all the Clergy. Omnium nostrum, tam Presbyterorum & Diaconorum, quam etiam totius Cleri una sententia.

The third Letter of the Pope Siricius is addressed to all the Orthodox; he exhorts them to observe the Canons of the Council of Nice in the Election of Bishops; he recommends to them, not to give Bishopricks to Persons unknown, nor to Novices, nor to Lay-men, but to Clergy-men, whose Life was unblameable.

The fourth Letter of Siricius which is addressed to the Bishops of Africa, is suspected of Forgery by the most able Criticks, who prove it by very strong Conjectures (a), and it contains nothing remarkable. Siricius.

The last Letter written to Anysius of Thessalonica, and other Bishops of Illyricum, was for a long time attributed to St. Ambrose, tho' he speaks there of this Father in the third Person, and was restored to Siricius by Holstenius. The Bishops to whom he writes had consulted him about the Cause of Bonosus, who was accused of saying rashly, That the Virgin Mary had Children. Siricius answers Anysius and those Bishops, that the Synod of Capua having ordained that the neighbouring Bishops to Bonosus, and chiefly those of Macedonia, should take cognizance of the Charge that was drawn up against him, it did no longer belong to him to judge of this Cause; that it belonged to them to whom this Judgment was committed to give their Sentence, and that neither the Accused, nor the Accusers could avoid it; That the Synod of Capua having chosen them to judge it, the Judgment which they should give was to be looked upon as the Judgment of the Council; That Bonosus having consulted St. Ambrose, whether he could be re-admitted to his Church, he had answered him that he must attempt nothing unseasonably; but must wait for the Judgment of those to whom the Synod of Capua had given Authority to determine this Affair: Yet in the following part of this Letter he does not omit to acquaint them with his Thoughts of this Question, and to refute the Opinion of Bonosus; but he does it as a private Doctor, and not as a Judge; declaring at the End of this Letter, that he waited for their Judgment upon this Affair, that he might follow it as his Rule. This is a very authentick Testimony of the Reverence which the antient Popes had for the Decisions of Councils.

(a) By very strong Conjectures.] Blondel had before rejected this Letter, but with some Doubt, and without giving any convincing Reason; but Monsieur Quesnel has perfectly destroyed the Credit of it, by sapping the Foundation upon which it was built, which was the Council of Telepta, wherein this Letter is quoted, and by alledging many new Conjectures against this Letter. These that follow are the chief. 1. The first Canon of this Letter has no Sense in whatever manner it be read or explained; for according to some it must be read, ut sine Conscientia sedis Apostolicæ Primatis, nemo audeat ordinare, according to others, ut extra Conscientiam sedis Apostolicæ, i. e. Primatis, nemo audeat ordinare. The first is ridiculous; first, because the Popes never pretended to take Cognizance of the Ordinations of all the Metropolitans. Secondly, because in Africk there was but one Primate only, all the other Ecclesiastical Metropolitans were the most antient Bishops of the Province. The Second is equally ridiculous: For what Probability is there, that a Pope should give to all the Metropolitan Churches the Title of the Apostolick See, which Pope Leo in Ep. 78. said could not be granted to the Bishop of Constantinople? Secondly this Letter is copied from that of Innocent to Victricius. Thirdly, the Author of this Letter says impertinently, that the Bishops of Africk would have come to the Synod of Rome, if they had not been hindered by Old Age or Sickness from coming thither. Fourthly, he makes Siricius speak to the Africans with too much Authority. Fifthly, he only advises Priests and Deacons to Celibacy, as a thing that they were not obliged to; whereas 'tis certain that Siricius looked upon it as an indispensable Law. Sixthly, what this Author has not copied from the Letter of St. Innocent is barbarous and ill-turned. Seventhly, the Subscription of this Letter is singular, Data Romæ in Concilio Episcoporum 80. This is always put at the Beginning, and never at the End of Synodical Letters. In fine, this Letter was never quoted in the African Councils, which have treated of the Continency of the Clergy, no more than that Council of Telepta, wherein it is pretended that it was quoted. 'Tis true that Ferrandus the Deacon has inserted the Canons of this Council, as well as those of this Letter, into his Collection; but he may be mistaken as Father Quesnel proves in this Dissertation, which is the 15*th.* of his Learned Dissertations upon St. Leo.

SABINUS.

Sabinus.

Sabinus Bishop of the Macedonians at Heraclea in Thracia, lived about the end of the reign of Theodosius the Great. He collected together the Acts of several Councils of the Fourth Century, which Socrates quotes several times (a), though he wrote very spitefully against the Church, yet his Memoirs had been very useful for clearing up the History of the Councils of that time, if they had come to our hands. Sabinus.

AMBROSE of Alexandria.

Ambrose of Alexandria.

ST. Jerome speaks of this Author in his Catalogue of Ecclesiastical Writers after this manner: 'Ambrose 'of Alexandria, the Scholar of Didymus, wrote a 'great Dogmatical Treatise against Apollinarius, and 'Commentaries upon Job, of which some spoke to me not 'long ago: This Author is still alive;' which shews that he died not 'till after the Year 392. And this is all that we have to say of this Author. Ambrose of Alexandria.

THEOTIMUS.

Theotimus.

Theotimus Bishop of Tomi in Scythia, has written, according to the Testimony of the same St. Jerome, short and sententious Tracts by way of Dialogue, according to the antient manner of Writing. This Bishop was one of the Defenders of St. Chrysostome. He was present at Constantinople when St. Epiphanius came thither, and spoke to him briefly in Defence of Origen's Books. Socrates produces his Words Ch. 12. of B. VI. of his History. Sozomen commends him Ch. 26. of B. VI. of his History, and mentions some Miracles which he wrought. Theotimus.

EVAGRIUS of Antioch.

Evagrius of Antioch.

ST. Jerome assures us that Evagrius, who was Ordained in 386, Bishop of Paulinus's Party at Antioch, was a Man of a brisk and fervent Spirit; that when he was Priest, he wrote many Treatises upon different Subjects which he had read to himself, but that they had not yet seen the Light; and that he had translated into Latin the Life of St. Anthony written by St. Athanasius. This shews, that they are to blame, who attribute the Translation of this Life to St. Jerome. This Author died in the Year 393. Evagrius of Antioch.

St. AMBROSE Biſhop of Milan.

St. Ambroſe.

THE Father of St. Ambroſe was Prætorian Præfect of Gaul when this Saint was born, which was about the Year 340 (a), and was nurſed in his Father's Palace (b). 'Tis reported, that while he was ſleeping one day with his Mouth open in the Court of this Palace, a Swarm of Bees came and flew about his Cradle, and having many times crept in and out to reſt themſelves upon his Mouth, at laſt they mounted up into the Air ſo high, till they quite vaniſhed out of ſight; which was looked upon by his Father as a Prodigy, and a Preſage of the future Greatneſs of this Infant. Prophane Antiquity relates the ſame thing of Plato, and affirms, That it was a Preſage of the Sweetneſs of his Eloquence; but there is more reaſon to believe what the Author of the Life of our Saint ſays, That this Swarm of Bees formed thoſe Honey-combs in his Mouth, which ſhould One Day make us reliſh the Sweetneſs of Heavenly Gifts, and raiſe our Hearts up to Heaven.

The Father of St. Ambroſe dying ſometime after, his Widow left Gaul, whither ſhe was come to dwell only upon the Account of her Husband's Office, and returned to Rome which was their Country. Thither ſhe carried St. Ambroſe who was yet very Young, together with Marcellina his Siſter, and Satyrus his Eldeſt Brother; and ſhe took ſpecial Care of the Education of her Children. Her Daughter profeſſed Virginity, and received the Veil from the Hands of Pope Liberius; St. Ambroſe profited very much by the Domeſtick Examples of the Piety and Virtue of his Mother, his Siſter, and the Virgins that were with them; they inſpired into him from his tender Youth, the love of Virtue, and ſecured him from the Corruptions of the Age, and he joyned Learning to his Piety. His Works diſcover how vigorouſly he applied himſelf to human Learning. Having finiſhed his Studies, he acquired by his Merits the Friendſhip of Anicius Probus, and Symmachus, two very Honeſt and Learned Men, tho' of different Religions. The firſt was the Prætorian Præfect of Italy, in whoſe Court St. Ambroſe pleaded Cauſes with ſo much renown, that Probus made choice of him to be his Aſſeſſor. Afterwards he made him Governor of Liguria and Emilia, that is, of all that Country, which comprehends at this Day, the Archbiſhopricks of Milan, Liguria, Turin, Genoa and Bologna. 'Tis reported that Probus ſaid to him at parting, Go thy way, and Govern more like a Biſhop than a Judge; which Words were a Prediction of what happened afterwards. For a little while after, Auxentius Biſhop of Milan, who was of the Arian Faction, being dead, the Biſhops of the Province of Italy aſſembled to place one in his room, according to the Orders of the Emperor Valentinian, who would not himſelf interpoſe in the Election; and upon this Occaſion there aroſe a great Contention among the People, becauſe the Arians and the Orthodox on each ſide, did all that lay in their Power to chooſe a Biſhop of their own Party. This Quarrel being like to raiſe a Tumult, St. Ambroſe thought it the Duty of his Office to come unto the Church and prevent it, whither being come, he made an Oration to the People with much Diſcretion and Mildneſs, exhorting them to proceed in their Choice with the Spirit of Peace and without Tumult. While he was yet ſpeaking, the People unanimouſly proclaimed him Biſhop of Milan. This unexpected Choice ſurprized him; he preſently withdrew, and made uſe of all the Artifices he could to ſhun this Biſhoprick. He aſcended the Bench of Juſtice, and affecting to ſeem cruel and unworthy of the Prieſthood, he cauſed the Criminals to be brought before him loaded with Chains, and commanded them to be racked with great ſeverity. This Artifice failing, he contrived another, by making Women of lewd Lives come into his Houſe. But the People perceiving all this to be affected, continued ſtill in their Choice: Whereupon he ſtole out of the City by Night, with a deſign to retire to Ticinum; but miſſing his way, he wandred up and down all Night, and found himſelf next Morning at the Gates of Milan. His Flight being known, a Guard was ſet about him, and a Relation of all that had paſs'd, was ſent to the Emperor: St. Ambroſe wrote alſo to him on his own behalf, that he might be excus'd from that Office. But the Emperor being wonderfully pleas'd with this Choice of the People, did not only confirm the Election, but gave Order to the Lieutenant of Italy to ſee the thing effectually done. In the mean time St. Ambroſe once more made his eſcape, and hid himſelf in the Houſe of one Leontius: But the Lieutenant of Italy having publiſhed the Order, againſt all thoſe that knew where he was, and did not diſcover him, Leontius by an Innocent kind of Treachery declared where he was, and then St. Ambroſe finding it was in vain to reſiſt any longer, was firſt baptized, and ſome time after made Biſhop of Milan, at the End of the year 374, or the beginning of 375 (c). Immediately after his Ordination he diſtributed to the Poor, or gave to the Church all the Money that he had. He ſettled his Lands alſo upon the Church, reſerving only the Profits of them for Life. He committed the Care of his Affairs to his Brother Satyrus, who being gone to Rome by Sea in purſuit of a Man who had unjuſtly poſſeſs'd himſelf of ſome part of their Eſtate, was like to have periſhed in a Shipwrack; which made him reſolve to be baptized: Nevertheleſs he eſcaped the danger and return-

St. Ambroſe.

(a) About the Year 340.] The Date of St. Ambroſe's Birth, depends upon the Date of that Letter which was formerly the 32*d*. and is now the 60*th*. addreſſed to Severus; for there he ſays, that he was 53 years old, and that he wrote in a time of War. Tot abjecti barbaricis moribus, & bellorum procellis, in medio verſamur omnium moleſtiarum freto. This may relate either to the War of Maximus, in 387, or to that of Eugenius in 393; if it refers to the firſt, he was born in 334, if to the ſecond, in 340. 'Tis hard to ſay whether it refers to the one or to the other.

(b) Was Nurs'd in his Father's Palace.] Paulinus the Author of St. Ambroſe's Life ſays plainly, that he was born in his Father's Palace, who was then the Prætorian Præfect of Gaul. Poſito in adminiſtratione præfecturæ Galliarum Patre ejus Ambroſio natus eſt Ambroſius, qui infans in Area Prætoris in Cunabulis poſitus, &c. This plainly enough diſcovers the place of his Birth and Education, for the Dwelling-Houſe and Palace of the Præfect of the Gauls was certainly in Gaul: 'Tis true that the ſame Paulinus ſpeaking afterwards of St. Ambroſe's Journey to Rome, ſays, that he went to his own Country, proprium ſolum, and that St. Baſil writing to St. Ambroſe, ſays, he was of the Imperial City: But on theſe Occaſions, the Place of his Parents abode, the Origin of the Family, and the common Reſidence of St. Ambroſe, was conſidered as the Place of his Country. And indeed ſo it was according to the Roman Laws; and the Children born in a Place where their Parents were by chance about their Affairs, were eſteemed to be of that Place, which was the ordinary Reſidence of their Fathers and Mothers. See L. retro. ff. de captiv. & L. filios C. de municip. & L. cives C. de incolis. 'Tis more difficult to Aſſign preciſely that City of the Gauls, where the Prætorian Præfect then reſided, which is not certainly known. Some are of Opinion that it was at Triers, which St. Athanaſius and Theodoret call the Metropolis of Gaul, as Milan was the Metropolis of Italy: For the Reſidence of the Prætorian Præfect of Italy was at Milan. Ammian. Marcellinus calls the City of Triers, the Dwelling-Place of Princes; to which we may add, the Praiſes which many Authors have given of this City; but this proves nothing. In the time of the Tyrant Maximus, Evodius the Prætorian Præfect of the Gauls Reſided at Triers, as appears by the Hiſtory of the Priſcillianiſts related by Sulpitius Severus. But it does not follow from hence, that this City was the Ordinary Reſidence of others, becauſe that Maximus a Tyrant, who was newly raiſed to the Empire, dwelt at Triers. Some have thought that the ordinary Reſidence of the Prætorian Præfect of the Gauls was at Arles. The Conjectures for this Opinion are theſe, that the Emperor Conſtantine reſided in this City, that he honoured it with many Privileges, and particularly to be the Place for the meeting of a Council; that there is a Law of Honorius and Theodoſius, which Ordains that every year an Aſſembly of the Seven Provinces ſhould be held in the City of Arles, in the preſence of the Præfect, ſub illuſtri præſentia Præfecturæ; that Agricolaus the Prætorian Præfect of the Gauls, to whom this Law was addreſs'd, received it at Arles; That in the Petition which thoſe Countries preſented to the Pope Leo, they eſtabliſh the Dignity of the Eccleſiaſtical Metropolis of Arles upon the Privileges which had been granted to this City by Valentinian and Honorius, which made it be looked upon as the Mother of all the other Cities, and upon the Honour which it had to ſerve for the Reſidence of the Prætorian Præfect. 'Tis added, that Honoratus writes in the Life of Hilary of Arles, that the Prætorian Præfect came to ſee this Biſhop when he was reduced to Extremity; that St. Proſper in his Chronicle ſpeaks of a Prætorian Præfect called Exuperantius, who reſided at Arles; that Liberius Prætorian Præfect of Gaul, who confirmed the Second Council of Orange, dwelt at Arles; that Fauſtus Rhedonenſis writing to Felix the Præfect of Gaul, ſays, that he reſided in a City where he profited by the Inſtructions of Eonius, and this Man was Biſhop of Arles. All theſe Proofs plainly ſhew, that in the Fifth Age the ordinary Reſidence of the Prætorian Præfects of Gaul was in the City of Arles; but they do not prove, that it was alſo in the time of St. Ambroſe. One may rather believe, that it was the City of Lyons, which at firſt was the ordinary Reſidence of the Prætorian Præfect of Gaul. For, Firſt, This City was looked upon as the Chief City of Gaul. Secondly, Strabo aſſures us, that the Præfects and Governors of Gaul commonly reſided there, and coyned Money there of Gold and Silver: Now there is no probability, neither is there any Proof that Conſtantine changed this Cuſtom in favour of the City of Arles: And therefore there is nothing very certain upon this Subject.

(c) Ordained Biſhop of Milan about the Year 374, or 375.] In Euſebius's Chronicon, his Ordination is placed in the year 375. But ſince it is certain that Valentinian died November 10*th*. 375. and that his Ordination was made the 10*th*. of December under this Emperor, we muſt of neceſſity place it in the preceding year.

St. Ambroſe.

ed ſafe to Milan, where he died in 379. Thus St. Ambroſe having renounced all Care of Secular Affairs, applyed himſelf wholly to the worthy diſcharge of his Epiſcopal Function. Tho' he was but newly baptized, and never had time to Study Religion before his Ordination, yet by his great Induſtry he attained to that Perfection, that at the ſame time he both learned and taught the Truths of the Chriſtian Religion. He did every Day celebrate the Holy Myſteries; there paſs'd not a Sunday but he preached to his People. He hearkened to all Men with Meekneſs and Charity, he relieved the Poor, he comforted the Afflicted, ſo that all his People loved and admired him. He applied himſelf vigorouſly to root out the remnants of Arianiſm that were yet in the Church of Milan. He convicted Secundianus and Palladius, and procured their Condemnation in the Council of Aquileia held in the year 381. The Death of Gratian changed the face of Affairs in the Weſtern Empire. The Tyrant Maximus who had put him to Death, having Uſurped Gaul, was become formidable to all Italy. It was feared that he would paſs the Alps, and carry Italy by force from Valentinian the younger, who was then but twelve or thirteen years Old. St. Ambroſe was ſent Embaſſador to this Tyrant in the year 384, and by his Prudence and Boldneſs diverted his Deſign of paſſing then into Italy. The Empreſs Juſtina, Mother to Valentinian, who was an Arian, having a Deſign to reſtore Arianiſm after its Extirpation in the Church of Milan, did at firſt deſire of St. Ambroſe, one of the Churches called the Portian Church, which St. Ambroſe refus'd to grant her; and ſo great was the Aſſembly of the People round about the Palace, that ſhe was forced to leave St. Ambroſe in the Poſſeſſion of his Church, and to entreat him alſo to appeaſe the People. Sometime after the Empreſs ſent to him to demand in the Emperor's Name, not only that Church, but alſo the New-Church. Our Saint oppoſed them with wonderful Boldneſs, and anſwered them with ſuch a fearleſs Courage, as aſtoniſhed the Perſons who brought the Emperor's Orders to him. This happened at the Beginning of the year 385. On Palm-Sunday in the ſame year, Officers were ſent to ſeize upon the Portian-Church, when St. Ambroſe was Officiating in the New-Church. This irritated the People, who run to that Church, and having apprehended one Caſtulus an Arian Prieſt, would have made a Riot, if St. Ambroſe had not ſent ſome Prieſts and Deacons to appeaſe them. The Emperor cauſed many of the Seditious to be Arreſted and ſent armed Soldiers to take Poſſeſſion of the Church, which for all that was not put in Execution. On Wedneſday in Paſſion Week the Soldiers were ſent to ſeize upon the New-Church, but the People flocking thither in great Multitudes, the Soldiers never entred it; but the People within it ſpent the whole Night and Day, in ſinging of Pſalms; and the next day after, the Emperor being prevailed upon by the Boldneſs and Wiſdom of St. Ambroſe's Carriage, who had put a ſtop to the Sedition, and yet had yielded nothing of what was demanded of him, ordered the Soldiers who Surrounded the Church to retire.

In the year following the Perſecution was renewed againſt the Catholicks and St. Ambroſe, by an Edict of the Emperor in favour of the Council of Ariminum. A deſign alſo was laid to take from the Catholicks the Portian-Church. Orders were given to apprehend St. Ambroſe and ſend him into baniſhment; but he was ſtill ſecured by the Affection of the People of Milan, who Guarded him in his Church, where he ſpent many Days and Nights in ſinging Pſalms and Hymns continually with his People. He was challenged to Diſpute in the Palace with Auxentius the Arian Biſhop; but he refuſed to do it, becauſe Lay-men and Pagans were choſen to be Judges of their Conference. He offered to refer the Difference to the Judgment of a Council, tho' it was not reaſonable to trouble the Peace of the Church for one Man only, nor to call that in Queſtion which had been already determined. After this he ſpoke an Oration againſt Auxentius, which provoked the Empreſs Juſtina yet more againſt him: But at laſt ſhe gave over the further Perſecution of this Biſhop, ſeeing it was to no purpoſe, becauſe his own Wiſdom and Courage, and the Affections of his People, covered him from all her Deſigns. 'Tis believed, that the Diſcovery of the Relicks of St. Gervaſius and St. Proteſius, and the Miracles that were then done by them, contributed to the Peace of the Church. But 'tis very probable that the true Reaſon which hindered Juſtina and Valentinian from puſhing things to extremity, was the State of the Affairs of the Empire at that time. Maximus had prepared to paſs over into Italy, a Sedition was alſo to be feared in this Juncture, and they ſtood in need of St. Ambroſe. In effect, the Emperor found no Perſon fitter than he to treat with Maximus, whom he ſent Embaſſador to this Tyrant, who reſided at Triers: St. Ambroſe ſpoke to him with much boldneſs, but he could obtain nothing of him; on the contrary, this Tyrant marched immediately into Italy; and thereby made himſelf Maſter of all the Weſtern Empire, ſo that Valentinian was forced to retire into the Eaſt, and deſire Aid of Theodoſius, who re-eſtabliſhed him, after he had defeated, taken and beheaded Maximus. This Revolution happened in 387. St. Ambroſe continued during this time in his Biſhoprick. When Theodoſius came into the Weſt, he ſhewed no leſs Courage with reference to him, than before he had done to Valentinian. He oppoſed the reeſtabliſhment of the Jewiſh Synagogue, which Theodoſius would have done, and of the Altar of Victory, which Symmachus had already endeavoured in vain to reſtore becauſe of the Oppoſition of St. Ambroſe. 'Tis well enough known, with what freedom he reproved the Emperor Theodoſius for the Maſſacre at Theſſalonica which he gave a Warrant for putting in Execution, and after what manner he obliged him to do publick Penance for it. The Death of Valentinian and the Advancement of Eugenius for ſome time diſturbed the Repoſe of St. Ambroſe. He was obliged to retire from Milan in the year 393, but he returned in the year 394, and finiſhed his Courſe as he had begun it. He died in the year 396, aged 57 years.

St. Ambroſe.

The Works of St. Ambroſe above all the other Fathers have been moſt corrupted in the ordinary Editions. The Roman Edition from which thoſe that followed after were made, inſtead of reſtoring the Text of this Father, hath rendered it more faulty in many places, by the Liberty which the Superviſors of that Edition took, of making Alterations in it by their own Authority. In this Edition the Works were in great Confuſion, without Order, and without any Diſtinction of what were genuine, and what were ſuppoſititious; which induced the Benedictins of the Abby of St. Germain de Prez to undertake a New Edition of this Father's Works, wherein they have reſtored the Text from many Manuſcripts; and ranged the Diſcourſes in very good Order. In it they are divided into Two Volumes. The firſt which is already publiſhed, contains the Treatiſes of St. Ambroſe upon the Scripture. The ſecond which will quickly come forth, and which they have allowed me to make uſe of, contains the other Works of this Father. The firſt begins with the Treatiſe upon the Creation of the World, compoſed of Nine Diſcourſes of St. Ambroſe to his People, preached in one of the laſt Weeks of Lent. 'Tis probable, that he reduced them afterwards into the Form of a Treatiſe. 'Tis divided into ſix Books, which anſwer to the ſix Days of the Creation. This Work contains many Queſtions of Controverſy, and many moral and myſtical Conſiderations upon the Text of the Bible. There are many of them, particularly in the laſt Books which are very extraordinary, and far-fetched. St. Ambroſe made this Treatiſe about the year 389. He has imitated St. Baſil in it, whoſe Method he followed, and he has taken many things from him, as alſo from Hippolitus and Origen.

The Treatiſe of Paradiſe is one of the firſt Books of St. Ambroſe. He wrote it, as he ſays in his Letter to Sabinus, ſoon after he was made Biſhop. He does not dive very deep into the Hiſtorical Queſtions which may be made upon this Subject, but for the moſt part acquieſces in the Allegorical Explications, which he draws out of Philo and other Authors, or which he invents himſelf: There he refutes the Hereticks of Apelles's Sect, and occaſionally ſpeaks againſt the Jews.

St. Ambroſe continues the Explication of the Text of Geneſis in the Treatiſe of the Hiſtory of Abel and Cain, upon which he makes abundance of long Allegories, wherewith he intermixes ſome moral thoughts. He enlarges particularly upon the Sacrifices of theſe two Brethren. Upon the occaſion of the Saying that the Blood of Abel cries, he ſays, That God hears the Juſt even after their Death, becauſe they are even then Living before God and enjoy Eternal Light.

The Hiſtory of the Deluge and the Life of Noah, furniſhed St. Ambroſe with very fit Matter for the Continuation of his myſtical and moral Explications. This is the Subject of the Book of the Ark and of Noah, or of the Ark of Noah, as St. Auſtin calls it. This Treatiſe is not perfect, for St. Auſtin quotes a Paſſage out of it, which is not to be found there now.

There are two Books of St. Ambroſe upon the Life of Abraham. In the firſt he deſcribes the Life and Actions of this Patriarch, and repreſents his Submiſſion to the Will of God, and his other Virtues. In the ſecond Book he diſcourſes on the firſt Actions of this Patriarch, to draw from them a more ſublime and ſpiritual Senſe, by applying them to the different Degrees of a ſpiritual Life, and to the ways by which we tend to Perfection.

He treats alſo of the ſame Subject, tho' in a more compendious way, in the Book of Iſaac and the Soul, where he explains the Union of the Soul with the Word, which was figured by the Marriage of Iſaac and Rebecca. There he diſtinguiſhes four Degrees thro' which the Soul muſt paſs, that it may be delivered from all earthly Affections, and arrive at a State of perfect Union with God. By this Union he explains the Canticles, on which he makes a kind of a myſtical Paraphraſe, and therefore this Treatiſe may paſs for a Commentary upon this Book of Scripture.

St. Ambroſe having diſcourſed of the Soul at the End of the preceding Treatiſe, found himſelf inſenſibly engaged to treat of Death in the following Book. 'Tis entituled, Of the Benefits or Advantages of Death. There St. Ambroſe firſt diſtinguiſhes three kinds of Death, the Death of Sin which kills the Soul, the myſtical Death by which we die to Sin, and the natural Death by which the Soul is ſeparated from the Body. All the World conſiders the firſt as a great Miſery, and the ſecond as a great Happineſs; but their Opinions are divided about the laſt: Some wiſh for it as a great Advantage, and others dread it as a great Puniſhment. St. Ambroſe declares for thoſe who hold it to be a great Benefit, he makes the Advantages of it appear, and oppoſes to them the Troubles of this preſent Life from which Death delivers us. He exhorts Chriſtians, not to ſet their Affections upon this Life nor the Pleaſures of this World; he makes them ſenſible of the Bitterneſs which accompanies them; he repreſents the Dangers to which we are continually expoſed, the Temptations to which we are ſubject in all ſorts of Occurrences, and the Sins into which we fall every moment: Afterwards he diſcourſes of the State of departed Souls; he ſuppoſes that 'till the Day of Judgment, they are in Places or Habitations, where they expect Eternal Glory or Damnation, tho' they enjoy already by Anticipation ſome kind of Happineſs or Miſery. All Souls wait, ſays he, for what they have deſerved; ſome expect Damnation and others Glory; but in this waiting, the former are not without Pain, nor the latter without ſome Reward. St. Ambroſe inſiſts particularly upon the Joy which the latter enjoy, and diſtinguiſhes ſeven Degrees of their Happineſs, whereof the laſt is to rejoyce in the Aſſurance they have of ſeeing God face to face. He concludes with exhorting the Faithful to die without Fear. 'Let us go on, ſays he, without Fear 'in the way to Jeſus Chriſt; Let us march without Anxi-'ety to the Aſſembly of the Patriarchs and Saints; Let us 'enter with Confidence into Abraham's Boſom. Yes, O 'Holy Patriarch, open to us your Boſom, extend your 'Arms to theſe poor Faithful. Jeſus is gone before us to 'prepare Habitations, where we are to be received; he promiſed to do it before we asked it of him. We deſire to 'follow thee, O Lord, but call thou us unto thee, that 'ſo we may effectually follow thee, becauſe without thee, 'no Man can aſcend unto thee. Thou art the Way, the 'Truth and the Life, thou giveſt us the Power, the Faith, 'and the Reward; receive us, ſince thou art the Way; 'confirm us ſince thou art the Truth; grant us Life, ſince 'thou art the Author of Life; make us to enjoy that good 'thing which David deſired; ſhew us that Eternal, that Im-'mutable Bliſs, which we ſhall enjoy for all Eternity.' This Treatiſe of St. Ambroſe has another ſort of a Reliſh than the foregoing; 'tis full of uſeful and ſolid Reflections, and of juſt and natural Reaſonings. He founds all that he ſays upon Paſſages of the Holy Scripture, which he applies very pertinently and very naturally. He builds very much upon the Fourth Book of Eſdras which he cites as Canonical. This Treatiſe was written about the year 387. The Book Of forſaking the World was written ſoon after this, of which we have already ſpoken: The Title of it ſufficiently diſcovers the Subject. There St. Ambroſe makes uſe of ſeveral Allegories taken out of the Old Teſtament, to exhort the Faithful to flee from this World, that they may be wholly united to God.

The Books of Jacob and a Happy Life, treat of the Happineſs of the Righteous. In the firſt, he diſcovers the means of arriving at Happineſs; the chief whereof is, to follow the Light of right Reaſon, which can command our Paſſions, and repreſs the Motions of Luſt: For tho' we cannot wholly extinguiſh our Paſſions, yet we may reſtrain their Violence by practiſing the Virtue of Moderation; for he maintains that we do Good or Evil freely. Jeſus Chriſt, he ſays, will have none for his Servants which are not free, and the Devil has none for Slaves, but thoſe that are voluntarily ſold to him by their Sins. But becauſe of Man's Weakneſs the Divine Aſſiſtance is neceſſary. The Law which God has given him does clearly diſcover to him his Sins; but it has not ſufficient Virtue to deliver him from Sin and Death; there is nothing but Grace could ſet us at Liberty, which Jeſus Chriſt by his Death hath merited for all Men. This Grace is ſo powerful, that provided we be willing to follow its Motions, nothing ſhall ever be able to ſeparate us from Jeſus Chriſt. Whatever befals us we ſhall be happy; a juſt Man is above all the Miſeries of this Life; 'tis true indeed, he ſuffers Loſſes, Afflictions, Diſeaſes, Pains, Captivity, &c. but he does not think himſelf leſs happy for being ſubject to theſe Accidents. There is nothing wanting to him that poſſeſſes Virtue; he fears nothing, he hopes nothing, he deſires nothing; tho' he be weak he is ſtrong enough; tho' he appear to be poor, he is rich; tho' he is deſpiſed, he believes himſelf the more honoured; tho' he is alone, yet he is not forſaken; whatſoever Diſeaſe he has, he enjoys a perfect Health.

Theſe Maxims are confirmed in the ſecond Book by the Example of Jacob. St. Ambroſe there deſcribes the Life and Actions of this Patriarch, and ſhews that the Afflictions and Croſſes which befel him did not hinder him from being happy. He concludes with the Example of Eleazar and the Maccabees, on whom he makes a very lively and eloquent Panegyrick.

After he has diſcourſed of the Patriarchs Abraham, Iſaac and Jacob, and treated, as he ſays himſelf, Of Submiſſion to the Will of God, upon the occaſion of Abraham, of Purity of Spirit from Iſaac, of Patience under Miſeries from the Hiſtory of Jacob; he treats of Chaſtity in explaining the Hiſtory of Joſeph, who has given an illuſtrious Example of the practice of this Virtue in reſiſting the Sollicitations of Potiphar's Wife. This Action of Joſeph is ſo much the more glorious, by how much the Charms of this Woman were harder to be overcome; which St. Ambroſe ſtudies to ſet off to the beſt Advantage, that the Virtue of Joſeph may the better appear. After this he purſues the Hiſtory of this Patriarch, and diſcourſes of all the Circumſtances of his Life, which he refers to Jeſus Chriſt, of whom Joſeph was a Figure. He lays open this myſtical Senſe with much Art and Probability, by comparing what is ſaid of Joſeph in Geneſis, with what is ſaid of Jeſus Chriſt in the Goſpel.

St. Ambroſe.

The Commentary upon the Benedictions of the Patriarchs, follows naturally after the Book of the Life of Joſeph. St. Ambroſe there gives Myſtical Senſes to the Bleſſings, which Jacob, when he was dying gave to his Children, and refers the greateſt part of them to Jeſus Chriſt. This Book and the preceding are Sermons Preached by St. Ambroſe at Milan about the Year 387, which he afterwards reduced into a Treatiſe.

The Book of Elias and of Faſting, contains many Sermons Preached at Milan in Lent. Having formerly ſpoken of the actions of Elias upon other Occaſions, he here enlarges upon the Morals of them. The Perſon of whom, and the Time when he Preached do both conſpire to invite him to treat of Faſting; and ſo this is the ſubject of the Firſt and Principal Part of this Work. He maintains that Faſting is a Duty as old as the World, and Pretends that the Law by which God forbid Adam to Eat of the Tree of Life, was a kind of command for Faſting. He alledges afterwards the Examples of Noah, Abraham, Moſes, Eliſha, Daniel and many others to Authorize the Practice of Faſting. He diſcovers at laſt the advantages of it, and ſhews how Intemperance and Exceſs are pernicious and inconvenient. This leads him inſenſibly to diſcourſe againſt the Debauchery, the Drunkenneſs, and the other Diſorders of Mens Tables, which were very common in St. Ambroſe's Time: He adds, That theſe Exceſſes draw along with them all other Vices, and particularly the Deſire of gathering Riches, to furniſh the exceſſive Expences which were neceſſary to ſupport their Luxury. He exhorts Chriſtians to apply themſelves to God who is the Sovereign Phyſician of theſe Evils; and propoſes the Day of Judgment as a Diſſuaſive from theſe Exceſſes. Addreſſing himſelf afterwards to the Catechumens, he preſſes them to purifie themſelves from their Sins by receiving Baptiſm. He reproves thoſe ſharply who delay to receive this Sacrament, and exhorts them rather to imitate the forwardneſs of Abel than the Negligence of Cain. 'Tis eaſy to perceive, that this Treatiſe was Compoſed of many Pieces collected together. St. Ambroſe has taken a great Part of it out of St. Baſil, and in it there are many excellent Paſſages, and ſome things very remarkable about the Diſcipline of the Church. He ſays, in Ch. 10. that they prepared themſelves by Faſting to approach to the Holy Table, that they faſted at Milan, all the time of Lent, except Sundays and Saturdays; that on Eaſter-day the Faſt ended; that on that Day, thoſe among the Catechumens, who were called Elect, were Baptized; that they approached to the Altar, and received the Sacrament. In ſhort, St. Ambroſe in this Treatiſe gives very Lively and Moral Deſcriptions of the Exceſſes and Debauchery of his Age: One needs only read the 12*th*. and 13*th*. Chapters, to be poſſeſſed with a horror of them. Even the Women were given to Wine, and did many Actions unbecoming the Modeſty of their Sex, of which St. Ambroſe makes them aſhamed in Chap. 18.

The Treatiſe of Naboth and the Poor (for ſo it ought to be called, according to the Antient Manuſcripts, and according to the Cuſtom of St. Ambroſe) is a Diſcourſe full of Zeal againſt the Rich and Powerful who oppreſs the Poor, preached by St. Ambroſe upon the Hiſtory of the Oppreſſion of Naboth by King Ahab. This Saint there ſhews, that there are Ahabs and Naboths at all times. 'The 'Hiſtory of Naboth, ſays he, at the beginning of his Diſ-'courſe, is Antient, if we conſider the time wherein it 'was Tranſacted, but in Practice it happens daily; tempore 'vetus eſt, uſu quotidiana: For who is the Rich Man that 'does not deſire other Mens Goods? Is it not daily ſeen, 'that the Rich would take from the Poor the little Eſtate 'that they have, and drive them away from the Inheri-'tance of their Anceſtors? Where is there one found that 'is content with what he has? There has not been one 'Ahab only in the World, he is born in it every Day; 'there has not been one Naboth only killed, there are ſome 'ſuch every Day oppreſſed. Every Day the Poor are over-'whelmed, driven away, perſecuted, and reduced to die 'by Famine, by the Injuſtice of the Rich.' He declaims afterwards againſt this Barbarity, and ſhews the Rich, by the Example of Ahab, that they are more unhappy with all their Riches, than the moſt Miſerable and the moſt Poor in their Wants. He cries out againſt thoſe ſumptuous Feaſts and needleſs Expences which they make, by which they waſte the Blood and Subſtance of the Poor. Here he relates a frightful Story of a Rich Man, who to procure good Wine to his Table, forced a Poor Man to ſell his Son; and then he brings the Parable of the Rich Man mentioned in the Goſpel of St. Luke, Ch. 12. who purpoſed to pull down his Barns, that he might build larger, and ſhews from hence how far the Slavery, Blindneſs and Miſery of Rich Men extends. Afterwards he returns to his Hiſtory of Ahab, and having repreſented the horribleneſs of the Action of Ahab and Jezebel, he exhorts Rich Men not to imitate it, by teaching them the uſe they ought to make of their Riches, which is deſcribed in Pſalm 75. He concludes with this Remark, that God pardoned Ahab for this Crime, but this miſerable Man brought upon himſelf Deſtruction by new Crimes. 'Tis thought, that this Treatiſe was compoſed about the Year 395.

The Book of Tobit is chiefly written againſt Uſury, which St. Ambroſe condemns moſt ſeverely. There he Deſcribes the Miſeries to which Uſurers reduce the Poor, and the Artifices they uſe to enſnare young Heirs. Uſury according to him, is all that is received above the Principal. It is condemned by the Divine Law in the Old and New Teſtament: If it was permitted to the Iſraelites with reſpect to Strangers, it was only with reference to them whom they might lawfully kill. He refutes thoſe by Name who reſtrain the Prohibition of Uſury only to the Poor, and rejects the Reaſons of Intereſt which may be alledged to excuſe it. Eraſmus doubted whether this Book were St. Ambroſe's or no, but it was a doubt very ill grounded, for St. Auſtin cites it. It has St. Ambroſe's Stile, it contains his Doctrine, which is alſo to be found in ſhort, in his 23*d*. Letter to Vigilius, and it contains many paſſages tranſlated out of St. Baſil, according to the Cuſtom of St. Ambroſe. This Book was written about the Year 386.

The Four Books of the Interceſſion of Job and David, (that is of the Complaints which Job and David made for the Miſeries and Weakneſs of Mankind) are in this Edition replaced here in their natural Order. In the two Firſt Books he enlarges upon the Complaints contained in the Firſt Chapters of the Book of Job, and in the Pſalms, particularly in the 72*d*. and 42*d*. In the Two laſt he anſwers the Complaints of thoſe who tax Providence, becauſe the wicked are happy in this Life, and the Juſt miſerable. He proves that the Happineſs of the Wicked is not true Happineſs, and that the Calamities, Miſeries and Misfortunes of the Good, do not at all render them unhappy.

In the Book entituled the Apology of David, he ſaves the Honour of this Holy King, not by juſtifying his Crimes of Adultery and Murder which are uſed to render him odious; but by ſhewing, that he roſe again from his Fall by a quick and ſincere Repentance; that it was for our Inſtruction that God permitted him to fall into Sin, and that he made amends for his fault by a great number of good Actions. And therefore he explains the 5*th*. Pſalm, that it may ſerve as an Apology for this Holy King. Theſe Sermons were preached ſoon after the Death of Gratian, in the Year 385.

The Benedictines have placed here among theſe Works of St. Ambroſe which are Genuine, the Second Apology for David; but it is confeſſed in the Preface, that it has been queſtioned, and that there is reaſon for doing ſo: Indeed it is obſerved, that in all the Manuſcripts that have been ſeen, this Book goes under the Name of St. Ambroſe, and the Conjectures which ſome Criticks have alledged to ſhew its impoſture, are rejected. But then they find the Stile is different from St. Ambroſe's, and the Author uſes a different Verſion of Scripture, and ſometimes the Vulgar Latin, and he ſpeaks of Two ſorts of Wills and Operations in Jeſus Chriſt, in ſuch a manner as ſavours very much of the Times of the Monothelites. They add, that this Author only Copies and enlarges upon what St. Ambroſe had ſaid before. The Second Apology contains a great part of what is in the Firſt; And what probability is there that St. Ambroſe ſhould twice repeat the ſame thing? The Subject of both is the ſame. The Author undertakes to ſhew, that no Man ought to be offended with any thing that is related in Scripture; And that David fell into the Crimes of Murder and Adultery. His Defence is divided into three Parts. In the Firſt he ſhews that the Fall of David muſt be attributed to the Infirmity of Human Nature, and that his amendment was the effect of his Virtue. In the Second he ſays, that David fell to Inſtruct the Jews that they ſhould continue no longer in their blindneſs. In the laſt, Chriſtians are inſtructed in the Myſteries which are typifyed by David's Fall. The Author enlarges upon common Places, and employs part of his Diſcourſe in Refutation of the Hereticks, and chiefly of the Arians and Manichees. This Treatiſe is compoſed of popular Harangues.

The Expoſitions of ſome particular Pſalms, are not a formal Commentary upon them, but a Collection of Homilies upon the Pſalms Preached or compoſed upon ſeveral Occaſions. However it appears by the Preface to the Commentary upon the Firſt Pſalm, that St. Ambroſe had a Deſign to Expound all the Pſalms. The Homily upon the Firſt Pſalm was Preached about the Year 390, after the Inſtitution of Singing in the Church of Milan. The Explications of the 35*th*. and the Five following Pſalms are alſo a Collection of Homilies preached one after another about the Year 393. The Preface ſhews that it is a Collection of Sermons, and there are two or three Places in the Explication of Pſal. 36, which ſerve to Denote this Epocha. St. Ambroſe.

As to the Expoſition of Pſal. 43. he dictated it himſelf a little after his Death to his Deacon Paulinus, as he ſays, in the Life of his Maſter.

The Explications of Pſalms 45, 47, 48, 61, are ſeparate Homilies. In theſe Expoſitions St. Ambroſe follows the Text of the Septuagint, but he ſometimes takes notice of the differences of the Verſions of Thodotion, Symmachus and Aquila. Yet he does not confine himſelf to a literal Expoſition, but often gives Myſtical Senſes of them. Sometimes he lays down Principles of Morality, and upon certain Occaſions he oppoſes the Hereticks. In many places he copies from St. Baſil, and in others from Origen, ſome of whoſe Errors have crept into his Expoſitions.

The Work upon Pſalm 119. is a Collection of many Sermons, wherein St. Ambroſe rather confines himſelf to the Moral than the Spiritual Senſe; which gave him occaſion to reprove the Vices of ſome Perſons in his time, and he ſpares not even the Diſorders of the Clergy-men. He explains the Letters of the Hebrew Alphabet, which ſerve to diſtinguiſh the Parts of this Pſalm. But as he knew but little of Hebrew, ſo what he ſays about it is not very ſolid; and 'tis probable that he took his from the Etymologies of Philo, which were full of Faults as St. Jerome aſſures us. Theſe Sermons were preached about the Year 386, after the Diſcovery of the Relicks of St. Gervaſius and St. Protaſius. There are as many Sermons, as there are Letters of the Hebrew Alphabet which make the Diviſions of this Pſalm, each Sermon anſwers to a Section contained under each Letter. There he explains alſo part of the Canticles.

In the Commentary upon St. Luke, St. Ambroſe confines himſelf more cloſely to the Hiſtorical and Literal Senſe, than in his other Commentaries. In explaining the Text of St. Luke, he clears ſome of the other Goſpels, and reconciles the apparent Contradictions, which may occur between them. He obſerves in the Preface to this Work, that the Goſpel of St. John is more ſublime, but St. Luke follows the Order of Hiſtory more ſtrictly, and relates many more particulars. He adds, that St. Matthew is chiefly employed in deſcribing the Birth of Jeſus Chriſt, and informing Men of his Manners; that St. Mark dwells longer in the deſcription of his Strength and Power: That St. Luke repreſents him as a High-Prieſt and a Sacrifice; And that St. John inſiſts more than any other upon the Miracles of his Reſurrection. In the beginning of this Commentary he mentions the many Apochryphal Goſpels, as that of the Twelve, the Goſpel of St. Thomas, and that of St. Matthias, and aſſures us that the Church never received any but theſe Four Goſpels which were written by the Inſpiration of the Holy Spirit. Theſe are St. Ambroſe's general Remarks upon the Four Goſpels. It were too long to mention particularly all things that are in this Commentary. He confines himſelf for the moſt part, as we have already ſaid to the Letter and Hiſtory of the Goſpel, but yet he cannot refrain from having recourſe oft-times to the Myſtical Senſe, and draws from it Moral Precepts. Theſe are the Homilies which make up the Body of this Commentary, which is Divided into ten Books or Parts. He wrote it after the Perſecution of the Empreſs Juſtina about the Year 386.

This Tome ends with a Commentary upon the Canticles, extracted out of the Works of St. Ambroſe, collected by William Abbot of St. Thierry, who lived about the Year 1142. We have already obſerved that St. Ambroſe explained ſome conſiderable parts of it in many places. This gave occaſion to many Perſons to extract theſe Places, and make up a Commentary upon the Canticles. Cartorius caus'd one of his Collecting to be printed at Louvain in the Year 1558. Ten Years after Gillotius publiſhed another which is attributed to Demochares a Doctor of Paris, who probably did nothing elſe but augment one that was ſhorter, which is in a Manuſcript in the College of Navarr, and in another Manuſcript of the Abby of Vendoſme that is 600 Years old. Cheffletius had alſo a Manuſcript of it more antient by 200 Years, and he found it quoted by Florus Magiſter of Lyons, who lived about the Year 855, in a Commentary upon St. Paul, which was never printed. The Collection which is publiſhed here by the Benedictines, was never printed before. It is publiſhed from a Manuſcript by the ſame hand of William Abbot of St. Thierry, and afterwards Monk of Signi.

The Firſt Book contained in the ſecond Tome of St. Ambroſe's Works, is his excellent Treatiſe concerning the Office of Miniſters, or the Duties of Clergy-men. For tho' the name of Miniſters be cut out in the Roman Edition, and in thoſe that followed it; yet it is to be found in all the Manuſcripts; and 'tis plain by the Book it ſelf, that St. Ambroſe compos'd it for his Clergy. But tho' he addreſſes himſelf particularly to them, yet he does not forget to treat of the Duties of all Chriſtians, of which he makes a particular Application to the Clergy.

St. Ambroſe.

He had been ſeveral Years Biſhop when he compos'd this Work, for there he ſpeaks to the Clergy whom he had Choſen and Ordained himſelf: He muſt therefore have been Biſhop for ſome time, ſince he had already Ordained a conſiderable number of Clergy-men. He there takes notice, that he had endured ſeveral Shocks from the Civil Powers, becauſe he would not deliver up the Depoſita which were entruſted with the Church. He ſays, that two Perſons of whom he had a bad Opinion, had abjured the Catholick Faith in the time of the Arian Perſecution, Arianæ infeſtationis; which is to be underſtood of the Perſecution of the Empreſs Juſtina.

He ſays alſo, that he ſold the ſacred Veſſels to redeem Captives and Slaves, whoſe number was ſo great, that they would fill a whole Province.

This may have reference either to the War of Maximus in the year 387, or to the Inundation of the Barbarians, who having killed the Emperor Valens ravaged the Countries of Thrace and Illyricum, and came over into Italy, where they made a great number of Captives, which happened in the year 379. He ſpeaks alſo of a Famine which afflicted the City of Rome under Damaſus in the year 383.

Laſtly ſpeaking of a Depoſitum entruſted with the Biſhop of Pavia, he ſays, that the Emperor did all that he could to wreſt it out of the hands of this Biſhop, that he might give it to one of his Courtiers. And we find a Law of Valentinian publiſhed at Pavia, January the 2*d*. 386. All theſe Tranſactions do clearly demonſtrate, that the Books of Offices were not written by St. Ambroſe at the beginning of his Biſhoprick, and that 'tis very probable they were not written till about the year 390, or 391, when Peace was reſtored to the Church after the Death of the Tyrant Maximus. He followed and imitated in theſe three Books the Deſign and Method of Tully's Offices. He confirms thoſe good Maxims which this Orator had laid down, and corrects thoſe that are imperfect, refutes thoſe that are falſe, and adds ſeveral others which are infinitely more excellent, more pure, and more ſublime.

The firſt ſix Chapters of the firſt Book of St. Ambroſe's Offices, are a Preface to the whole Work, wherein he enquires, when and how it is ſeaſonable to ſpeak or to be Silent. The Biſhops are obliged by their Office to explain the Word of God; but they ought to diſcharge this Duty with Humility; they muſt learn by teaching, and that they may teach. This is what St. Ambroſe applies to himſelf. 'For, ſays he, being removed all of the ſudden from the 'Civil Bench, and from the Office of a Judge, that I might 'be promoted to the Prieſthood, I have taught what I had 'not then learned, and was obliged to Learn and Teach at 'the ſame time.' After this he diſcovers the Advantages of being Silent, and the Dangers to which a Man expoſes himſelf by ſpeaking; but yet he would not have Men always to continue in ſilence. On the contrary, he ſays, that it is uſeful and neceſſary to ſpeak, provided it be done with Humility and Moderation, provided that one weighs his Words in the balance of the Sanctuary, and does not follow the Motions of his Luſts, but Reaſon and Juſtice, and provided that he does not employ his Voice to retaliate Reproaches by Reproaches.

After this Preface he enters upon the Matter, and undertakes to treat of Offices. He affirms that this Name was not only in uſe among the Philoſophers, but that it is in the Holy Scripture. He quotes one ſingle Paſſage taken out of the Goſpel of St. Luke Ch. 1. P. 23. Where there is mention made of the Miniſtry of Zacharias, and he tranſlates the Greek Word by Office. This example does not prove very ſtrongly what he had affirmed. After this he gives two Etymologies of the Word Officium; the Firſt is ab efficiendo, quaſi efficium, and the Second ab officiendo. The Philoſophers diſtinguiſhed three ſorts of Offices, of Honeſty, of Profit, and of Pleaſure. St. Ambroſe ſays, that the Chriſtians know no other but that of Honeſty, cauſe they refer all to the Happineſs of Heaven, beeing perſuaded, that the Profits and Pleaſures of this Life, are neither true Profits nor true Pleaſures. And therefore he treats only of the Offices which have reference to Honeſty. He affirms that this Term of Honeſty and Decency was known to David before the Philoſophers uſed it; and for proof of this, he quotes Pſal. 64. 2. Praiſe becomes thee, O Lord, in Zion, Te decet hymnus, Deus, in Sion. He adds ſome Paſſages of St. Paul, where he ſpeaks of Decency and Honeſty. He affirms that Pythagoras followed David in impoſing the Law of Silence upon his Diſciples. But he puts a very great difference between their Precepts, in that Pythagoras wholly forbade his Scholars to ſpeak, whereas David teaches us to ſpeak with moderation, and to hold our Peace when it is convenient to do ſo. He diſtinguiſhes two ſorts of Offices, the leſs perfect which he calls medium, and the moſt perfect. He explains this by the Words of Jeſus Chriſt to the young Man, who ask'd him what he muſt do to inherit Eternal Life. Jeſus Chriſt anſwered him at firſt, Keep the Commandments, Do not commit Murder nor Adultery, &c. Theſe, ſays St. Ambroſe, are the leſs perfect Offices, to which there is ſtill ſomething wanting. Thoſe that are perfect are deſigned by what Jeſus Chriſt ſaid afterwards to the young Man, when he had anſwered him that he had obſerved all theſe things. If you would be perfect, go and ſell all your Goods, and give them to the Poor, and you ſhall have Treaſure in Heaven, and come and follow me. This gave occaſion to St. Ambroſe to recommend Alms-giving as one of the principal Duties of the Chriſtian Life.

St. Ambroſe.

Here he treats very largely of the Providence of God, and proves againſt the Philoſophers, that it extends to all Creatures. Why then do the Wicked here enjoy Plenty? this is the common Objection: to which St. Ambroſe anſwers, Firſt, that this Abundance does not make them happy in this Life, becauſe the remorſe of their Conſcience torments them.

He adds in the ſecond place, that we muſt not wonder, if the Wicked ſeem to be happy in this Life, and on the contrary the Good ſeem to be miſerable, becauſe this it not the Place of Reward or Puniſhment. That we muſt wait till the other Life, when every one ſhall receive according to his Works: that here we are in a place of Combate: that the Juſt are to endure continual Aſſaults, that they may obtain one day Reward of their Victory; whereas the Wicked here enjoy Repoſe who deſerve no Reward, after which ſhall follow the Puniſhments which their Sins deſerve. That in ſhort, God has granted to thoſe the good things and Advantages of this Life, that they might be without Excuſe in the Day of Judgment, for not obſerving the Commandments of God.

St. Ambroſe having thus eſtabliſhed theſe general Maxims, enters upon the particular conſideration of the Duties of every State.

He begins with thoſe which belong to young Men: He recommends to them above all things Shamefacedneſs and Modeſty; he gives a wonderful deſcription of this Virtue, and proves how neceſſary it is to Clergy-men. He ſays, that he had hindred one from entring into Holy Orders, becauſe his Countenance was not modeſt enough, and that he had forbid another to walk before him, becauſe he had too confident a Gate. He counſels them not to be preſent at Feaſts, and to ſhun the Converſation of Women; he recommends to them to ſtay at home, and to apply themſelves to the Duties of Piety which are agreeable to their Miniſtry. Afterwards he gives Precepts for reſtraining the Motions of Anger and of other Paſſions. He deſcribes the Diſcourſes of Clergy-men. He does not think it fit that they ſhould uſe Raillery. He gives them three Rules for the good Conduct of their Actions. The firſt is, to hold their Paſſions in ſubjection to Reaſon; the ſecond is to obſerve Moderation; the third is to do all things ſeaſonably and in order. He illuſtrates theſe Maxims by the Examples of many Saints in the Old Teſtament.

After he has laid down theſe general Rules, he diſcourſes of Virtues in particular, comparing the Idea's which Chriſtians have of them with thoſe which the Pagan Philoſophers had; and ſhews, that thoſe of the Chriſtians are much more ſublime. As for example, Juſtice among Chriſtians does not allow, that they ſhould render Evil for Evil; it acknowledges no particular Intereſt, and it takes place, not only with reſpect to Friends, but alſo to declared Enemies. Likewiſe Chriſtians are not only to do good to their Friends and their Relations, but alſo to their Enemies. It is not Vanity, but Charity, which is the foundation of their Liberality; they do not only give of their Superfluities, but alſo of their Neceſſaries. Their ſtrength conſiſts chiefly in ſuffering with Courage and Conſtancy, in keeping off the Violence which is offered to the Weak, in over-coming their Paſſions, in deſpiſing the Riches of this World, and ſeeking after, loving and valuing nothing but Virtue. They preſerve an Evenneſs of Soul and wonderful Tranquility of Mind in the midſt of Croſſes: Yet they do not raſhly expoſe themſelves, and are not aſhamed to fly, when they find themſelves too weak to reſiſt Perſecutions. In ſhort, their Moderation conſiſts in Tranquility of Mind, in the love of Mildneſs, in compleat Meekneſs and perfect Honeſty. St. Ambroſe explains particularly all the parts of theſe Virtues, gives excellent Precepts for obſerving them, and propoſes admirable Examples of them taken out of the Holy Scripture. He produces alſo ſome Examples of them taken out of Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory; that of St. Laurence is very remarkable. St. Ambroſe propoſes him as an illuſtrious Pattern of Conſtancy. He ſays, 'That this holy Deacon, ſee-
'ing Xyſtus his Biſhop dragged away to Martyrdom, he fell
'a weeping, not that the Martyrdom of his Maſter grieved
'him, but becauſe he was left behind him in the World;
'upon which account he addreſſes to him in theſe Words:

'you refuſe him with whom you have conſecrated, and who
'has conſecrated the Holy Sacraments with you? Why do you

'anſwers in theſe words, and others like them. I do not

St. Ambrose.

'ſerved for greater Combates: Mourn not, you ſhall quickly follow me, within Three Days you ſhall be where I am Such, ſays St. Ambroſe, was the glorious Conteſt of theſe two Illuſtrious Martyrs, who ſtrove who ſhould firſt ſuffer for Jeſus Chriſt. The Hiſtory of Oreſtes and Pylades meets with applauſe, when it is repreſented how each of them endeavoured with all his might to die for one another. Theſe two would both have died, the one having committed Parricide, and the other being a Complice in it; but there was nothing that obliged St. Laurence to offer himſelf to Death, his own Zeal only induced him to it; and three Days after, as he was roaſting upon a Grid-Iron, he ſtill mocked the Tyrant, ſaying, I am roaſted enough, turn me and eat me, and ſo he overcame the Violence of Fire by the Strength of his Courage.' We muſt not forget the Example of St. Agnes which St. Ambroſe relates before this. 'This Holy Virgin, ſays he, being in danger of loſing either her Chaſtity or her Life, ſecured her Virginity, by yielding up this Mortal Life to purchaſe an Eternal one.

About the End of this Book St. Ambroſe inſiſts upon the principal Virtues of Clergy-men; he recommends to them above all things Diſintereſtedneſs and Purity. It appears by this place, That St. Ambroſe thought that Biſhops, Prieſts and Deacons were obliged to live in Celibacy, and that thoſe could not be received into the Clergy who had been twice married, tho' they had been married the firſt time before their Baptiſm.

He concludes with ſpeaking of the Truſt committed to us, and of the Fidelity we ſhould ſhew in keeping that which is entruſted to us. He recommends to the Clergy-men who take Care of the Veſtry, to diſcharge their Duty with Faithfulneſs and Modeſty.

He begins the ſecond Book with enquiring, wherein conſiſts true Happineſs; and he ſhews, That it conſiſts in the Knowledge of God, and in Innocency of Life; That all other good things, do not only fall ſhort of our ſupreme Happineſs, but they do not ſo much as render us more happy; as on the contrary, the Croſſes and Miſeries of this Life do not render us more unhappy; That the good things of this World, ſuch as Riches, Abundance, Joy, &c. are truly Evils, becauſe they hinder us from working out our Salvation; whereas thoſe things which are believed to be evil, as Pain, Affliction, &c. are good for us, becauſe they give us Opportunities of practiſing Virtue.

Afterwards he treats of the Good that is profitable; and having ſhewn that there is no true Profit without Honeſty, he diſcourſes of the ſeveral ſorts of Good Things that are truly profitable, of Friendſhip, of Advice, of Fidelity, of Liberality, of Good-Will, of Civility, of the Protection of the Poor and Afflicted, of Hoſpitality, and the other Virtues neceſſary for maintaining Society and Commerce among Men. The Advices which he gives about things, are very judicious: Some of them are as follow. Nothing is more profitable than to be loved; nothing is more diſadvantageous than not to be loved. Mildneſs, Civility and Modeſty, cauſe us to be loved of all the World. Theſe Virtues are very becoming to Kings and Princes as well as to private Perſons; they maintain Peace and Charity. A Man is more eaſily truſted, who is loved by many. When Counſel is to be asked, we ſhould addreſs our ſelves to a Perſon who is equally juſt and wiſe. Theſe two Virtues are inſeparable. We muſt not only aſſiſt the Poor who have nothing to live upon, but it is a piece of Prudence and Charity to help alſo thoſe who are unfortunate in their Affairs, chiefly, when it is not by their Debauchery that they are reduced to this Condition, but by ſome unforeſeen Misfortune. 'Tis alſo a Duty of Charity to redeem Captives, and reſcue them out of the Hands of their Enemies, to ſave Women from Diſgrace; this is, to reſtore Children to their Fathers, and Fathers to their Children, and Citizens to their own Country. There are ſome alſo that do a Work of Charity, by marrying Orphan Daughters. When we cannot help others by giving them Money, it is good to aſſiſt them by our Counſel and Labour. We muſt do Works of Charity with Prudence, and not give Alms to thoſe that are unworthy. There are ſome that feign Debts, and others that deplore their Miſery; we muſt examine whether theſe things be true or no; and we are not only to employ our Hands to give, but alſo to make uſe of our Eyes to conſider the Perſons to whom we give. We muſt look upon him who does not ſee us, and ſeek after him who is aſhamed to be found. Yet we muſt not retrench our Alms, under a Pretence that many ask them who do not deſerve to receive them. I omit many other fine Maxims which he propoſes concerning Alms, and Contempt of Riches; but I cannot forget that place, where he ſays, That he broke in pieces the ſacred Veſſels to redeem Captives. He juſtifies himſelf in this Action, or rather he draws from it a great deal of Glory. 'The Church, ſays he, was founded 'without Gold, if ſhe has it now, 'tis to give it and not 'to keep it; 'tis for aſſiſting the Poor with it in their great 'Neceſſities. What would be ſaid of a Biſhop, who to 'preſerve the lifeleſs Veſſels, would ſuffer the living Members of Chriſt to periſh? Would he ſay, I am afraid leſt 'the Temple of the Lord ſhould be ſpoiled of its Ornaments? 'Might it not be anſwered to him, That 'tis not neceſſary 'that the Sacraments of the Altar ſhould be adminiſtred in 'Gold or Silver; That the Redemption of Captives was 'an Ornament much more pleaſing in the Sight of God; 'That thoſe Veſſels could not be put to a nobler Uſe than 'when they are employed to redeem the Lives of Chriſtians; That the true Treaſure of the Lord is that which 'has the ſame Effect with his Blood; That then a Veſſel 'is known to be truly the Lord's when there is a double 'Redemption to be obſerved in it; that is, when the exteriour Veſſel redeems from the Enemy, thoſe whom the 'Blood of Jeſus Chriſt had redeemed from Sin.

St. Ambroſe.

He juſtifies alſo this Conduct by the Example of St. Laurence who ſhewed the Poor when the Treaſures of the Church were demanded of him. At laſt, He concludes, That tho' it be a Crime to break the Veſſels of the Church, to turn them to our own Profit; yet on the contrary, it is an Act of Charity and Virtue to do it, to diſtribute them to the Poor, to redeem Captives, or to build a Church, when ſuch things are neceſſary. He adds, That he uſed that Precaution, as to take firſt the Veſſels which were not conſecrated, and afterwards to break and melt thoſe that were, leſt any ſhould turn the ſacred Chalices to prophane Uſes. He concludes this Book with recommending to the Clergy, to keep with Faithfulneſs and Courage what is depoſited in the Churches by Widows, and relates ſome Examples of the Boldneſs wherewith ſome have defended theſe things againſt thoſe who came to invade them.

And here I muſt reſume the 24th. Ch. of which I have ſaid nothing. St. Ambroſe there deſcribes the chief Duties of Clergy-men towards others in a few Words, 'We muſt, 'ſays he, prepare our ſelves by good Actions and by a good 'Intention to receive Offices, and chiefly thoſe of the Clergy. We muſt not carry our ſelves proudly in them, nor 'eſtrange our ſelves from them by Negligence; we muſt 'equally ſhun Ambition and the Affectation of refuſing 'them. Simplicity and Uprightneſs comprehends all, and 'theſe are of themſelves commendable enough: In the Exerciſe of his Miniſtry he muſt neither be too ſevere nor 'too remiſs, leſt he ſhould ſeem either to exerciſe his Authority with Dominion over the Flock, or elſe to neglect the 'Duties of his Miniſtry; he muſt endeavour to oblige all 'the World. A Biſhop ſhould conſider and protect the 'Prieſts and the other Clergy-men, he ſhould not be offended if they purchaſe Eſteem either by their Charity, or 'their Faſting, or their Piety, or their Learning: But theſe 'ought not to exalt themſelves, much leſs employ their 'own Merits to diminiſh the Reputation of their Biſhop. 'The Wicked muſt not be defended, nor Holy Things 'given to thoſe that are unworthy of them; but neither 'are we to reprove and condemn any Perſon 'till he be 'convicted of a Fault. For if Injuſtice be otherwiſe above 'all things offenſive, it is inſupportable in the Church, 'where every thing ſhould be regulated according to Equity, where Impartiality ſhould be obſerved. The Powerful 'and Rich ought to have no more Authority than the Poor, 'becauſe the Rich and Poor are all one in Jeſus Chriſt. 'The moſt Holy ſhould attribute nothing more to himſelf 'than others; for the more Holy he is, the more humble 'he ought to be. When we judge we ought not to have 'any reſpect of Perſons. Favour ſhould have no place in 'our Judgments but only the Juſtice of the Cauſe. Nothing does more wound the Reputation and Credit which 'we may have, than to betray the Cauſe of the Weak in Favour 'of thoſe that are more powerful; to reprove a poor Man 'that is innocent ſeverely, and to excuſe a rich Man that 'is guilty. 'Tis true that we are naturally inclined to favour great Perſons, leſt they find that Injuſtice has been 'done them, and afterwards revenge themſelves upon us. 'But, firſt, if you be afraid of making your ſelves Enemies, do not meddle with judging or oppoſing. You can 'ſay nothing when a Matter of Intereſt is under Debate, 'tho' it were better done to protect Juſtice; but when the 'Cauſe of God lies at Stake, or it is to be feared that the 'Impious will be admitted to the Communion of the Church, 'then it is a very heinous Sin for Clergy-men to uſe Diſſimulation.

In the Firſt Chapter of the Third Book St. Ambroſe ſhews, That this Maxim of Scipio, That he was never more buſy nor leſs alone, than when he was by himſelf, was antienter than Scipio; and that it was verified in a more illuſtrious manner in Moſes, Elias, Eliſha, and the Apoſtles, who did ſo many wonderful things when they ſeemed to mind nothing. He adds, That a juſt Man is never alone, becauſe he is always with God; That he is never idle, becauſe he is always meditating; That he ſeems to be unknown, and yet is famous; That when he is thought to be dead, he then enjoys a more happy Life; That he is never more joyful than when others think him to be under Affliction; that he is never richer than when he is poor, becauſe he places all his Happineſs in Juſtice and Honeſty. He obſerves afterwards, That the Compariſon which the Philoſophers make between the Good of Honeſty and of Profit, has no place among Chriſtians, becauſe they acknowledge nothing profitable to be Good which is not alſo Honeſt. He diſtinguiſhes two ſorts of Good and of Duty, that which is more, and that which is leſs perfect. In ſhort, he maintains, That a juſt Man ought never to ſeek his own Profit by doing Injury to others; but on the contrary, that he ought to ſeek the Good of others above his own. He enlarges upon this Maxim, and proves, that for any Man to do Injury to his Neighbour for his own Profit, is contrary to the Example, and to the Law of Jeſus Chriſt, to the Law of Nature, to the Dictates of Conſcience, and to the Civil Laws. Purſuant to this Principle he determines, that a Chriſtian in a Shipwrack ought not to ſnatch from his Brother the Plank which he has taken to ſave himſelf; that he ought not to fight againſt a Robber who would ſet upon him, and lays it down for a General Maxim, That 'tis never lawful to preſerve our own Life by putting another to Death. The Philoſophers were ſo far in the right when they affirmed, That a Wiſe-man, tho' he were ſecured for ever from any Diſcovery, ſhould do nothing againſt his Duty; but finding no Example to prove it, they had recourſe to the Fable of Gyges's Ring: St. Ambroſe confirms this Truth by the Example of David and St. John Baptiſt.

In a Word, St. Ambroſe proves that in all Caſes we ought to prefer Honeſty to Profit. He grounds upon this Principle his Aſſertion, That one who has gathered together much Corn, ought not to keep it up in his Barns until a time of Famine that he may ſell it very dear. He condemns this Practice as a ſort of Uſury, or Robbery. He would not have Strangers hindered from coming into Cities in a time of Famine, and blames the antient Romans for the Practice of this Rigor; But praiſes an Old Man, who in his time was of a contrary Opinion. Having related many Examples taken out of Scripture, to ſhew that we ought to prefer Honeſty to Profit, he reproves the Conduct of thoſe who are always intent upon ſordid Gain, who uſe all manner of Tricks to cheat others of their Goods, and leave no means uneſſayed to poſſeſs themſelves of their Neighbours Inheritance. He adds, That this Covetouſneſs is very much to be blamed in all ſorts of Perſons; but it is inſupportable in Clergy-men, who ought to allow dying Men their Liberty to make their Laſt Will with Diſcretion and Freedom: That a Clergy-man ought never to alienate the Goods which belong to another for his own Profit, becauſe it is his Duty to do Good to all the World, and to do no Injury to any Man. From hence he concludes, that when we cannot help one Man but we muſt do Injury to another, it is more convenient to deny our Aſſiſtance to the former, than by doing him Good to prejudice the latter. For this Cauſe he would not have Clergy-Men meddle in Pecuniary Cauſes, becauſe in gaining from one they injure another.

At laſt he collects ſeveral Examples taken out of the Old Teſtament, which he alledges to prove, That Honeſty is to be preferred before any Intereſt and Advantage whatſoever. He concludes this Book with ſome excellent Precepts which he gives concerning Honeſt and Chriſtian Friendſhip. I ſhall ſet down ſome of them. Friendſhip it ſelf ought to give place to Honeſty. No Man ought to favour his Friend when he is in the wrong, nor to deal unjuſtly by him when he is in the right: As we ought to vindicate him when he is innocent, ſo we ought to reprove him when he is guilty; we ought to ſpeak to him with Sincerity, to open our Heart to him, to reprove him with Freedom, to ſuffer for him when it is neceſſary, and to relieve him in his Wants. The Foundation of Friendſhip is Faith in God, and no Man can be a true Friend to another who is an Infidel towards God. Piety preſerves Friendſhip, and makes Friends equal. There can be no Friendſhip between Perſons of different Principles. One Friend ought to admoniſh another without Bitterneſs, and rebuke him without Reproaches. Our Friendſhips ought not to be founded upon Intereſt, for Friendſhip is a Virtue and not a Matter of Traffick. There is no true Friendſhip where there is Flattery. Thus I have given an Abridgment of St. Ambroſe's Offices which is a very uſeful Book to teach all Chriſtians the Principles, Maxims, and Rules of that moſt Holy Morality which they profeſs: And this made it ſo common in former Ages; every one would have it, every one would read it with Attention, and thoſe who had Leiſure made Abridgments of it which are ſtill extant. It were to be wiſhed that Chriſtians, and chiefly Clergy-men would do the ſame ſtill, and that they would draw from this pure Fountain the Morality which they teach and which they practiſe. The French Tranſlation which has been made of it may render it uſeful to all Men. But let us proceed to the other Treatiſes of St. Ambroſe.

The Books of Virginity were written by St. Ambroſe at the Requeſt of his Siſter Marcellina, who having heard ſome ſpeak of the Sermons which he had made about Virginity, deſired him to ſend her in Writing what he had preached, ſince ſhe could not be ſo happy as to hear him. Whereupon he put his Sermons in the Form of a Treatiſe, and divided them into three Books, which he addreſſed to his Siſter Marcellina, in the third year of his Biſhoprick, that is to ſay, in the year 377.

After a very humble Preface, he begins his Treatiſe with a Diſcourſe in praiſe of St. Agnes: He ſets off the Glorious Martyrdom of that Illuſtrious Virgin with inimitable Elegance. 'To Day, ſays he, is the Feaſt of a Virgin, let 'us imitate her Purity: It is the Holy Day of a Martyr, 'let us offer up Sacrifices: 'Tis the Feſtival of St. Agnes, 'let Men admire her, and young Children entertain bleſſed 'hopes of her; let Married Women wonder, and Virgins 'endeavour to imitate her. But what can we ſay worthy 'of a Perſon whoſe very Name is a ſufficient commendation. Her Zeal was above her Age, and her Virtue exceeded the Powers of Nature. . . . . This Holy Virgin 'ſuffered Martyrdom at twelve Years of Age. By how 'much the Cruelty of thoſe who did not ſpare ſuch tender 'Years is to be deteſted, by ſo much is the Virtue of that 'Faith to be admired, which could make a Martyr at that 'Age. . . . . Here is a new kind of Martyrdom. She was 'not yet of an Age fit to ſuffer, and yet ſhe was already 'able to Conquer. She went to Death with more gaiety 'than a young Bride to the Nuptial Bed. All People mourned for her, and yet ſhe ſhed not one Tear for her ſelf. It 'was matter of admiration, to ſee her prodigally throw away that Life, which ſhe had ſcarce yet taſted, with 'as much eaſe as if ſhe were arrived at the end of her 'Courſe. In ſhort, what ſhe did was ſo incredible of human Nature, that it was believed to be from God, for 'whatſoever tranſcends the Power of Nature, muſt proceed from the Author of it. What threatnings did not 'her Executioner uſe to frighten her? What Artifices did 'he not employ to perſuade her? By what various Solli'citations did he attempt her to yield to Marry? That 'were, ſaid ſhe, an Injury to my Divine Spouſe, to enter'tain any hopes of being able to pleaſe others; I am only 'his who has choſen me firſt: Why do you delay, Execu'tioner, to do your Office? Let this Body of mine Pe'riſh, ſeeing it is ſo unhappy as to be pleaſant in the Eyes 'of thoſe whom I would not have it to pleaſe. Having 'ſpoken theſe Words ſhe put herſelf into a poſture to re'ceive the Fatal Blow; ſhe prayed and then ſubmitted her 'Neck. You ſee here a double Sacrifice in one Victim. 'She is a Martyr both for Religion and Virginity; ſhe re'mains a Virgin and obtains a Crown of Martyrdom.

St. Ambroſe, having propoſed this Illuſtrious Example, treats at large of the Excellency of Virginity. He ſhews, that this Virtue comes from Heaven, and that God is the Author of it; that the Heathens neither knew it, nor practiſed it as they ought; that the Jews themſelves did not eſteem it, and that it was not common amongſt Men till Jeſus Chriſt came into the World. Afterwards he gives a Catalogue of the Advantages which Virginity has above the married State, by comparing theſe Two Conditions. 'I do 'not condemn Marriage, ſays he, but I will prove that 'Virginity is more excellent. Let us compare, if you pleaſe, 'the more conſiderable Advantages of Married Women 'with the leaſt Happineſs of Virgins: The Married Wo'man may boaſt of her Fruitfulneſs, which makes her 'happy in Children, but the more ſhe brings into the World, 'the more Pain ſhe ſuffers. She may reckon upon the 'Comfort and Support ſhe ſhall have from her Children; 'but with this let her balance the troubles they bring up'on her. What might I not ſay of the Troubles which 'Mothers muſt undergo both in Nurſing Children and 'in bringing them up, and then in marrying of them? 'What is more harſh than that Subjection or rather Sla'very to which Wives are reduced? What is more un'eaſy than thoſe perpetual Complaiſances which they 'muſt always uſe towards their Husbands? Fear and Jea'louſies and a Thouſand other cares render them unhappy. 'The Neceſſity and Slavery they undergo in dreſſing and 'adorning themſelves is a perpetual Puniſhment. But, 'you, O bleſſed Virgins, know not what all this attiring 'means, you have no other Ornament but Modeſty and 'Chaſtity; you court no other Beauty than that of Virtue, 'a Beauty which cannot be ſhared with others, nor taken 'away by Death, nor defaced by any Sickneſs; you have 'none to pleaſe but God who loveth beautiful Souls, tho' 'they be ſhut up in deformed Bodies; you are not troubled 'with the Inconveniences of Child-bearing, and of bring'ing forth Children, and yet you have a very numerous 'Spiritual Off-ſpring.

St. Ambroſe complains that there were ſo few Perſons at Milan who profited by his Inſtructions, whilſt a great many Virgins, not only from Bologna and Placentia, but even from Mauritania, came to receive the Veil at Milan. He reproves Mothers who hindred their Daughters from coming to his Sermons, leſt they ſhould embrace Virginity. At laſt, he commends thoſe Virgins who devoted themſelves to God without their Parents leave, and relates the Example of a young Gentlewoman, who being preſſed by her Mother and Relations to Marry, threw herſelf down before the Altars, and would not ſtir from thence till ſhe had obtained the conſent of her Parents to her profeſſing Virginity. 'Tis obſervable, that St. Ambroſe ſays, that at length her Relations approved her Deſign, and ſo ſhe was not deprived of her Eſtate.

In the Second Book he undertakes to Inſtruct Virgins by ſome examples which he propoſes to them: And becauſe the Virgin Mary was undoubtedly the moſt perfect of all Virgins, her Example is the Firſt and moſt Illuſtrious. St.

Ambroſe

St. Ambrose.

Ambrose here proposes her Life as a Pattern which Virgins ought to imitate, and represents her Virtues in a most Excellent manner. From this Father, Preachers and Devotee's may learn how to praise the Virgin in such a manner as is worthy of her, without stuffing their Discourses with Apocryphal Stories, Excessive Praises, and False Notions. The Picture which he draws of her, represents her as she was, and sets before our Eyes her natural Beauty; whereas some of the Devotee's of the latter Ages, have changed and disfigured her by vain Ornaments which are no ways agreeable to her, neither could she herself endure them.

St. Ambrose having proposed to Virgins the Example of the blessed Mary, as the Pattern of their Life; sets before them also the Example of St. Thecla the Martyr, to Instruct them how to die well. He sub-joyns the Example of a Christian Virgin of Antioch, who being carried to the Stews because she would not Sacrifice to Idols, was delivered from the Danger she was in by a Soldier, who changed Cloaths with her and saved her. But when this came to be known, the Soldier was carried to the place of Punishment, where the Virgin also rendered her self, and they both received the Crown of Martyrdom. St. Ambrose describes this History in very lively and eloquent Figures, and comparing it with the Fable of Damon and Pythias, he proves that this Action was much nobler and greater, than that which is related of those two famous Friends. Towards the end, he excuses himself for using so many Flowers and Figures of Rhetorick in relating these Examples of Virgins, which he says he did not do to shew his his Eloquence, but to win the Affection of Virgins by the Sweetness and smoothness of his Discourse, and to render their conditions the more Amiable by the Beauty of the Examples which he proposed to them, before he proceeded to the Precepts and Advices which might be less agreeable.

The Third Book begins with an Exhortation which Pope Liberius made to Marcellina, St. Ambrose's Sister when he gave her the Veil at Rome in the Church of the Apostles on Christmas-Day. There is no probability that this very Discourse should be Liberius's, but it was certainly made by St. Ambrose, and contains very useful Advices to Virgins consecrated to God. After he has exhorted them to love their Divine Spouse, he prescribes Rules concerning their principal Duties; he enjoyns them to be very Sober, to shun Visits from the People of the World, to keep Silence, and to be very Modest and Reserved in all their Actions. When he has given these Precepts under the Name of Liberius, he praises the Virtues of his Sister, and chiefly her Fastings, but he Counsels her to moderate them, that she may apply her self more to other Spiritual Exercises, and especially to Prayer. He says, that she should Pray in the Morning when she awakes, before she goes out, before and after Meals, towards Night, and when she goes to Bed. He advises her also to repeat in her Bed the Lord's Prayer, and the Psalms, either before she falls asleep, or when she awakes. And he thinks that she ought to repeat every Morning the Creed as the Seal of our Faith. He adds, that she ought to Weep, and shun excessive Mirth, the Pleasures of this World, and Particularly Dancing. And to dissuade Christian Virgins from it, he relates the Example of the Dancing of Herodias's Daughter, and Describes the Fatal Consequences of it: A fit Example, says he, to teach Wise and Christian Ladies, that they ought not to suffer their Daughters to practise Dancing.

Lastly, St. Ambrose answers the Question which Marcellina had put to him, to know what was to be thought of Virgins who killed themselves or threw themselves head-long to shun falling into the Hands of their Persecutors, who sought to deprive them of their Faith and their Virginity. He relates the Example of St. Pelagia who killed her self, and of the Mother and Sisters of that Saint, who threw themselves head-long into the River. He subjoyns the Examples of St. Sotera who was of his own Kindred, and concludes from these Examples, that this Zeal is no ways forbidden. Here the Third Book of Virgins ends in all the Manuscripts, tho' in the Printed Editions there are many Pages added that have no relation to this Treatise, which St. Ambrose concludes with these examples, as appears by the beginning of this last Chapter.

The Treatise of Widows was written soon after that of Virgins, as St. Ambrose declares at the beginning of it. It was the Inconstancy of a Widow which made him undertake this Work. St. Ambrose had comforted her after the Death of her Husband, and had exhorted her to lay aside her Mourning, but she abusing his Advices, had made use of them to gain Authority to her Design of marrying again. The Holy Father being unwilling that it should be thought he had counselled her to do so, wrote this Treatise of Widows, wherein he exalts the State of Widows as approaching near to the Perfection of Virgins. For proof of this he not only alledges the Testimony of the Apostle St. Paul, but he relates also the Example of many Widows of the Old and New Testament. He exhorts Widows to continue in their Widow-hood, and in his Address to this Widow who had occasioned his Writing this Book, he shews her that all the reasons which she alledged for proceeding to a Second Marriage, were weak; yet he does not condemn either First or Second Marriages; on the contrary, he rejects the Opinion of the Hereticks who had forbidden them; but he prefers the State of Virgins and Widows before that of married Women, and refutes with sharpness the Reasons which Women use for running into Second Marriages. Altho he would not openly declare his Opinion of their Conduct, who use the Knife and Fire to check the motions of the Flesh, yet he speaks of it after such a manner as plainly discovers that he did not approve it, and observes that it is contrary to the antient Canons. This Treatise is cited by St. Ambrose in his Commentary upon St. Luke, by St. Jerome in Letter Fifty to to Pammachius, and so there can be no doubt but it is this Father's.

St. Ambrose

There is in this Edition a little Treatise of Virginity, which in the former Editions had been placed at the end of the second Book about Virgins, but it is parted from it in all the Manuscripts, and is evidently a distinct Treatise. The Treatise of Widows, which is there cited, was written after the two Books of Virgins.

This little Piece is not very coherent. In it he praises the famous Judgment of Salomon, he blames the Action of Jephtha; and then he defends himself against those who accus'd him of giving excessive Praises to the State of Virginity, and demonstrates the Excellency and Advantages of it. He occasionally answers those who said, that the great numbers of Virgins would lessen the Race of Mankind, and he maintains that there are no places more populous than those where there are most Virgins: For Proof of which he observes, that tho' at Alexandria, in the East, and in Africa, there are an infinite number of Virgins, yet these Countries are very well peopled. He adds, that if this Reason were good, they must also advise Women to be lewd, because so they would have more Children.

After this, he examines the Reasons of those who find no fault with the Consecration of Virgins, but only say, that we should wait till they be of sufficient Age before they receive the Veil. He confesses, that a Bishop ought to beware of giving the Veil with too much precipitation, but then he ought not so much to regard their Age, as the ripeness of their Parts, nor to consider so much the number of their Years as the Disposition of their Hearts: that every Age can follow Jesus Christ, and embrace the perfection of a Christian Life. This gives him occasion to speak of the way which Virgins ought to hold in following of Jesus Christ, and of the Life they ought to lead to imitate him. He concludes with comparing the Instructions of the Ministers of Jesus Christ, who exhort Virgins and Widows to live in Continence, to the miraculous Fishing of St. Peter; and he prays the Lord, that he would make his own fishing successful to the catching of many. This Piece was compos'd of many Sermons, and was made soon after the Treatise of Widows.

The following Treatise is entituled in the printed Copies, Of the Instruction of a Virgin, address'd to Eusebius, but in the Manuscripts its Title is, A Discourse of the perpetual Virginity of the Virgin Mary. And indeed the principal part of this Treatise is against the Error of Bonosus, who had oppos'd the perpetual Virginity of Mary. But that which gave occasion to St. Ambrose to compose this Discourse, was the Profession of a Maid called Ambrosia, Niece to Eusebius a Citizen of Bolonia, to whom St. Ambrose had made an Exhortation when he gave her the Veil. He committed the same to Writing afterwards according to his custom, and address'd it to Eusebius with a Preface, wherein he discourses of the chief Duties of Virgins that are consecrated to God, which are Silence and Prayer. After this he gives an account of a Discourse which he made when he gave the Veil to Ambrosia: there he says many things in praise of Women, and undertakes the Defence of that Sex against those who blamed it. He proves that they are unjustly accus'd as being the cause of Man's Falling and Offending; and he extolls their Piety by proposing the Virtues of many Women. He shews, that if Eve gave occasion to the Condemnation of Mankind, this Loss was fully compensated by Mary, who is the Honour of her Sex and of the Church. St. Ambrose wonders, that there have been Christians who durst oppose her perpetual Virginity. He adds, that this Error deserved to be buried in Eternal Silence; but because it had been maintained by a Bishop (he means Bonosus) he thought himself obliged to discover and refute it; which he does in the following part of this Discourse, where he establishes the perpetual Virginity of the Virgin Mary, and refutes the Objections of Bonosus, which were the same with those of Helvidius.

St. Ambrose

The first Objection which he proposes is taken from the Word Mulier or Woman, which is attributed in the Holy Scripture to the Virgin. St. Ambrose shews, that this Word is general, and is given to Virgins as well as Married Women and Widows.

The second Objection is founded upon this Passage of the Gospel, Before they came together, and upon that other, He knew her not before she had brought forth her First-born Son. He answers, that these ways of speaking do not intimate that St. Joseph had afterwards any carnal Knowledge of the

St. Ambroſe.

Virgin, but only that he had not before; and that the Deſign of the Evangeliſt is to diſcover the principal Myſtery, viz. That a Virgin conceived Jeſus Chriſt by the Operation of the Holy Spirit, and not to determine an incidental Queſtion. This Anſwer is much better than the ſecond, wherein he pretends, that the Word, cognovit, he knew, is to be underſtood only of the Myſtery, which was yet hid from Joſeph.

The third Objection is taken from the Title of Joſeph's Wife which is given to Mary. St. Ambroſe anſwers, that this Title might be given her tho' ſhe were a Virgin, becauſe it is not the loſs of Virginity that makes Marriage, but the actual Conſent of the Parties, tho' it were never Conſummated. Wherefore he makes no ſcruple to conclude, that there was a true Marriage between Joſeph and Mary.

St. Auſtin and St. Jerome are of the ſame Opinion; Gratian and the Maſter of the Sentences followed them; and ſince that time it hath paſs'd for a Maxim among Canoniſts and Divines.

St. Ambroſe produces alſo an Objection taken from the Mention which is made of the Brethren of Jeſus Chriſt, but he does not think that it deſerves to be inſiſted on, ſince the Word, Brother, is a general Word which has many ſignifications, and agrees to others beſides thoſe who are born of the ſame Father and the ſame Mother.

St. Ambroſe proceeds afterwards to the Proofs of the perpetual Virginity of Mary.

He ſays firſt, that ſince Jeſus Chriſt was able to preſerve the Virginity of his Mother, it is very improbable that he ſhould permit her to be deprived of that perfection.

The ſecond Argument is, that if Mary had not always been a Virgin, ſhe ſhould not have been propos'd as a Pattern and Example to Virgins.

The third is, that the Virgin was deſigned to be a Perſon of the greateſt Merits and Perfections, but there is none greater than Virginity.

The fourth is, that Joſeph durſt not come near her, whom he knew to be the Mother of God.

The fifth, upon which he inſiſts more largely, is, that Jeſus Chriſt ſufficiently teſtified it, by recommending her to his beloved Diſciple when he was upon the Croſs: For, how, ſays he, could he remove her from her Husband, and give her to another, if ſhe had known a Husband; How could this Diſciple take her to his own houſe, if ſhe had to do with another as her Husband? Jeſus Chriſt would never have divorced them, and Mary would never have forſaken a Husband. This ſuppoſes, that St. Joſeph was yet alive, when Jeſus Chriſt upon the Croſs ſpoke thus to his Mother. If this Matter of Fact be not certain, the Argument is nothing worth. Beſides, ſuppoſing there was a true Marriage between St. Joſeph and the Virgin, as St. Ambroſe had already ſaid, they ought not to have been parted; 'tis true St. Ambroſe anſwers, that this Marriage, being deſigned only for the accompliſhment of the Myſtery, was to ceaſe aſſoon as the Myſtery was perfectly fulfilled by the death of Jeſus Chriſt. But I doubt this Anſwer has more Wit than Solidity.

[It is plain from the 2*d*. Chapter of St. Luke, that our Saviour lived with Joſeph when he was 12 Years old; for not only Joſeph and Mary then lived together, but he went with them again to Nazareth, after he had Diſputed with the Doctors in the Temple, and was ſubject unto Them: Afterwards when he entred upon the Miniſtry, the Galileans took offence at his Preaching becauſe of his being (as they thought) only the Carpenter's Son, which had been a groundleſs Suggeſtion, if Joſeph and Mary had not Cohabited together; it does not indeed weaken the Opinion of the perpetual Virginity of the Bleſſed Virgin, tho' it takes off the force of this Argument by which St. Ambroſe went about to prove it.]

The ſixth proof which St. Ambroſe alledges for the perpetual Virginity of Mary, is grounded upon Ch. 44. of the Prophet Ezekiel. He explains what is ſaid in this place of a Gate ſhut, through which the Lord of Iſrael had paſs'd, and thinks it ought to be underſtood of Mary, who is that Gate through which the Lord paſs'd without opening it, and which afterwards continued ſhut: Which ſhews that ſhe loſt not her Virginity, neither by bringing forth Chriſt into the World, nor after ſhe became the Mother of God.

St. Ambroſe having thus proved the perpetual Virginity of Mary, exhorts the Virgins to follow her. He propoſes to them alſo another moſt powerful Motive to engage them to keep their Virginity; and that is, the Love of Jeſus Chriſt, their Celeſtial Spouſe, who is extremely jealous of their Purity. The Majeſty of this Spouſe ſhould make thoſe tremble who had any thoughts of being unfaithful to him. He is God, the Son of God, his Eternal Word, conſubſtantial to his Father. Hence St. Ambroſe takes an occaſion to make a Digreſſion about the Divinity of the Word, and to diſpute againſt thoſe Hereticks that denied it. 'Tis probable that they were alſo the followers of Bonoſus whom he attacks in this place, ſince we learn from the Canon of the Council of Arles, that theſe Hereticks followed the Error of the Photinians and Paulianiſts; from whence in Gennadius's time the Photinians were called Bonoſiacks, as this Author obſerves in his Book of Eccleſiaſtical Writers Ch. 14. The Benedictines who ſet out St. Ambroſe, whoſe exactneſs nothing has eſcaped, have not forgot to make this Obſervation.

St. Ambroſe.

After he has occaſionally anſwered two Objections of thoſe Hereticks, he returns to his firſt Subject of the Virginity of Mary, and continues to exhort the Virgins to imitate her. He applies to this purpoſe many Paſſages of the Canticles; in particular he addreſſes himſelf to Ambroſia, and gives her excellent Inſtructions about the Virtues ſhe ſhould practiſe. He concludes with praying the Lord to receive her into the number of his Spouſes, and to pour upon her abundance of his Grace.

It appears by the Preface of this Book, that Ambroſia was ſtill to continue in her Father's Houſe though ſhe had received the Veil; which plainly ſhews, that all the Virgins conſecrated to God were not yet ſhut up in Monaſtries, though there were already ſome Monaſtries ſet up.

Towards the end, the Ceremonies of a Virgin's making Profeſſion, are deſcribed. She preſented her ſelf at the feet of the Altar, where ſhe made Profeſſion before the People; the Biſhop preached to her, and gave her the Veil which diſtinguiſhed her from other Virgins, but her hair was not cut. St. Ambroſe ſays in this Treatiſe, that he had already written many other Books concerning Virgins; and in it he recites many things which are in his Commentary upon St. Luke compos'd in 386. At laſt he ſpeaks of the Error of Bonoſus as a Hereſie publiſhed not long before, which ſhews that this Treatiſe was written in the Year 392. For the Affair of Bonoſus being carried into the Council of Capua, held in the Year 391, they ſent it back to the Biſhops of Macedonia.

When St. Ambroſe fled from the Tyrant Eugenius he retired to Bolonia, where he diſcovered the Reliques of St. Vitalis and St. Agricola, who had ſuffered Martyrdom under the Perſecution of Dioclefian and Maximilian, and made a ſolemn Tranſlation of them. From Bolonia he went to Florence, whither he carried the Reliques of theſe Saints, which he placed in a Church built by a holy Widow called Juliana, which he was entreated to Dedicate. 'Twas at the Dedication of this Church, that he made the Diſcourſe entituled, An Exhortation to Virginity. Juliana having loſt her Husband, was not only conſecrated to God her ſelf, but by her Example and Inſtructions ſhe ſo ordered the matter, that ſhe gave all her Children to God alſo: Her Son Laurentius was made Reader, and her three Daughters profeſs'd Virginity. St. Ambroſe upon this occaſion relates the Exhortation of this holy Widow to her Children. She told her Son, that his Father and ſhe had given him that Name which he had, becauſe they had obtained a Son by the Interceſſion of St. Laurence; that they had deſigned him from that time for the Clergy, and that in this he ought to comply with their Deſires, and fulfil their Vows. Afterwards addreſſing her Speech to her Daughters, ſhe deſcribes the Troubles of Marriage, the excellency of Virginity, and exhorts them to conſecrate themſelves to God. She concludes with preſſing her Son and her Daughters to accompliſh the Vows which ſhe and their Father had made in their behalf. St. Ambroſe purſues this Exhortation, by adding Inſtructions to teach the Virgins after what manner they ſhould live, and Examples to ſerve them for a Pattern. The example of St. Sothera, the Kins-woman of St. Ambroſe, is not here forgotten. Afterwards he promiſes to Juliana the Reward of her Piety. Laſtly, he prays the Lord to accept graciouſly of that Church which he was conſecrating, and to receive favourably the Prayers, and Sacrifices of the Body of Jeſus Chriſt, which ſhould be offered there, and particularly the Oblation of all the Family of Juliana. This Treatiſe was written when St. Ambroſe retired upon the Account of the coming of Eugenius the Tyrant, in the Year 393, towards Eaſter.

The Treatiſe of the fall of a Virgin conſecrated to God, is here found under the name of St. Ambroſe. It is alſo among St. Jerome's Works, but certainly it is not his; for it is notorious that the Author of this Treatiſe was a Biſhop, but St. Jerome was only a Prieſt. Gennadius aſſures us alſo, that Niceas Biſhop of Aquileia wrote a Diſcourſe addreſs'd to a Virgin who had faln into Sin, very proper to perſuade all thoſe who ſhould fall into the like Faults, to return from their Evil ways. This gave occaſion to the Conjecture of many, that this Biſhop was the Author of this Treatiſe. But the Title alone is not a ſufficient proof, ſince St. Baſil wrote a Book upon the ſame Subject which has the ſame Title. The Benedictines obſerve, that all the Manuſcripts which they have ſeen, attribute this Work to St. Ambroſe, except one only wherein it is attributed to St. Chryſoſtom. They maintain alſo, that there is nothing in this Book which may not very well be St. Ambroſe's: But they confeſs that it has not the Stile of this Saint; and indeed there is neither that ſharpneſs of Wit, nor the lively and ſpiritual thoughts which are in his Works: this is more languid and leſs ſublime. Whoſoever be the Author of it, he is Antient, for one may find there Traces of the antient Diſcipline, one ſees that Publick Penance was adminiſtred but once: Nay, even this Author obliges this faln Virgin to do Penance all her life, and he ſeems alſo to take from her the hopes of receiving Abſo-

St. Ambroſe.

Abſolution in this Life. It appears, that there were yet Idolaters in his time, and that the Adult were baptized on Eaſter-day. He admits a middle State between the Damned and the Happy; he deſcribes the Ceremonies of the Profeſſion of Virgins, almoſt as St. Ambroſe does. He ſays, that ſhe to whom he writes, who was a young Woman of Quality called Suſanna, having reſolved againſt the Will of her Kindred to embrace Virginity, profeſs'd it on Eaſter-day at Night in the great Church, where ſhe was accompanied by thoſe that were newly baptized, holding lighted Torches in their hands; that there ſhe pronounced her Vows publickly before the People, and then received the Veil and entred into a Monaſtry; that preſently after Reports were ſpread about which wounded her Reputation, and they were found to be falſe, and the Authors of them could not be diſcovered; but that Three Years after ſhe committed the Crime whereof ſhe had been falſly ſuſpected before, ſuffering a young Man to lie with her many times, by whom ſhe was gotten with Child. She was accuſed alſo of having deſtroyed her Child, which Murder ſhe endeavoured by all means poſſible to conceal, and would never confeſs; but being convicted of it before the Biſhop, ſhe was put under publick Penance. The Author of this Treatiſe repreſents to her the monſtrous Heinouſneſs of her Crime, and the Scandal ſhe had given; he exhorts her to do Penance all the reſt of her Life; he orders her to repeat every day the 51ſt. Pſalm, and to paſs her Life in Sorrow and Grief, that at leaſt ſhe might avoid the Puniſhment of Hell-fire. He excites her alſo to the Acts of Penance and Compunction, which he deduces from many places of Scripture. There is alſo a Chapter againſt him who had abuſed this Virgin, whom he exhorts to do Penance. The Author of this Treatiſe is accus'd of being a Novatian, becauſe he tells this Virgin, that ſhe ought not to expect Abſolution of her Sin in this Life; and that thoſe who promiſed her Pardon of her Sin in this Life deceived her. 'Tis true, that this Rigor was practiſed in ſome Churches in the firſt Ages of the Church. But he who ſpeaks thus in the Fourth Century, appears to be much inclined to the Novatians. St. Ambroſe was the Man of all the Fathers who did moſt vigorouſly oppoſe this Maxim in his Books of Penance, and therefore 'tis no wiſe probable that he ſhould affirm the ſame in this Treatiſe, without giving any Explication of his Words. But here it may be ſaid, that this Author exhorts this young Woman to do publick Penance; Why ſhould he exhort her to do Penance, if ſhe was uncapable of Abſolution? This is what St. Ambroſe and the other Fathers juſtly object againſt the Novatians, That they put Sinners under Penance, and exhort and force them to do it, but yet afterwards they deprive them of the Fruit of Penance by refuſing them Abſolution. The Language of the Author of this Exhortation is perfectly like that of the Novatians. He exhorts this young Woman to do Penance, but he gives her no hopes of obtaining Remiſſion in this Life: On the contrary, he tells her expreſly, that this ſhall not be, and that thoſe who promiſe it to her, do but deceive her; but that ſhe ought always to do Penance, to ſhun Eternal Torments. He even dares not promiſe her Glory, but only the Privation of Torments. Theſe are Doctrines contrary to thoſe which St. Ambroſe eſtabliſhed in his Book of Penance, or rather that is the only Doctrine which he oppoſes there. It is no ways probable therefore, that this Treatiſe ſhould be his, and we muſt ſtill continue in as great Uncertainties as ever concerning its Author.

The Book of Myſteries or Sacraments is an Inſtruction to the New-baptized, wherein St. Ambroſe explains to them the Significations and Vertue of the Sacraments which they had received. Here is an Abridgment of what is moſt remarkable in this Inſtruction.

'After we have ſpoken every day of Morality, and propoſed to you the Examples of the Patriarchs and Prophets, while the Proverbs were reading, that you might be accuſtomed to follow the Examples of the Saints, and to lead a Life becoming thoſe Perſons who are purified by Baptiſm, 'tis now time to diſcourſe to you of the Myſteries, and to explain the Sacraments; for if we had explained them to you before you were initiated, we ſhould have thought that we had prophaned rather than diſcovered them: Beſides that the Light of the Myſteries themſelves, which you did not expect, has now aſtoniſhed you more than if we had inſtructed you about them before. Open therefore now your Ears to receive the ſweet Word of Eternal Life, which we ſignified to you when we celebrated the Ceremony, by which we wiſhed that they might be opened, by ſaying Ephatha, that ſo all thoſe who were to come to Baptiſm might know what was demanded of them, and what they anſwered. At laſt you are introduced into the Place where the Sacrament of Baptiſm is adminiſtred; you are obliged to renounce the Devil and his Works, the World and its Pomps and Pleaſures. You found in this place the Waters and a Prieſt who conſecrated them; the Body was plunged into this Water to waſh away Sins; the Holy Spirit deſcended upon this Water; you ought not to fix your Mind upon the External Part of it, but to conſider in it a Divine Vertue. Do not imagine therefore, that it is this Water which purifies you, 'tis the Holy Spirit. There are three things in Baptiſm, the Water, the Blood and the Spirit, and without theſe three things, the Sacrament is not compleat; neither the Remiſſion of Sins, nor Grace is received, unleſs it be in the Name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghoſt. The Baptiſm of Jews and Infidels does not purify at all; 'tis the Holy Spirit which deſcended formerly under the Figure of a Dove, which ſanctifies theſe Waters. We muſt not conſider the Merit of the Prieſt, for it is our Lord Jeſus Chriſt who baptizes. You made Profeſſion of believing in the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghoſt. After this you drew near unto the Prieſt, he anointed you and your Feet were waſhed. This Sacrament blots out your hereditary Sins, and the Baptiſm blots out the Sins contracted by your own Will. After this you received white Garments, to ſignify that you were ſtript of Sin and cloathed with Innocence. You received the Seal of the Holy Spirit, the Spirit of Wiſdom, of Power, &c. The Father hath marked you out, The Son hath confirmed you, and the Holy Spirit hath given you Aſſurance of your Salvation. Afterwards you run to the Heavenly Feaſt, and ſee the Altar prepared, where you receive a Nouriſhment infinitely exceeding that of Manna, a Bread more excellent than that of Angels. 'Tis the Fleſh of Jeſus Chriſt, the Body of Life, 'tis the incorruptible Manna, 'tis the Truth, whereof the Manna was only the Figure. Perhaps you will tell me, But I ſee another thing? How do you aſſure me, that it is the Body of Jeſus Chriſt which I receive? That we muſt prove. We muſt ſhew that it is not the Body which Nature hath formed, but that which the Benediction hath conſecrated: Which St. Ambroſe confirms by an infinite number of the like Miracles; and laſtly, by the Myſtery of the Incarnation which he compares to that of the Euchariſt. A Virgin, ſays he, brought forth. This is againſt the Order of Nature. The Body which we conſecrate came forth of a Virgin. Why do you ſeek for the Order of Nature in the Body of Jeſus Chriſt, ſince Jeſus Chriſt was born of a Virgin contrary to the Order of Nature? Jeſus Chriſt had real Fleſh which was faſtened to the Croſs, and laid in the Sepulchre. So the Euchariſt is the true Sacrament of this Fleſh. Jeſus Chriſt himſelf aſſures us of it: This is, ſays he, my Body; before the Benediction of theſe Heavenly Words it is of another Nature, after the Conſecration it is the Body. So likewiſe of the Blood: Before Conſecration it is called by another Name, after Conſecration it is called the Blood of Jeſus Chriſt, and ye Anſwer, Amen, that is to ſay, 'Tis true. Let the Mind acknowledge inwardly that which the Mouth brings forth; let the Heart be of that Judgment which the Words expreſs. The Church exhorts her Children to receive theſe Sacraments which contain the Body of Jeſus Chriſt. This is not bodily but ſpiritual Food, for the Body of the Lord is ſpiritual. Laſtly, this Heavenly Meat gives us ſtrength, this Divine Drink rejoyces us. Having therefore received theſe Sacraments, let us be perſuaded that we are regenerated, and let us not ſay, How can this be? 'Tis not by Nature but by the Holy Spirit.

St. Ambroſe.

From hence we may learn the chief Ceremonies which were obſerved in the Church of Milan. As to the Adminiſtration of the Sacraments, theſe which follow are remarked. The Ears of the Catechumens were touched, ſaying Ephatha, and after that they were bidden enter into the place where they were to be baptized. There they were obliged to renounce the Devil, the World and its Pomps; the Biſhop bleſſed the Water of Baptiſm, the Creed was repeated to the Catechumens, they were anointed with Holy Chriſms, their Feet were waſhed, they were plunged into the Water, and at the ſame time the three Divine Perſons were invocated; afterwards they were cloathed with White Garments, the Sacrament of Confirmation was given them, and the Holy Spirit was called upon for them: From thence they were conducted to the Altar, where they were preſent at the Conſecration of the Euchariſt, and received the Body and Blood of Jeſus Chriſt, anſwering, Amen.

Since theſe Ceremonies and the Doctrine of this Treatiſe do not agree with the Opinions of Proteſtants, ſome among them have done what they could to raiſe Doubts about this Book whether it were St. Ambroſe's. But the Reaſons which they alledge are ſo weak, that the ableſt Men among them have ſincerely acknowledged that it is really his. There are very ſtrong Proofs that it is this Father's; the Beginning alone diſcovers that it is his, for there he ſpeaks plainly of the Sermons he had made to the Catechumens upon the Lives of the Patriarchs and Prophets. This does not agree to any other Author but St. Ambroſe; 'tis the Stile of this Father, tho' he treats of things more particularly than in his other Books. 'Tis his Doctrine, and no body doubts but it is his Work: It has always been cited under his Name, and is attributed to him in all the Manuſcripts. This Diſcourſe was ſpoken by St. Ambroſe, after his Sermons upon the Lives of Abraham, Iſaac, and Jacob, towards the Year 387.

St. Ambroſe.

The Opinions of Criticks are very much divided concerning the Author of the Book of the Sacraments. The Benedictines produce in their Preface what has been ſaid upon this Subject, and after having given a very wiſe and equitable Judgment about the different Opinions, they give their own Thoughts of it, and build their Judgment upon good Reaſon. Firſt of all, they obſerve, That 'tis indifferent to the Members of the Church of Rome, to whom this Work be attributed, ſince St. Ambroſe teaches the ſame Doctrine in his Treatiſe of Myſteries; and ſo, tho' it were ſuppoſed with Aubertine, that the Author of the Book about the Sacraments is of the Seventh Age, or with Dailleé, that he is of the Eighth, the Cauſe of the Church would be ſo much the ſtronger, becauſe it would have two different Teſtimonies of the Judgment of the Church; and in different Ages, viz. St. Ambroſe in the Fourth Age, and this Author in the Seventh or Eighth. Tho' this were not ſo, and the Church might draw ſome Advantage from ſuppoſing that St. Ambroſe was the Author of the Book about the Sacraments; yet if it ſhould appear that the contrary Opinion is more probable, we muſt undoubtedly follow it. We muſt judge of theſe kind of Matters without Prejudice and Affection, and we muſt not conſider what would be moſt advantageous to our ſelves, but what comes neareſt to the Truth. This is what the Benedictines do; they profeſs to examine this Queſtion with all poſſible Sincerity, as if it had never been canvaſſed before, and without addicting themſelves to the Prejudices of any Party. They immediately diſapprove the Reproaches which the Proteſtant Criticks have thrown upon this Author, they cannot endure that they ſhould make him paſs for an ignorant and ridiculous Perſon, for an Impoſtor and a Liar; They vindicate him from ſome Miſtakes and Abſurdities, which Cook, Rivet, and Dailleé had faſtned upon him. They ſhew, that this Expreſſion, For this cauſe at Rome the Name of the Faithful is given to the Baptized, is not ſo ridiculous as theſe Criticks imagine, becauſe tho' it were true, that the Baptized were called by the ſame Name in other Churches, yet it were no unprofitable Obſervation, that in the Church of Rome they were called ſo alſo. They obſerve, That ſome Manuſcripts have Rectè, inſtead of Romæ, but they do not think that we are obliged to follow this Correction. They ſhew alſo, That the manner wherein this Author relates the laſt Words of the Pater Noſter, Ne patiaris nos induci in tentationem, inſtead of Ne nos inducas in tentationem; that this manner, I ſay, of ending the Lord's Prayer was not peculiar to him, and that St. Cyprian read and repeated thus the laſt Words of the Lord's Prayer. Laſtly, they defend him againſt the Accuſations of Barbariſm, of falſe Subtility, of vain Allegories, which are charged upon him by the Criticks whom we have mentioned.

After this the Benedictines produce the Reaſons which are alledged by Catholick Authors, to ſhew that the Books of the Sacraments were St. Ambroſe's, and at the ſame time prove that they are not very convincing.

The firſt is drawn from the Authority of many antient Manuſcripts, where this Treatiſe is found under the Name of St. Ambroſe. To theſe is added the Authority of all the Editions which have been made of it, and the Teſtimony of a great number of Authors of the Ninth Age, and thoſe that followed it, viz. of Hincmarus Biſhop of Rheims, of Deoduinus of Liege, of Paſchaſius Ratbertus, of Ratramnus a Monk of Corbie, of Florus a Deacon of the Church of Lyons, of Lanfranc, of Berengarius, of Algerus, of Guitmondus, of Durandus Troarnenſis, of Ivo Carnutenſis, of Gratian, of the Maſter of the Sentences, and of other later Authors who have all cited the Book of the Sacraments under the Name of St. Ambroſe: This Argument appears plauſible enough, yet the Benedictine Fathers maintain, that it is not fully convincing: For how often has it happened, ſay they, that Books have been, and every day are taken from thoſe Authors under whoſe Names they had always paſſed? Is it not very well known that the greateſt part of thoſe who cited the Works of the Fathers in the latter Ages, did not carefully examine, whether the Books which they cited were theirs, but truſted to the common Title of them? As to the Manuſcripts, the Benedictines aſſure us, that the moſt antient have not the Name of the Author, and that it is probable the Name of St. Ambroſe was added in thoſe which are more modern, either becauſe it was known, that St. Ambroſe had treated of this Subject, or becauſe theſe Books were found together with that about the Myſteries which treats of the ſame Matter, and the firſt bearing the Name of St. Ambroſe, whoſe it was indeed, they thought that the laſt were this Father's alſo.

The ſecond Proof which is alledged to ſhew, That the Books of the Sacraments are St. Ambroſe's, is taken from the Agreement of the Stile of this Work, with that of the Book of Myſteries. The Benedictines ſay, That 'tis true this Author does ſo imitate St. Ambroſe, that he copies out the ſame which he had ſaid; but they obſerve, that in copying it out he corrupts it, and accommodates it to his own Stile, which is much below that of St. Ambroſe. Wherefore this Argument is more proper to raiſe a Doubt, whether theſe Books of the Sacraments be St. Ambroſe's or no, than to confirm them in the Poſſeſſion of the Title which they bear.

St. Ambroſe.

The third Argument produces alſo the ſame Effect. 'Tis ſaid that St. Auſtin affirms, That St. Ambroſe wrote a Book about the Sacraments; but 'tis evident that the Book which St. Auſtin cites under this Title, had quite another Subject than this Book. It was a Book of Philoſophy againſt the Platoniſts, as appears by what this Father ſays of it in the ſecond Book againſt Julian, Ch. 5. and in the ſecond of his Retractions, Ch. 4.

The Benedictines produce alſo ſome places drawn out of this Book, which are thought to agree to St. Ambroſe, as the Complaint which he made that he had not a ſtrong Voice, and the Explication of the Lord's Prayer, which St. Ambroſe probably would not have omitted in his other Treatiſes, but that it was in this; but at the ſame time they ſhew how weak theſe Arguments are.

After having thus diſcuſſed what is ſaid on both ſides about the Author of theſe Books, they endeavour to diſcover him by the Work it ſelf, and for that end they enquire into theſe three things, what Rank he held in the Church, at what time he lived, and of what Country he was.

As to the firſt, they ſay, That it plainly appears he was a Biſhop, who inſtructed the Catechumens.

Upon the ſecond, they ſay, That the Teſtimony of the Authors which have quoted him, ſhew that he was older than the Eighth Century, and that there is a Manuſcript in the Abby of St. Gal written in great Letters, which Mabillon believed might be about 1000 years Old, whoſe Antiquity ſhews that this Author lived before the Seventh Century: Beſides that it appears by the Work it ſelf, that it is more antient: For there he ſpeaks of a great Number of adult Catechumens, which proves that he lived at a time, when the Practice of Baptizing all Infants was not yet ſo general. He obſerves alſo, That there were yet in his time ſome Remainders of Idolatry. And in ſhort, he refutes no other Hereticks but the Arians, and he makes uſe of a Verſion of the Bible different from that of St. Jerome, which yet is not that which St. Ambroſe uſed.

As to the laſt Head which concerns the Country of this Author, 'tis evident that he was not a Roman, ſince he ſays, That he honours the Church of Rome, and follows many of its Practices, tho' he does not think himſelf obliged to follow it in all. This gives occaſion to conjecture, that he was not far diſtant from it. the Cuſtoms and Practices which he deſcribes, agree very well with the antient Rites of the Church of Milan, and the Churches of Gaul.

Theſe Remarks ſeem to prove that this Book may be St. Ambroſe's; for all thoſe Characters agree perfectly well to him; but there are other Reaſons which hinder the Benedictines from attributing it to him. The firſt and principal is the Diverſity of the Stile; for tho' it may happen, that an Author ſhould write in a more plain and leſs ſublime manner than he was wont to do, yet the Strength of his Wit it always perceived. 'Tis never found, that an Author who has naturally an elegant and noble Stile, does write in a very mean one. St. Ambroſe never falls into this Fault; he does not make uſe of cold and childiſh Interrogations ſuch as this Treatiſe is full of: Beſides that, 'tis no wiſe probable, that St. Ambroſe ſhould imitate himſelf ſo exactly, and tranſcribe a part of his Book about Myſteries, and a part of his Treatiſe of the Inſtitution of a Virgin. They add alſo, That St. Ambroſe never reproves his People for communicating ſeldom, as this Author does, and that there is no probability that he ſhould oppoſe ſo publickly the Practice of the Roman Church about the waſhing of Feet. Theſe laſt Conjectures are a little weak; on the contrary, the former are very ſtrong, and are, as one may think, ſufficient to have determined the Benedictines to remove this Book from the Place of which it was poſſeſſed, among the genuine Works of St. Ambroſe, eſpecially ſince in reading the Book of the Sacraments, it plainly appears, that the Author was nothing elſe but a cold Imitater of St. Ambroſe. In effect the Subject of this Book is the ſame with that of the Book about Myſteries. The Author does nothing but enlarge upon what St. Ambroſe had ſaid before. He follows him ſtep by ſtep; he adds very few things of his own; he ſpeaks only of the ſame Sacraments, and the ſame Ceremonies; he gives the ſame Explications of them; he amplifies the ſame Arguments and the ſame Obſervations; yet he enlarges ſometimes a little more upon certain Ceremonies. He openly oppoſes the Cuſtom of the Church of Rome in omitting the waſhing of Feet. He explains the Change which is made in the Sacrament more largely. He gives an Explication of the Pater Noſter, and diſcourſes of Prayer. But he has alſo taken what he ſays of it out of St. Ambroſe's Book of the Inſtitution of a Virgin. Theſe ſix Books are ſo many Sermons preached to the Novices.

The two Books of Penance are undoubtedly St. Ambroſe's; they have his Stile. He ſpeaks of them in his Commentary upon Pſalm 37, and St. Auſtin cites them ſeveral times. There cannot be more convincing Proofs to ſhew that any Work is genuine. Theſe Books were written againſt the Novatians, who would not allow the Church to have have Power to pardon Crimes. This is the Error which St. Ambrose disputes against in the First Book.

'He begins with a Commendation of Moderation and 'Christian Meekness, whereof Jesus Christ himself has gi-'ven us an Example, who condemns the Harshness and 'Rigor of the Novatians, who fright Sinners from Penance, 'and hinder them from applying a Remedy to their Disea-'ses. For who is it, says he, who will have the Courage 'to do Penance without any Hope of Pardon? What 'Confidence will any one have in such a Physician, who 'is so far from having Compassion for his sick Patient, 'that he shews nothing but Contempt and Rigor towards 'him. Afterwards he explains wherein the Error of the 'Novatians consists. They maintain, says he, That we 'must not admit those to Communion, who have fallen 'by violating the Law of God. If they spoke only of Sa-'crilege, if they refused Pardon to this Crime only, this 'would indeed be a Rigor condemned by the Words of 'Scripture. But they offend also against common sense, by 'making all Crimes equal, and by depriving those of Com-'munion that are guilty of lesser Crimes, as well as those 'that have committed the greatest. They say, that they do 'honour to Jesus Christ by reserving to him only the Pow-'er of pardoning Sins; and in this very thing they dishо-'nour him, because they violate his Commandments. The 'Church obeys Jesus Christ in binding and loosing Sinners. 'The Novatians content themselves with binding only, and 'will never loose Sinners, tho' Jesus Christ gave at the 'same time to the Church the Power of binding and loo-'sing; whence it follows that the one cannot be permitted 'without the other; wherefore both the one and the other 'are done in the Church, and neither the one nor the other 'can be done among Hereticks: For this Jurisdiction be-'longs only to Priests, and none but the Church can as-'sume it, since none but she has true Priests, and Here-'ticks have none at all.'

Tho' what we have just now recited might make us believe that the Novatians granted not Remission to any Sin; yet St. Ambrose confesses in the following Discourse that they pardoned lighter Sins, and refused Absolution only to those that were guilty of great Sins. He asserts against them that Novatian was never of this Opinion, and that his Judgment was, that Penance should not be allowed to any Sinner. Perhaps St. Ambrose would have found it very difficult to prove this Assertion, which seems not to agree with the Account we read in St. Cyprian of the Birth of the Error of the Novatians.

However it be, St. Ambrose having objected to them, that they condemn the Author of their Sect, disputes against their Distinction, by saying that Jesus Christ did not make it; That his Mercy extends unto all Sinners; That those who have committed the greatest Sins should perform the greatest Penance; and Lastly, that the greater the Sins have been, the greater need there is of Relief. In the remaining part of this Book he proves by many Passages and examples taken out of the New-Testament, that Absolution ought not to be refused for any Sin whatsoever; and he answers the Objections of the Novatians. He observes also towards the end of this Book, that the Novatians do in vain exhort Sinners to Penance, since they deprive them of the Fruit of Penance. 'For, says he, if any one be guilty of Secret 'Sins, and does Penance for them very heartily, in Obedience 'to the command of Jesus Christ, How shall he receive 'the Reward, unless he be restored to the Communion of 'the Church? I would have the Guilty hope for the Par-'don of his Sins, yet he should beg it with Tears, yet he 'should beg it with Sighs, yet he should beg it with the 'Lamentations of all the People. I would have him pray 'for Absolution; and when he is twice or thrice delayed 'as to his Re-admission into the Communion of the Church, 'let him believe, that this delay proceeds from the want 'of Importunity in his Prayers; let him redouble his weep-'ing, let him render himself more worthy of Pity, and 'then let him return, let him throw himself at the Feet 'of the Faithful, let him embrace them, kiss them, bath 'them with his Tears, and let him not forsake them, that 'so our Lord may say unto him, Many Sins are forgiven 'him, because he loved much. I have known some Persons 'who in their Penance have spoiled their Face with much 'weeping, who have hallowed their Cheeks with continual 'Tears, who have prostrated themselves on the Ground to 'be trod under Foot, who by their continual Fasting have 'rendered their Countenance so pale and disfigured, that 'they carryed in a living Body the very Image of Death.' This is a lively Representation of publick Penance which was yet in its Vigour in the time of St. Ambrose. This Passage also informs us, that there were then some Persons who were guilty only of secret Mortal Sins, who submitted to the trouble of Publick Penance. Monsieur Daillé thinks, that instead of siquis occulta habens crimina, it must be read, siquis multa habens crimina: But his Conjecture not being Authorized by any Manuscript ought not to be received.

In the Second Book after having answered Two principal Objections of the Novatians, whereof one is drawn from a Passage of the Epistle of the Apostle St. Paul to the Hebrews, where 'tis said, that 'tis impossible for those who have once lost the Grace of Baptism to be renewed again, and the other is grounded upon what Jesus Christ says of the Sin against the Holy Ghost: After, I say, he has answered these two Objections, and confirmed the Doctrine and Practice of the Church, he exhorts the Faithful to Penance, and signifies to them with what Dispositions they should enter upon it, he proposes the Resurrection of Lazarus as an Illustration of the Spiritual Resurrection of a Sinner, who reflecting upon his own Condition, begs of God the pardon of his Sins. Lastly, He discourses of the Conditions necessary to make Penance useful, and of the Faults that are to be met with in ordinary Penances. There are also towards the end of this Book, some things very remarkable concerning the Discipline of the Antient Church in the Administration of Penance.

St. Ambrose.

'There are many ways, says he, of paying to God what 'is owing him; and though a Man be Poor he is always 'Rich enough to pay him; Prayer, Tears, Fasting, are the 'Tributes due to him. A Man may lessen his Sin by distri-'buting his Patrimony to the Poor, but Faith must make 'this expence valuable; for to what purpose serves the gi-'ving away of his Patrimony if he has no Charity. There 'are some who give their Riches out of Vanity, and 'satisfy themselves with the Reward which they can 'have in this World without troubling themselves about 'that of another. Some having given their Riches to the 'Church, by I know not what sudden fit of Devotion, 'without sufficient Consideration of what they do, re-'voke their Donation. Others blame themselves for having 'given their Goods to the Poor. But as to those who do 'Penance, that which they are chiefly to fear, is, lest they 'repent of having done Penance: For many Persons being 'terrified with the fear of Punishment, and pushed forward 'by the Remorse of their own Conscience, desire Pe-'nance, and after they are admitted to it, leave it off for the 'shame of the publick Humiliation. What can be said of 'such Persons, but that they did well to desire to do Pe-'nance for their Sins, but at the bottom they repent of the 'Good they have done? There are others who desire not 'to enter upon Penance, but that they may be immediately 'restored to communion: These do not desire so much 'to be loosed as to bind the Priest; for they don't un-'burden their own Conscience, but they burden the Con-'science of the Priest, who is commanded not to give Holy 'things unto Dogs, and not to throw Pearls before Swine, 'that is to say, not easily to admit impure Souls to the 'Holy Communion. You see them walk with their ordi-'nary Apparel, who should be weeping and sighing for ha-'ving defiled the Garment of Baptism and of Grace. You 'see the Women also still wearing Pendants and Dia-'monds at their Ears, who should be mourning for ha-'ving lost the Heavenly Diamond, that is to say, the Grace 'of Baptism. There are some also who think that Penance 'consists merely in refraining from the Sacraments. Last-'ly, There are others, who seeing the hope that is given 'them of doing Penance, do from thence take occasion to 'think that they have the greater Liberty to Sin, not con-'sidering that Penance is appointed to be a remedy of 'Sin, and not an inducement to commit it. But who can 'endure that you should be ashamed to pray unto the 'Lord, who are not ashamed to pray so often unto Men? 'That you should be ashamed to appear before God in 'the condition of a Supplicant, who are not ashamed to 'confess your Sins unto Men? Are you afraid to have 'any Witnesses of your Prayers? Alas! if Satisfaction is 'to be made to some Men, is it not necessary that you 'should see many Persons, and pray them to intercede for 'you? Are you not often obliged to prostrate your self at 'his Feet whom you have offended? Must you not kiss the 'places through which he has passed? Must you not pre-'sent your Children who had no hand in their Fathers 'Fault, to obtain Pardon by their means? Why are you 'troubled to do the like in the Church, to appease the 'wrath of God, to desire the Suffrages of the People? In the 'Church, I say, where there is but one thing only of which 'we ought to be ashamed, and that is not to confess our 'Faults, because we are all Sinners; where he that is most 'humble is most esteemed, where the more one is abased, 'the more Holy he is thought to be. Let the Holy Church 'your Mother mourn for you, let her wash away your 'Faults with her Tears. . . . . And yet we have reason 'to answer those who think that Penance may be done 'more than once, because this is to abuse the Mercy of Je-'sus Christ, for if they should once do true Penance, they 'would not believe that they had power to reiterate it. 'As there is but one Baptism, so there is but one publick 'Penance; for we ought also to do Penance for the Sins 'we commit every Day: But this last Penance is for small 'Sins, and the former for great ones. I have found more 'Persons who have preserved the Innocence of their Bap-'tism, than who have done Penance as they should after 'they have lost it. For 'tis believed, that Penance may be 'consistent with the Ambition of aspiring to Offices, with 'Pomp and high Feeding, with the Pleasures and Use of

St. Ambroſe.

'Marriage. But they muſt renounce the World, and allow 'leſs time for ſleep than Nature requires; they muſt 'break their ſleep with Groaning and Sighing, and employ 'ſome part of that time in Prayers; they muſt live in 'ſuch a manner, that they may be dead to the Uſe of this 'Life; let ſuch Men deny themſelves, and change them-'ſelves wholly, &c.'

This place teaches us many Remarkable Circumſtances concerning the Penance which was in uſe in the time of St. Ambroſe; Firſt, that the Sinners themſelves deſired to be put under Penance. Secondly, that by putting them under Penance they were ſeparated from Communion. Thirdly, that they did Penance publickly. Fourthly, that they uſed many Faſts, Auſterities, and Humiliations during the time of their Penance. Fifthly, that this Penance was impoſed but once. Laſtly, that this Penance was only for enormous Crimes, and that ordinary Sins were pardoned by the daily Penance. For the better underſtanding of this place, 'tis neceſſary to obſerve, how the Fathers underſtood this Diſtinction of great and little Sins. Tertullian who was the firſt that ſpoke diſtinctly of it in his Book of Chaſtity, places among the Number of little Sins, Anger, Evil-ſpeaking, a vain Oath, a Failure in our Promiſe, a Lye extorted by ſhame or neceſſity, &c. He calls theſe Capital or Mortal Sins, Murder, Idolatry, Fraud, Apoſtacy, Blaſphemy, Fornication, and other Crimes of this Nature, theſe are alſo the Crimes which St. Cyprian calls great Sins in his Treatiſe of Patience. Origen in Homily 15*th*. upon Leviticus, ſays, that there are Mortal Sins which are not in the rank of great Sins. I know very well that Monſieur Arnaud has affirmed, that in this place we muſt read culpa moralis, for culpa mortalis, as it is to be found in one Edition. But ever ſince the Maſter of the Sentences time, who cites this place, it has been read, culpa mortalis; and if one minds well the Senſe, he will perceive that it is to be read ſo. This place of Origen has much affinity with thoſe of St. Ambroſe, whereof we are now ſpeaking; for he ſays, that Penance is allowed but once, and that but ſeldom to thoſe who have committed great Sins, whereas the Sins of every Day are pardoned every Day. He explains himſelf alſo almoſt after the ſame manner in his Sixth Treatiſe upon St. Matthew, where he handles this Queſtion, whether a Man may not be treated as a Heathen and a Publican, that is to ſay, ſeparate from the Church, when he does not amend his ways, after he has been reproved for ſlight Sins. The Examples which he gives of ſlight Sins, are Evil-ſpeaking, lying, idle Words, addictedneſs to Wine, &c. And thoſe which he gives of great Sins, are Murder, Adultery, &c. He concludes, that there is no doubt but what is ſaid in the Goſpel, that we ought to look upon thoſe as Heathens and Publicans who do not reform after they have been Reproved, is to be underſtood of great Sinners. He adds, that it may alſo be underſtood of other Sinners, with reſpect to the Judgment of Men, but that it does not belong to us, to judge whether they are ſuch before God. St. Auſtin diſtinguiſhes in many places Two ſorts of Sins; the great Sins for which Men are put under publick Penance, ſuch as are Murder, Adultery, Fornication, &c. And the other Sins which are daily committed, and are pardoned by a daily Penance. He ſays of the Firſt, that they kill the Soul all at once, and that Chriſtians who have Faith and Hope do not commit them. But there is one place that is in Ch. 26. of the Book of Faith and Works, where he treats more clearly of this Matter, and diſtinguiſhes Three ſorts of Sins. 'There are ſome, ſays he, ſo 'great, that they deſerve Ex-'communication, and for which 'Sinners will want Reconci-'liation: there are others for 'which this Penance is not ne-'ceſſary, but they may be hea-'led by the remedy of Chaſtiſe-'ments: And laſtly, there are 'ſome that are very light, which 'are blotted out by the Lord's 'Prayer, from which no Man is free in this Life.' This diſtinction ſeems to be more juſt and reaſonable; for there are certainly many Sins which are not of the Number of great Crimes, neither are they ſo ſmall, but they may be Mortal. The difficulty is to know, to which of theſe Two Claſſes we ſhould refer thoſe Sins, which hold the middle place between the Firſt, and the Second; for ſince this diſtinction was not very common, and ſince all the Fathers and St. Auſtin himſelf in many places did not diſtinguiſh but two ſorts of Sins, and two ſorts of Penance, it may be doubtful under what Claſs this Third ſort was comprehended. For my part I believe that for the moſt part they were comprehended under the Second: Firſt, becauſe the Fathers in relating the Examples of ſlight Sins, place in that number thoſe that are conſiderable enough, ſuch as ſlander and addictedneſs to Wine. The Author of Sermon 41, among thoſe of St. Auſtin, which is attributed alſo to St. Ambroſe, places in the rank of light Sins, Drunkenneſs, Theft, Evil-ſpeeches, &c. Julianus Pomerius in the 2*d*. B. of a contemplative Life Ch. 7. ſays, that ſlight Sins are thoſe for which one is not condemned before Men. Cæſarius of Arles, Fulbertus of Chartres, and St. Eloi, when they make a particular Enumeration of Mortal Sins, place among them Anger and Drunkenneſs, but with reſtrictions, viz. Anger, if it laſt long, and Drunkenneſs, if it be continual. Secondly, the Fathers conſider the firſt Claſs, as enormous Sins, great Sins, great Crimes, which no Chriſtian commits, which do wholly diſgrace a Man, and which are extreamly rare. Now there are many Sins between theſe great Sins, and the ſmalleſt Sins, of which we cannot ſpeak after this manner. Thirdly, All the Sinners of the firſt Claſs, when they are known, either by Confeſſion or by Conviction, are put under publick Penance. But none were put under publick Penance except for very heinous Sins, ſuch as are mentioned in the Canons of Councils, and the Canonical Letters of Biſhops. What are theſe Sins? Theſe are Murder, Adultery, Fornication, and the Conſequents of theſe great Crimes. There is no Canon to be ſeen againſt Anger, Covetouſneſs and Slander; at leaſt it does not appear that publick Penance was impoſed upon any for theſe kind of Sins. Theſe Sins therefore, tho' they be ſometimes mortal, were comprehended under the ſecond Claſs, and not under the firſt, which contained only thoſe for which publick Penance was done. This may be confirmed by the Canonical Letter of St. Gregory Nyſſen to Letoius, where he makes an exact enumeration of thoſe Sins which ſubjected Men to publick Penance, which are all enormous Sins and Conſiderable Crimes. Fourthly, it may be added, that publick Penance being granted but once only, they muſt be very extraordinary and enormous Crimes for which men are ſubjected to it. Laſtly, Origen, St. Auſtin and St. Bernard ſay, that the great number and the cuſtom of ſome Sins of the ſecond Claſs may finally deſtroy, and ſtifle Charity in the Soul; therefore they did not believe, that this Claſs did not contain Mortal Sins.

I would not have it thought that I make theſe Remarks to authoriſe Licentiouſneſs, or to inſinuate, That there are ſome Mortal Sins which may paſs for Venial: God forbid that I ſhould have ſuch a deteſtable Deſign! On the contrary, my intention is to create a horror of all Sins; Firſt of great Crimes. Secondly, of Sins that may be mortal tho they appear not ſo enormous. And Thirdly, even of lighter Sins alſo. But I thought my ſelf obliged to obſerve here, for explaining the Paſſage of St. Ambroſe, that none but the Sins of the Firſt Claſs did ſubject Men to Publick Penance, and that 'tis of theſe only that the Fathers ſpeak, and which they comprehend under the Name of enormous Sins and Crimes; tho' there be others which may be alſo Mortal, and which a Chriſtian ought carefully to ſhun: but then they are ſuch for which he was never ſubjected to the Humiliation of Publick Penance, but only to Corrections and Reprimands given in ſecret, as St. Auſtin informs us. But now let us return to our ſubject, the Time is not certainly known when St. Ambroſe compoſed theſe Books of Penance. He ſays in the Explication of Pſal. 37, made about the Year 393, that it was a long time ſince they were written: De pœnitentia duos jamdudum ſcripſi libellos, I wrote two little Books of Penance a long while ago: But this denotes no certain time. It appears by the Books themſelves, that he was then well advanced in Years, and had taken much pains for the Church. The Benedictines think, that they may have been written in the Year 384.

After the Treatiſes of Morality and Diſcipline, follow his Writings of Controverſy. The five Books of Faith, or the Trinity, are the chief of his Writings of that ſort. St. Ambroſe wrote the two firſt at the Requeſt of the Emperor Gratian, who at his departure into the Eaſt in the Year 377, to aſſiſt the Emperor Valens againſt the Goths, deſired of St. Ambroſe a Treatiſe concerning the Faith againſt Arianiſm which then reigned in the Eaſt. St. Ambroſe proves the Divinity of the Son in theſe two Books of the Faith of the Church, and anſwers the Objections of the Arians conciſely and ſmartly. The Arians having accus'd him of treating this Matter too ſuccinctly, and of having abridged their Objections and his own Anſwers too much, he added in the Year 379, the three laſt Books, in which he enlarges and confirms confirms the Principles that he had laid down in the former. Theſe Books are written with much Wit, Vigor and Subtilty; he illuſtrates the Matter which he handles with lively and pleaſant Deſcriptions. He propoſes the moſt ſubtile Objections in an intelligible manner, and anſwers them with all the Induſtry and clearneſs that is poſſible. It may be ſaid, that there is none among the great number of Treatiſes written by the Ancients upon this Subject, where the Theological Difficulties about the Myſtery of the Trinity are better diſcuſſed, and cleared up than in this. Yet he is not always Exact, and he ſometimes employs Arguments which are not very concluding.

[The true Reaſon why Slander, Evil-ſpeaking, Anger, Covetouſneſs, and ſuch ſort of Sins were not ſubjected to publick Penance in the Primitive Church, ſeems only to have been, becauſe they are not ſo eaſy to be proved, and Delinquents cannot ſo well be convicted. Sins of the Fleſh, and Crimes againſt publick Society are Matters of Fact, liable to Proof and Examination, and therefore come under Cognizance of Civil Laws as well as Eccleſiaſtical; whereas Circumſtances may ſo alter the Nature of Spiritual Crimes, that what in ſome caſes may be damnable, in others may be venial, in others, again, highly commendable; and accordingly the ſelf-ſame Actions in all thoſe Caſes, ſhall meet with different Appellations. To ſpeak evil of Dignities is a Sin expreſly forbidden in Scripture; yet to defend the cauſe of Truth unjuſtly trampled upon, even againſt thoſe whom in lawful and indifferent things we are bound to obey, may be very often our Duty. This with due alterations may be extended to all other Crimes where the Good and Evil depend ſo viſibly upon ſuch Circumſtances, wherein a Criminal's word muſt of neceſſity be taken. And this I ſuppoſe was the true Reaſon why thoſe things were left to God and their own Conſciences; ſince it is moſt manifeſt that the Fathers eſteemed theſe Sins if unrepented of, to be as damning as any of thoſe of a groſſer Nature.]

The Books of the Holy Spirit are written in a leſs conciſe, leſs lively, and leſs ſmart Stile: St. Jerome ſays, That they contain nothing Logical, nothing maſculine, nothing moving, nothing convincing, but that every thing in them is feeble and languid, tho' it be poliſhed, dreſſed up and Painted with ſtrange Colours. He accuſes him alſo of having robbed the Greeks, and particularly the Book of Didymus, whoſe Tranſlation St. Jerome publiſhed then, and of having made a bad Latin Book out of many Good Greek ones; for Ruffinus informs us, that St. Jerome, ſpeaks of St. Ambroſe in this Place. It muſt be acknowledged that tho' the paſſionate Deſire which this Saint had to extol the Treatiſe of Didymus, made him ſpeak a little too vehemently againſt St. Ambroſe's Book, yet there is ſomething of Truth in what he ſays, for this Book is not written ſmartly, and the greateſt part of the things which it contains are taken out of the Works of Didymus, of St. Baſil, and St. Athanaſius. St. Auſtin was ſo far from finding in it that Beauty and thoſe Ornaments which St. Jerome met with in it, that he gives it for an example of a Book written in a low Stile, Becauſe, ſays he, the Subject does not require Ornaments of Diſcourſe to move the Heart, but Proofs of the Truths which he propoſes. St. Ambroſe has there collected together all that could be ſaid for eſtabliſhing the Divinity of the Holy Spirit. He wrote it after the Death of Athalaricus King of the Goths, and before the Death of Peter of Alexandria, and before the Celebration of the Council of Conſtantinople, that is to ſay, in the Year 381. There is one place in it, where he ſeems to aſſert, that Baptiſm given in the Name of one Perſon only of the Trinity, is valid. There are many Explications given of it which may be ſeen in the Note of the Benedictines upon this Paſſage.

The Treatiſe of the Incarnation is a Diſcourſe which St. Ambroſe ſpoke to refute the Objections which two Arians, Officers who belonged to the Emperor Gratian, had propos'd to him with much pride. He engaged to anſwer them the next day in his Sermon. Paulinus informs us, that theſe two Officers having mounted up into their Chariot to come to this Sermon, were thrown down headlong. St. Ambroſe, who knew nothing of this Accident, waited long enough for them, and tho' they came not at all, yet he did not fail to perform his promiſe. But before he entred upon the Matter, to give them yet longer time to come, he begun his Diſcourſe with the Explication of the Sacrifices of Cain and Abel. Afterwards he applies to Hereticks the Curſe which God pronounced againſt the Sacrifice of Cain, and makes a Catalogue of the principal Hereſies, ending with the Apollinarians. After this he proves againſt the Arians the Divinity of the Son, and his Humanity againſt the Apollinarians, and demonſtrates againſt both the one and the other, that there were in Jeſus Chriſt two perfect and compleat Natures; the Divine Nature according to which he is equal to his Father; and the Human, that is to ſay, a real Body and an underſtanding Soul with the Properties of theſe two Natures. When St. Ambroſe afterwards wrote down this Sermon, he added the Anſwer to a Difficulty which the Arians propos'd to him after his Sermon, viz. How it is poſſible, that the Father who was not begotten ſhould be of the ſame Nature with the Son who was begotten. This is the Subject of this Treatiſe, which he compos'd ſometime before the Death of Gratian in 383, and after the Book of Faith which he wrote in 379, that's to ſay, about the Year 382.

There is at the end of this Treatiſe, a Paſſage of St. Ambroſe about the Incarnation, which is produced by Theodoret in his ſecond Dialogue, as taken out of a Book, Entituled, An Explication of the Faith.

The Letters of St. Ambroſe are placed in a new Order, and divided into two Claſſes. The Firſt contains thoſe whoſe time and Order could be found out. The ſecond contains thoſe whoſe Date is not certainly known.

The Letter of the Emperor Gratian to St. Ambroſe is of a more antient Date than the reſt. He wrote to this Holy Biſhop after his Return from the Eaſt, whither he had gone to aſſiſt his Uncle Valens. He ſignifies to him how much he deſired to have him near him, and prays him to ſend him again that Book, which he had given him before, (meaning the two Books of the Faith, and to add to them the Proofs of the Divinity of the Holy Spirit. St. Ambroſe in the Anſwer which he made to this Letter, excuſes himſelf for not coming to wait upon him when he returned from the Eaſt, and praiſes the Faith and Piety of this Emperor. He promiſes Satisfaction to his Demands. This Letter was written in 379, ſoon after the Return of Gratian.

St. Ambroſe.

The Second is written to Conſtantius, who was lately promoted to a Biſhoprick. He exhorts him to govern his Church well in the midſt of Storms and Tempeſts. He diſcourſes to him very largely about the Inſtructions which he ſhould give to his People. He recommends to him the Church of Imola, which was without a Biſhop, and prays him to viſit it often till a Biſhop were ordained for it; becauſe as for himſelf, he was ſo buſy during the time of Lent, that he could not go far from his own Church. Laſtly, he admoniſhes him to take heed leſt the Arians that came from Illyricum ſhould ſpread their Error among the Faithful of his Country. He adds, that they ought to think of the Miſery which had befaln them, becauſe of their Infidelity; which diſcovers that the Arians were driven out of Illyricum by the Goths who entred into that Country after the Death of the Emperor Valens: And therefore this Letter was written in the Lent of 379.

The two following Letters are addreſſed to Felix Biſhop of Comum. In the Firſt St. Ambroſe thanks him for the Muſhrooms which he had ſent him, and complains that he had not yet come to ſee him. In the ſecond he praiſes him, and invites him to be preſent at the Dedication of the Church of St. Baſſianus Biſhop of Lodi. If we may believe Ughellus the Author of Italia ſacra, this Church was Conſecrated in the Year 380, but that is very uncertain. This Baſſianus ſubſcribed at the Council of Aquileia.

The 5th. Letter to Siagrius Biſhop of Verona concerns a Point of Diſcipline. This Biſhop had condemned a Virgin who was accuſed of having violated her Virginity, to be examined by a Midwife. St. Ambroſe nulls this Judgment in a Synod of Biſhops. Siagrius being offended with this Proceeding, wrote to him, that it was to be feared the Inhabitants of Verona would complain of the Judgment which he had given. St. Ambroſe ſhews in this Letter, that his Judgment was as Canonical as that of Siagrius was Irregular. He accuſes this Biſhop of being too haſty in giving this Judgment, which was ſo diſgraceful to a Virgin who had been conſecrated by his Predeceſſor Zeno, and who had always paſſed for a virtuous Maid. This was ſo much the more unjuſt, becauſe there was neither Accuſer, nor Informer, nor Witneſs againſt her. She had been defamed by none but a Club of Libertines unworthy of Credit, whom ſhe had driven away from her Houſe. And therefore this Judgment being againſt all Laws Eccleſiaſtical and Civil, was void in Form; neither was it better as to the Matter, becauſe what it ordained was againſt good Manners, againſt Modeſty and Civility. St. Ambroſe repreſents to him, that there are other ways to be aſſured of the good behaviour of a Virgin, and that we muſt never proceed to theſe Extremities; that oftentimes this way is not ſucceſsful, and leaves the Matter as uncertain as before; that it was very dangerous to make the Reputation of a Virgin conſecrated to God, depend upon the Credit of a Woman who might eaſily be corrupted or deceived; that if theſe means might be us'd, it was only to be us'd to Maid-ſervants, who are more afraid of a Diſcovery than of Sinning; but it ought never to be us'd for trying the Chaſtity of Virgins conſecrated to God; that in this particular Caſe 'twas to no manner of purpoſe to uſe theſe Means, becauſe if it were true that this young Woman who was accus'd had been with Child, and put it to death after her being brought to Bed, as was given out, it had been impoſſible but this would have been known by many Perſons, and conſequently there muſt have been many Witneſſes found againſt her; that the thing which had ſtirred up ſome Perſons againſt her, was becauſe ſhe lived retir'd in her Houſe and made no Viſits to the Ladies of the World; that Maximus who was her true Accuſer tho' he would not appear in it, had been engaged in a Law-ſuit and ſome Differences with her; that all this Accuſation was founded only on a falſe Report which had been ſpread about; that Renatus and Leontius the Witneſſes, at firſt contradicted themſelves and afterwards diſappeared; that Indicia having no more Accuſers or Witneſſes againſt her, brought Marcellinus and two other Witneſſes, who averred that ſhe always behaved herſelf very prudently, and in conſequence of this, that he and his Collegues had declared that her Reputation was untainted, and excommunicated Maximus, Renatus and Leontius her Accuſers, with this difference, that Maximus might be received again without doing Penance, by confeſſing his Fault only, whereas the other two were obliged to do Penance.

The 6th. Letter is to the ſame Biſhop upon the ſame Subject. He repreſents to him alſo how odious the Judgment was which he had given, and the Reſpect which is due to Virginity. This Letter is placed in the Year 380, but there is no convincing proof brought of it.

The 7th. and 8th. Letters are written to Juſtus, who is thought to be the Biſhop of Lyons, who was preſent at the Council of Aquileia. St. Ambroſe explains in the firſt, after a very Myſtical manner, the Queſtions which this Biſhop had propos'd to him upon ſome places of the Holy Scripture. In the ſecond he affirms that the ſacred Writers wrote with Art, and gives many examples of it which are very intricate.

There are placed here among the Letters of St. Ambroſe the Acts of the Council of Aquileia, which are maintained to be Genuine and Authentical, againſt the Opinion of Chiffletius, who thought fit to affirm that they were compoſed by Vigilius Tapſenſis: But this is an Opinion which is not ſupported by any reaſonable Conjecture (d), and is confuted by the bare reading of theſe Acts, which diſcover that they are Originals. Theſe Acts are not entire, for what concerns the Condemnation of Secundianus, and the Concluſion of the Council, is loſt. The Six following Letters are written in the name of the Biſhops of Italy who were preſent at the Council of Aquileia, and concern the Hiſtory of that time. What we have to ſay of the Acts of this Council and theſe Letters, may be found in our Diſcourſes of the Councils of Aquileia and Conſtantinople.

The 15th. addreſs'd to the Biſhops of Macedonia and to the Clergy of Theſſalonica, was written upon the death of Aſcholius Biſhop of that City. St. Ambroſe comforts them upon his death, becauſe he was removed into a better life, and enjoys the happineſs of Saints. He compares him to Elias and Eliſha; he teſtifies how much he loved him, and how much he regrets the loſs of him; he enlarges upon his Virtues, and congratulates the Churches of Macedonia upon the receiving Anyſius for his Succeſſor. To him the following Letter is written, which is alſo full of the Praiſes of his Predeceſſor Aſcholius. He prays God that Anyſius may be ſucceſſor to his Virtues as well as to his See. Theſe Letters are written in the Year 383.

In Letter 17th. St. Ambroſe writes to the Emperor Valentinian againſt the Petition which Symmachus had made in the Name of the Senate for reſtoring the Altar of Victory. He remonſtrates to him, that as all the Subjects of the Roman Empire ought to ſubmit to him, ſo he alſo was obliged to ſubmit to the only true God, and as they defend his Empire, ſo he was obliged to defend the Religion of Jeſus Chriſt. That a Chriſtian Prince ought neither to Diſſemble nor Tolerate, and much leſs ought he to Authorize the Worſhip of Idols and falſe Gods. He wonders therefore, that under a Chriſtian Emperor, there ſhould be found any Perſons ſo raſh, as to hope, that he would grant an Edict for reſtoring the Altars of the Gods, and that he would contribute towards the Expence of it by giving Money out of his Exchequer: That tho' the Temples had not been deſtroyed, and the Worſhip of the Gods forbidden by the Laws of his Anceſtors, yet he ought to do it now; but after the Laws have been in force for a long time, there was yet leſs reaſon to ſubvert them: That in this buſineſs he muſt never hearken to the Advice of a Pagan, how prudent ſoever he may be otherwiſe; and that if any Chriſtian had been cowardly enough to conſent to this Propoſition, he deſerved not to bear the Name of a Chriſtian any more: That if a Pagan Emperor would re-eſtabliſh an Altar, and oblige Chriſtians to conſent to it, this would be lookt upon as a Perſecution. How then can a Chriſtian Emperor do it, without committing Sacrilege? That there was no probability, that all the Senate had conſented to this Propoſition, ſince all the Chriſtian Senators two Years before had entred their Proteſtation againſt it, and that they were not preſent in the Senate when it was done, becauſe they thought that they could not have their liberty there to make head againſt it. He warns Valentinian that he ſhould not ſuffer himſelf to be ſurprized, and exhorts him to do nothing new in an Affair of this Importance without the Advice of the Emperor Theodoſius, whom he was wont to conſult in Affairs of Importance. Now what Affair, ſays he, can be of greater Importance than this of Religion? What is more precious than the Faith? He prays him to deſire of them a Copy of the Act of the Senate, and that they would leave him to anſwer it. In a word, he tells him with an aſſurance becoming an Holy Biſhop, that if he ſhould act otherwiſe, the Biſhops would not ſuffer nor diſſemble the Injury which he would do to Religion, and that if he came to the Church, he ſhould not find a Biſhop there, or elſe he ſhould find one who would oppoſe his Entrance into it. 'And what 'will you anſwer then, ſays he, addreſſing his Words to 'the Emperor Valentinian? What will you anſwer to the 'Biſhop when he ſhall ſay, the Church cannot receive Ob'lations from him who has given Ornaments to the Tem'ples of the Gods: His Gifts ſhall not be preſented on the 'Altar of Jeſus Chriſt who hath made an Altar for Idols. 'The Edict ſigned with your own Hand convicts you of 'the Fact. How can the Honour which you give to Jeſus 'Chriſt be acceptable to him, ſince at the ſame time you 'worſhip Idols? No, you cannot ſerve two Maſters. The 'Virgins conſecrated to God, have no Privileges, and yet 'you have granted Privileges to Veſtals? Why have you 'recourſe to the Miniſters of Jeſus Chriſt after you have 'preferred before them the Petitions of Pagans?' St. Ambroſe adds to theſe Remonſtrances of the Biſhops, the Charge which his Brother Gratian could draw up againſt him, if he ſhould return into the World, and the Accuſations which his Father Theodoſius might juſtly make againſt him.

St. Ambroſe.

Becauſe St. Ambroſe had deſired of Valentinian a Copy of the Petition which had been preſented to him in the Name of the Senate, and which he anſwers in the following Letter, that is alſo here inſerted. Symmachus therein deſires of the Emperors, as Governor of Rome, and Deputy of the Senate, that they would cauſe the Altar of Victory to be repaired, that ſo the Oath might be adminiſtred according to antient Cuſtom upon the Altar, and that they would reſtore to the Veſtal College and the Prieſts of the Gods, the Goods and Priveleges of which they had been unjuſtly deprived, ſince the Gods being provoked with the Injuries done to their Prieſts, had avenged themſelves by a cruel Famine, wherewith the Empire was afflicted. He aſſerts, That they ought not to imitate the Emperors who have taken away thoſe antient Ceremonies. He introduces the City of Rome deſiring this Reſtauration, and he affirms that this may be done without any Expence to the Treaſury. This Petition was written with all the Eloquence and Politeneſs poſſible.

St. Ambroſe anſwers it in the following Letter, and reduces the Reaſons of this Requeſt to theſe three: The firſt is the Claim which the City of Rome makes to her antient Ceremonies: The ſecond is the Injuſtice which is done to the Veſtal Virgins, and the Prieſts of the falſe Gods, by deſpoiling them of their Revenues: The third is the Vengeance which the Gods have ſent down upon the Em-

(d) This is an Opinion which is not ſupported by any reaſonable Conjecture, &c.] Theſe Acts are written in a Simple and Natural way. The Queſtions which are put to the Accus'd, and the Anſwers which they give, are not of the nature of thoſe that are made at pleaſure; but ſuch as are made in the ordinary Forms. There is nothing in them which ſmells of Forgery. They contain particular Facts, which could not be known by any Man that had lived but 30 Years after. There is no Error in them contrary to Hiſtory. In the other Letters of the Council of Aquileia, there is mention made of two Biſhops of Dacia and Myſia condemned by this Council. The Biſhops which are named in theſe Acts, are all Biſhops of that time. What is ſaid there, that this Council was called together from the Eaſt and the Weſt, agrees with another Letter of a Council of Italy, where 'tis ſaid, that there was a Synod held in the Weſt, quæ videbatur ex univerſis orbis partibus eſſe præcepta. There were in this Council ſome Biſhops of Gaul and Africk. All the Biſhops are named there with their Biſhopricks: In fine, all things conſpire to confirm the truth of theſe Acts. The Opinion of Chiffletius is founded only upon frivolous Conjectures. Vigilius Tapſenſis, ſays he, obſerves that Palladius wrote a Diſcourſe after the death of St. Ambroſe to refute what this Saint had ſaid about the Trinity, and that Vigilius himſelf had anſwered this Work of Palladius in a little Book by it ſelf. What follows from thence? Vigilius wrote a Treatiſe againſt that of Palladius; therefore it was the Acts of the Council held againſt the Hereticks. Who can believe it? Is there any thing more different, than theſe Acts are from a Piece about Doctrine againſt any Author's Book? Theſe Acts treat of the judicial Condemnation of a Perſon, but ſay nothing of the Refutation of a Book. The other Conjectures are yet more weak. He objects, that theſe Acts are not found in the antient Editions of the Councils, as if the firſt Collectors had collected all: How many Councils did they forget, and Synodical Writings which are in the Works of the Fathers. 2. That Valerian of Aquileia is named there before St. Ambroſe. This Objection is no more againſt the common Opinion than againſt that of Chiffletius; for either Vigilius had the Acts of the Council of Aquileia, or he had them not; if he had them, why ſhould he change the Order of the Biſhops; if he had them not, wherefore was not the Biſhop of Milan placed before the Biſhop of Aquileia: He muſt therefore, as well as we, find out a reaſon why the Biſhop of Aquileia goes before the Biſhop of Milan: It may be, becauſe the Synod was held in his own City, and the Order of the Emperor for calling the Synod together was directed to him. The 3d. and 4th. Reaſon of Chiffletius, is, becauſe this Diſpute ſavours not of Epiſcopal gravity, and all the Diſcourſes there are made by the ſame hand. If one takes the pains to read the Acts, he will ſee that 'tis not ſo, and that there are Anſwers and Queſtions which are Originals, and could not be gueſſed at by any Author. He alledges for a 5th. Reaſon, that Anemius Biſhop of Sirmium, does there impertinently aſſume the Title of the Head of Illyricum. But 'tis certain that he enjoyed it in the time of Conſtantine, and it does not appear that he was diſpoſſeſs'd of it ſo ſoon after, ſince he enjoyed it ſtill in the time of Juſtinian. 'Tis not certain that Theſſalonica had yet received the Vicariate of Damaſus, and tho' it were ſo, Sirmium was always the Head of the Weſtern Illyricum; and it may be that the Biſhop of Sirmium contended againſt him for the poſſeſſion of this Vicariate, eſpecially at the beginning. Chiffletius pretends that Aſcholius Biſhop of Theſſalonica was preſent at the Council of Aquileia, but he has no other Proofs of it but the Authority of a Synodical Book full of Errors. The 6th. Reaſon of Chiffletius is, that the Anſwers of Palladius are ridiculous: But it may be they do not appear ſo ridiculous to all the World, and tho' they did, is this the firſt time that Hereticks have defended themſelves ill? I ſhall not ſtay longer to mention the other Conjectures, which are as weak as the reſt, ſo that there never was a fancy worſe grounded than this of Chiffletius about theſe Acts.

St. Ambroſe.

pire by Famine. To the firſt he oppoſes a contrary Proſopopœia, wherein the City of Rome condemns her antient Superſtitions, and demonſtrates the Advantages which ſhe has drawn from the Chriſtian Religion. In anſwer to the ſecond Argument, he compares the Virgins conſecrated to God with the Veſtal Virgins, and the Chriſtian Biſhops with the Prieſts of the falſe Gods. The Veſtals continued Virgins, becauſe of the Honour and Advantages which their Condition procured to them; but the Chriſtian Virgins have no other Recompence of their Virginity, but their own Virtue. They complain that the Prieſts of falſe Gods, are deprived of Revenues from the Publick; but the Chriſtian Prieſts are even deprived of the Right of Succeſſion. 'The 'New Laws, ſays he, have made this Regulation, and yet 'we do not look upon it as an Injury, becauſe we are not 'much concerned for this Loſs. The Prieſts of the Falſe 'Gods are capable of Donatives, but no Legacies can be 'made in favour of our Church-men. I do not complain 'of this ſeverity, ſays St. Ambroſe, for I would rather that 'Eccleſiaſticks ſhould have leſs Riches and more Grace. 'The Church hath no Patrimony but her Faith; if ſhe has 'any Revenues they are for feeding the Poor.' In ſhort, St. Ambroſe diſcovers the Falſhood of Symmachus's Suppoſition, That the Gods of the Pagans being provoked, ſent the Famine which afflicted the Empire the preceding Year. Firſt, becauſe this Famine did not begin till long after the Pagan Prieſts were deprived of their Rewards and their Honours. Secondly, becauſe this Famine did not continue long, and Plenty ſucceeded it, tho' nothing was done in favour of the Prieſts of the Pagan Gods. He concludes this Anſwer with ſhewing, that the Emperors ought not to expect Protection from the Gods of the Pagans. Theſe Pieces were written in the Year 384, when Symmachus was Governor of Rome.

The 19*th*. Letter to Vigilius lately choſen Biſhop of Trent, contains ſome important Inſtructions, which he counſels him to give unto his People. The principal is, to diſſuade the Faithful from contracting Marriages with Infidels; of this he treats largely in this Letter. But he admoniſhes him alſo by the bye, to teach his People the Obligation that lies upon them to pay Labourers their Hire; to inſtruct them that Uſury is forbidden, and to exhort them to uſe Hoſpitality. One of the Reaſons which he brings to ſhew, That a Chriſtian ought not to marry an Infidel, is this, That Marriage ought to be ſanctified by the Prieſtly Veil, and by the Bleſſing, How then can a Marriage be made between two Perſons of a different Belief? The Hiſtory of Sampſon and Dalilah, affords him a fair Field to enlarge upon, by which Example he ſhews that Chriſtians ought to ſhun marrying with Perſons of a different Religion. Vigilius died under the Conſulſhip of Stilico in 400 or 405. 'Tis commonly believed that he was 20 Years a Biſhop; yet there are Acts of the Life of this Saint, where he is ſaid to be only 12 Years inſtead of 20. If he died in 400, and was Biſhop only 12 Years, this Letter was in the Year 388. If he died in 405, and was 20 Years a Biſhop, the Letter may be written at the ſame time; it cannot be in the Year 381, becauſe the Name of his Predeceſſor is found in the Subſcriptions of the Council of Aquileia.

The 20*th*. Letter to Marcellina, Siſter to St. Ambroſe, contains a Relation of the Endeavours, that the Empreſs Juſtina uſed in the Year 385, to take from the Catholicks of Milan, two of their Churches, and of the manner wherein St. Ambroſe defended them. 'The Day after I received 'your Letter, ſays he, by which you ſignify to me, That 'you were very much tormented with troubleſome Dreams, 'here began thoſe Commotions which have created me a 'great deal of Trouble. They were not ſatisfied with asking the Portian-Church, which is without the City, but 'they demanded alſo the New-Church, which is within 'the City, and is greater than the other: The Lords of the 'Court and the new Officers, came to find me out, and told 'me that I muſt abandon this Church, and hinder the People from making any Sedition. I anſwered according to 'my Duty, That a Biſhop cannot deliver up the Temple of the Lord. The next Morning there was great 'Crying in the Church, and the Prefect came thither 'to perſuade us to give up at leaſt the Portian-Church; 'the People oppoſed him with their Clamours, and he 'retired, ſaying, That he would make his Report of 'what was done to the Emperor. The next day, which 'was Sunday, after the Reading and Sermon, when I was 'explaining the Creed to the Catechumens, I was told, that 'Serjeants were ſent to ſeize upon the Portian-Church, that 'they had already hung up Curtains, and that a great many 'People were flocking thither; I went on ſtill in diſcharging my Duty and began Maſs; but as I was offering, I 'was informed, that the People having met with an Arian 'Prieſt, called Cartulus, had laid Hands upon him. This 'made me weep, and I prayed to God in the midſt of the 'Holy Sacrifice, that he would hinder the ſhedding of Blood 'in the Quarrel of this Church. At the ſame time I ſent 'Prieſts and Deacons to recover this Man out of the Hands 'of the People. Immediately very ſevere Sentences were 'paſſed, Firſt, againſt all the Companies of Merchants; ſo 'that at this Holy Time, which was the laſt Week of Lent, 'when Priſoners were wont to be ſet at Liberty, there was 'nothing heard every where but the rattling of Chains where-with innocent Men were loaded, and great Sums of Money were extorted from the People. The Officers threatned Perſons of Quality if they would not deliver up the 'Church to them. The Counts and Tribunes came to me, 'and required me to deliver up the Church preſently, ſaying, That the Emperor, in whoſe power all things are, 'does but demand his Right. I anſwered them, Did he demand any thing of mine, my Money, or my Land, I ſhould 'willingly give them up to him, tho' all that I have belongs 'to the Poor; but Places conſecrated to God belong not 'to the Emperor, neither is it in my power to give them. 'If you ſhould demand my Patrimony, ſaid I to them, take 'it; If you would have my Perſon, I am here ready for 'you, carry me away Priſoner, put me to death, if you pleaſe; 'In ſhort, do with me what you pleaſe, I'm content, I will 'not call upon the People to ſuccour me, I will not proſtrate my ſelf before the Altar to beg my Life, but I will 'rather willingly ſacrifice my ſelf for the Altar's ſake. I 'was deſired to put a ſtop to the Sedition of the People. 'I anſwered, That all that I could do, was to give no Encouragement to it, but God only could appeaſe it; That if 'they thought I was the Cauſe of it, the Emperor might 'baniſh me whitherſoever he pleaſed. I paſſed the reſt of 'the Day in the Old Church, and at night I went back to 'ſleep at my own Houſe, that they might find me ready 'to be gone if they had a mind to force me away. Next 'Morning the Church was encompaſſed with Soldiers; 'the People came ſtill flocking thither in great Multitudes; 'the Soldiers who had Orders to ſeize upon it, joyned with 'the People in the Prayers which were put up in it.' In the mean time, St. Ambroſe preached in another Church about the preſent Calamities. He recites here his Sermon full of Boldneſs and Reſpect, out of which take an excellent paſſage as follows. 'I was commanded to deliver up 'the Church; I anſwered, that it was not lawful for me 'to deliver it up, nor for you, Prince, to receive it. You 'cannot juſtly invade the Houſe of any particular Man, 'and would you forcibly take away the Houſe of Jeſus 'Chriſt? I was told that every thing is lawful to the Emperor. I anſwered, That the Emperor has no Juriſdiction 'over Divine Things; That he ought not to aſſume this 'Boldneſs, and if he would reign long he muſt ſubmit to 'God: For 'tis written, we muſt render to God what is 'God's, and to Cæſar what is Cæſar's; the Palaces are for 'Kings, the Churches for Biſhops: The Emperor has power over the Walls of the City, but not over Sacred Edifices. 'Twas ſaid, but 'tis very juſt that the Emperor 'ſhould have a Church for himſelf. No, he ought not to 'have any.' Here ſome came and told him, That they had already brought the Royal Hangings into the Church, and that the People which were there, earneſtly deſired his Preſence. This gave him occaſion to apply the Pſalm which was read that Morning to the Caſe in hand, O Lord, the Heathens are come into thine Inheritance, &c. While he was diſcourſing upon this Subject, there came a Notary in the Emperor's Name to ask him, why he had acted contrary to the Orders of his Majeſty. St. Ambroſe anſwered, That he did not believe that he had done it. 'Why then, ſays 'the Notary, did you ſend Presbyters into the Church 'which he had a mind to take Poſſeſſion of? If you be 'a Tyrant, the Emperor deſires that you would declare 'your ſelf ſo, that he may know what he has to do.' St. Ambroſe anſwered, That he had done nothing contrary to the Reſpect which he owed to the Emperor, nor contrary to the Intereſt of the Church: That he had indeed ſent Presbyters to this Church, but he did not believe that he had herein done any thing contrary to his Authority; That if they took him for a Tyrant, they might put him to death; That he had no other Arms to defend himſelf withal but the Invocation of the Name of Jeſus Chriſt; That under the antient Law the Kingly Power had been given to Prieſts, but they had never uſurped it; that Kings were more deſirous of the Prieſthood, than Prieſts of the Kingly Power; that Chriſt himſelf run away for fear leſt he ſhould be choſen King; that Maximus would not ſay, that he had been wanting in his Loyalty to Valentinian. In ſhort, that Biſhops had never been Tyrants, but had often ſuffered hard things from them.

St. Ambroſe.

All the Day was ſpent in ſadneſs, and St. Ambroſe could not return to his own Houſe, becauſe the Church was encompaſſed with Soldiers; ſo he paſſed the Night in ſinging Pſalms in the Church. The next Day the Book of Jonas was read. As St. Ambroſe was expounding it, word was brought him, that the Emperor had commanded the Soldiers to withdraw, and ordered the Fines which were exacted from the Merchants to be reſtored. 'What Joys, 'ſays he, what Acclamations of the People! This was the 'Day wherein Jeſus Chriſt was delivered up for us, the 'Day wherein Abſolution is given to Penitents. This is, 'writes he to his Siſter, what is paſſed, God grant that 'here may be an end of it. But the Threatnings of the Emperor make me fear ſtill ſome greater Commotions: He 'ſays, that I am a Tyrant and more than a Tyrant: And

St. Ambroſe.

'when his Officers prayed him to come to Church, he anſwered them, If Ambroſe would command you, you would deliver me up. Behold, what am I to expect after this! All thoſe that heard him ſay this, teſtified ſufficiently the trouble that it gave them; but there are ſome about him who have blown up the Coals. Calligonus Maſter of the Wardrobe came to me, and threatned me in theſe Words, Why do you deſpiſe the Emperor, Vengeance ſhall quickly come upon you? I anſwered him, That if God ſhould ſuffer theſe Threatnings to take Effect, he would do as Eunuchs have been wont to do, and I ſhould ſuffer as becomes a Biſhop: Heavens grant, that all the Miſchiefs which threaten the Church may fall upon me; That her Enemies may point all their Darts againſt me; that they may aſſwage their Rage with ſhedding of my Blood.' Thus ends this excellent Letter of St. Ambroſe.

Tho' the firſt Efforts of Juſtina had ſuch bad ſucceſs, yet ſhe did not give over her Perſecution. To colour her Deſign, ſhe cauſed a Conference to be propoſed between Auxentius the Arian Biſhop and St. Ambroſe, before ſuch Judges as they ſhould name, hoping by theſe means to have a Pretence to force him away. Then an Officer was ſent in the Name of Valentinian to ſignify unto him, That Auxentius had named ſome Judges, and that he ſhould name ſome on his own behalf. St. Ambroſe anſwered, That according to the good Maxim of Theodoſius the Father of Valentinian, Biſhops could have none but Biſhops for their Judges; That Laymen could not judge between Biſhops, and much leſs Infidels or Hereticks, ſuch as Auxentius in all probability had choſen. This is what St. Ambroſe remonſtrated to Valentinian in Letter 21*ſt*. which is properly a Petition, wherein he ſhews that he had done nothing contrary to the Reſpect which he owes him by this Anſwer; That he only followed the Law which his Father had eſtabliſhed, and that this was the Cuſtom of the Church: That if a Conference about the Faith was neceſſary, it ſhould be in the Church and before Biſhops: That if Auxentius ſhould appeal to a Synod, tho' it was not neceſſary to aſſemble one, (ſince if an Angel ſhould come from Heaven and teach a contrary Doctrine, it ought not to be preferred before the unanimous Conſent of all the Churches;) yet if a Council ſhould be aſſembled, he was ready to appear there; That he would have come to Court and to the Emperor's Council, if his People, his Clergy, and the Biſhops had not hindered him; That he was not wont to go thither but for the Intereſt of the Emperor, neither was it his Cuſtom to frequent the Court.

At the time when St. Ambroſe ſent this Petition to be preſented to the Emperor, he preached a Sermon to his People, to allay the Fear they were ſeized with, after they underſtood that St. Ambroſe was cited to appear before the Emperor's Council. This is placed after the preceding Letter. There he declares to his People, that he had no deſign to abandon his Church; That they might arreſt his Body by force, but they could not ſeparate his Mind from it; That he would never willingly forſake them, but if he ſhould be driven away by force, he would not reſiſt. 'I can, ſays he, ſigh and mourn, I can lament, Tears are my only Arms againſt Violence and againſt Soldiers; Biſhops have no other Defence. I cannot, I ought not to reſiſt any other ways; but as to flying away and forſaking my Church, that I will never do. You know that the Reſpect which I have for the Emperor does not make me yield cowardly; that I offer my ſelf willingly to puniſhment, and that I do not fear the Miſchiefs they threaten me with. If I knew that in my Abſence the Church would not be delivered up to the Arians, and if it were the Duty of a Biſhop to go to the Palace, I would go willingly; but this is not his Duty, for Matters of Faith cannot be handled but in the Church. If any one has a mind to oppoſe our Creed, let him come here, and I will defend the Faith which I profeſs, the Soldiers that encompaſs the Church and their rattling of their Arms, do not at all make me afraid, neither do they ſhake my Conſtancy; all that I fear is, that while you detain me, ſome Reſolution may be taken againſt you. I am not wont to have any fear for my ſelf, but I tremble for you. When the Veſſels of the Church were demanded of me, I ſaid, That if they would demand any thing that was mine, I ſhould willingly give it; That I could give nothing that belonged to the Church, and that in refuſing them I gratified the Emperor, ſince he could not receive them without doing an Injury to Jeſus Chriſt.' After this, he exhorts his People to continue Spectators of the Combat which he was to maintain. He ſays, that he had no Reaſon to fear, becauſe he was aſſured, that it was for the Cauſe of God, who could protect him againſt all his Enemies, and defeat all their Deſigns: That he had already ſmitten them with Blindneſs, ſince they did not perceive the Gate of the Church which was left open, tho' they had compaſſed the Church about, and ſought for a way to enter into it; that he went forth daily to make Viſits, or to go to the Sepulchre of the Martyrs, without being ſtopped by any Body, tho' 'twas already reſolved to drive him away, and that Auxentius had a Deſign to invade his Church. Here he inveighs freely againſt this Arian, and againſt the Law which he had gotten by ſurprize in favour of his Party. He obſerves, That he was ready to refute him, tho' there was no need of it, ſince Auxentius's Cauſe was quite deſperate, and he had been condemned even by thoſe whom he had choſen for his Judges, and in the Abſence of his Adverſaries: That after he was thus conquered, he would have taken the Emperor for a Judge, tho' he was yet but a Catechumen: That he had perſuaded the Emperor the preceding year to take away a Church from the Catholicks, but the Reſiſtance of the People hindering him from compaſſing that Deſign, he had charged St. Ambroſe with rebelling againſt the Orders of his Prince, tho' he always anſwered with much Moderation. 'If the Emperor, ſays he, demand of us Tribute, we will not refuſe to pay it him, the Lands of the Church do pay it. If he would have the Lands themſelves, he can take them, none of us do oppoſe it. I will not give them to him, but neither will I hinder him from taking them. We keep our ſelves within the bounds of a Juſt Obedience. We render to Cæſar that which is Cæſar's, and to God the things which are God's. Tribute is Cæſar's. No body refuſes him that. The Church is God's; 'tis unlawful to give it unto the Prince; he has no Authority over it. Could any thing be more reſpectful, or more to the Honour of the Emperor? 'Tis an Honour to him to be of the Church; he is in the Church, but not above the Church.

St. Ambroſe.

The 22*d*. Letter contains the Hiſtory of the Diſcovery of the Reliques of St. Gervaſius and St. Protaſius, and the Sermons which St. Ambroſe made to his People upon this Subject. It is alſo to his dear Siſter Marcellina, to whom he communicated an Account of what had paſſed in his Church. He writes to her, that having dedicated a Church at Milan, he was deſired to Conſecrate it with the ſame Solemnity, wherewith he had done the Roman Church (this was another Church which was near the Roman Gate) which he promiſed to do, if he could find any Reliques. That he had cauſed the Ground, at a place which was before the Rails of the Sepulchres of St. Felix and St. Nabor to be broke up; that in this place he found the Bones of two Men of extraordinary bigneſs with much Blood; That there were ſufficient Signs to diſcover that they were Martyrs; that having brought thither ſome poſſeſſed Perſons, it was known by their Agitation, that they were before the Sepulchre of Martyrs; that the People flocked together in great Multitudes for the ſpace of two Days to ſee theſe Reliques, and that afterwards thoſe Bones were diſpoſed according to their Natural Order to be carried into the Ambroſian Church; that they were laid up in Fauſtus's Church, where Vigils were celebrated all that Night, and the next Morning they were tranſlated to the Ambroſian Church; that while they were tranſlating, a Blind Man was cured. This was the diſcovery of the Bodies of thoſe Martyrs. St. Ambroſe adds two Sermons made to his People upon this occation, which contain alſo ſome Circumſtances of it. In them he obſerves, that theſe two Saints are St. Gervaſius and St. Protaſius. He does not tell us, whence he knew it: But St. Auſtin informs us that he had got an Account of their Death, and the place where their Bodies were laid, by a Revelation which he had that Night. He ſpeaks of the many Miracles which thoſe Reliques wrought, of the Poſſeſſed that were delivered, of the Sick that were healed, of the Hankerchiefs that were touched, to carry them to the Sick. He tells his People, that theſe Bones muſt be put under the Altar; that ſuch Victims could not be better placed than under the Altar where the true Sacrifice lay; that Jeſus Chriſt is upon the Altar becauſe he ſuffered for all, and the Martyrs are under the Altar, becauſe they were redeemed by his Blood. He adds, that he had deſigned this place for his own Burial place, becauſe it was fit that a Biſhop ſhould be interr'd in that place where he was wont to make the Oblation, but that he yielded this place to the Martyrs, and would preſently go and place their Reliques in it. The People earneſtly deſired, that he would put off the performance of this Ceremony till Sunday, but he would delay it no longer than till the next Morning. And then he made another Diſcourſe to his People, wherein he confutes the Infidelity of the Arians, and the Incredulity of ſome of the Faithful, by the Miracles which theſe Reliques had wrought, and chiefly by the Cure of the blind Man which was publick and certain. St. Auſtin Ch. 7. of the IX*th*. B. of his Confeſſions, and the Author of the Life of St. Ambroſe, ſay, that an end was put to the Perſecution by the diſcovery of thoſe Reliques, which diſcovers to us that this Letter was written in the Year 386.

The 23*d*. Letter is Written to the Biſhops of Emilia, about a ſcruple they had concerning Eaſter-Day for the Year 387. St. Ambroſe obſerves in the firſt place, that the Holy Scripture and Tradition teach us, that we muſt carefully find out Eaſter-Day; that the Council of Nice believed this ſo neceſſary; that they had made a Cycle of 19 Years; that by this means the Sacrifice in Honour of Chriſt's Reſurrection might be offered in all places in the ſame Night; that the Biſhops of Alexandria and Rome had already ready made Regulations of this Business; But since there were many who would also have his Opinion, he thought himself obliged to write his Thoughts; and tho' the difference at present was only about the Celebration of the next Easter, yet he would shew what Day should be observed for time to come, whensoever the like Question should return. He says, that there are two things to be observed concerning the Celebration of Easter, the 14*th*. Day of the Moon and the First Month; that this Time was fixed for the Passover under the Old Testament, and that Jesus Christ observed this Law, by Celebrating the Passover on Thursday the 14*th*. Day of the Moon of March, and by being crucified on Friday the 15*th*. and rising the Sunday following. That therefore Christians ought to Celebrate the Feast of the Resurrection on the Sunday after the 14*th*. Day of March-Moon, a Day on which it is not any more lawful to Fast; and when the 14*th*. Day of the Moon happens to be Sunday, as it will fall out to be quickly, we must put off the Solemnity of Easter, till the following Sunday, because we must not Fast upon Easter-Day, nor break our Fast upon the 14*th*. Day, which is the Day wherein Jesus Christ was delivered up to be crucified. He proves by Examples that this is the Custom. He speaks afterwards of the First Month, and shews that 'tis not necessary to Celebrate the Day of the Resurrection in the First Month, Provided the Day of the Passion happens in it. He makes this Remark, because he was treating of the Passover for the Year 387. which was to be Celebrated on the 23*d*. of April, a Day which seemed not to belong to the same Lunar Month. 'Tis certain that St. Ambrose speaks of the Easter of that Year as being quickly to come to pass, quod futurum est proximè, and that he speaks of the Easter of the Year 380, as being already passed some Years ago, superioribus temporibus; which proves, that this Letter was written in 386, or 387, tho' there be a place in this Letter, which seems to prove, that it was written in the Year 381, because he speaks of the Easter, for the Year 378, as being two Years before. But this must be a Fault in the Transcriber; for what probability is there, that he should take so much Pains to fix an Easter which was not to happen till Six Years after, and that he should speak of it as the next Festival?

In Letter 24*th*. St. Ambrose gives an account to the Emperor Valentinian, to whom it is addressed, of his Embassy to Maximus, which the Emperor had entrusted with him the second time in the Year 386. He tells him, that when he came to Triers, he desired to discourse with Maximus in private, but he would not say any thing but in his Council, tho' he was told, that it was not the Custom for Bishops to do so; that when he was admitted there, Maximus came to salute him, but he would not receive his Kiss till after much Discourse; that Maximus accused him of putting a trick upon him in his first Embassy, and hindering his Passage into Italy; that he excused himself, and proved from the several Steps that he had made, that he had no design to deceive him; that he came to treat about a Peace in the Name of his Prince, and that not being able to conclude it, he returned; that he had not passed his Word to him that Valentinian should come and meet him; that he had never dissuaded this Emperor from doing it; that this Resolution of his was taken before he returned, and that he had sent Deputies to acquaint Maximus that he would not come; that he had acted with all the Moderation that is possible; that he had sent back his own Brother to him, tho' Maximus had put Valentinian's to Death, and by an unheard of Inhumanity refused still to restore his Body; that Valentinian had preferred Peace to War, tho' he might hope for Succours from the Huns and Alanes against the Barbarians whom Maximus had brought into the Empire; that Maximus ought not to blame those, who being with Valentinian, made their escape and fled to Theodosius for Refuge, since he put all to Death that he could lay hands upon, and among the rest, one Vallion, who was a brave Captain; that after this Discourse he received no other Answer from Maximus but that he would consider what he had to do. St. Ambrose adds, that Maximus understanding that he would not Communicate either with the Bishops who had received him into Communion, or who had desired the Death of some Heteticks, he received Orders to be gone Immediately, and at his going away, he had the dissatisfaction to see the Holy Bishop Hyginus sent into Banishment, and used with all possible Rigour, so that his Age and bad Usage reduced him to that condition, which left him no hopes but of Death.

The Two following Letters are about a Question which Studius had put to St. Ambrose; Whether a Magistrate ought to Condemn Criminals to Death, and whether he that Condemns such Persons should be excommunicated. The practice in St. Ambrose's time was not very certain: Some Bishops excluded them from Communion, others on the Contrary received them; nay, there was also an example of some Bishops, who a little while before desired the death of the Priscillianists: Some Magistrates themselves abstained from these things. St. Ambrose confesses, that we ought not to excommunicate a Magistrate, who, according to the Duty of his Office, Condemns a Man to Death, and Orders him to be Executed; but he wishes that Judges would abstain from doing it, and would have no Criminal condemned to Death, but only to a Prison or some other Punishment, that so they may have opportunity to reform themselves and do Penance if they be Baptized, or to receive Baptism if they be Catechumens. To prove that a Christian Magistrate ought to use this Clemency, he alledges the Judgment which Jesus Christ gave of the Woman taken in Adultery and makes many Reflections upon this Action in this Letter and the next. These Letters were written after Judgment was given against the Priscillianists, about the Year 386.

St. Ambrose.

The seven following Letters to Irenæus contain Allegorical Explications of some Difficulties about Passages of the Holy Scripture. There are Four of them which were formerly among the Treatises upon the Holy Scripture. 'Tis thought they were written about the Year 386; but there is no convincing proof of it. The order in which they are to be placed is better ascertained, because it is authorized by the first Words at the beginning of each Letter.

The Three Letters to Orontianus were written immediately after one another. In the Third he speaks of his own Persecution, and therefore they were written after the Year 386. These are also about some Difficulties of Scripture.

The Letters 37*th*, and 38*th*. to Simplicius are about Morality. In them St. Ambrose shews, that none but a Wise Man can be truly Free and truly Rich. These Letters are placed in the Year 387, tho' without certain proof.

The 39*th*. is a Letter of Consolation to Sabinus upon the death of his Sister. He says, that as he returned from Bolonia, he saw the Cities ruined. This may have reference to the irruption of Maximus, or that of Eugenius.

The 40*th*. Letter to Theodosius is more considerable. The Governor of the East had written to Theodosius, who was then at Milan after the death of Maximus in 388, or 389. That a Synagogue of the Jews and a Temple of the Valentinians were burnt, and that the Bishop was the cause of this Conflagration. Theodosius gave order that those who had done this Action should be punished, and that the Bishop should re-build this Synagogue at his own Charge. St. Ambrose who was then at Aquileia, understanding that Theodosius had given this judgment, wrote to him with all possible freedom, that his Order was not consistent with his Piety, and the Zeal he had for the Christian Religion; That the Bishop could not obey him without prevaricating. He defends also the Counsel of this Bishop, and the Action of those who had burned the Synagogue. He shews, that the Jews had often burnt the Temples of the Christians, without being punished for it, or condemned to re-build them; that it was unworthy of a Christian Emperor who had received so many benefits from Jesus Christ, to take part with a Synagogue of Jews against the Church. In a Word, he heaps together many Thoughts and expressions of this Nature, which have more of Declamation than true Reasoning, to hinder any Reparation of the Injury which was done to the Jews by burning their Synagogue: He threatens also the Emperor to deprive him of Communion if he did not recall these Orders. He did not only write to the Emperor about it, but he also made a Sermon upon this Subject in his presence, which is related in the following Letter written to his Sister. He prevailed so far, that the Emperor promised none of the Christians should be sought after for this Cause, after which he went, says he, to the Altar, which he should not have approached if the Emperor had not passed his Word about that matter.

The 42*d*. Letter is a Synodical Epistle of a Council at Milan, being an Answer to that which Siricius and his Council had written to the Church of that City against Jovinian and his followers. This Letter is signed by seven Bishops, and a Priest who subscribed it in the presence of his Bishop and by his Command. In it they certify the Pope, that they were of the same Judgment with him concerning the excellency of Virginity. They prove that Mary the Mother of God never lost her Virginity in Child-bearing. They shew the necessity and usefulness of Fasting. Lastly, they condemn Jovinian and his followers whom Siricius and the Roman Church had condemned.

The Letters 43*d*. and 44*th*. are Explications of two Difficulties which Orontianus had started about the Creation of the World, which were not explained in St. Ambrose's Treatise upon this Subject written about the Year 389.

The five following Letters addres'd to Sabinus were written much about the same time: They contain nothing very remarkable.

The 50*th*. Addres to Chromacius is about the Prophecy of Balaam. St. Ambrose was old when he wrote it.

In the 51*st*. he exhorts Theodosius to do Penance for the Massacre done by his Order at Thessalonica, and represents to him the Enormity of this Action. This Letter was written in the Year 390.

The 52*d*. to Titianus contains nothing remarkable; he congratulates him that Ruffinus was made Prætorian Præfect, not only upon the account of the Honour that was done him by it, but also because this Office hindred him from St. Ambrose. being Judge in a Law-suit which Titianus had with his Grand-daughter whom Ruffinus favoured. Ruffinus was made Prætorian Præfect in 392. and so the date of this Letter is certainly known.

In the 53*d.* St. Ambrose testifies to Theodosius how much he was afflicted for the Death of Valentinian, which happened on the first of March 392, and this Letter was in the Summer following.

The two following Letters are written to Eusebius who was of an Illustrious Family of Bolonia. In the first St. Ambrose acquaints him with what he had done for an Officer whom he had recommended to him, and gives him an account of the News about his Grand-son Faustinus. In the second he writes to him that he had detained at Milan, Ambrosia the Sister of Faustinus. This is the Virgin to whom he had given the Veil, of which he speaks in the Book of the Institution of Virgins, published in 392. This Letter was written immediately after.

The 56*th.* Letter is an Answer of St. Ambrose to Theophilus, who had consulted him about the difference between Evagrius and Flavianus for the Bishoprick of Antioch. St. Ambrose tells him at the beginning of this Letter, that Evagrius had no cause to push on the Decision of this Affair, and that Flavianus ought to fear the event of it. He prays him to pardon these Words, which a just Grief drew from his Pen, because all the World quarrelled about them, tho' they did not sympathize with the Grief of others. He adds, that the Council of Capua having referred this Affair to Theophilus and the Bishops of Egypt, it was like to be determined by a Judgment which could not be suspected of Injustice, since the Judges did not communicate with either Party, but that Flavianus had recourse to the Emperor's Rescripts to avoid being judged by the Egyptians. This made St. Ambrose think that Flavian was in the wrong, altho' he did not find the Cause of Evagrius very good, and he condemns very sharply the procedure of Flavian. But Theophilus having written to him that some means of accommodating this Affair might be found out, he was not averse to it, and counsels him to cite Flavianus yet once more, and if he persisted to refuse to appear, then to accommodate this Affair as he should think fit: Nevertheless he ought not to violate the Canons of the Councils of Nice and Capua, and must still preserve peace with all the World, lest they should seem to destroy that which had been built up. He advertises him also, that it was convenient to write to the Bishop of Rome, being persuaded that he will give no decision which can displease him, because the way to maintain Peace, is to do nothing which may stir up Division among the Bishops of his own Communion. Lastly, he declares to him, that he will joyfully receive what he should determine if the Roman Church approve it.

The 57*th.* Letter about the Affair of Bonosus is not St. Ambrose's but the Pope Siricius's. For first, in it he speaks of St. Ambrose as a third Person. Bonosus, says the Author of this Letter, understanding your Judgment, sent to consult our Brother Ambrose, to know if he might return to his Church; and this cannot be understood of any but our Holy Bishop of Milan. There was no other Ambrose Bishop at that time, and tho' there were, yet 'tis plain that he speaks of our Bishop in this place, since it was he who presided at the Council of Capua, of the execution of whose Judgment he was treating. Secondly, The Stile of this Letter is no ways like that of St. Ambrose, and is very like that of Siricius. Thirdly, It appears plainly that it is a Bishop of Rome who speaks. Fourthly, Holstenius has published it in his Collection under the name of Siricius, upon the credit of the Manuscript in the Vatican. Neither is it to Theophilus of Alexandria that this Letter is address'd, but to Anysius of Thessalonica, and the Bishops of Macedonia. For 'tis evident that it was written to those to whom the Council of Capua had referred the Affair of Bonosus; and 'tis no less certain that it was referred to the Macedonians, to the Bishop of Thessalonica, and the other Neighbour-Bishops of Bonosus, who was Bishop of Naissa a City of Dardania. To convince any Man of these two things he needs only read the beginning of the Letter. I have read the Letters which you wrote to me concerning the Bishop Bonosus, wherein you desire our Opinion, either to clear up the Truth, or through Modesty only; but the Council of Capua having ordered that the Neighbours of Bonosus and his Accusers, should be Judges of this Affair, and chiefly the Macedonians, together with the Bishop of Thessalonica..... It belongs to you who are entrusted with this Cause, to judge according to the Order of the Council of Capua, because you are substituted in the room of this Synod, who has chosen you to enquire into this Affair. And the same Bonosus having sent to consult our Brother Ambrose whether he should enter into his Church, received for answer, that he should undertake nothing against your Judgment, but follow what you should Ordain, since the Synod has committed to you this Trust. Two things are evident from these Words: First, That the Bishops of Illyricum, and chiefly those of Macedonia, were entrusted, together with the Bishop of Thessalonica, by the Synod of Capua, to enquire and judge of the Cause of Bonosus. Secondly, That this Letter is address'd to those who were thus entrusted. But some may say, if it be so, why does it speak of the Bishop of Thessalonica and those of Macedonia in the third Person? Why does not the Author write thus, The Synod of Capua having referred this Cause to you and to your Brethren, but, The Synod of Capua having thought fit, that the neighbouring Bishops of Bonosus, and chiefly the Macedonians and the Bishop of Thessalonica, should enquire into and judge this Cause, &c. 'Tis easy to answer, that the Reason is, because he relates in this place the proper Words of the Synod of Capua. Now it often happens, that when such Writings are alledged to the Judges wherein they are spoken of, the way of speaking of them is not changed, but they are named in the third Person as they are in the Writings. But what is said afterwards is address'd to them, and what is related is applied to them. And this the Author of this Letter does in the next Line; vestrum est igitur qui hoc recepistis Judicium, &c. 'Tis needless to insist any longer upon a thing so clear; and therefore the true Title of this Letter is that which Holstenius has in his Collection; Siricius, to our dear Brethren Anysius, and the other Bishops of Illyricum. This Letter is no ways unworthy of this Pope as some pretend. He does not assume to himself the Judgment of a Cause referred to others. This is no ways contrary to the Prerogatives of the Roman Church; on the contrary this is according to Rule and agreeable to the Canons: This is the Practice and Judgment of the antient Popes, who had a most profound Veneration for the Decisions of Synods, and who inviolably kept the Laws of the Church.

St. Ambrose.

The Letter 58 is written to Eugenius, sometime after this Tyrant came into Italy, that's to say, in the Year 393.

The Pagans who had attempted thrice in vain to obtain of Valentinian the Restitution of the Goods which belonged to their Temple, addressed this New Emperor with the same Petition. He refused twice to grant it; but at last the great Lords of the Pagans having petitioned that these things might be restored, he did it, saying, That he did not give them to the Temple, but to themselves, for the Services they had done him. St. Ambrose, who mightily opposed all the Petitions of Pagans under Valentinian, speaks with no less Boldness to the Tyrant Eugenius, than he had done to Valentinian. He remonstrates to him, that how great soever the Power of the Emperor be, 'tis infinitely below that of God, who sees the bottom of our Hearts, and from whom nothing is hid; that he ought not to grant for the Importunity of these great Lords, any thing prejudicial to Religion; that the Bishops would not blame him for the Gifts which he had given to the Pagans; that they did not Envy them these Goods, but they could not approve of his Authorizing, by this Grant, the Use that these Pagans would make of it to restore their Religious Worship; that it was never lawful to contribute directly or indirectly to the Worship of False Gods; that in former Ages the Christians of Antioch dwelling at Jerusalem, being obliged to pay a Tax at Antioch, at the time of the publick Sports, would never give it, but upon Condition that it should not be employed for the Sacrifice of Hercules, but in other Expences necessary for the good of the Commonwealth; that if Christian Subjects being forced to obey, thought themselves obliged to do so, a Christian Emperor who was Master of his own Will, had much more reason to use the like precaution.

In the Letter 59, to Sabinus Bishop of Placentia, St. Ambrose makes an Encomiastick upon St. Paulinus and his Wife, who having sold their Goods to distribute the price of them to the Poor, had taken a Resolution to retire to Nola. This gives him occasion to shew the Advantages of Solitude and Voluntary Poverty. This Letter was written some time before St. Paulinus retired to Nola at the beginning of the Year 393.

The 60*th.* Letter is to Severus; where he speaks of a Priest called James, who was come from Persia to retire into Campania, that he might serve God more quietly; as also of the troubles and Wars wherewith his own Country was harrass'd. This Letter has relation to the War of Eugenius in the Year 393, or to that of Maximus in the Year 387.

The Letter 61*st.* to Paternus is about a Point of Discipline. This Man who had been Lord Treasurer, as we learn from the Letters of Symmachus, and the 14*th.* Law de Metallis, had consulted St. Ambrose, if he could marry one of his Sons to his Daughter's Daughter, or his Grand-Daughter. St. Ambrose, answers him, that he wonders he should ask such a Question of him; that the bare Proposal of the thing discovered that it was forbidden; that the Law of God forbidding the Marriages of Cousin-Germains, does much more strongly imply a Prohibition of this, tho' it was not by name forbidden in the Divine Law; that the Civil Laws forbid it, and that Theodosius forbad Marriages between Cousin-Germains; that if this Law were dispens'd with, yet it ought not to Authorize this sort of Marriages, because a Dispensation is only for him that obtains it. The reason which he alledges, that his Son was not related to his Grand-Daughter by the Father's side, but only by the Mother's side, proves nothing, since Marriage was equally forbidden between Brethren, whether they were born of the same Father and Mother, or of the same Mother and different Fathers. Lastly, he says, that it would be more advantageous to his Family, that his Son and his Daughter should should marry to others, because by this means he should have in his Family Children both by his Son and his Grand-Daughter. The Law of Theodosius which he cites is of the Year 384, and therefore this Letter was written after that Year: 'Tis there said, that Paternus possess'd a great Office which makes it to be placed in the Year 393, because the Law which we have cited, discovers to us, that in this year he was Lord High Treasurer, Comes Sacrarum largitionum: But he might have been so before.

The Letter 62 was written by St. Ambrose to the Emperor Theodosius, immediately after the Death of the Tyrant Eugenius, who was defeated and killed in the Month of September of the year 394. St. Ambrose retired from Milan when he understood that Eugenius was coming thither, that he might avoid meeting this Tyrant: But assoon as he was gone out of Milan, St. Ambrose returned in the Month of July. Some time after, the Emperor Theodosius having defeated Eugenius, wrote to St. Ambrose to return thanks to God for his Victory. This Saint made Answer in this Letter, that he would do it with Joy, and that he would offer up in his Name an acceptable Sacrifice to God; he praises the Piety of this Emperor, who did not seek after the Pomps of a vain Triumph, but desired the Bishops to offer up Sacrifices of Thanksgiving. He signifies to him, that he had satisfied his desire; that he had carried his Letter to the Altar, and laid it upon the Holy Table; that he held it in his Hand while he was offering Sacrifice; 'To the end, says 'he, that your Faith might be made known by my Mouth, 'and that your Majesties Letter might serve as Matter for 'an Episcopal Oblation.' Afterwards he praises God for having placed a Prince upon the Throne who surpass'd the greatest Princes in Glory, and the holiest Bishops in Humility. 'What can be wished for, what can be desired more, 'says St. Ambrose to him? you possess, Sir, all Virtues, 'you are a Prince of singular Piety and Clemency. All that 'can be wished for, is, that God would encrease in you 'this Piety, and that the Church which rejoyces that Innocent Men live in Peace and Tranquility, may receive also 'the Consolation of seeing the guilty absolved. Shew Favour at least to those who have not hitherto taken Arms 'against their Prince.'

The 63*d*. Letter address'd to the same Emperor, followed quickly after the preceding, wherein St. Ambrose begs favour for those of Eugenius's Party who retired into the Church after the Death of this Tyrant.

The 64*th*. is addressed to the Church of Verceilles, which had lost her Bishop. This was not Eusebius who died in the year 370, but Limenius who was present in the year 381, at the Council of Aquileia. If we believe the Acts of St. Gaudentius of Novara, produced by Mombritius and Bolandus upon the 12*th*. of January, St. Ambrose a little before his Death made a Journey to Verceilles, upon the account of some Dissention which was in that Church, which was probably about the Election of a Bishop; and this makes some believe that this Letter was not written till the Year 394. But this Conjecture is founded upon a very uncertain Ground; for it supposes these two things which are not well proved, First, that what is related in the Acts of St. Gaudentius of Novara is true; secondly, that the Division which obliged St. Ambrose to go to Verceilles was about the Election of a Bishop. It seems also that St. Ambrose needed not have written this Letter if he had been upon the place himself. Some have said, that this Letter was not St. Ambrose's, because that Venice is named in it: But if this Objection be of any force, we must also for the same reason reject the second Answer to Symmachus, which is without all Controversy St. Ambrose's. This Letter has his Stile and his Air of Writing; he has inserted into it some entire Fragments of his own Commentary upon the Gospel of St. Luke, and upon Psalm 119. He exhorts the People and the Clergy, to put an end to the Divisions which distracted them about the Choice of a Bishop. He admonishes them afterwards to beware of hearkening to two Men called Sermation and Barbatianus, who were gone out of a Monastry of Milan, to go and lead a licentious Life at Verceilles, where they preached, That no Merit belonged to Abstinence, nor any peculiar Grace to Virginity; and that it was a Folly for any one to fast and mortify himself. St. Ambrose makes a long Digression to refute these Errors, and to prove the Usefulness of Abstinence and Fasting, and the Excellency of Virginity. Afterwards he returns to his subject, and treats of the Qualities of the Person who ought to be chosen for a Bishop. One of the principal is, that he has had but one Wife. St. Ambrose extends this Prohibition to those also who had contracted a first Marriage before their Baptism. Thus he understands the Passage of the Apostle St. Paul, and the Canon of the Council of Nice. There is also another Condition observed by St. Paul concerning the Qualifications of a Bishop, That he should not be a Novice, or one lately instructed in the Faith. Because they transgressed this Rule in the Ordination of St. Ambrose, he is forced to justify himself, by saying, that he was Ordained against his Will. At last, he says, If great Care ought to be taken in the Choice of a Person who is to be placed upon any Episcopal Throne whatsoever, it was a Matter of the greatest Importance to place a Person of singular merit upon the Episcopal Throne at Verceilles, because the Bishop of this Church was entrusted with the care of a Monastry and a Church, and should joyn the practice of a Religious Life with the Virtues of a Bishop; as St. Eusebius did, who was the first that united these two things in the West, by settling Monastries in a City, and governing his Church without renouncing a Monastick Life. Here he enlarges upon the praises of this Holy Bishop, and of Denys of Milan, the companion of his Banishment, and of the Troubles he endured for the Defence of the Faith of the Church; and proposes the Life of their Disciples as a Pattern. He concludes with a long Digression, wherein he recommends the Practice of Christian Virtues and chiefly of Poverty, of Abstractedness from the World, of Retirement, of Patience, of Charity, of Abstinence, &c. I believe that this last part has been since added, and that it is a Fragment of some Discourse of St. Ambrose, for it has no relation to, nor connexion with what goes before.

St. Ambrose.

These are all the Letters of St. Ambrose, of which the Order and Time can be guessed at: The others which compose the second Class are without Date, tho' they have prefixed the Figures to these as well as to those that went before. The Nine first contain Expositions upon some places of Exodus, of Leviticus, of Deuteronomy, and the Prophet Micah. These were formerly among the Commentaries upon the holy Scripture. The four following are upon some places of the Epistles of St. Paul.

The 78*th*. addressed to Marcellus, is about an Arbitration, which he made of a Law-Suit that this Bishop had with his Sister. St. Ambrose was named Judge of it, but he chose rather to make an end of it, to the content of the two parties, by giving his Sister the Revenue of the Land in Question during her Life only.

In the 79*th*. he exhorts his Clergy not to neglect the Function of their Ministry, because of the Pains, the Fatigues, and the Persecutions they were to endure in the discharge of their Duty.

The 80*th*. 81*st*. 86*th*. 87*th*. 88*th*. 89*th*. 90*th*. 91*st*. and 92*d*, are short Letters about private Affairs.

The 82*d*. is addressed to a sick Man called Bellicius, who was converted in the height of his Disease, and was now beginning to recover. St. Ambrose tells him, that God had sent this Sickness to save him; that he had smitten him with this Infirmity to Cure him by it; that God knowing his inward thoughts, saw that he had good Designs but delayed the Execution of them, and therefore God had sent him this Sickness to serve for an Admonition to him; that he had already begun to know the Lord, but he was moreover to receive the Sacraments, by which the World is redeemed, Sins are pardoned, and Grace is Distributed. The following Letter is addressed to the same sick Person, wherein he compares his cure to that of the Man born blind. In Letter 84*th*. and 85*th*. he discourses of the true Treasures and the true Riches, and shews, that none but the Rich are truly happy.

The Funeral Orations upon Valentinian and Theodosius are placed here after the Letters of St. Ambrose; They are two Admirable Pieces. The first was spoken in 392. in the presence of the Sisters of Valentinian. There he Praises the Virtues of this Prince, and makes no doubt but he was saved, though he died before he received Baptism, because Faith and a desire of receiving the Sacrament supplied the want of it. He promises to pray for him. In the Second he particularly commends the Clemency, the Charity and Humility of Theodosius, and concludes with comforting his Son Honorius, before whom he spoke this Funeral Oration in 395.

It cannot be doubted but St. Ambrose composed Hymns. St. Austin in his Book of Confessions, B. XII. and in his Book of Musick Ch. 9. commends the Hymn at Vespers, Veni creator omnium, as St. Ambrose's. He could not be deceived in this matter; but since he has not set down the number of these Hymns which St. Ambrose composed, it may be doubted whether all those that go under his Name be his. Those for the daily Office appear to be more certainly his than the rest; to which may be added the Hymns upon the Hexameron. As for the rest they appear to be in another Stile, and of another Author. 'Tis certain that the Vexilla Regis is none of his.

St. Ambrose wrote also other Books which we have not at Present. We have already observed, that we have not now his Genuine Book of the Sacraments and of Philosophy, which is many times cited by St. Austin. The same Saint cites also the Commentary of St. Ambrose upon Isaiah, in B. IV. to Boniface, Ch. 62. and B. II. against Julian. St. Ambrose also mentions it in his Commentary upon St. Luke. We have not now his Instruction to Fritigilda, which Paulinus mentions in his Life, nor the Instructions to Pansophius.

But if some Books of St. Ambrose have been lost, it must be confessed that several have been attributed to him which are none of his.

First, there have been put out under his Name a Multitude of Sermons, and not one of them his: There are 36 of them printed among thoſe of St. Maximus, 14 in the Appendix to St. Auſtin's Sermons, two of which are in both places. That which was the 64*th*. is the Tranſlation of a Diſcourſe of St. Baſil upon the Words of the Rich-Man, I will pull down my Barns. The Expoſition upon Ch. 31*ſt*. of the Proverbs is the 37*th*. Sermon of St. Auſtin. The Benedictines did not think fit to print theſe, and ſo have only given the Catalogue of them. As for the Reſt which are 58 in number, they have publiſhed them here, but they confeſs that they are none of St. Ambroſe's: and indeed there is not one of them which has his Stile and Air.

Secondly, There have been attributed to St. Ambroſe ſome Treatiſes upon the Scripture, which having no Author that is known have paſſed under ſeveral Fathers Names. Such is the Diſcourſe of the Dignity of the Human Nature, which has alſo been attributed to St. Auſtin, under the Title of a Diſcourſe about the Creation of the Firſt Man, which Alcuinus cites under the Name of Albinus, and which has alſo been inſerted entire into the Book of the Spirit and the Soul. Such is alſo the Diſcourſe of the Forbidden Fruit, which is amongſt the Sermons of St. Auſtin. The Diſcourſes upon Elijah and Eliſha are the Sermons of St. Maximus.

The Treatiſe of the 42. Stations or Encampings of the People of Iſrael in the Deſart, belongs to a pretty antient Author, but it has not the Stile of St. Ambroſe. It uſes the Latin Tranſlation of Origen's Works.

I ſay nothing here of a Commentary upon the Epiſtles of St. Paul, which is believed to be Hilary's the Deacon, becauſe I have ſpoken of it in another place.

The Commentary upon the Revelations is a very late Author's. He ſpeaks of the Lombards and cites St. Gregory. The Name of the right Author of this Commentary has been found at the end of an Oxford Manuſcript, where it is attributed to Berengaudus, whom Dionyſius Carthuſianus cites with Bede and Haimo in his Commentary upon Ch. 10. of the Revelation.

To theſe Treatiſes may be added the Harmony of the Evangeliſts St. Matthew and St. Luke concerning the Genealogy of Jeſus Chriſt; for it is not St. Ambroſe's, becauſe this Author follows the Hypotheſis of Africanus, which St. Ambroſe does not.

Thirdly, there are many Treatiſes upon different Subjects attributed to St. Ambroſe, whoſe true Authors have been diſcovered.

The Treatiſe upon the Creed, which is better entituled in the Manuſcripts, a Treatiſe of the Trinity, and the Reſurrection, is a collection of Paſſages out of many Fathers. They have taken the liberty in the Roman Edition to make abundance of Additions and Alterations in it. The Benedictines will publiſh it juſt as it is in the Manuſcripts.

The Book of the Divinity of the Son is probably Gregory's of Bætica, as we proved when we gave an account of the Works of St. Gregory Nazianzen.

The Treatiſe entituled of the Myſteries of Eaſter, is a Sermon which is improperly divided into Chapters. It has rather the Stile of St. Maximus than of St. Ambroſe.

The Book of the Sacerdotal Dignity is Gerbertus's, under whoſe Name it has been Publiſhed by Mabillon in his Analecta where 'tis entituled A Paſtoral Book.

The Diſcourſe to a Virgin conſecrated to God has a quite different Stile from that of St. Ambroſe.

The Book of the Vocation of the Gentiles and the Epiſtle to Demetrias, are certainly none of St. Ambroſe's ſince they were written ſince the Birth of the Pelagian Hereſie. we ſhall afterwards examine to whom they ought to be attributed.

The 29*th*. Letter to Florianus is of a Stile much below St. Ambroſe's, and therefore it is rejected in the Appendix. 'Tis yet more evident, that the 34*th*. which is a Relation of the Martyrdom of St. Agnes, is the work of an Impoſtor who having written a Hiſtory as he himſelf pleaſed, added at the end, that it is St. Ambroſe's who having found theſe Memoirs in ſome Divine Books, wrote them for the Edification of the Church, and addreſſed them to ſome Virgins. The Stile of this Relation ſhews the Author to be a Liar, and diſcovers the Impoſture.

The 35*th*. Letter about the Invention of the Reliques of St. Gervaſius and St. Protaſius relates this Event after quite another manner than St. Ambroſe does in his Genuine Works, and is written in a Stile perfectly different from this Father's. The ſame may be ſaid of the 55*th*. Letter concerning the Invention of the Reliques of St. Vitalis and St. Agricola, which ends with this Form, regnante Chriſto domino noſtro, &c. which belongs to the Ages much later than St. Ambroſe.

The two Prayers for preparation to the Euchariſt, have nothing at all of St. Ambroſe's Stile. There are found in ſome Editions, many other Meditations and Prayers of the ſame nature, but none of them have any thing of his Genius.

The Book of the Combat between Virtues and Vices, which is alſo attributed to St. Auſtin and St. Leo, belongs to Ambroſius Autperetus, as is obſerved in the Preface to this Work, which is in the Appendix to the Sixth Book of the New Edition of St. Auſtin, p. 219.

The Expoſition of Faith is an Abridgment of St. Ambroſe's Book addreſſed to Gratian.

The Book of the Holy Spirit is a Fragment of ſome more conſiderable Treatiſes written by a Latin Author Antient enough, but different from St. Ambroſe.

St. Ambroſe.

The Book of Penance belongs to one Victor, as the laſt Words prove invincibly, nulla capiaris oblivione Victoris. The very Name of Victor is at the beginning of two antient Manuſcripts. We ſhall enquire afterwards, whether it ought to be aſcribed to Victor Cartennenſis, or to Victor Tunonenſis.

'Tis not neceſſary to adverti ſe the Readers that the Book of the Life and Manners of the Brachmans, is a Ridiculous Diſcourſe, and unworthy of St. Ambroſe, or any Man of Senſe.

The Stile of St. Ambroſe is not always equally lofty, for he proportions it, as St. Auſtin obſerves, to the things of which he treats. Sometimes it is very careleſs, ſometimes 'tis very labour'd, but 'tis always grave, ſerious and noble; it is ſhort, ſententious, and full of Strokes of Wit. The Books that he took pains about are very ſmart, exact, and ingenious; and adorned with Figures and Flowers of Rhetorick. His other Books, tho' they are leſs poliſhed, yet have their ſweetneſs and ſmoothneſs. His Words are choice enough, and his expreſſions noble. He diverſifies his Matter with a wonderful variety of Thoughts and Words. He is ingenious at finding out the moſt natural and agreeable Turns of Wit. He does not raiſe great paſſions, but he diverts and inſtructs his Reader, and inſinuates himſelf into his Mind and Heart by ſoft and pleaſant ſtrains. Neither does his Diſcourſe want ſtrength, and he urges a thing vigorouſly, when there is occaſion. As he joyned together in the conduct of his Life a wonderful Generoſity and inflexibility with all poſſible prudence and moderation, ſo he knew how to temper in his Diſcourſes the boldneſs and authority of a Biſhop, with an Air of ſweetneſs and charity. We have already declared, what Judgment is to be made of his Commentaries upon the Scriptures, and of his dogmatical Books. His Books of morality are certainly the moſt excellent of all his Works, and thoſe he took moſt pains about. There are ſome of his Letters which may paſs for Maſter-pieces in their kind, particularly thoſe which are written to the Emperors. He who wrote them, plainly diſcovers that he was a Man brought up at Court, who has ſuch a free Air and eaſy Way as is not acquired but by ſeeing the World. The conduct and Policy which he obſerved in the greateſt part of his Actions and Diſcourſes, diſcover likewiſe that he had been accuſtomed in his younger Years to manage great Affairs, and that he had a Genius very fit for them. He was but moderately learned, chiefly in Eccleſiaſtical Matters. But being born in an Age of great Light, and having great ſharpneſs of Wit, and a wonderful facility of ſpeaking, and labouring continually in reading the Fathers that went before him, he became able to diſcharge with Honour all the Offices of his Miniſtry, and to fill up the place which he poſſeſſed to his Credit.

The firſt Edition of the Works of St. Ambroſe, is that which Maffeilius Venia, an Auguſtine Monk, dedicated to the General of his Order, Ambroſius Coranus. The Time and Place where it was printed is not ſet down. The ſecond was made at Milan by the Care of a Prieſt called Cribellius in 1490. Theſe two Editions contain but a few Treatiſes.

[Cornelius à Beughem in his Catalogus of Books printed before the Year 1500. mentions an Edition of St. Ambroſe's Epiſtles in 1480. in Fol. Of the Generation of John, at Augsbourg 1476. Of the Flowers of Wiſdom, Homilies: Venice 1488. They ſeem by their Titles to be ſpurious.]

St. Epiphanius.

Two years after, Amerbachius Printer at Baſle, made another Edition of the Works of St. Ambroſe much larger, but leſs correct. This Edition was re-printed in 1506, by Johannes Petri Printer alſo at Baſle, who added only a great Index.

Eraſmus undertook a New Edition of the Works of St. Ambroſe which he divided into four Tomes. The firſt contains the moral Works; The ſecond, the Polemical; The third, the Orations, Epiſtles and Sermons; and the laſt, the Commentaries upon the Old and New Teſtament. Theſe four Tomes make two Volumes. This Edition was many times re-printed at Baſle, and once at Paris by Chevallon in 1529.

The Edition of Eraſmus being full of Faults, Johannes Coſterius a regular Canon of Louvain, took the pains to correct the Text of St. Ambroſe by many Manuſcripts, and cauſed it to be printed a-new at Baſle in 1555, by Epiſcopius.

At laſt, Gillotius having gathered together a much greater Number of Manuſcripts, cauſed the Works of St. Ambroſe to be printed at Paris by Merlinus, in the year 1568. This Edition, tho' more correct than all the reſt, was little minded, and in a manner wholly eclipſed by the Reputation of the Roman Edition which followed ſoon after. Cardinal Manſulus, who was afterwards Sixtus V. deſiring to purchaſe a Reputation among learned Men, undertook it while he was but a Cordelier and General of his Order, and cauſed four Volumes of it to be publiſhed when he was Cardinal, dinal, in 1579, 1580, 1581, and 1582, which he dedicated to Gregory XIII.

The 5th. and 6th. appeared under the Pontificate of Sixtus V. in 1585, and 1587.

This Edition was after that the Pattern and Original which was followed in the Edition at Paris, begun in 1586, and in all the other following Editions which are very numerous. 'Twas believed that a Book publiſhed with ſo much Oſtentation, valued ſo much by the Publiſher, printed on ſo fine a Character, and with ſo much care, muſt needs be very correct and perfect; and yet this Edition has many eſſential Defects which disfigure it. The firſt and moſt conſiderable is, that the Roman Correctors took the Liberty to change, cut off, and add what they thought fit, tho' they had no ground to do ſo from the Authority of any Manuſcript. They carried it ſo far as that they did not content themſelves with changing thoſe Terms which appeared to them harſh, and ſubſtitute others according to their Fancy, but they alſo blotted out or added whole Lines and Periods, which made a perfectly new Senſe, and altogether different from the Author's, as may be ſeen by comparing the antient Editions and the laſt, with this Roman Edition. Secondly, they have inſerted into the Commentaries the whole Text of the ſacred Books, which hinders the reading the Commentary of St. Ambroſe without Interruption. Thirdly, the Order which they have obſerved in ranging the Books is not natural. They have placed ſome Letters amongſt the Treatiſes upon the Holy Scripture, they have ſeparated Books that ought to follow one upon another, as the Complaints of Job and David, whereof one is placed in the firſt Tome, and the other in the ſecond; they have joyned together ſome Treatiſes which ſhould be ſeparated; they have ranked the Letters in a very inconvenient Order. In a word, by too much refining, they have corrupted all, as Faber ſays in a Letter to Fronto Ducæus, where he obſerves the Faults of the Roman Edition of St. Ambroſe. 'I have found, ſays he to him, that nimis fuere ingenioſi in alieno opere, as in the Books De Interpellatione ſanctorum Job & David, which they have ſeparated and placed the one in the firſt Tome, and the other in the ſecond; to do which they were forced, quædam interpolare minime probabili exemplo. They have done the ſame in priore Apologia David; and in the ſecond that which is yet worſe; for becauſe it is ſaid in the 8th. Ch. that the Hiſtory of David with Bathſhebah is not a Hiſtory (which ſhews that this Book is none of St. Ambroſe's, but ſome Origeniſts, who Allegorizes almoſt all the Bible, as alſo it ſeems by the reading of it to be collected and made up out of two or three Sermons) they have taken away five or ſix Lines which are found in all the antient Editions.' Fourthly, they have made a particular Claſs of ſome ſuppoſititious Books, and yet they have left a great number of them amongſt St. Ambroſe's genuine Works. There are ſome of them whoſe Forgery is ſo manifeſt, that they cannot be pardoned, ſuch as the Books de Arbore interdicta, de Dignitate Hominis, de Vocatione Gentium, the Epiſtle ad Demetriadem in Symbolum Apoſtolorum, and many others. They muſt be very ignorant who believed that theſe Books were written by St. Ambroſe, and very impudent who left them among his genuine Works, when they had a deſign to make a diſtinct Claſs of thoſe that were ſuppoſititious.

St. Ambroſe.

In ſhort, the Authors of this Edition have made no Notes, or marked in the Margin any different Readings; they have only added at the end the Theological and Scholaſtical Diſſertations of one Ferdinand Wellofillus, which are a Collection of common Places, and Paſſages of the Fathers upon different Queſtions, which are of no uſe at all for underſtanding the Text of St. Ambroſe.

Now to commend the Edition of the Benedictines, I need only ſay that they have avoided all the Faults of the Roman Edition: For firſt, they preſcribed it to themſelves as an inviolable Law, that they would put nothing into the Text, which ſhould not be approved by the Authority of one or more Manuſcripts, and they have changed nothing without acquainting us with the Manuſcript upon whoſe Authority they did it. Secondly, they have taken out the Text of the Bible, and left the Commentary of St. Ambroſe continued after the ſame manner as he compoſed it, excepting only the diſtinction of Chapters which is a great eaſe to the Reader. Thirdly, the Order which they obſerved in ranging the Books is plain and natural. Beſides this, they have noted the Chronology of each Diſcourſe, and ranged the Letters according to the Order of their Dates. Fourthly, they have not placed any Book that is manifeſtly ſuppoſititious among thoſe that are genuine. They have only left among them the ſecond Apology of David, and the Books of the Sacraments, becauſe many learned Men believe them ſtill to be St. Ambroſe's, tho' it is very probable that they are not. Laſtly, they have prefixed to every Chapter moſt uſeful Arguments, wherein they diſcover the time of each Work, and give the Contents of it. They have alſo placed at the Bottom of the Pages ſuch Notes, as contain not only the different Readings of the Manuſcripts, but alſo very uſeful Explications of difficult places in the Text, whoſe ſenſe they have diſcovered by the moſt diligent Enquiries with all poſſible Exactneſs, without diverting to Queſtions which are of no uſe for underſtanding the Text of their Author. All which give us occaſion to ſay, that this Edition of the Works of St. Ambroſe is as perfect as it can be, and comes no ways ſhort of the late Edition of St. Auſtin.

St. Ambroſe.

St. EPIPHANIUS.

St. Epiphanius.

ST. Epiphanius was born about the year 332, in a Village of Paleſtine, near the City of Eleutheropolis, and paſſed his youth in the Monaſtick Diſcipline with St. Hilarion, Heſychius, and other Monks of Paleſtine. He tells us, (Hereſie 26.) that he was like to have been ſurprized by the Hereticks called Gnoſticks, but God of his mercy preſerved him. He was choſen afterwards about the year 366. Biſhop of Salamis the Metropolis of the Iſle of Cyprus. In this place he acquired very great Reputation for his Ability and Piety; and happy had it been for him if he had not been engaged towards the latter end of his Life in the Diſpute of St. Jerome and Theophilus againſt the Origeniſts, which diſturbed his Repoſe, and created him a great deal of trouble. This Diſpute began in the year 391, between St. Epiphanius and John of Jeruſalem. He accuſed this John of maintaining the Errors of Origen; and going into Paleſtine, he Ordained Paulinianus, the Brother of St. Jerome, Deacon and Prieſt, in a Monaſtry which was not under his Juriſdiction. John of Jeruſalem complained immediately of this Action of Epiphanius, which was contrary to the Canons and the Diſcipline of the Church. St. Epiphanius maintains what he had done in a Letter which he wrote to John of Jeruſalem, produced by St. Jerome. This Conteſt farther exaſperated their Minds, which were already very much imbittered upon the ſubject of Origen; both the one and the other endeavour to engage Theophilus of Alexandria on their ſide. This Biſhop, who ſeemed at firſt to favour the Party of John of Jeruſalem, at laſt declared againſt Origen, condemned his Books in a Council held in 399, and perſecuted all the Monks that were ſuſpected to favour his Memory. Theſe Monks being perſecuted, withdrew to Conſtantinople, where they were well enough received by St. John Chryſoſtome: which ſo enraged Theophilus, that from that time he conceived a mortal Hatred againſt St. Chryſoſtome, as plainly appeared by his following Actions. Nevertheleſs Theophilus deſiring to ſtrengthen his Party, acquainted St. Epiphanius with what he had done againſt Origen, and ſollicited him to do the ſame thing. This Saint who had a great Averſion to this Author, aſſembled a Council in the year 401, in the Iſle of Cyprus, wherein he cauſed the Reading of Origen's Books to be condemned, and wrote to St. Chryſoſtome to exhort him to do the ſame thing: But he not approving of this Propoſition, St. Epiphanius came himſelf to Conſtantinople, by the Perſuaſion of Theophilus, to cauſe the Decree of the Council of Cyprus to be put in execution there. Socrates and Sozomen tell us, That before he entred into the City, he Ordained a Deacon in a Church depending upon the Juriſdiction of Conſtantinople. Cardinal Baronius thinks that theſe two Hiſtorians are miſtaken, and that the Ordination of Paulinianus made by Epiphanius in Palæſtine, in a place depending upon John of Jeruſalem, gave them occaſion to think, that St. Epiphanius had Ordained a Deacon in the Dioceſs of St. John Chryſoſtome. However this be, St. Epiphanius being come to Conſtantinople, would not hold Communion with St. Chryſoſtome, and alſo did all that lay in his power to procure from the Biſhops that were then at Conſtantinople, an approbation of the Sentence of the Cyprian Council againſt Origen; but he found but very few willing to ſign the Condemnation of one that died in the Communion of the Church, upon ſo ſlight Grounds, and others refuſed to approve his Sentence. St. Epiphanius not being able to compaſs his Deſign by theſe means, reſolved to be preſent the next day in the Church of the Apoſtles, and there with a loud Voice before all the People to condemn the Books of Origen, and all thoſe who defended them. But when he was in the Church, St. Chryſoſtome advertized him by his Deacon Serapion, that he went about a thing that was againſt the Eccleſiaſtical Laws, and which would expoſe him to great Danger, for it was to be feared, that the People would make ſome ſedition, of which he himſelf being the Author could not complain, after he had been forewarned of it. This Conſideration put a ſtop to St. Epiphanius's Undertaking, who was ſo tranſported againſt Origen, that when the Empreſs Eudoxia, had recommended to his Prayers the younger Theodoſius, who was ſeized with a dangerous Sickneſs, he cauſed this to be told her for an Anſwer, that the Prince her Son ſhould not die, provided ſhe would ſhun the Converſation of Dioſcorus

St. Epiphanius.

St. Epiphanius.

and the other Defenders of Origen. The Empreſs being ſurprized with this Anſwer, which ſhe did not expect, ordered him to be told, That if God would take away her Son, ſhe would ſubmit to his Will, that it was in his Power to take him away as he had given him to her, but it was not in the Power of St. Epiphanius to raiſe him from the dead, ſince he ſuffered his Archdeacon to die a little while ago. The Heat of St. Epiphanius was a little abated, after he had ſpoken to Ammonius and his Companions, whom Theophilus had driven away for Origeniſm, for theſe Monks gave him to underſtand that they maintained no Heretical Doctrine, and that he had condemned them with too much precipitation. Whereupon he departed immediately to return to Cyprus, and 'tis ſaid that being ready to embark, he told the Biſhops that conducted him to the Ship, I leave you the City, the Palace, and the Theatre. He died by the way, or ſoon after his Return in 402, or 403.

The Books of St. Epiphanius are firſt of all, his great Work of Hereſies, entituled, Παναριον or Κιβωτος, that's to ſay, an Apothecary's-ſhop, or Repoſitory of Remedies, which is divided into three Parts.

The firſt contains the Hereſies before Jeſus Chriſt, which amount to 46; the ſecond contains 23 of them, and the third 11 of them, ſo that this Book contains in all, the Hiſtory of 80 Sects or Hereſies, the Catalogue of which may be ſeen.

The Letter written to two Monks ſerves for a Preface to the whole Work, and for an Anſwer to a preceding Letter of thoſe two Monks, wherein they had deſired St. Epiphanius to ſet down in Writing what he knew concerning Hereſies. He ſeems to have begun this Book in the Year 374, and ended it about the Year 376. In it he not only gives an Account of the Hiſtory, and the Errors of the Sects and Hereſies he writes about, but he alſo refutes them as well as he could, and employs one part of his Diſcourſe in eſtabliſhing the Doctrine of the Church.

The ſecond Work of St. Epiphanius is his Ancoratus, ſo called, becauſe it is a ſort of an Anchor to which the Faithful may adhere. In it he explains the Doctrine of the Church concerning the Myſtery of the Trinity; he proves the Reſurrection, and refutes the Errors of the Pagans, the Manichees, Sabellians and Arians. This Book was compoſed for the Chriſtians of Pamphylia before the foregoing Book, as appears by the Preface, where it is noted, that he wrote it in the 10*th*. Year of the Emperor Valens, which is the Year 373.

After this Book followed his Anacephaleoſis, or Recapitulation, which is an Abridgment of his great Book of Hereſies.

In the Treatiſe of Weights and Meaſures, having explained the ſignification of the different Notes that are to be found in the Greek Bibles, he gives an account of the Weights, Meaſures, and the Money of the Jews, and other Nations. In this Book he gives a Catalogue of the Canonical Books of the Old Teſtament, according to the Canon of the Jews, which comprehends the Books of Ruth and Eſther, and he writes the Hiſtory of the Greek Verſions or the Text of the Bible. He is of Opinion, that the Lxx Interpreters, tranſlated all the Books of the Bible, and that they made this Verſion in ſeparate Cells, being all inſpired of God to compoſe it after the ſame manner. There is much Learning in this Treatiſe.

The Phiſiologus is a Treatiſe of a very particular Deſign, wherein he relates the true or falſe Properties of many Animals, and draws from them ſome moral Reflections, good and bad, as well as he could.

The Treatiſe of the Twelve precious Stones, which were upon the Pontifical Garments of the High-Prieſt of the Jews, is an Hiſtorical Explication of the Names, the Figures and properties of thoſe precious Stones. This Book has been cited by St. Jerome, in his Epiſtle 228 to Fabiola, and Anaſtaſius has made an abridgment of it, which goes alſo under the Name of St. Epiphanius.

The Book of the Life and Death of the Prophets, is a Collection of an infinite number of Fables and Trifles, which cannot be attributed to St. Epiphanius, without making him paſs for an Enthuſiaſt.

If we believe Petavius, The nine Sermons and the Treatiſe of the Myſteries of Numbers, which bear the Name of St. Epiphanius, are not this Biſhop's of Salamis, but ſome other Biſhop's who had the ſame Name, as may be diſcerned by the Stile and other Marks. Tho' I cannot perceive that theſe Books are more unworthy of St. Epiphanius than the Phyſiologus, neither do I find ſo great a difference in the Stile.

The Letter to John of Jeruſalem, tranſlated by St. Jerome, is made up of two Parts.

The Firſt is about the Difference which he had with this Biſhop about the Ordination of Paulinianus, and concerning Origeniſm.

The ſecond concerns a particular Matter of Fact which St. Epiphanius relates in theſe Words: 'When I entered 'into the Church of a Village of Paleſtine, called Anabla- 'tha, I found there a Curtain hanging over the Door, 'whereon was painted an Image like that of Jeſus Chriſt, 'or ſome Saint (for I do not remember whoſe Picture it 'was, ſays he:) But ſeeing in the Church of Chriſt the 'Image of a Man, contrary to the Authority of the Holy 'Scripture, I tore it, and gave Order to the Church-Wardens to bury ſome dead Body in this Curtain; and when 'they anſwered me in a murmuring way, that if I would 'tear this Curtain, I ſhould give them another, I promiſed 'to do it, and now I perform my Promiſe.'

St. Epiphanius.

The firſt part of this Letter is acknowledged by all the World as a Genuine Piece, but Baronius, Bellarmin, and ſome others are of opinion, that this ſecond is ſuppoſititious. They alledged many conjectures to prove it, but I find only three that have any probability.

The Firſt is, that this Letter ſeems to be finiſhed before the Relation of this Hiſtory.

The Second is, becauſe St. Epiphanius condemns in it the Uſe of Images as a thing contrary to the Authority of the Holy Scripture and the Practice of his own time.

The Third, becauſe St. Jerome making an extract out of this Letter in his Epiſtle to Pammachius, ſays nothing concerning this Hiſtory. Theſe Reaſons, however, appear not to me ſtrong enough to make me abſolutely reject this Letter. For firſt, altho' what concerns the principal Subject of the Letter was ended before the Second Part, yet it cannot be proved that the Letter was perfectly finiſhed: And St. Epiphanius being to write of this particular Matter of Fact, could not do it, before he had made an end of the principal Affair, for which he wrote; beſides, no Man can ſay, that this Letter was finiſhed before theſe Words which are at the end of all, I Wiſh that God may have you in his Holy keeping; Secondly, it is very poſſible that the Uſe of Images, which had been very rare in the firſt three Ages of the Church, was not yet eſtabliſhed in Paleſtine and Cyprus, and that St. Epiphanius, who was a plain zealous Man, thought it was dangerous to introduce it, and that he alſo ſpoke in too rigid a manner againſt this Cuſtom. Laſtly, though St. Jerome has Tranſlated this whole Letter, yet he cites no part of it in his Apology to Pammachius, but thoſe places which were to his purpoſe, neither does he recite the whole Firſt Part, and we muſt not wonder, that he ſays nothing of the ſecond, ſince it did no ways concern the Conteſt which he had with John of Jeruſalem. Moreover, this ſecond Part has the ſame Stile with the firſt, and it agrees well enough with what St. Epiphanius ſays in Hereſie 27*th*. It is cited by the Author of the Caroline Books, B. IV. Ch. 25. and 'tis ſaid in the 7*th*. Council, Art. 6. Tome 5, that the Iconoclaſts alledged that St. Epiphanius was of opinion that Images ſhould be taken away, which cannot be meant of any other place but of the ſecond Part of this Letter. Thus though it be true as appears by the Teſtimony of St. Gregory Nyſſen, in his Panegyrick upon Theodorus, and in his Treatiſe of the Divinity of the Son and the Holy Spirit, that from that time there were Pictures in ſome Churches, which repreſented the Hiſtories of Scripture, and of the Actions of Saints and Martyrs, yet it cannot be ſaid, that this Cuſtom was general; and it muſt be confeſſed that St. Epiphanius diſapproved it, tho' without Reaſon, and that he was miſtaken in ſaying, that it did not agree with the Holy Scripture: For I believe that it would be contrary to the Candor and Sincerity that Religion requires of us, to attempt to give another Senſe to his Words.

Laſt of all, we have a Letter of St. Epiphanius written to Diodorus of Tarſus, related by Facundus in Ch. 3. of his IV*th*. B. which is a kind of a Preface to the Book of the Precious Stones in the Garment of the Jewiſh High-Prieſt, written by St. Epiphanius at the requeſt of this Biſhop.

I ſhall not ſtay to give an abridgment of St. Epiphanius's Treatiſe of Hereſies, which would be an uſeleſs and troubleſome Buſineſs: I ſhall content my ſelf with producing in ſhort the chief Dogmes which he eſtabliſhes contrary to the Errors of the Hereticks.

Firſt, he proves the Unity of God againſt the Pagans, againſt the Valentinians, the Marcionites, and the Manichees. He eſtabliſhes his Immenſity, his Almighty Power, his Infinite greatneſs, his Spirituality, and his other attributes, by refuting the Hereticks who believed the contrary. He proves the Myſtery of the Trinity, the Divinity of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit in many places, and chiefly in Hereſies 62, 69, 71, 74. and in his Ancoratus.

In Hereſ. 23 and 65, he ſhews that God Created the World and the Angels.

He endeavours to explain in Hereſ. 70. in what Senſe Man is created after the Image of God.

In Hereſ. 24 and 36. he ſhews that Sin is not a Subſtance, and that God is not the Author of it.

He explains the Myſtery of the Incarnation in Hereſ. 77, 30, 69, and ſhews that Jeſus Chriſt was one Perſon only, compoſed of the Divine and Human Nature.

He ſhews in Hereſ. 77. that the two Natures were not confounded after their Union, and that they kept their own Properties.

He proves the Reſurrection in Hereſ. 42, and 64. and in the Ancoratus, where he maintains, that the ſame Fleſh which we now have ſhall be raiſed again.

He holds in Hereſ. 24, and 46. that Jeſus Chriſt deſcended into into Hell, to save those that had lived well and believed in God.

St. Epiphanius.

He teaches that the Soul is Immortal and Spiritual, and that it partakes of Happiness after Death. See what he says about this in Heres. 75.

In Heres. 8. he shews that the Sacraments of the New Law are more Excellent and more Efficacious than those of the Old.

In his Anchoratus he speaks of Faith as a Disposition necessary to the receiving of Baptism. Tho' he speaks obscurely enough of the Eucharist in his Anchoratus, yet he says enough of it to make us understand that it is truly the Body of Jesus Christ, and that the words of his Institution are to be understood according to the Letter and without any Figure or Metaphor.

He acknowledges Free-Will in Heres. 16, and yet he admits the Grace of Jesus Christ.

In Heres. 30. he speaks of the wonderful Effects of the Sign of the Cross.

He proves the necessity of Ecclesiastical Traditions in many places, and chiefly in Heres. 69. 51, and 57. he shews the necessity and usefulness of Fasting, in the Heres. 33, 75, and 80. There he observes that the Christians fasted during Lent, and every Wednesday and Friday in the Year, except after Easter until Whitsunday. He supposes that these Fasts are of Apostolical Tradition, and that we are obliged to observe them, and that we must abstain from Meat in the time of a Fast: He says that in the last Week of Lent nothing but plain Meats were eaten, that is to say, Bread and Water, and that many fasted the two or three last Days without eating any thing.

In Heres. 76. he establishes the distinction between Bishops and Priests.

He ranks in the Order of the Clergy, Bishops, Priests, Deacons, and Sub-Deacons. The other Ministers according to him do not partake of Holy Orders.

These inferior Ministers, are the Readers, Deaconesses Exorcists, Interpreters, Diggers and Porters.

He observes in Heres. 75. and at the end of Heres. 80. that the Assemblies of People in the Church were chiefly made on Wednesday, Friday, and Sunday, and also in some places on Saturday: That Baptism and the Celebration of the Eucharist were attended with such Ceremonies as were prescribed either by the Gospel, or by the Tradition of the Apostles. That Mattins were sung, and that Christians kneeled at their Prayers Day and Night. That Hereticks, Idolaters, and all those that were guilty of enormous Crimes were excommunicated, and their Oblations not received.

He proves Prayers for the Dead in Heres. 76. and refutes Aërius who said the contrary.

He says in Heres. 78. that the Saints enjoy eternal Happiness, and that we ought to Honour them.

As to the Honour due to the Virgin, he keeps a middle way between the Antidicomarianites, who dishonoured her, by saying, That she had other Children besides Jesus Christ, and the Collirydians who adored her. He says, that we must honour her, but we must not adore her, nor give her superstitious Worship. Read the Heresies 78, and 79: where he testifies that there is nothing certainly known concerning her Death, nor about the Place where her Body is: yet it seems that his Piety induces him to believe that she never died, but he does not deliver this Opinion as a certain Truth.

He praises Virginity in Heres, 4, 8, 5, 61, and 80. but he does not condemn Marriage, nor yet second Marriages. There he declares plainly that the Church does not admit any to Holy Orders, but such as will observe Celibacy, and that she excludes Bigamists.

And yet he confesses in Heres. 59. that there are still some places where the Deacons and Subdeacons do not observe Celibacy; but he adds, that this is done upon sufferance, because of the weakness of Men, or the Multitude of People. Lastly, he says, that it is a great Sin to violate the Vow of Virginity.

He says in Heres. 59, that a Husband, who having divorced his Wife for Adultery or some other Crime, marries another, is free from Sin according to the Authority of Scripture, and that he is nowise unworthy of Eternal Life, and that he ought to be permitted to continue in the Church.

He would not have Women undertake any Ecclesiastical Function, and he proves in Heres. 79. That this ought not to be suffered. In short, if one would have an abridgment of the Doctrine, the Discipline, and the Morality of St. Epiphanius's time, he needs do no more but read what St. Epiphanius has said of them at the end of his Book about Heresies, where he has given the sum of them, so as to serve for an Antidote against all the Errors of Hereticks.

Any one that gives the least attention to the Doctrine of Epiphanius which we have now represented, may easily perceive, that there is scarce any Author, who has made more Observations concerning the Doctrine and Discipline of the antient Church, contrary to the Errors and Disorders of the Innovators of our Times: Yet they have endeavoured to find in his Writings part of their Errors, and have had the boldness to impute to us the Heresies which he refutes. This Scultetus has done with so much fraud, that 'tis impossible to read what he says about it, without conceiving an indignation against so unjust a procedure. He says First, that St. Epiphanius rejected the Invocation of Saints and the Virgin in Heres. 79. but this is a mere Cheat. St. Epiphanius indeed there condemns those who adored the Virgin, and gave her that sovereign Worship which is due to God only: He maintains that the Church neither adores the Virgin nor the Saints, altho' she has an Honour and due Respect for them. And do not we say the same thing? and can any other Doctrine be imputed to us without a palpable Calumny? But, says Scultetus, St. Epiphanius says in Heres. 75. That the Saints were prayed for, and therefore he cannot approve of their Invocation. This Author methinks should not have cited a place which so plainly opposes the Opinions which he maintains, which I shall set down entire. 'As to what concerns the custom of reciting the Names of 'the Dead, what can there be more useful and more reasonable? this is, First of all to persuade those that are 'present that the Souls of the Dead are still alive, and that 'they are not annihilated. Secondly, to make us apprehend 'that there is good hopes of those that are dead. Moreover 'Prayers are not only useful to the Living but also to the 'Dead, tho' they do not blot out all their Sins; yet they 'serve to expiate some of those which they committed in 'this Life. We mention Sinners and Righteous Men; 'Sinners, to implore the Mercy of God for them; Righteous Men, such as the Fathers, the Patriarchs, the Prophets, the Apostles, the Evangelists, the Martyrs, the Confessors, the Bishops, the Hermits, and all Christians, that 'Jesus Christ may be distinguished from all his Creatures, and 'that we may learn to give to him the Worship that is due 'to him only; being persuaded that we ought not to equal 'Mortal Men to the Lord, whatsoever Righteousness and 'Holiness they have. After this he distinguishes two Sorts 'of Saints, those that are on Earth, and those that are in 'the Heavenly Jerusalem; and he adds, that the Church 'does well to observe a Custom which she has received by 'Tradition; that the Laws of our Fathers cannot be subverted, nor the Commands of our Mothers despised without impiety, according to the Words of Salomon, Hearken, my Son, to the Commands of your Father, and do not reject the Admonitions of your Mother. Jesus Christ our Father has 'taught us his Doctrine by Writing and by Tradition: 'The Holy Church our Mother has Laws which cannot 'be destroyed nor abrogated. Nothing is greater nor more 'admirable than those Laws, and all those who would oppose them, are self-convicted of an Error.' Can there be any thing more agreeable to the Doctrine of the Church, or more contrary to the principal Errors of the Innovators! But, says Scultetus, these Arabian Women who offered Sacrifices to the Virgin, did not believe her Eternal or Infinite. But tho' these Women did not, it may be, think so, yet they gave her that Worship which is due only to a sovereign and infinite Being, by offering Sacrifices unto her, and placing all their Religion in doing so.

St. Epiphanius.

The second Objection of Scultetus is about the use of Images, which St. Epiphanius condemns in his Letter to John of Jerusalem, and which he seems also to reject as contrary to the Law of the Gospel. We have already answered this objection, by saying, that indeed St. Epiphanius seems to have disallowed the use of Images, because this Custom was not then established in his Country. But 'tis certain, and Baillée himself does not deny it, that 'twas then established in other Churches. Moreover, we must not wonder, that St. Epiphanius speaks of it as a Practice contrary to the Gospel: For 'tis well known, that those who speak against Customs that were not established in their own time, do sometimes make use of Expressions too vehement in rejecting them; as for Example, St. Cyprian condemning the practice of those who did not put Water into the Chalice, makes no scruple to say, that their Custom was contrary to the Law of Jesus Christ. Many other Examples may be brought of this nature, and the Calvinists themselves must acknowledge, that the same is to be said of the Words of St. Epiphanius, since they cannot affirm, that the use of Images, whereof St. Epiphanius speaks in this place, is contrary to the Gospel.

[This Excuse is not defensible: The New Testament is as severe against Idolatry as the Old was, and more, if we consider upon how much nobler Foundations it is constituted. Neither is this only a Matter of Discipline; or if it is, yet it is not an indifferent thing. The Church of Rome was very sensible of this, when she removed the second Commandment out of the Catechisms, by which she orders her People to be instructed. If the Abuses occasioned by placing of Images in Churches had never been more dangerous than they were in St. Epiphanius's time, this Plea might have been valid for those Churches which still desired to retain them; or if the Church of Rome, in her Offices, Catechisms and Directions to her Priests to guide them in their Sermons and Exhortations to the People, had taken all possible care to obviate all Objections whatsoever which could have been raiſed, ſhe could then have juſtly urged it. But Mr. Du Pin knows very well that her conſtant connivance if not Command, has long ago precluded her from all Pretences of this nature: He knows alſo, that the Laiety in all Countries of the Communion of the Church of Rome where they have not been over-awed by a promiſcuous converſation with Proteſtants, have without check paid as groſs Acts of Worſhip to ſenſeleſs Images of (ſometimes fictitious) Saints, as ever the Heathens of old paid to the Images of Jupiter or Apis; and laſtly he knows, that his Church is in this Point wholly inexcuſable, becauſe it has eſtabliſhed and ſtill maintains a Cuſtom, not mentioned at leaſt, if not expreſly forbidden in Scripture; unknown to the pureſt Ages of Chriſtianity, oppoſed as contradictory to the Law of God at its firſt appearance, by Men eminent for Piety and Learning in the time when they lived, and received as Saints by the Catholick Church after their Deaths, and abuſed by the ignorant People to the baſeſt Idolatry and Superſtition in all Countries where-ever it has been allowed.]

The third thing which Scultetus pretends to find in the Books of St. Epiphanius contrary to the Doctrine of the Church, is the condemnation of the Sacrifice of the Maſs. He endeavours to prove that St. Epiphanius never taught it, becauſe, he ſays in Hereſ. 55. and 42. That Jeſus Chriſt came to aboliſh the Sacrifices of the Old Law, by one Sacrifice only. The meaneſt Writer of Controverſies would eaſily anſwer this Objection, by ſaying, Firſt, That St. Epiphanius in this place ſpeaks only of the Sacrifices of the Old Law, to which he oppoſes that of Jeſus Chriſt upon the Croſs, and that he does no ways exclude the unbloody Sacrifice of the Euchariſt. Secondly, That the Sacrifice of the Euchariſt, properly ſpeaking, is not different from that upon the Croſs, and that it is always the ſame thing which is offered, tho' after a different manner. Thirdly, That St. Epiphanius acknowledges, that the Prieſthood of Melchiſedeck, and conſequently the Sacrifice, continued under the New Law.

The fourth Objection of Scultetus is about Purgatory. He affirms that St. Epiphanius did not own it, becauſe he ſays in Hereſ. 59. That no Man can change his Condition after his death, and that then there is no more room for any one to repent and to merit Glory. But does it follow from this Propoſition which all Catholicks acknowledged, that thoſe who died in a State of Damnation could no longer hope for Salvation? Does it follow, ſay I, that thoſe who died in the Guilt of ſome ſmall Sins could not be purified from it after their deaths? All the Catholicks deny this Conſequence, and St. Epiphanius has plainly owned it to be falſe, when he ſays in Hereſ. 75, that Prayers for the Dead could expiate ſome Sins, tho' they could not blot out great Crimes.

The fifth Dogm of the Church which Scultetus oppoſes by St. Epiphanius, is the Vow of Continence: But the Paſſages which he alledges, are ſo far from oppoſing it, that they plainly diſcover that it was uſed in the time of this Father, and that the Church puniſhed thoſe very ſeverely who violated it.

The laſt is about Baptiſm adminiſtred by Women. St. Epiphanius in Hereſ. 76, ſays, that it was not lawful for them to baptize. Do not we ſay ſo alſo? But does it follow from thence that their doing of it in a caſe of neceſſity is not valid? This is what Scultetus ſhould prove, but it is not the Queſtion of St. Epiphanius.

Theſe are the falſe Conſequences which Scultetus urges to oppoſe the Doctrine of the Church: But he does ſo groſly calumniate us, by charging upon us the deteſtable Opinions of ſome Hereticks, that he muſt have renounced all kind of Modeſty to affirm ſuch manifeſt Untruths with ſo much boldneſs.

Firſt of all, He accuſes us of making Women the Miniſters of Baptiſm, as the Marcionites did. But where is it found that Women do Adminiſter Baptiſm in our Churches? They never do it but in great neceſſity. And 'tis no Hereſie to ſay, that in this Caſe all ſorts of Perſons may Adminiſter it, 'tis no part of the Error of the Marcionites or the Collyridians.

Secondly, He charges us with truſting to Revelations and Miracles, as the Nazarenes did. But is it an Error to believe that there have been, and that there may be Revelations? That Man muſt have no Religion who ſays the contrary. The Hereticks are to blame for feigning falſe Miracles, but the Catholicks are not to blame for Believing true ones.

Thirdly, He compares Tranſubſtantiation to the Enchantments of Marcus, who having put white Wine into a Glaſs, made one part of the Liquor appear Red as Blood, another of a Purple colour, and a third of a Blue. But what Affinity is there between our Holy and ſacred Myſteries, and the Diabolical Actions of theſe Miniſters of Dæmons? What Relation has our Doctrine to theſe Impieties?

The other Accuſations of Scultetus are no leſs Calumnious: For do we offer the Sacrifice of the Maſs in honour of the Virgin, as the Collyridians did? Do we teach that Concubinate is lawful, as Aëtius did? Do we adore Idols? The Images to which we pay a bare External Reſpect, are they the Images of Simon and Helena, and other Hereticks? Are they not the Images of Jeſus Chriſt and the Saints, to whoſe Perſons only all our Worſhip is referred? Do we condemn Marriage and the uſe of Meats as Tatian and the Encratites did? Do we believe that the Souls of the Wicked may be delivered out of Hell? In ſhort, is there any Similitude between all the Errors of the Hereticks related by St. Epiphanius, and the Doctrines of the Church? Do not we Believe what the Church Believed in his Time? Do not we Practiſe what ſhe Practis'd? On the contrary, are not they the Innovators of our Time, who take part with the Hereticks of that Time againſt the Church? Do not they deny with Aërius the diſtinction of Biſhops and Presbyters? Do not they find fault with Prayers for the Dead, and the Honour which is given to Saints? Do not they condemn the Celibacy of Prieſts, the Vow of Virginity, the Monaſtick State, the Ceremonies, the Sign of the Croſs, the Solemn Prayers? Theſe are the Errors which St. Epiphanius condemns in the Hereticks of his Time, and which he refutes by the Practice and Tradition of the Church. And therefore that may juſtly be charged upon the Sect of Innovators, which Scultetus has unjuſtly charged upon Us, That their Doctrine is a Garment patched together, and made up of many Pieces and many Shreds of antient Hereſies.

St. Epiphanius.

[Who is moſt in the right, Scultetus, or our Author, will not be hard to judge, to any one who is acquainted with undiſguiſed Popery; I ſay undiſguiſed, becauſe Mr. Du Pin goes upon the palliating Principles laid down by the Biſhop of Meaux. There is no queſtion but the Seeds of thoſe Corruptions began to ſpring up in St. Epiphanius's Time, which afterwards grew ſo high in the Church; yet tho' they honoured the Dead who died in the Lord, and prayed for thoſe who were Guilty of leſſer Sins, they neither called upon the former, nor believed a middle State for the latter, if St. Epiphanius's Authority be deciſive, in thoſe places which are faithfully urged by Scultetus. In the caſe of Images in Churches, Mr. Du Pin gives it up, becauſe St. Epiphanius ſays expreſly that it was againſt the Word of God: Contra auctoritatem Scripturæ. In the Matter of the Real Preſence our Author and Petavius before him, lay great Streſs upon a Paſſage in the Ancoratus Sect. 57. wherein ſpeaking of the Sacrament as Chriſt's Body, he ſays, ὁ γὰρ μὴ πιστεύων εἶναι αὐτὸν ἀλήθειαν, ὡς εἶπεν, ἐκπέπτωκε τῆς χάριτος καὶ τῆς σωτηρίας; He that does not believe it to be the real Body of Chriſt, as he ſaid himſelf, is fallen from Grace and Salvation. Now to know the full meaning of St. Epiphanius in theſe Words, we are to go back to the beginning of Sect. 55. There he raiſes a diſpute of the meaning of Adam's being created after the Image of God, ſince there is ſo great diſparity between their Natures: And he finds that this cannot be Phyſically underſtood, becauſe to be κατ' εἰκόνα, and to be καθ' ὁμοίωσιν, are very different things; yet ſince it is ſaid in Scripture, we ought to believe it.

Now to prove this Aſſertion he urges the Inſtitution of the Lord's Supper: Our Saviour ſaid (ſays he) of the Bread, this is my Body; and yet it is not like Fleſh in the leaſt, ſo as to reſemble Chriſt's Human Nature, nor like the inviſible Godhead, ſo as to reſemble his Divinity: But becauſe he has ſaid it we muſt not diſpute it, ſince if we ſhould diſpute it, we ſhould fall away from Grace and Salvation. This Illuſtration therefore cannot in reaſon be carried farther than the Original Queſtion which it was deſigned to illuſtrate; wherefore ſeeing that St. Epiphanius confeſſed, that when we ſay, that man is created after the Image of God, we do not mean that he is created after the Nature of the Inviſible, Incomprehenſible and Spiritual God; it is plain that his illuſtration of the Euchariſt is equally figurative as this Expreſſion of man's Nature, which he is now explaining.

But it is needleſs to run through all the reſt of the Articles here particularly named. St. Epiphanius's Authority is deciſive of neither ſide; if it were, we muſt believe that Divorces are lawful for other Cauſes beſides Adultery, and that ſuch Divorces perfectly diſſolve the Marriage Bond, for this was his Opinion, as appears from Hereſ. 59. Sect. 4.]

The Stile of St. Epiphanius is neither beautiful nor lofty, on the contrary, it is plain, low and mean, it is rude and unpoliſhed; without Coherence and Connexion. He had much Reading and Learning, but no Faculty of diſcerning, nor Exactneſs of Judgment. He often uſes ſuch things for Reaſons to refute the Hereticks which are falſe. He was very credulous and not very accurate. He is miſtaken in many places about very conſiderable Matters in Hiſtory, and gave credit too lightly to falſe Memoirs, or to uncertain Reports. He had much Zeal and Piety, but little Conduct and Policy.

The Works of St. Epiphanius were printed in Greek at Baſle by Oporinus in the Year 1544. Cornarius's Tranſlation of this Work, had been publiſhed and printed at Baſle by Robertus Ullinterus in 1533. The ſame Printer cauſed it to be re-printed in 1540, and in 1545; It was alſo re-printed at Paris in 1564, at Baſle in 1560, and in 1578, and at Paris in 1612, with ſome Corrections of Jacobus Billius: The Phyſiologus was publiſhed by Gonſalus Ponce de Leon at Rome in 1587, and printed afterwards at Antwerp in 1588: The Book of the Lives of the Prophets, was publiſhed in Greek and Latin with the Notes of Zehennerus, and printed at Scheuling in 1612. The Oration concerning the Burial of Jeſus Chriſt, was publiſhed in 1614.

At laſt, Petavius undertook a new Edition of St. Epiphanius, and having found the Verſion of Cornarius very defective defective, he made a new one, which he printed at Paris in 1622, together with the Greek Text reviewed and corrected by two Manuscripts. This Edition is in two Volumes in Folio; the first contains the Book of Heresies; the second contains the Anchorate, the Recapitulation, and the Book of Weights and Measures, of Petavius's Translation, the Physiologus, the Book of precious Stones, and the Homilies, together with the antient Versions of his Works, the Letter to John of Jerusalem, the Life of St. Epiphanius written by Metaphrastes, and the Animadversions of Petavius, which are rather Critical and Chronological Dissertations, than Notes to explain the Text of St. Epiphanius. This Edition was lately re-printed in Germany.

St. Epiphanius.

PHILO CARPATHIUS.

Philo Carpathius.

THIS said in the Life of St. Epiphanius, that this Saint Ordained one named Philo Bishop of Carpasus, and that he committed to him the Charge of making Ordinations at Salamis in his Absence. Upon this Ground it has been thought that this Man lived in the time of St. Epiphanius, and that he was Bishop of the Isle of Carpathus, which is upon the Coast of Asia, near the Isle of Crete: There has also been attributed to this Philo, a Commentary upon the Canticles. But all these Suppositions are found to be false: For first, the Life of St. Epiphanius which is filled with an infinite Number of Fables and Forgeries, was written by a modern Greek, and has no Authority, and can no more prove that there was a Philo, than that there was a Papius, or an Eudemon, or a Polybius, or a great many others whom this fabulous Author has feigned to embellish his History. Secondly, he does not say that this Philo was Ordained Bishop of the Isle of Carpathus, which was not under the Jurisdiction of St. Epiphanius, but of a City called Carpasus, which was in the Isle of Cyprus, mentioned by Pliny: Now it does not appear that this City ever had a Bishop. In short, the Commentary upon the Canticles, is the Invention of some modern Greeks which contains many things, that may be found word for word in the Commentary of Gregory the Great. And tho' it were true that these places were added, as some Authors have suspected, we cannot lay much stress upon an Author so little known as he is.

Q. JULIUS HILARION.

Q. Julius Hilarion.

THIS Author, of whom the Ancients make no mention, has written a Chronicle, or a Book of the Duration of the World, from the Beginning of the World down to the Year 397; which makes it credible that he lived about this time. He speaks of a Treatise which he wrote about Easter; he believed that the World would be at an end 470 Years after Jesus Christ, and he held the Opinion of the Millenaries, which still confirms his Antiquity. His Treatise was first published by Pithœus, and inserted into the Bibliothecæ Patrum.

Q. Julius Hilarion.

EVAGRIUS PONTICUS.

Evagrius Ponticus.

Evagrius Ponticus, a Disciple of the Macarii (not Evagrius of Antioch, mentioned in the second Volume, nor Evagrius Scholasticus) was Ordained Deacon of Constantinople by St. Gregory Nazianzen. He sided with the Defenders of Origen, and left Constantinople; but returned thither in the Year 379, to meet Melanius, and there took upon him the Habit of a Monk. From thence he retired into the Solitudes of Nitria, where he spent the rest of his Life until about the year 406. Socrates affirms that he wrote very useful Books: 'One, saith he, 'is entituled, The Monk, or of an active Life; the other, 'The Gnostick; i. e. of a contemplative Life, or for en'lightned Men. This Book is divided into fifty Chapters. 'The third is entituled Antirrheticus, which is a Collecti'on of Passages out of Scripture against the Temptations 'of the Devil; divided into eight Parts, according to eight 'sorts of Thoughts. He wrote, besides six hundred Gnostick 'Problems, two Books of Sentences: Whereof one is ad'dressed to the Cœnobites, and the other to a Virgin. Who'soever reads those Books, will easily see their Worth, and 'find them to be worthy of Admiration.' Palladius, Evagrius's Disciple, in the 86*th*. Chapter of his Monastick History, speaks much in his Commendation, and observes that his Writings were either Books of Piety, or Monastical, or Polemical Books; and this agrees with what Socrates said before. St. Jerome in his second Book against Pelagius, says, That he wrote to Virgins, to Monks, and to Melanius, and that he composed a Treatise of Apathy, i. e. Of Freeness from Passion; and that the Books of this Author were known in the West as well as in the East, because some of them had been translated by Ruffinus his Disciple. Gennadius mentions this Author in his Catalogue of Ecclesiastical Writers; and says, That he had translated into Latin Evagrius's Treatise against the Eight principal Temptations, One hundred Sentences for the Anchorets, Fifty for learned Men, and some other Sentences that were something obscure: He speaks also of certain Rules dedicated to the Monks and Nuns. There is a Book commonly ascribed to this Author, entituled, The Lives of the Fathers; and some have believed that Gennadius said so: But they misunderstood him; for he doth not say that Evagrius was the Author of those Lives, but that the Book entituled, The Lives of the Fathers, did make mention of Evagrius as a learned and pious Man: and accordingly we find in the 27*th*. Chapter of the second Book of those Lives, that Evagrius is mentioned, and his Learning and Piety are commended; whereas it is not likely that Evagrius would have commended himself.

We have some Fragments of this Author's Works, and several of his Sentences in the Code of the Monastick Rules, in the Lives and Apothegms of the Fathers, in the Ascetick Treasure, published by Poussin, and particularly amongst the Works of St. Nilus, where there are several of Evagrius's Writings; whether St. Nilus quoted them, or whether it happened by the Editions of Transcribers, is uncertain. Socrates Chap. 7. of the third Book of his History, cites a passage of Evagrius, taken out of his Gnostical Treatise, where it is said, That it is impossible to define the Divinity, and to expound the Trinity. The same Author afterwards cites two passages of Evagrius in the 23*d*. Chapter of the 4*th*. Book of his History; whereof one is taken out of the Gnostical Book, and the other out of the Practical Book. Maximus, St. John Damascene and Anthony, quote many Sentences of this Author, which are found amongst the Works of St. Nilus.

Evagrius Ponticus.

Cotelerius in the third Volume of his Monuments of the Greek Church, page 68, &c. hath given us part both of the Gnostical and of the Practical Books of Evagrius, which he took out of two Greek Manuscripts, and out of Authors who quoted those Discourses. They begin with a Letter to Anatolius, which is a Preface to the whole Work of the two Books: This Preface is followed by 71 Chapters or Sentences drawn from the Gnostical Book, which are written without Order, and confounded one with another: There is more Order in the 100 Chapters drawn from the Practical Book. The following Treatise contains eleven Instructions for the Monks. And this is what Cotelerius could find of the Works of Evagrius.

His Antirrhetical Treatise, or of the eight evil Thoughts, is equally imperfect, as we have it: For that which Bigotius hath given in Greek, the Translation whereof was found in St. John Damascene, and in the Bibliotheca Patrum, before the Book of St. Nilus of the Eight Vices, is not the entire Treatise of Evagrius, but only an Epitome containing the Titles, and the Sum of those Eight Chapters, as Bigotius judiciously observes, and may be proved by the Testimony of Socrates; who assures us, That that Book of Evagrius contained several passages of Scripture, whereas there is not one in this.

Some also ascribe to Evagrius the History of an Hermite called Pacon, related in Palladius, Chap. 29. and to be found amongst the Works of St. Nilus, published by Suarez at Rome, who observes that this Treatise was ascribed to Evagrius in his Manuscript, as well as the following, which is a Dogmatical Letter concerning the Trinity; the Author whereof refutes the Errors both of the Arians and Macedonians. This Letter belongs to Evagrius, who wrote it while he was at Constantinople with St. Gregory Nazianzen.

It is very probable also, that the Sentences or Maxims which are from page 543, to 575, of the Writings attributed Evagrius Ponticus. ted to St. Nilus, are written by Evagrius, as Holſtenius confeſſes, upon the Authority of Manuſcripts. The Greek Manuſcripts have quoted ſome of them under his Name, and they have great relation to thoſe which Gennadius ſpeaks of. To theſe muſt be added thoſe which we find under the Name of Evagrius, at the latter end of the firſt Volume of the Bibliotheca Patrum, in Greek and Latin, of the Year 1624; and a ſmall Treatiſe of the Names of God, which is very obſcure, publiſhed by Cotelerius in the ſecond Volume of his Monuments of the Greek Church, p. 116. Evagrius Ponticus.

MARK.

Mark. Mark the Hermite, of whom we are to ſpeak in this place, lived about the end of the Fourth Century; Palladius and Sozomen ſpeak of him as of a very holy Man. He compoſed ſome Aſcetical Treatiſes, which have been attributed by Bellarmin and ſome others to one Mark, who lived under Leo the Emperor, in the Ninth Century: But Photius having made a very exact Extract of thoſe Treatiſes, it is impoſſible they ſhould be of a Man that lived ſince him; And therefore, they muſt be aſcribed to that Mark who lived about the latter end of the Fourth Century. This is what he ſaith of it in the Two hundredth Volume. 'I have read eight Books 'of Mark the Monk, whereof the firſt is entituled, Of the 'Spiritual Life; it may be profitable to thoſe who have 'undertaken to lead a Religious Life, i. e. to be Monks, 'as well as the following; in which he ſhews, That they 'are deceived who think to be juſtified by their Works; 'ſhewing, that this is a very dangerous Opinion. He adds 'to this Inſtruction wholeſome Precepts, that lead to a 'ſpiritual Life. The third Book is of Repentance; his De'ſign here is to ſhew, that this Virtue is of uſe at all times. 'This Book aims at the ſame end as the foregoing, and 'the ſame uſe may be made of it. His Stile is clear enough, 'becauſe he makes uſe of common terms, and ſpeaks of 'things in general; but he wants the ſmoothneſs of Old 'Athens. If there be ſome Darkneſs, it doth not proceed 'from the Terms he uſeth, but from the things he treats 'of; which are of ſuch a nature, that it is eaſier to com'prehend them by practice than by diſcourſing. Wherefore 'you ſhall find the ſame Obſcurity not only in the Books 'now mentioned, but alſo in thoſe that follow, and in all 'the Books of thoſe that have written of the Monaſtick 'Life, and have diſcourſed of the Motions and Paſſions 'of the Soul, as well as of the Actions which they pro'duce; it being impoſſible to teach with Words thoſe things 'that depend upon Practice. The fourth Book, by way of 'Queſtions and Anſwers, ſhews, That by Baptiſm we 'have received not only the Pardon and Remiſſion of our 'Sins, but alſo the Grace of the Holy Spirit; and many 'other ſpiritual Gifts. The fifth is a kind of Conference 'of the Spirit with the Soul: Whereby he proves, That 'we our ſelves are Authors of our Sins, and that we ought 'to accuſe no body elſe upon that account. The ſixth is 'in the form of a Dialogue between Mark and an Advo'cate, who diſcourſe of theſe following Subjects: That 'none is to ſeek Revenge for an Injury received, becauſe 'the Wrong we ſuffer is to be looked upon as a Puniſh'ment for our Sins; he adds, that 'tis difficult to pleaſe 'Men, and that Prayer is to be preferred before any other 'Labour. He concludes, by explaining wherein the De'ſires of the Fleſh conſiſt. He treats of Faſting in the ſe'venth Book, that is not written by way of Dialogue. The 'eighth is directed to a Monk called Nicolas, treating of 'the Ways of appeaſing of Anger, and of quenching of Luſt. 'There is alſo a Ninth Book againſt the Melchiſedechians, 'wherein he ſpareth not his own Father, who had been 'tainted with that Hereſie.' Thoſe that would read uſeful Books, will not loſe their time in reading of this. The Order of theſe Books is not the ſame in all Copies; In ſome thoſe are found laſt which we have named firſt. This Obſervation of Photius is verified by the Latin Edition of theſe eight Books, which were publiſhed by Johannes Picus, Preſident of the Inqueſts in the Parliament of Paris, and inſerted into the Bibliotheca Patrum. The four firſt are there in Photius's Order; but the fifth in his Order is the laſt there; the ſixth is the laſt but one; and the Book concerning Faſting is immediately after that dedicated to Nicolas the Monk. That againſt the Melchiſedechians is loſt. This Author attributeth much to the Faith and Grace of Jeſus Chriſt, and very little to the good Works and free Actions of Men, differing therein from moſt of the Aſcetical Writers. He likewiſe aſcribeth much to the Vertue and Efficacy of Baptiſm; and pretends, that it delivers us not only from Death, but alſo from Luſt; and puts us in a condition of doing either Good or Evil: So that they who have received Baptiſm are as Free either to Good or Evil as the Firſt Man was. His Opinion is that a perfect Chriſtian is free from Temptations and from Paſſions; and maintains, that many of the Goſpel-Admonitions have the nature of Precepts; An ordinary exceſs of ſpiritual Men. In ſhort it cannot be denied that among many true Maxims, there may be ſome ſtretched, and contrary to Truth and right Reaſon: which is but too common in the moſt part of Books of a Spiritual Life, both Antient and Modern. The Original Greek of theſe Homilies is not only among the MSS. of the King's Library, and in ſome others, as Oudin hath obſerved; but alſo in the Firſt Volume of the Greek and Latin Bibliotheca Patrum, Printed at Paris 1624. Mark.

I ſay nothing of another Mark, a Deacon of Gaza in Paleſtine, who is reckoned to be the Author of the Acts of St. Porphyrius of Gaza, related by Metaphraſtes and by Surius; becauſe I reſolved not to engage in writing any Account of the Acts of the Martyrs, being unwilling to launch into a Sea where it is difficult to avoid being often Shipwrackt.

SIMPLICIANUS Biſhop of Milan.

Simplicianus, Biſhop of Milan. S*Implicianus*, Biſhop of Milan, Succeſſor to St. Ambroſe. exhorted St. Auſtin by his Letters to exerciſe his Parts, and apply himſelf to expound the Holy Scripture: So that he may be ſaid to have been to St. Auſtin, what Ambroſe was to Origen. We have found ſeveral Expoſitions of hard places of Scripture which St. Auſtin dedicated to him. He alſo wrote a Letter wherein he asked Queſtions as if he had been to learn, and yet Inſtructed by his queſtion. This is what Gennadius obſerves of this Author. St. Ambroſe writ ſeveral Letters to him; and we have two Letters of St. Auſtin, wherein he anſwered ſeveral Queſtions of Simplicianus, concerning ſome obſcure Paſſages of the Holy Scripture. This Biſhop held the See of Milan, but a little while, for he died towards the latter end of the Year 400, or in the beginning of the Year 401. Simplicianus, Biſhop of Milan.

VIGILIUS of Trent.

Vigilius of Trent. THere were ſeveral of this Name (a). He that we ſpeak of is the Biſhop of Trent (b), who ſuffered Martyrdom under the Conſulſhip of Stilichon, in the Year 400 or 405 of Jeſus Chriſt, to whom St. Ambroſe wrote a Letter, which is the 24*th*. among his Letters. Gennadius affirmeth, that this Vigilius, Biſhop of Trent, wrote a Letter or ſmall Book in commendation of Martyrs, dedicated to Simplicianus; which Contained the Acts Vigilius of Trent.

(a) There were ſeveral of this Name.] This is the antienteſt. There was another of Africa, who Wrote upon the Revelations, mentioned by Caſſiodorus in the 9*th*. Chap. of his Inſtitutions. Gennadius. Chap. 51, ſpeaketh of a Deacon called Vigilius, who wrote a Rule for the Monks. Vigilius Biſhop of Tapſus in Africa, famous for his Writings againſt Neſtorius and Eutyches, is a different Perſon from all theſe. There was one Vigilius, the Seventh Biſhop of Breſcia after Philaſtrius. One Vigilius a Biſhop ſubſcribed in the Council of Agatha or Agde. But theſe Names cannot be taken one for the other, without miſtaking the Chronology and Hiſtory.

(b) Biſhop of Trent.] It is certain that Vigilius, Biſhop of Trent, lived at the latter end of the 4*th*. Century, becauſe the 24*th*. Letter of St. Ambroſe is directed to him. Uſuardus ſaith, that he ſuffered Martyrdom under the Conſulate of Stilicon, who was Conſul in 400 and 405. There is more probability that it was in 400, becauſe in that very Year Siſinnius ſuffered Martyrdom.

of those who suffered Martyrdom in his time by the Cruelty of the Barbarians. Surius mentions this Letter, May, 23. And it is believed that that Simplicianus, to whom it is dedicated, is the Successor of St. Ambrose in the Church of Milan (c). There he gives an account of the Martyrdom of Sisinnius and his Companions.

Vigilius of Trent.

(c) 'Tis believed that that Simplicianus to whom it is dedicated, is the Successor to St. Ambrose in the Church of Milan.] This Conjecture of Miraus is indeed probable; This Letter is directed to one Simplicianus a Bishop. He of Milan lived at that time; and Paulinus observes in the Life of St. Ambrose, that the Reliques of Sisinnius were sent to Milan. It is true that Gennadius having spoken of Simplicianus as of an Author and Bishop known to him; and then speaking of Vigilius his Letter, he doth not say that it was directed to him, but only, ad quemdam Simplicianum, to one Simplician; which makes it doubtful, Whether it was to the Bishop of Milan that this Letter was directed. But perhaps Gennadius did not think upon it. However, Vigilius, Bishop of Trent, both lived and wrote at the same time that Simplicianus was Bishop of Milan.

PRUDENTIUS.

Prudentius

Quintus Aurelius Prudentius Clemens was born in Saragossa, a City of Spain, in the Year 348 (a); and being called to the Bar, was afterwards made a Judge in two considerable Towns, and then promoted by Honorius the Emperor to a very honourable Office. But at the Age of 57 Years, he resolved to mind the things of his Salvation, and to spend the rest of his life in composing of Hymns to the praise of God, and the Honour of the Saints; with some Poems against the Pagan Religion, and touching the Duties of Christians. These particulars of his Life are set forth by himself in a Preface to one of his Poems. The Catalogue of his Poetical Works, to the most whereof he gave Greek Titles, is as follows:

Psychomachia, or The Combat of the Soul, there he describes in Hexameter Verse the Conflict of Virtue against Vice in the Soul of a Christian; and particularly of Faith against Idolatry, of Chastity against Uncleanness, of Patience against Anger, of Humility against Pride, of Sobriety against Excess, of Liberality against Covetousness, and of Concord against Dissention.

Cathemerinon, or Poems concerning each Days Duty; they contain several Odes or Songs about the most ordinary Exercises of Christianity; As for Example; Prayers and giving of thanks at lying down and rising up, before and after Meals, about Fasting, upon the Death of Kindred or Friends, of the Nativity of Christ, and upon the Epiphany.

After these Hymns come several others, entituled περὶ στεφάνων, or of Crowns, because made in Commendation of Martyrs.

The following Poems regard several Points of the Christian Religion, and are therefore entituled Apotheosis, or Treatises upon the Divinity. In these he refuteth the Errors of the Heathens, of the Jews, Sabellians, Arians, and Apollinarians, and discourses of the Nature of the Soul, of Original Sin, and of the Resurrection.

Hamartigenia is a Treatise concerning the Original of Sin, against the Errors of Marcion.

The two Books against Symmachus oppose Idolatry. In the first is shewed the Original and Baseness of false Deities; and there is an account of the Conversion of the City of Rome. In the second, the Petition which Symmachus presented to the Emperors, to obtain the Re-establishment of the Altar of Victory, and of the Service of the Gods, with the Ceremonies of the Pagan Religion, is answered.

Prudentius

The last of Prudentius his Works is an Abridgment of some Histories of the Old and New Testament in Distichs. Gennadius speaks of a Book written by Prudentius, called Dittochæon, i. e. Double food, wherein he had comprized the Historical Part both of the Old and New Testament according to the Persons Names. This Book is very like that we now speak of, but only written in a looser Style, and far from the Beauty of his other Works. And whereas Prudentius calls the Dittochæon a considerable Book upon the Old and New Testament, this is a small one upon some places only; which makes me think that it is simply an Epitome of Prudentius's whole Work (b).

However, Gennadius says, that Prudentius wrote a Commentary upon the Hexameron as far as to the Creation and Fall of the First Man: But that Book is lost.

Prudentius is no very good Poet, he often useth harsh Expressions not reconcilable to the Purity of Augustus's Age. His thoughts are just enough, and worthy of a good Christian: He has some things elegantly written which are read with Pleasure.

Prudentius's Works were Printed and Published at Rome, by Aldus Manutius, in the Year 1501, in Quarto. This Edition was followed by those of Germany, and others which are conformable to them; where are added Erasmus's Notes upon the Hymns upon Christmas, and the Epiphany, and those of Sichardus upon the Psychomachia. The Edition of Antwerp of 1540 in Octavo, contains the Annotations of Antonius Nebrissensis and Sichardus. That of 1564. was made after the Notes and Corrections of Pulmannus, Graffemburgius and Victor Giselinus, who added his own Commentaries. Most of the late Editions, which are numerous, have been made after that. In 1613. Prudentius was printed at Hanover with Weitzius's Notes; and in 1614. the two Books against Symmachus were printed at Paris with the Commentaries of Grangæus: The last Edition of Prudentius was at Amsterdam, in 1667, in Twelves, with the Notes and Corrections of Nicolaus Heinsius.

(a) IN the Year 348.] He saith in the Preface to the Cathemerinon, that he was born under the Consulship of Salia; for so we are to read and understand that place.

Oblitum veteris me Salia Consulis arguens
Sub quo prima dies mihi ——

Most Authors understood not the meaning of it; as Aldus, Sixtus Senensis, Possevinus, and even Labbée who believed that he was Consul in a City called Messalia, which is thought by Labbée to be Marseilles: That is a mistake: They took the Name of the Consul Salia, who was Consul with Philippus in the Year 348, for the Name of a town; and so they ascribed to Prudentius the Consular Dignity that belonged to Salia, under whose Consulship Prudentius came into the World. In the same place he says that he was 57 Years old when he began to write, which shews that it was in the Year 405.

(b) Prudentius his whole Work.] This Abridgment is ascribed by some to Amœnus; and Georgius Fabritius observeth, that it goes under his Name in a Manuscript belonging to one of Strasburg. It is also printed under the same Name in some Editions of the Bibliotheca Patrum. In all the Manuscripts, Prudentius is said to be Author of it; and Aldus says, that he saw an Antient one where the Title of it was Dittochæon, or Dyrrochæon: But it is not to be Wondered at, if the Abridgment of Prudentius's Works made by one Amœnus, should be taken for the very Work of Prudentius, and perhaps this is the Cause of its being lost.

DIADOCHUS.

Diadochus

IT is well known that Diadochus was Bishop of Photice, a City of Epirus, but the time wherein he lived is not known. Bellarmine and others that mention him, place him at the End of the Fourth Century, but without proof. However he is antienter than Maximus, who quotes him in his Answers to Thalassius. Photius in the 201 Volume saith, that he had read a Book of that Bishop, which contained Ten Definitions and One Hundred Chapters, and observes that this Book is useful for those who design to live a Spiritual Life. The Ten Definitions prefixed before the Hundred Chapters are not extant: These (as we learn by the Titles which Photius hath preserved of them) were properly Reflections upon the principal Perfections of a Spiritual Life. The hundred Chapters of the Spiritual Life were published by Turrianus; they contain several Maxims concerning a Religious and Spiritual Life; they are written with a plain Stile, as most Ascetical Treatises are. There are several false Thoughts, and of those extraordinary Exercises and Mortifications, which the old Monks, and Hermits obliged themselves to observe, over and above the ordinary Duties of the Christian Life, that every Christian was by his Profession, made at his Baptism, bound to practise.

[Spiritual in the Ascetical Stile, is to be understood spiritual Notions as will not be received by every Body.

AUDENTIUS.

Audentius.

WHat Gennadius obſerveth of this Author whom he mentions immediately after Prudentius, is this: 'Audentius a Spaniſh Biſhop wrote a Book 'againſt the Manichees, Arians and Sabellians, 'and chiefly againſt the Photinians, who are now called Bono- 'ſiacks; he entituled this Book, A Treatiſe of Faith againſt 'all Hereticks. He there ſhews, that the Son of God is 'coeternal with the Father, and that he did not begin to 'be God when he made himſelf Man, and that he was 'born of the Virgin Mary. Audentius.

SEVERUS ENDELECHIUS.

Severus Endelechius.

WE have a Bucolick, or Paſtoral Poem, of one Severus Endelechius, about the end whereof there is a Diſcourſe of the Efficacy of the Sign of the Croſs, and of the Chriſtian Religion, to the embracing of which Tityrus exhorts his Companion. This Author lived ſince Conſtantine, but the Time is not known. His Poem is pretty well writ. It is likely he lived about the end of the Fourth, or the beginning of the Fifth Century. Severus Endelechius.

FLAVIANUS.

Flavianus.

Flavianus Presbyter of Antioch, having governed that Church during the Arian Perſecutions, in the Abſence of Meletius his Biſhop, was after his Death, in the Year 380, choſen by the Oriental Biſhops to fill that See, which was not to be looked upon as Vacant, ſince Paulinus, Collegue to Meletius was yet alive. This Ordination renewed the Schiſm of the Church of Antioch. The Weſtern Biſhops, who of a long time favoured Paulinus, could not endure that a Biſhop ſhould be ordained while he lived, againſt the agreement made with Meletius, That the Surviver ſhould remain ſole Biſhop. They complained lowdly of that injuſtice; but thoſe who ſided with Meletius being the Major Part, would not ſuffer Paulinus, and ſo nothing was enacted againſt Flavianus. The Death of Paulinus in the Year 389. did not put an end to the Diviſion of the Church of Antioch; his Party acknowledged Evagrius for their Biſhop, whom Paulinus ordained before his Death, and accuſed Flavianus before Theodoſius. This Emperor commanded him to go to Rome, there to be judged: But Flavianus excuſed himſelf becauſe of the Winter, promiſing to execute the Emperor's Orders in the Spring following. But the Synod of Capua in the Year 390, remitted this buſineſs to Theophilus and the Biſhops of Egypt. The Emperor commanded Flavianus to repair to Alexandria, which he refuſed to do, and anſwered the Emperor, That if they found fault with his Doctrine he was willing to be judged even by his Enemies; but if the Queſtion was about his Biſhoprick, he would not diſpute the matter but readily quit it. The Emperor admiring his Conſtancy, ſent him back to Antioch, and ſuffered him to live quietly: His reſolution provoked St. Ambroſe, and the Weſtern Biſhops: But Theophilus endeavoured to appeaſe that Quarrel by a Milder way than a determinate Sentence: Evagrius being dead, no other Biſhop was ordained in his room, and there were but few Chriſtians at Antioch, who owned not Flavianus for their Biſhop. But he did not communicate with the Weſtern Biſhops before the Year 398, when St. Chryſoſtom undertook to make his Peace with Anaſtaſius Biſhop of Rome, and with the Weſtern Biſhops. And thus was Flavianus acknowledged by all as the lawful Biſhop of Antioch, and ended his Days in Peace, in the Year 404. St. Chryſoſtom often commends him in his Sermons. He deſcribes his Journey to the Emperor's Court, to get a pardon for the People of Antioch; and tells the particulars of the Speech he made. Theodoret alſo ſpeaks much to his Advantage, and obſerveth, l. 4. of his Hiſtory c. 25. that Diodorus and he maintained the Faith of the Church againſt the Aſſaults of the Arians, he adds, that Flavianus did not then preach, but furniſhed Diodorus with Notions and Arguments from Scripture to uſe in his Sermons; but when he was Biſhop of Antioch he preached himſelf. Theodoret in his Dialogues quotes ſome places of this Father's Homilies touching the Incarnation; he quotes a Homily upon St. John Baptiſt, upon the Theophany, and a Homily upon Eaſter: An Homily upon Judas's Treachery, a Homily upon St. Luke, and another upon theſe words. The Spirit of the Lord is upon me. None of theſe Homilies, nor any other of the Works of this holy Biſhop are extant, unleſs perhaps ſome of his Sermons are among thoſe that are attributed to St. Chryſoſtom. Flavianus.

[Photius cod. 52. of his Bibliotheca ſpeaks of a Letter written by Flavianus to the Biſhops of Oſrhoëne, and of another to an Armenian Biſhop.]

St. JOHN CHRYSOSTOM.

St. John Chryſoſtom.

ST. John, Sir-named Chryſoſtom, becauſe of his Eloquence (a), was of Antioch; his Father's Name was Secundus, and his Mother's Anthuſa (b). He loſt his Father when he was young (c), and his Mother took care to breed him up like a Chriſtian. He learned Rhetorick under Libanius, and Philoſophy under Andragathius, both very famous in their profeſſion. He firſt deſigned to follow the Law (d), but ſoon altered his Mind, and became a Church-man. He left Libanius his School to ſtudy the Scriptures, and had for his Tutors Diodorus and Carterius Superiors of the Monks, that were in the Suburbs of Antioch. He was afterwards baptized by Meletius, and choſen St. John Chryſoſtom.

(a) Sir-named Chryſoſtom, &c.] It is not known when he was firſt called by that Name, ſo juſtly given him: Some ſay he had it in his Life-time, but neither St. Jerome, nor St. Auguſtine, nor Theodoret, nor any other among the Ancients, give him that Name, but call him only John of Conſtantinople. Sozomen obſerves, that Antiochus Biſhop of Ptolemais, had this Name given him, but does not ſay, that it was common to him with our Saint. Many Authors have written his Life, but very few have done it faithfully. Palladius alone may be credited in this Caſe. Bigotius publiſhed the Original Greek of this Author, and with him may be joined Socrates, Sozomen and Theodoret who have in their Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtories given an account of ſeveral Circumſtances of the Life of St. Chryſoſtom. Theodoret made ſome Speeches in his Commendation, the Extracts whereof are preſerved by Photius, in the 273 Volume. Little regard is to be had to the other Writers of his Life: for they have filled their Relations with Fables. The firſt of them is George, who is thought to have been Biſhop of Alexandria. Some think that part of his Relation was taken out of St. Cyril of Alexandria, but that is not probable. This Author lived about the year of Chriſt 600. After him Leo the Emperor, Simeon Metaphraſtes, an Anonymous Author, St. John Damaſcene, Coſmas Veſtitor, John Euchaïta, the Patriarch Philotheus, and Matthaus Camariota, have written Lives and Panegyricks of our Saint; but very ill, and ſtuffed with many Fables.

(b) His Mother's Anthuſa.] There was another John, Son of Publia, mentioned by Theodoret in his Hiſtory, l. 3. c. 19. for in the firſt place, all Hiſtorians aſſure us, that St. John Chryſoſtom's Mother was called Anthuſa; as Palladius in his Life, c. 5. Socrates in his Hiſtory, l. 6. c. 3. Secondly, Publia was an old Woman in the Time of Julian the Emperor, in the Year 362. according to Theodoret, and St. Chryſoſtom's Mother, was alive in 404, as appeareth by his own Letters, the 238*th*, and 239*th*. and ſhe was but 40 Years of Age in the Year 368. In ſhort, John the Son of Publia was an only Child; whereas St. Chryſoſtom had a Siſter older than himſelf, to whom he wrote his 238*th*. Letter.

(c) He loſt his Father when he was Young.] St. Chryſoſtom ſays it in his firſt Book of Prieſthood, c. 1. Some have affirmed that his Parents were Pagans, but he ſays himſelf in the firſt Homily againſt the Anomœans, that he was bred and brought up in the Church; and it is clear by the place we have quoted out of his Book of the Prieſthood, that his Mother was a Chriſtian when his Father died, which was ſoon after he was born.

(d) He firſt deſigned to follow the Law.] Some ſay that he was called to the Bar, but Palladius, Socrates and Sozomen only ſay, that when he was fit for it he quitted it. There is a Letter of Libanius to one John to congratulate him for a publick Pleading, wherein he had ſpoken much to the Praiſe of the Emperor and of his Children. But this John is not our St. John Chryſoſtom, who was then a Prieſt: For this was the Emperor Theodoſius, who left the Empire to his Sons about the Year 395. St. Chryſoſtom indeed confeſſeth in his firſt Book of the Prieſthood, that he did follow the Bar, but does not mention his Pleading. Such was his Eloquence, that Libanius at his Death ſaid, that he alone was worthy to ſucceed him, if the Chriſti- had not ſnatched him away.

ſen by this Biſhop to be Reader. He was ſo highly eſteemed, that he was marked out by an Aſſembly of Prelates to be made Biſhop, as well as Baſil his Friend (e). But knowing the Day when they were to ordain him, he hid himſelf, avoiding that Dignity with as much Care, as others ſought for it with earneſtneſs. About the Year 374, he retired to a Mountain near Antioch, where he lived with only one old Monk the ſpace of four Years; then he choſe to dwell in a Cave for two Years, after an auſtere manner. The ſeverity of a ſolitary Life, and continual Labour did much impair St. Chryſoſtom's health, which obliged him to return to Antioch, about the Year 380. There the great Meletius ordained him a Deacon, and ſoon after he went to the Council of Conſtantinople, where he died. After his Death St. Chryſoſtom ſided with Flavianus, who made him Prieſt, and having received that Order he gave himſelf wholly to preaching, and therein got ſuch reputation, that after the Death of Nectarius Archbiſhop of Conſtantinople, he was with general Conſent choſen to fill up that See. The Emperor was obliged to uſe all his Authority to make him leave Antioch, and at laſt he was forced to take him away ſecretly. Theophilus Biſhop of Alexandria, whom the Emperor had ſent for to ordain St. Chryſoſtom, had more inclination for one Iſidorus a Presbyter; wherefore he ſecretly oppoſed the Ordination of St. Chryſoſtom. But Eutropius and other Officers of the Court upheld St. Chryſoſtom ſo far, that Eutropius (to oblige Theophilus to ordain him) ſhewed him a Memorial containing ſeveral Heads of an Accuſation formed againſt him, and put it to his choice, whether he would ordain St. Chryſoſtom, or prepare himſelf for his Trial upon thoſe Accuſations. Theophilus choſe the former, and ordained St. Chryſoſtom the firſt Day of March 398. This was the beginning of that hatred which Theophilus bore to St. Chryſoſtom, and which proceeded further than can well be believed, as we ſhall ſee afterwards.

St. Chryſoſtom being entred upon the Government of the Church of Conſtantinople, began with endeavouring to reform the manners of the Clergy, and then fell to reproving the Vices of the Court; and this got him the ill-will of many, for he was of a ſevere Temper not agreeable to men of the World, and his way of living was ſingular and retired. They found fault, that he always eat by himſelf, and would never appear at thoſe Feaſts where he was invited, which they looked upon as proceeding from Scorn and Contempt of others, though it was only an Effect of his Conſtitution and Weakneſs of Stomach, or of his great Sobriety. He diſcharged the Duties of his Office with wonderful Exactneſs and Care, knowing that the Revenue of the Church is the Patrimony of the Poor; he cut off the ſuperfluous Expences of his Predeceſſors, to increaſe the Allowances of Hoſpitals for the Sick. And the Hoſpital at Conſtantinople not being large enough, by reaſon of the great Number of Sick and Strangers, he cauſed ſeveral others to be built, and for each of them he appointed two Prieſts to take care of the Sick and Strangers. He particularly provided for Virgins and Widows. He conſtantly preached to the People, exhorting them not to neglect the publick Service. And he is ſaid, firſt to have inſtituted ſolemn Proceſſions in Conſtantinople.

But his Paſtoral care was not reſtrained to his particular Church, but extended it ſelf alſo to the Churches of Thracia, Pontus, and Aſia. He pulled down ſome Temples of falſe Deities that were ſtill in Phœnicia. To the Goths that were infected with Arianiſm, he ſent Prieſts, Deacons and Readers that ſpake their Language, thereby to endeavour the Converſion of that People from their Error: He alſo ſent Miſſionaries to the Scythians that inhabited along the Danube. He wrote to the Biſhop of Tyre againſt the Marcionites of thoſe parts, offering him the Emperor's help: But he never did the Church a more ſignal Service, than when he re-united the Eaſt and Weſt, by reconciling Flavianus with the Weſtern and Egyptian Biſhops.

He aſſembled at Conſtantinople a Synod of two and twenty Biſhops about September in the Year 400. Euſebius, Biſhop of Valentinople in Aſia, came to it, and preſented to the Council a Petition containing ſeven Articles againſt Antoninus Biſhop of Epheſus, the Metropolitan of Aſia. He was accuſed, Firſt, Of Melting the Holy Veſſels, and converting them into Money, which he beſtowed upon his Son. 2dly. That he had taken a Marble Stone from the entrance of the Baptiſtery, to uſe in his own Bath. 3dly. That the Pillars which remained after the Building of the Church were uſed to ſupport the Roof of his own Hall. 4thly. That he kept a Servant who was guilty of Man-ſlaughter. 5thly. That he had ſold the Lands, which were left to the Church by Baſilina, Mother to Julian the Emperor, as if they had belonged to his own Eſtate. 6thly. That he had again taken his Wife, whom he had put away, and had two Children by her. 7thly. That a Cuſtom was introduced by him, ſo as to become almoſt a Law, to take Money for the Ordination of Biſhops, proportionably to the value of their Biſhopricks. Antoninus appeared at the Council that was called by St. Chryſoſtom, where theſe Accuſations were brought againſt him by Euſebius. They inſiſted particularly upon the laſt, as being the moſt important. Antoninus denied all; and could not be convicted, becauſe there were no Witneſſes; Wherefore the Council deputed three Biſhops to go into Aſia, and hear the Witneſſes that were to be produced by the Accuſer. One of theſe three Biſhops being Antoninus his friend, feigned himſelf ſick, that he might not inform againſt his friend. The two others went to Hypæpæ, a City in Aſia, where they waited to no purpoſe for Witneſſes, becauſe the Accuſer was agreed with the accuſed, either through fear of his Power, or becauſe he had no ſufficient Proofs. The Deputies, weary of waiting, went away, having written a Letter, in which they Excommunicated Euſebius as an Impoſtor for making default. Sometime after Antoninus died, and his Death cauſed new Troubles in the Churches of Aſia. In this juncture of time the Clergy of Epheſus and the Biſhops of that Province made application to St. Chryſoſtom, and prayed him to come into their Country, to eſtabliſh ſome Order in the Church of Epheſus. He came thither in the end of Winter, of the Year 401, and aſſembled a Synod of Seventy Biſhops, wherein Six Biſhops were depoſed, who were convicted of giving Antoninus Money for their Ordination. The Heirs of that Biſhop were enjoyned to return them the Money he had received: and they Ordained Heraclides a Deacon, Biſhop of Epheſus. What concerned the Church of Epheſus being thus regulated, St. Chryſoſtom returned through Nicomedia, where he turned out Gerontius, who was formerly St. Ambroſe's Deacon, but went to the Eaſt and was ordained Biſhop of Nicomedia: He ſettled in his rome Panſophius; and going on in his Journey, in every place, he took from the Novatians and Quartodecimani the Churches which they were in poſſeſſion of.

St. John Chryſoſtom.

While St. Chryſoſtom was doing theſe things in Aſia, Severinus, Biſhop of Gabala, a famous Preacher, (to whom, at his going away, he had committed the care of his Church) did all he could to get the applauſe both of the Nobility and People. This begot ſome jealouſie in St. Chryſoſtom, who expelled him out of Conſtantinople after he returned; and this he did by the Sollicitation of a Deacon of his, named Serapion. But the Empreſs cauſed him to come again, having reconciled them, though with much difficulty.

This Reconciliation was followed by another quarrel with Theophilus Biſhop of Alexandria, an old Enemy to St. Chryſoſtom. The Hiſtorians repreſent that Biſhop as an ambitious Man, paſſionate, fierce, covetous, and cunning; who would never yield, but compaſs every thing he undertook; who eaſily provoked Men to be his Enemies, and ſooner or later would undoe them: He was no friend to St. Chryſoſtom, becauſe he was obliged to ordain him againſt his will: but the hatred he bore to him broke out upon the account of three Egyptian Monks, Dioſcorus, Ammonius, and Euthymius, Sir named the Long-brethren. Theophilus was very angry with them, becauſe they reproved his Conduct, and received Iſidore that was become his enemy: He condemned them in a Synod of Alexandria, aſſembled in 399, becauſe they would not ſubſcribe the Condemnation of Origen. After this Condemnation he went himſelf with Soldiers to drive them away, with all the Monks that lived under their Rule. Theſe poor Monks not knowing whither to go, becauſe Theophilus perſecuted them every-where, came to Conſtantinople, and repreſented to St. John, the Violences of their Biſhop, beſeeching him to have compaſſion on them. St. Chryſoſtom gave them leave to ſay their Prayers in a Church he aſſigned for them, but did not admit them to the Communion of the Euchariſt. He only writ to Theophilus to re-eſtabliſh them. On the contrary, Theophilus ſent Men to Conſtantinople, who delivered to the Emperor a form of Accuſation againſt theſe Monks; who in their own defence, accuſed their Biſhop alſo. St. John Chryſoſtom gave Theophilus notice of it, who anſwered him fiercely: That he ought to have known, that by the Canons of the Council of Nice, a Biſhop is forbidden to judge of Cauſes that are out of the limits of his own Juriſdiction: That he had no right to receive Accuſations againſt him; and that if he muſt be judged, the Judgment belonged to the Biſhops of Egypt, and not to the Biſhop of Conſtantinople. St. Chryſoſtom having received this Letter, exhorted both the one and the other to Peace; but neither were diſpoſed towards it. The Monks accuſed by Theophilus, and ſome of their Brethren, perſuaded of their innocence, continually Petitioned the Emperor; who yielding to their Supplications, at laſt appointed Judges; who after examination of the Accuſations againſt the Long-brethren, found them to be Calumnies, and ſo gave Judgment againſt ſome of the Monks that were the Authors of them. All this happened in the Year 401.

(e) Baſil his Friend.] It is not certainly known who this Baſil was, nor Biſhop of what place; but it is certain, that he was not the great St. Baſil, Biſhop of Ceſarea in Cappadocia. Socrates and Sozomen, have improperly confounded them; for Baſil Chryſoſtom's Friend was of his own Age, and inſtructed by the ſame Maſters, as appeareth by the beginning of St. Chryſoſtom's Book of the Prieſthood; whereas St. Baſil was much older, and was Biſhop of the Church of Ceſarea, before St. Chryſoſtom was 25 years Old: Photius tells us, that Baſil St. Chryſoſtom's Friend, was Baſil of Seleucia. This is yet a groſſer miſtake, becauſe this latter was not ordained Biſhop before the year 431, and he lived till 458. Baſil St. Chryſoſtom's Companion, was rather Biſhop of Raphanea, or another of the ſame Name Biſhop of Biblos, whoſe Names are found in the Subſcriptions of the Council of Conſtantinople.

St. John Chryſoſtom.

In the year 402, St. Epiphanius, Biſhop in Cyprus, (who held with Theophilus, becauſe he was a great Enemy to Origen) came to Conſtantinople. St. Chryſoſtom invited him to take a Lodging in his Houſe; but Epiphanius, pre-ingaged by Theophilus, writing to him, gave him this anſwer; That he was ſo far from lodging in his Houſe, he would not ſo much as enter into it, nor joyn in the publick Prayers whilſt he was there, unleſs St. Chryſoſtom firſt baniſhed the Long-brethren, and condemned Origen. St. John having refuſed to do it, St. Epiphanius deſigned to go himſelf into the Apoſtles' Church on the Lord's-day; and there publickly condemn Origen's Books, and excommunicate the Long-brethren with their Adherents. But as he was going, he met with Serapion the Deacon, who told him from St. Chryſoſtom, that he undertook things againſt Order, and againſt the Canons: That he had ordained a Deacon out of his own Dioceſs, and celebrated the Euchariſt, without permiſſion from the Ordinary; and that he was about a thing that was neither juſt nor reaſonable, and dangerous for himſelf, for he had to do with a Populace which would ſoon be up; and that St. Chryſoſtom would not anſwer for what might happen. This Diſcourſe made Epiphanius withdraw, and deſiſt from his Enterpriſe. The Long-brethren after this went to him, and complained that he condemned them before hearing, and without Conviction; they ſhewed, that they had not dealt ſo with him, having every where defended both his Works and his Perſon. Epiphanius reflecting upon this Remonſtrance, and conſidering what Troubles Theophilus had engaged him in, returned towards Cyprus. At his going away he told the Biſhops, I leave you the Town, the Palace, and the Theatre. He died before he got to his own Country.

After the departure of St. Epiphanius, St. Chryſoſtom made a Speech againſt the Diſorders of Women: The Empreſs Eudoxia ſuppoſing that it was meant of her, complained to the Emperor, and urged Theophilus to come to Conſtantinople. This Biſhop, who waited for an opportunity to deſtroy St. Chryſoſtom, came immediately about the beginning of the year 403, and brought with him ſeveral Egyptian Biſhops. Thoſe of Aſia that were depoſed by St. Chryſoſtom, or were not ſatisfied with his Behaviour, repaired likewiſe to Conſtantinople. Theophilus had his Apartment in one of the Empreſs's Houſes; from whence he ſent the Accuſers of John to the Emperor, who commanded that both they and Chryſoſtom ſhould appear before Theophilus his Synod, to be judged there. St. Chryſoſtom denied them to be his Judges; affirming, That it belonged to the Biſhops of his, and of the adjacent Provinces, and not to Strangers, to take Cognizance of that Matter. Notwithſtanding this Reaſon, which Theophilus himſelf had alledged to avoid being judged by St. Chryſoſtom, he held a Synod of ſix and thirty Biſhops, in the Suburbs of Chalcedon, to condemn St. Chryſoſtom. One John exhibited nine and twenty Articles againſt him.

St. Chryſoſtom was cited to the Synod to anſwer thoſe Accuſations, but he ſent three Biſhops and two Presbyters, who in his behalf declared to Theophilus and his Synod, that he was ready to ſubmit to any that might be his Judges, but not to Theophilus his profeſſed Enemy, nor to the Egyptian Biſhops, who could not regularly judge the Biſhops of Thrace. St. Chryſoſtom objected in writing, particularly againſt Theophilus; becauſe when he came out of Alexandria, he ſaid, I am going to depoſe John: Againſt Acacius of Beræa, becauſe he threatned him long before: Againſt Severianus and Antiochus, becauſe of the Quarrels betwixt them, which were publick and notorious. He ſo much depended upon his Innocency, that he promiſed to appear at the Synod, if theſe four Biſhops would retire: They did not hearken to this Propoſition, but cited him to the Synod three times. He anſwered ſtill, That he would juſtify himſelf before a more numerous Synod; but he had reaſon to reject a Council, where his Enemies were to be his principal Judges. However, his Proceſs was brought before the Council. Theophilus was preſent, and received the Memorials of Accuſation which himſelf had made. One Iſaac a Monk, whom St. Chryſoſtom had reproved, for going abroad oftner than Monks ought to do, exhibited a Bill againſt him with nine Articles: After examination of ſome of them, Paul of Heraclea, Preſident of the Council, required the Biſhops to give their Opinions: They all declared that St. Chryſoſtom ought to be depoſed; and having delivered their Opinions, they wrote a Letter to the Emperor, and another to the Clergy of Conſtantinople, giving notice of the Judgment they had given againſt St. John Chryſoſtom. After this, three Biſhops of Aſia, depoſed by St. Chryſoſtom, petitioned the Council for their Reſtauration; and it is probable that it was granted them. And, on the contrary, Heraclides, who had been ordained Biſhop of Epheſus, was depoſed. This is what Theophilus his caballing obtained of the Council: the Acts whereof were extant in Photius's time, who gives an Epitome of them in the 59*th*. Volume of his Bibliotheca. They were divided into thirteen Acts or Seſſions.

St. John Chryſoſtom.

The news of St. Chryſoſtom's Depoſition ſtirred up a great Sedition at Conſtantinople; the Emperor commanded that he ſhould be baniſhed, and the People reſolved to keep him by force: But three days after he went out of the Church of his own accord, to ſurrender himſelf to them that had Order to ſeize him, and was conveyed to a ſmall Town of Bithynia. His going away encreaſed the Tumult of the People, who both with Prayers and Threatnings addreſſed to the Emperor to call him back; which ſo amazed Eudoxia, that ſhe became Petitioner for his Return, and ſent one of her own Officers to fetch him. When he was come back, he would not perform the Epiſcopal Functions 'till he was reſtored by a more numerous Synod than that which depoſed him; he beſought the Emperor to call one, and in the mean time withdrew to a place without the City: But the People, impatient of delays, led him into the Church, and he was reſtored by thirty Biſhops, and Theophilus was obliged to depart.

After this, it ſeemed that St. Chryſoſtom had nothing to fear; but of a ſudden a new ſtorm aroſe againſt him. Towards the end of the year 403, the Empreſs Eudoxia cauſed her Statue to be ſet up near the Church: The People in honour to the Empreſs, celebrated ſome publick Games by that Statue. St. Chryſoſtom looking upon thoſe as indecent things, preached againſt them: This provoked the Empreſs, who ſtill preſerved a grudge againſt him, and reſolved to have a new Aſſembly of Biſhops, to drive him out of the Church of Conſtantinople. It is ſaid, that the Saint hearing of it, provoked her yet more, by beginning a Sermon with theſe Words: Now Herodias is in a fury again; now ſhe demands the Head of John in a Charger once again: However, at the end of that year, Theophilus being afraid to go to Conſtantinople, ſent thither three Biſhops from Egypt; who being aſſembled with them that were then at Court, and ſome others come from Syria, Pontus and Phrygia, they undertook to judge St. Chryſoſtom. He went to them, and deſired to ſee his Accuſation, or to know his Accuſers, that he might make his defence about the Crimes laid to his Charge: But theſe Biſhops declared, that it was not neceſſary to examine, whether the things alledged againſt him were true or falſe; it was enough for his Condemnation, that he returned to his Biſhoprick when depoſed by a Council, and was not abſolved by another Council; becauſe it was provided in the fourth Canon of the Council of Antioch, That whoſoever was guilty of this, could never hope to be reſtored, nor ſo much as be admitted to plead for himſelf. Elpidius and Tranquillus who defended St. Chryſoſtom; anſwered, That this Canon was made by Arians: and that he was reſtored by thoſe Biſhops that communicated with him. The Biſhops of the Council denied that the Canon was made by Arians; and inſiſted upon this, That the number of thoſe who depoſed St. Chryſoſtom, was greater than of thoſe that communicated with him at his return to his Church. On this ground they confirmed the Sentence of Depoſition, which the firſt Council pronounced againſt St. Chryſoſtom.

By vertue of this Judgment, the Emperor, at the beginning of Lent, 404, forbad him to go to the Church: He obeyed, and left the Clergy alone to perform Divine Service. But he was not ſuffered to be long at reſt, for upon Holy Saturday, Lucius, Captain of the Guards, came with Soldiers into the Great Church in the Evening, and drove away forty Biſhops that communicated with St. Chryſoſtom, all the Clergy, and part of the People: Then he placed armed Men about the Sanctuary, entred into the Baptiſtery, and miſuſed thoſe that were there. Some Soldiers that were not yet baptized, went to the Altar, and ſpilt upon their Cloaths the conſecrated Elements that were in the holy Veſſels. This Violence was followed by the Prince's Edicts againſt St. Chryſoſtom, and againſt thoſe that communicated with him. The next day the People met together in the publick Baths, and were driven out by force: So that ſuch as were for St. Chryſoſtom were obliged to meet in ſeveral places of the Town; and were afterwards called by their Enemies Joannites. They did not yet dare to meddle with the Perſon of St. Chryſoſtom, who was ſo much beloved of the People, that they were ready to take up Arms to prevent his being taken away. This Saint, unwilling to be the cauſe of a Civil War, got away from thoſe Guards that the People ſet about him, and put himſelf into the hands of thoſe that were to take him. He was led to Nice; and the ſame day that he went, which was the 20*th*. day of June, there happened a Fire in the Great Church, which burnt it to the ground, with the Palace joyning to it. Seven days after, one Arſacius, an old Man of eighty Years of Age, Brother to Nectarius, was ordained in the room of St. Chryſoſtom. This Arſacius furiouſly perſecuted St. Chryſoſtom's Friends. This Saint tarried not long at Nice, but left it on the 13*th*. of July to go to Cucuſus, the place of his Exile, where he arrived in September. He endured much by the way, but was kindly received by Dioſcorus Biſhop of

of the place. In the mean time Laws were publiſhed at Conſtantinople againſt thoſe that adhered to St. Chryſoſtom; Three of them are in the Theodoſian Code. The firſt of the firſt of September, l. 16. tit. 2. c. 3. It is againſt foreign Clerks, who kept Meetings in private places. The ſecond of the tenth of the ſame Month, is tit. 4. c. 5. of the ſame Book: By this Law thoſe are to be fined who ſuffer their Slaves to go to private Meetings. The third in the ſame place, c. 6. forbids all the Meetings of thoſe that did not communicate with Arſacius Biſhop of Conſtantinople, Theophilus Biſhop of Alexandria, and Porphyrius who was choſen Biſhop of Antioch in the place of Flavianus. All theſe Laws are againſt them that took John's part, and held private Meetings, and refuſed to communicate with thoſe three Patriarchs. About the latter end of that Year a ſhower of Hail of extraordinary bigneſs did much Miſchief in Conſtantinople; and the Empreſs died ſoon after: John's Friends looked upon both theſe Accidents as Judgments from God for the injurious uſage of St. Chryſoſtom.

The Patriarchs of the Eaſt having declared againſt St. Chryſoſtom, he could expect no relief, but from the Weſtern Biſhops, and particularly from the See of Rome, which had always been the refuge of Biſhops that were unjuſtly perſecuted in their own Country. To prevent Pope Innocent, Theophilus ſent him a Letter by one of his Readers, acquainting him with St. Chryſoſtom's depoſition. This being publickly known in Rome, Euſebius Deacon of Conſtantinople, petitioned the Pope that he would ſuſpend his Judgment, till he were rightly informed of the matter. Three days after came four Biſhops, ſent by St. Chryſoſtom, who delivered to the Pope a Letter from him, imploring his ſuccour, and that of the Biſhops of the Weſt; with another Letter from forty Biſhops and the Clergy of Conſtantinople; which declared, That St. John Chryſoſtom was condemned unjuſtly, and without being heard. St. Innocent being perſuaded that Theophilus had not proceeded regularly, ſent Letters of Communion to St. Chryſoſtom, as well as to the Biſhops that condemned him; and declared, that it was requiſite to call an unexceptionable Council both of Eaſtern and Weſtern Biſhops. Theophilus afterwards ſent to Rome the Acts of the Council held againſt St. Chryſoſtom; but this altered not the Pope's Reſolution; who declared, that he could not refuſe Communion with St. Chryſoſtom before a new Council had condemned him. Soon after Theoctenus brought a Letter from five and twenty Biſhops, ſignifying to the Pope, that St. Chryſoſtom had been expelled out of Conſtantinople, and ſent into Exile; the ſame was afterwards confirmed by another Letter of fifteen Biſhops, brought by the Biſhop of Apamea; and by the Teſtimony of Palladius of Hellenopolis, who was forced to flee to Rome; and by Letters from the Clergy of Conſtantinople, which gave an account of the Violences exerciſed againſt their Biſhop, and the whole Church of Conſtantinople. The Pope, moved with theſe things, writ to St. Chryſoſtom and to his Clergy thoſe Letters which are preſerved by Sozomen in his Hiſtory, l. 8. c. 26.

St. Chryſoſtom's friends every-where publiſhed theſe Letters; and wrought ſo far with Innocent, that he obtained of Honorius, Emperor of the Weſt, a Letter to his Brother Arcadius, in the behalf of St. Chryſoſtom; by the which he requeſted of his Brother, that a Council might be aſſembled at Theſſalonica, where Theophilus ſhould appear as one accuſed. Three Biſhops, two Presbyters, and two Deacons, were deputed to carry this Letter, with the Letters of ſeveral Weſtern Biſhops, written in favour of St. Chryſoſtom. But theſe Deputies were ſtopt at Athens by the Governor, and ſent by Sea with a Guard to Conſtantinople. They were not permitted to enter into the Town, but were conveyed to a Caſtle in Thrace, where they were ſhut up. A Counſellor of State, called Patricius, went thither to ask for the Letters; they anſwered, that their Order was not to deliver them to any but the Emperor, and the Biſhops to whom they were directed. Patricius withdrawing after this Anſwer, another Officer, named Valerius, was ſent to take them by force. They next day Money was proffered them, to admit to their Communion Atticus, who ſucceeded Arſacius in the See of Conſtantinople. They refuſed it, and demanded to be ſent back. When they could not be made to comply, they were put into an old Veſſel with twenty Soldiers, that carried them to Lampſacus, where they ſhifted their Veſſel, and arrived at Otranto, a Port of Calabria, twenty Days after their Embarquing, and four Months from their departure out of Italy. This Deputation was dated in the Year 404.

In the mean time St. Chryſoſtom being unhealthy in the place of his Exile, was obliged often to ſhift his Quarters, as appeareth by his 131*ſt*. Letter. But notwithſtanding his baniſhment and infirmities, he ſtill ſent Prieſts and Monks to preach the Goſpel among the Goths and Perſians, and to take care of the Churches of Armenia and Phœnicia; as appears by his 14*th*. 123*d*. 126*th*. 203*d*. 204*th*. 206*th*. and 207*th*. Letters. But his Enemies would not let him be quiet, but perſuaded the Emperor to ſend him further to Pityus, a Town upon the Euxine Sea: Immediately Soldiers were ſent to convey him thither; the uſage which he endured, and the fatigue of the Journey ſo weakned him, that he fell ſick of a violent Fever, which carried him off in a few hours. In the place where he died, there was a Church of St. Baſiliſcus Martyr, where he was buried the 4*th*. of November, 407, having been three Years three Months, and four and twenty Days in Baniſhment: Aged ſixty Years, and ten Years ordained Biſhop of Conſtantinople. After his Death, the Eaſt and the Weſt were divided for ſome time upon his account, becauſe thoſe of the Weſt reverenced his Memory; and the others on the contrary looked upon him as a condemned Biſhop, whoſe Name they refuſed to inſert into the Diptychs; That is to ſay, in the Regiſters of thoſe that were to be mentioned with Honour at the Celebration of the Euchariſt. One would have thought that the Emperor Arcadius his Death happening five Months after, ſhould have removed the greateſt obſtacle, which hindered the Biſhops of the Eaſt from doing juſtice to the Memory of St. Chryſoſtom: but Theophilus exerciſed his hatred againſt him, even after his death: He wrote againſt him a Book full of Invectives, and reproachful Railings; and prevented, while he lived, any honour to be done to the Memory of St. Chryſoſtom in the Eaſt.

St. John Chryſoſtom.

When Theophilus was dead, the Spirits of the Eaſtern Biſhops began to relent, and they began to be more favourable to the Memory of that Saint. Alexander Succeſſor to Porphyrius in the See of Antioch, was the Firſt, who in the Year 413, inſerted the Name of St. Chryſoſtom into the Diptychs, and who by that means was re-admitted to communicate with Pope Innocent. Acacius of Beræa likewiſe received Letters of Communion from the Pope, upon condition that he ſhould not ſhew any hatred againſt St. Chryſoſtom afterwards.

About the Year 428. Atticus Biſhop of Conſtantinople, inſerted the Name of St. Chryſoſtom into the Diptychs, and exhorted St. Cyril of Alexandria to do the ſame. This Biſhop ſcrupled it at firſt: But at laſt St. Iſidore Peluſiota perſuaded him to do it. Thus all the Churches did right to the Memory of St. Chryſoſtom, and Peace was reſtored.

The Number of St. Chryſoſtom's Works is ſo great, that the Antient Criticks durſt not pretend to make a Catalogue of them: St. Iſidore and Suidas, looked upon it as almoſt impoſſible. George and Nicephorus ſay, that he compoſed above a thouſand Volumes. Suidas and Caſſiodorus affirm that he wrote Commentaries upon the whole Bible: From all which it is evident, that how many ſoever of St. Chryſoſtom's Works are yet extant, they are fewer than they have been, and ſo much the rather; becauſe among thoſe that we have, ſome are none of his, though they bear his Name

The 65 Homilies upon Geneſis, are the firſt of St. Chryſoſtom's Commentaries of the Bible, according to the Order of the ſacred Books; the thirty two firſt were preached in Lent, in the third Year of his being Biſhop. This Subject was interrupted by the Feſtivals; for he was to preach upon the Paſſion of Jeſus Chriſt. After Eaſter, he undertook to expound the Acts of the Apoſtles, and was near a Year about that Work: Afterwards he betook himſelf to his former Task, and finiſhed his Expoſition of Geneſis, in thirty four Homilies. Theſe Homilies are Commentaries upon Geneſis, rather than Sermons. And he applies himſelf particularly to explain the Text of Scripture literally. The Examples of Virtues or Vices ſpoken of in the Text, which he expounds, are commonly the Subject of his Homilies. The Stile is plain, and without thoſe Figures and Ornaments which are to be found in his other Sermons.

The Nine Sermons of St. Chryſoſtom upon ſingle paſſages of Geneſis, are more florid, and contain more moral Thoughts. The firſt is, upon the firſt Words of Geneſis. In the beginning God created the Heavens and the Earth: in it he treats of Faſting and Alms-deeds.

The ſecond is upon theſe Words of the firſt Chapter, v. 26. Let us make Man after our own Image: There he gives the reaſon why Moſes ſpeaking of the Creation of Man, uſes the Expreſſion, God ſaid, Let us make; whereas he ſaid of the Creation of other things, God ſaid, Let them be: And there he ſhews wherein this Reſemblance with God conſiſts.

In the third he makes ſome further Reflections upon Man being like God, and upon the Dominion given to him over other Creatures; and there he anſwers the Queſtion, why Beaſts fall upon and kill Man; and confeſſes that it is, becauſe Man by Sin has loſt the Empire he had over them. St. Auſtin quotes this Homily in his firſt Book againſt Julian, and produces a paſſage out of it to prove Original Sin.

In the fourth the three kinds of ſervitude which Mankind is fallen into by ſin are diſcourſed of, which are, the Subjection of the Wife to her Husband, that of one Man to another, and that of Subjects to their Princes. He inſiſts much upon this laſt, and occaſionally ſpeaks of the Attention Men ought to give to Sermons.

In the fifth he ſhews, that thoſe who live well purchaſe their Liberty; and declaims againſt thoſe that refuſe to aſſiſt the Poor.

The ſixth, ſeventh, and eighth, are concerning the Tree of Knowledge of Good and Evil. In the firſt he ſhews, that Adam knew Good and Evil before he taſted the Fruit of that Tree. In the ſecond he ſays, that it is ſo called, becauſe Evil is more perfectly known after Commiſſion; there he alſo explains thoſe Words of our Saviour to the good Thief: This day ſhalt thou be with me in Paradiſe. The third is about God's forbidding Man to eat of the Fruit of the Tree.

The ninth is upon the Names of Abraham and Noah, where he diſcourſes of brotherly Correction.

The tenth Homily upon Geneſis in the Engliſh Edition is not genuine; it has the ſame Preface with the third Homily upon David and Saul; it is written in a ſwelling Style, and full of Metaphors, and quite different from the firſt Part.

The following Sermons are upon the Hiſtory of Hannah, Samuel's Mother, in the firſt Book of Samuel; but it treats of ſeveral Subjects.

The Preface to the firſt is upon the Faſt of the laſt Lent, and upon the Sermons which he had made ſince againſt the Gentiles; and after Flavianus his return upon the Feaſts of the Martyrs, and againſt ſwearing. After this he reſumes the Subject of Providence, which he was entred upon: he demonſtrates, that it is God who gave unto Man the knowledge of the things which he ought to know; that ſickneſs and death have their uſe: He takes notice that the Love which Parents have for their Children is an effect of Providence, and that Mothers are not leſs concerned in the Education of their Children than Fathers: And upon occaſion of this laſt Reflection, he relates the Hiſtory of Hannah, and he ſpeaks of it in the following Sermon, and thereupon he Diſcourſes of Moderation, of Modeſty, and the Reverence due to Prieſts, and of Grace before and after Meat.

In the third, he ſpeaks of the Obligation which lies upon Men, to give their Children good Education.

In the fourth, upon the ſecond Part of Hannah's Song, he reproves thoſe who neglect Divine Service to go to Plays and publick Shows, and diſcourſes of the uſefulneſs of Prayer.

In the fifth he ſhews their Error, who go to Church only upon great Feſtival Days. He expounds the reſt of Hannah's Hymn, and he ſpeaks of the Advantage of Wealth above Poverty. Theſe five Diſcourſes were preached by St. Chryſoſtom in Antioch, about Whitſuntide, after Flavianus his Return. In this laſt Sermon, he mentions a Diſcourſe upon the firſt Part of Hannah's Hymn not extant.

There are three Sermons about David and Saul. In the firſt, after a Declamation againſt thoſe that frequent Plays to the neglect of Holy Worſhip, and a Declaration that they ſhould be excommunicated, he treats of Patience, and forgiveneſs of Enemies; propoſing for an example David's Action, who would not kill Saul, though God had delivered him into his Hands.

In the ſecond, that Action is commended, and preferred before all the other great Actions of that King. He proſecutes the ſame Argument, in the third Diſcourſe, where he alſo complains of thoſe who were given to Plays: He obſerves, that it is as great an Act of Virtue to bear an Injury patiently, as to give Alms.

At the End of theſe there is another Sermon againſt Idleneſs, which hath no Relation to the Reſt.

The Homilies upon the Pſalms, are Commentaries rather than Sermons: St. Chryſoſtom does not enlarge ſo much upon Moral Topicks, as to give the ſenſe and underſtanding of the Text. He follows the Verſion of the LXX, but he often hath recourſe to the Differences of the Antient Greek Verſions, and quotes even the Hebrew Text in ſome places to clear Difficulties: There are ſome Pſalms upon which we have no Homilies of St. Chryſoſtom, as the firſt and ſecond; but there are upon the third, and following to the 13*th*; upon the 41*ſt*, and 43*d*, and ſo on to the 117*th*; and from the 119*th* to the laſt; which make in all Sixty Homilies, which certainly are St. Chryſoſtom's. To theſe may be added, the Homily upon the 13*th*, Pſalm, and two others upon the fiftieth, which have likewiſe St. Chryſoſtom's Style. Thoſe upon the 51*ſt*, 95*th*, and 100*th*, are more doubtful; yet I ſee no reaſon that we ſhould reject them. It is not ſo of the Commentaries upon the 101*ſt*. Pſalm, and upon the Six that follow, which are Theodoret's. The Commentary upon the 119*th*, belongs to ſome modern Greek, that ſpeaks againſt the Iconoclaſts, and takes out of Theodoret's Commentaries part of what he Writes. There are alſo four Sermons upon particular paſſages of the Pſalms, but they muſt not be joyned to the reſt; becauſe they are not Explications of the Text of the Pſalms, but Sermons upon diſtinct Subjects.

Theſe are a Diſcourſe upon theſe Words of the 44*th*. Pſalm: The Queen ſtandeth at thy Righthand, preached in Conſtantinople ſome Days after Eutropius his Diſgrace, who had retired into the Church, but was gone out again. He ſpeaks in his Preface, of the advantage of reading the Holy Scripture. He deſcribes afterwards how the Church was beſet, when Eutropius had taken Sanctuary there. He relates what he had done to help him, and with what ſincerity he had ſpoken, without fearing the Threatnings uttered againſt him. He obſerves that he was taken by his own fault, for the Church had not forſaken him, but he had quitted it: But yet it was no wonder that he reaped no greater benefit from that Sanctuary, becauſe he entered not into it with a Chriſtian Heart; that when any Man flies into the Church to take ſanctuary there, he ought to go in with his Mind as well as with his Body; becauſe the Church is not made up of Walls, but of an Holy Union among the Members of Jeſus Chriſt. Upon occaſion of the Eunuch's Diſgrace, he ſhews how little Solidity there is in the Goods of this World, and draws a fine Picture of the Inſtability of Riches, and then concludes with an excellent Deſcription of the Church. 'Nothing, ſays he to his Auditors, is ſtronger 'than the Church; Let it be your Hope, your Heaven and 'Refuge: It is higher than the Heavens, of a larger extent 'than the Earth: She never waxeth old, but ſtill retaineth her 'ſtrength and vigour, for this cauſe the Scripture calleth 'her a Mountain, to ſhew her ſtability; a Virgin becauſe ſhe 'cannot be corrupted; a Queen becauſe of her Magnificence 'and Splendour; and it gives her the Name of Daughter, 'by reaſon of her Union with God, &c.'

St. John Chryſoſtom.

Both the Sermons upon theſe Words of the 48*th*. Pſalm. Be not thou afraid when one is made Rich, were likewiſe preached in Conſtantinople. In them he recommends Almsdeeds and Hoſpitality; and he touches upon the neceſſity of being preſent at Divine Service.

The Homily on theſe words of the 145*th*. Pſalm, My Soul bleſs thou the Lord, is a Sermon for the holy Week, called then the great Week. The reaſon of that Name St. Chryſoſtom gives in the beginning of his Diſcourſe, which is this. 'This Week, ſays he, is called the great Week, 'becauſe Jeſus Chriſt wrought great Myſteries at this Time: 'He delivered Man from the Tyranny of the Devil, he o'vercame Death, bound the ſtrong armed Man, blotted 'out Sin. But as this Week is the great Week, becauſe it 'is the firſt of Weeks; for the ſame reaſon Saturday is 'called the great Day: and for this cauſe many of the faith'ful do upon this Day Double their exerciſes; ſome faſt 'with greater Auſterity, others watch continually, others 'beſtow much on the poor: ſome apply themſelves with 'greater Zeal, to the Practice of good Works, and by their 'Piety bear witneſs to the Mercy of God: Emperors 'themſelves honour this Week, they grant a Vacation to all 'Magiſtrates, that ſo being freed from Worldly Care, they 'may ſpend theſe Days in the Worſhip of God: They give 'honour alſo to this Day, by ſending Letters every where 'to command the Priſon Doors to be opened. Let us al'ſo have regard to theſe Days, and inſtead of Palm-branches, 'let us offer him our Hearts. Then he explains the Pſalm, 'My Soul praiſe thou the Lord. The Royal Prophet, ſays 'he, cries out Praiſe the Lord, O my Soul; why does he di'rect his Diſcourſe to the Soul? to teach us that the Soul 'ſhould apply herſelf to the Words that are uttered: For 'if he that prayeth doth not underſtand his own words, 'how would he have God to give ear to him? God often 'doth not grant our Petitions, but that is for our good; 'he defers ſome time, not to deceive us with vain hopes, 'but to make us more zealous and diligent, for the fer'vency of Prayer commonly ceaſeth when we have what 'we have deſired: ſo that to keep up our Devotion, God 'is pleaſed to with-hold his Gifts. He obſerves in this Ser'mon, that the Righteous after Death live with us, pray 'with us, and are amongſt us, &c.'

St. Chryſoſtom writ a Commentary upon Iſaiah: but we have only part of it from the beginning, to the eleventh Verſe of the eighth Chapter. Both the hiſtorical and ſpiritual Senſe is ſet forth with much ſolidity and clearneſs.

There are alſo five Homilies of his upon theſe words of Iſaiah. ch. 6. I ſaw the Lord upon an high Throne, and one concerning the Seraphim ſpoken of in the ſame place; they are moral Diſcourſes upon various ſubjects, and eſpecially of the reverence due to ſacred things, and of the Dignity of the Prieſt-hood; there is a very remarkable paſſage concerning the Eccleſiaſtical and the Civil Power. 'Uz'ziah, ſaith he, went himſelf into the Holy of Holies to 'offer Incenſe: being King he would uſurp the Prieſt-hood: 'I will, ſaid he, burn Incenſe, for I am worthy to do it. 'O ye Princes keep within the Limits of your own pow'er: The bounds of Eccleſiaſtical Power differ from thoſe 'of ſecular Government. The King rules over earthly 'things, the Church's Juriſdiction relates to Heavenly goods. 'God hath committed to Kings the things of the Earth, 'and to me thoſe of Heaven: When I ſay to me, I mean 'to Prieſts. So that, though a Prieſt prove unworthy of his 'Office, yet for all that you ought not to deſpiſe the dig'nity of the Prieſt-hood. God hath made the Body ſub'ject to Kings, and the Soul to Prieſts. The King pardons 'corporal Offences, but the Prieſt remits Sins. The one 'compels, the other exhorts; the one impoſes a law, the 'other gives council; one uſes Spiritual Weapons, the other 'ſenſible Arms; one wages War againſt Barbarians, and 'the other againſt Devils. But the Eccleſiaſtical power is 'the nobler of the Two, wherefore the King receives the 'Prieſt's bleſſing, and in the old Law the prieſt anointed 'the Kings. But this King would go beyond his Bounds, 'and extend his Power, too far, and enter the Temple by 'force, to offer Incenſe: but what did the Prieſt ſay to this? 'Sir, you are not permitted to offer Incenſe. Behold this is 'a generous liberty; here was a Soul that could not flatter 'baſely. You are not, ſays he, to go into the Sanctuary,

'nor

St. John Chryſoſtom.

'nor to offer Incenſe to the Lord, That is reſerved for me 'to do. King Uzziah could not bear this reproof, but tranſ-'ported with Pride, he opens the Sanctuary and burns In-'cenſe. The Prieſt is deſpiſed, the ſacerdotal Function is 'ſet at nought: The Prieſt is without power: For the 'Prieſt's right is only to reprove freely, and to admoniſh 'judiciouſly. Having then adviſed the King with that bold-'neſs which became him, and the King refuſing to yield, 'but on the contrary preparing Arms to aſſert his Autho-'rity; the Prieſt crieth out, I have done what my Duty 'commanded me to do, I have no power to go further, 'O Lord defend the Prieſt-hood which is deſpiſed; thy 'Laws are violated, and Juſtice is overthrown, undertake 'for them.' This is the Account which St. Chryſoſtom gives of the High-prieſt's Conſtancy in the Fourth Homily. In the Fifth he ſpeaks of his Meekneſs. 'I have ſhewed you 'the firmneſs of the High-Prieſt; now take notice of his 'lenity, for we have need not of Courage only, but much 'more of Meekneſs, becauſe Sinners hate to be reproved, 'and ſeek all occaſions to avoid admonition: and ſo muſt 'be drawn and reſtrained with mildneſs and Charity.'

In the Homily concerning the Seraphim he ſpeaks of that Celeſtial Hymn, Holy, Holy, Holy: He ſays, that formerly that Hymn was ſung only in Heaven, but ſince the Lord appeared upon Earth, we are allowed the Benefit of that Divine Conſort. 'Wherefore, ſays he, when the Prieſt 'is by the holy Table to offer the Euchariſt, he does not 'utter that Hymn, but after he has named the Cherubim 'and Seraphim, and the Congregation have lifted up their 'Hearts to God.' This paſſage diſcovers the Antiquity of this Preface to the Office of the Euchariſt.

To theſe Homilies ſhould be joyned the Sermon upon Iſaiah. ch. 45. v. 7. I am the Lord, I form the Light and create Darkneſs, I make Peace and create Evil.

There is no Commentary of St. Chryſoſtom upon Jeremiah (f); but only one Homily upon Ch. 10. v. 23. of that Prophet, where he proves the freedom of Man's Will.

To theſe Homilies upon the Prophets muſt be added two Sermons of the obſcurity of Prophecies wherein he gives reaſons why prophecies are dark. He tells us in the firſt, that the Prophets ſpake obſcurely of the Evils which were to come upon the Jews, becauſe that had they ſpoke plainly, they might have been ill uſed, and perhaps killed by the Jews. This he proves by an infinite Number of Examples of Prophets killed by them, for telling the Truth. It is added, that Prophecies were dark, that the Jews might not underſtand them, till they were to comprehend them. In the ſecond, he ſays, that the event has cleared the Prophecies, That the Veil which covered them was taken off in the New Teſtament, and ſo the obſcurity wherein they were wrapt up has been diſſipated. At laſt, he obſerves, that the Old Teſtament having been Written in Hebrew, is the leſs-clear, becauſe Verſions commonly make the Senſe more obſcure.

This Father's Commentaries upon the New Teſtament are more full and entire.

St. Matthew's whole Goſpel is expounded in fourſcore and ten Homilies (g), and that of St. John in eighty ſeven. There are four and fifty Homilies upon the Acts, and thirty two upon the Epiſtle to the Romans; forty four upon the firſt Epiſtle to the Corinthians; thirty upon the ſecond; a Commentary upon the Epiſtle to the Galatians; four and twenty Homilies upon that to the Epheſians; fifteen upon the Epiſtle to the Philippians; twelve upon that to the Coloſſians; eleven upon the firſt to the Theſſalonians; five upon the ſecond: Eighteen upon the firſt to Timothy; ten upon the ſecond; ſix on the Epiſtle to Titus; three upon that to Philemon; and thirty four upon the Epiſtle to the Hebrews. It is ſaid, that theſe laſt were collected after the Death of St. Chryſoſtom, by a Prieſt called Conſtantine who had been his Diſciple; but there is no Proof of this; and it is more likely that he writ them himſelf. Part of theſe Homilies were preached at Antioch, and the other at Conſtantinople (h).

St. John Chryſoſtom.

Theſe Homilies conſiſt of two parts: The firſt contains a Commentary upon the Goſpel, the other a moral Exhortation to the People. In the Commentary he gives a reaſon of the Contents of the Goſpel, examines all the Circumſtances thereof, weighs the Words, and diſcovers in thoſe places which ſeem moſt plain, great numbers of fine things, to which no attention would have been given, had he not taken notice of them. He keeps ſtill to the literal ſenſe, and of all Explications, he always chuſes, not the moſt ſubtle, but the moſt natural. He ſeeks for no allegorical or figurative ſenſe. He uſeth no far fetched notions to prove his Opinions; avoids all entangled and hard Queſtions, contenting himſelf to make clear and uſeful Obſervations upon the Hiſtory and upon the Text of St. Paul. He gives a perfect light to all the places of this Apoſtle's Epiſtles, which ſeem moſt difficult, and particularly to thoſe, which are thought to ſpeak of Predeſtination and of Grace. His Expoſitions remove all that which at the firſt view makes them appear terrible and fearful. Every-where God is repreſented as a good and merciful Being, and willing to ſave all Men, and who affords them all neceſſary means of Salvation. Men are exhorted to anſwer that Call of God; ſince it is their own fault if they be not ſaved; for thoſe that are damned damn themſelves. He tells them often, that God requireth no impoſſible thing of them: That with God's help they may keep the Commandments, and practiſe Virtue. St. Chryſoſtom finds theſe comfortable Thoughts in the paſſages of St. Paul, which ſeem moſt terrifying; and endeavours to prove, that they are not contrary to the mind of this Apoſtle. The Expoſition he gives of the moſt difficult places, is no ways forced; yea, it ſeemeth very often to be the moſt ſimple and natural. However, to my thinking, it is always the moſt profitable and edifying, and the fitteſt to be preached to the People, which are much edified by ſuch remonſtrances as tend to practice, but can reap little or no fruit from Speculations about God's eternal Decrees, and other abſtracted matters, that have but little relation to the government of Life and Manners.

All the Exhortations that conclude St. Chryſoſtom's Homilies, are ordinarily about ſome points of Morality; as about the fear that men ought to ſtand in of God's Judgments, the Neceſſity of Repentance, the Contempt of Riches, Forgiving of Enemies, Humility, Abſtraction of the Heart from worldly things, diligent Meditation upon the Holy Scriptures, and God's Laws; an Abhorrency of Plays and Shows, Charity towards the Poor, Alms, and Hoſpitality; brotherly Reproof, the Duties of Husbands to their Wives, of Parents to their Children, of Maſters to their Servants, of Lay-men towards their Paſtors, Patience in Afflictions, that Holineſs wherewith Men ſhould come

(f) There is no Commentary of St. Chryſoſtom upon Jeremiah.] There was a Manuſcript in ſome Libraries that went under St. Chryſoſtom's Name; but it was ſo pitiful a Buſineſs, that it was not judged worth publiſhing: no more than ſome Scholia upon the Goſpels of St. Matthew, St. Mark, and St. Luke.

(g) St. Matthew's whole Goſpel is expounded in 90. Homilies.] In the Tranſlation there are 91, but the 29*th.* is divided into two, though it is but one in the Greek Original; and ſo the Tranſlation ought to be mended in the number of the Homilies upon St. Matthew, and in the Greek Text to be corrected in the number of the Homilies upon St. John; for though it diſtinguiſhes 88 Homilies, yet there are but 87, becauſe the Preface is not to be reckoned one of them.

(h) Part of theſe Homilies were preached at Antioch, and the other at Conſtantinople.] Photius obſerves, that it is eaſie to know which Homilies St. Chryſoſtom preached at Antioch; becauſe they are more elaborate than thoſe that were preached at Conſtantinople. But though this general Rule may ſerve to diſtinguiſh them, yet ſome Particulars in the Homilies themſelves are remarkable, to determine where they were preached. It is evident, that the Homilies upon Geneſis, were preached at Conſtantinople, as we obſerved before after Photius, for he poſitively ſays ſo in the 33*d.* Homily upon Geneſis, which is the 28*th.* according to Photius, who reckoneth but 61 Homilies upon Geneſis. Eraſmus believed, that the 54 Homilies upon the Acts were not St. Chryſoſtom's; and Sir Henry Savil ſeems to have doubted of it: But without ground, for they are written in his Stile, and in ſeveral places he diſcovers himſelf. The Stile of the Homilies upon the Pſalms, ſhews that they were preached at Antioch, not to mention the Authority of George of Alexandria, and ſome other modern Greeks that confirm the ſame. It cannot be known when he made the Commentary upon Iſaiah. The ſeventh Homily upon St. Matthew, ſhews plainly that it was preached at Antioch; for he ſays there, that they, to whom he ſpake, boaſted of being Inhabitants of that City, where the Name of Chriſtians took its beginning. That Town is again pointed at in the 68*th.* Homily, according to the Latin, and the 67*th.* according to the Greek: Whereby it is manifeſt, that theſe Homilies were preached at Antioch. In the 21*ſt.* Homily upon the Epiſtle to the Corinthians, he plainly ſays, that he was preaching at Antioch. In the 3*d.* Homily upon the Epiſtle to Titus, he makes mention of Daphne, a Suburb of Antioch, as belonging to the Town where he preached. The Sermons upon the Epiſtle to the Coloſſians were preached at Conſtantinople; for in the 3*d.* Homily he ſpeaks with Epiſcopal Authority, threatning Sinners to deny them the Peace of the Church; he alſo mentions the Epiſcopal Throne whereon he was ſitting, and calls himſelf Biſhop. Of the ſame time are the Homilies upon the Epiſtles to the Theſſalonians: In the 11*th.* upon the firſt Epiſtle, he ſays, that he preſided over them that heard him. The ſame is to be taken notice of in the 4*th.* Homily upon the ſecond Epiſtle. In the 4*th.* upon the Epiſtle to the Hebrews, he threatens to put thoſe out of the Church, who ſhould hire Mourners at the Funerals of their Relations, which juſtifies his being Biſhop. In the 26*th.* Homily upon the ſecond Epiſtle to the Corinthians, there are theſe Words, That the Son of Conſtantine cauſed his Father to be buried in this City. As to the reſt, there is no certain proof from what he ſays, to tell us where they were preached: But the Stile of the Homilies upon the Epiſtles to the Romans, and to the Galatians, being ſmoother and more poliſhed; whereas that of the Homilies upon the Epiſtles to the Epheſians, Philippians, and Philemon, being careleſs and without Art; we may believe, according to Photius his Rule, that the former were preached at Antioch, and the latter at Conſtantinople.

St. John Chryſoſtom.

to the Sacraments; the Benefit of Prayer, and the Conditions required therein, of Faſting, and the Advantages of a monaſtical and ſolitary Life, Aſſiduity in divine Offices, Attention to preaching, Sobriety, Purity, Modeſty, Meekneſs, Clemency, Contempt of Death, and many other like Subjects, which he handleth with ſuch familiar, and yet ſuch ſolid and convincing Reaſons, that there are no Diſcourſes more capable of inſpiring Notions of Piety and Virtue. He does not go about, as moſt Preachers do, to ſet forth ſtudied Notions, which divert the Underſtanding, but do not touch the Heart. He goes to the Bottom of Things, ſearches the ſecret Folds of Man's Heart; and not contented to have diſcovered and deſcribed Vice, he begets an horrour of it; He ſets forth the moſt powerful Motives to deter Chriſtians from it, and the moſt proper means to correct it, and to practiſe true and ſolid Virtue. He ſtretches nothing too far, but diſtinguiſhes exactly the matter of a Precept, from the Advice therein contained: He is neither too meek nor too ſevere: He is neither too familiar, nor keeps too much diſtance; never complies beyond what is meet, nor terrifies to Diſcouragement: In a word, his Exhortations are an excellent Pattern of preaching to the People.

The Sermons in the Fifth Volume upon ſeveral Texts of the New Teſtament, are not Commentaries, but moral Inſtructions, or Homilies upon different Subjects.

The firſt is of Forgiveneſs of our Enemies, upon the Parable of that Debtor, to whom his Maſter remitted ten thouſand Talents, and yet afterwards exacted the hundred Pence from him that owed them to him. He ſpeaks of the exact Account that Men muſt render to God. 'Rich Men, 'ſaith he, muſt give account for the uſe of their Riches; 'poor Men of their Patience; Judges of the Diſcharge of 'their Office; but above all, Church-men ſhall account for 'their Miniſtry; they ſhall be more ſtrictly examined. It 'ſhall be asked of him to whom the Word of God was 'committed, whether out of Idleneſs or Flattery, he omitted none of thoſe neceſſary things which his Miniſtry obliged him to ſpeak; if he explained all and concealed no 'Truth. A Biſhop charged with the Direction of a Dioceſs, hath yet a far greater Account to give: His Examination will be not only about his Doctrine, and his helping of the poor, but eſpecially about the Orders which 'he ſhall have conferred, and a Thouſand other Obligations of the Prieſthood. St. Chryſoſtom ſpeaking of St. Peter in that Homily, calleth him the Head of the Body of 'the Apoſtles, the Mouth of the Diſcipies, the Firmament 'of the Faith, the Foundation of Confeſſion, and the Fiſherman of the whole Earth.

The ſecond Sermon of this Volume is againſt Dancing and Luxury; there he ſhews, that Preachers are bound to reprove Vice, and that they ought never to forbear, tho' their preaching ſeems to be without Fruit: Then he begins to explain the Parable of Dives and Lazarus, making ſeveral moral Reflections on the particulars of that Parable in the four following Sermons. The laſt is quoted by Photius in the 277*th*. Volume of his Bibliotheca, where he ſpeaks of an Earthquake at Antioch, where he preached theſe Sermons. He obſerves in the fourth, that God does not permit any to return from the Dead, and gives the reaſon of it.

The ſeventh Sermon is an Expoſition of the Parable of the Man that was ſick of the Palſie; he uſes Jeſus Chriſt's Words, concerning that ſick Man, and his Cure, to prove the Divinity of Jeſus Chriſt.

The eighth is upon theſe Words of Jeſus Chriſt in St. Matthew, Chap. 26. v. 39. Father, if it be poſſible, let this Cup paſs, &c. There he explains the Myſtery of Chriſt's Incarnation, and in what ſenſe he feared Death, and would have avoided it.

The ninth on theſe Words of St. Matthew, Enter in at the ſtrait Gate, is againſt publick Shows: At the latter end of it, the Caſe of Dives is compared with that of Lazarus.

The tenth contains an Expoſition of the Lord's Prayer: This Prayer is not written in St. Chryſoſtom's Stile.

The eleventh is upon the Reſurrection of Lazarus. That Diſcourſe is none of St. Chryſoſtom's, the Stile, Elocution, and the very Thoughts, are quite different from his.

The twelfth is upon the Title of the Acts of the Apoſtles: where after a Diſcourſe, concerning the Eſtabliſhment and Perpetuity of the Church, which could neither be ſhaken nor ruined by the ſevereſt Perſecutions; he ſhews, that a Chriſtian Life, and good Works, are more to be valued, than the Gift of working Miracles; he ends with a Commendation of the Biſhop of Antioch, whom he calls the Succeſſor of St. Peter: For, ſaith he, it is one of the Prerogatives of our City to have had for our Maſter St. Peter, the firſt of the Apoſtles. It was juſt, that that City, which had the Advantage of bearing firſt the Name of a Chriſtian City, ſhould have for her Biſhop the firſt of the Apoſtles. But having enjoyed that Happineſs, we would not engroſs it to our ſelves, but conſented he ſhould go to Rome, the Imperial City: Yet in giving, we have not loſt him, we have him ſtill; we have not his Body, but his Faith; and having St. Peter's Faith, we may truly ſay, we have St. Peter himſelf.

He juſtifies himſelf in the thirteenth for the length of his Prefaces; he ſhews there the Uſefulneſs of Reproof, and treats of the Converſion of St. Paul, and of the changing of his Name, and reproves them that neglect to labour in their own Converſion, under pretence that God will convert them. God, ſays he, forceth no man; he draweth only them that are willing to go to him; he is willing to ſave us; but that is, if we be willing to be ſaved.

St. John Chryſoſtom.

The fourteenth is upon theſe Words of St. Paul, c. 5. v. 3. Rejoycing in Tribulations. Here he ſhews what is the Fruit of Afflictions, and of Perſecutions.

The ſame Subject is handled in the following Diſcourſe, upon theſe Words of the ſame Apoſtle: All things work together for good to them that love God.

The Preface of the ſixteenth is againſt ſuch as frequent not the Aſſemblies of the Faithful in Churches; and then he expounds theſe Words of the Apoſtle, If thine Enemy hunger, feed him: exhorting Men to forgive Injuries.

In the ſeventeenth and eighteenth Sermons he makes many very uſeful Reflections upon theſe Words of St. Paul, Salute Aquila and Priſcilla. In theſe Diſcourſes we have an Example, how many moral Thoughts may be ſuggeſted by a Subject which of it ſelf ſeems dry and barren. For what is there more ſimple in appearance, and of leſs Inſtruction, than this Salutation of St. Paul? Yet by a wonderful Art St. Chryſoſtom makes uſe of it for the Explanation of many important Inſtructions. As about the Reſpect we ought to have for the Poor, Charity towards our Brethren, the ſmall regard that is to be had to Nobility, the Profit of working with our own hands, and the Reverence due to Church-men, &c.

The nineteenth and twentieth Sermons are about what St. Paul ſaith of Marriage in 1. Cor. c. 7. from which he takes occaſion to ſpeak againſt dancing, feaſting, and other prophane Pomps of Weddings. He teaches what ought to be the end of Marriage among Chriſtians, and how it is to be uſed. 'Marriage, ſays he, is a Remedy againſt Fornication, 'Let us not therefore diſhonour it by filthy Pomps. Chriſtians ought to baniſh from their Weddings deviliſh Pomps, 'filthy Songs, laſcivious Conſorts, undecent Dancings, 'obſcene Words, Riots, exceſſive Laughter; and they ought 'to introduce the Servants of Jeſus Chriſt, and his Prieſts; to 'have Jeſus Chriſt in Perſon in the midſt of them, as of the 'Marriage in Cana. Let no man tell me it is the Cuſtom; 'do not tell me of a Cuſtom, if it is ſinful. If the thing be 'evil in it ſelf, how old ſoever the Uſe of it be, retrench it: 'If it be good, and not uſual, bring it in. But know that this 'Cuſtom is not antient, but an Innovation. Remember the 'Marriage of Iſaac with Rebecca, of Rachel with Jacob; 'the Scripture tells us how thoſe Weddings were kept; 'it ſhews indeed, that there was a Feaſt more ſplendid than 'ordinary; that the Relations and Neighbours were invited, but there were no Fiddles, no Dancing, nor any o'ther ſhameful Exceſſes of our Age. Now at Weddings 'ſuch laſcivious Songs are ſung, as teach Adultery, and 'inſpire fooliſh Love, the Gueſts full of Wine do at'tend the Bride with impure Diſcourſes. With what reaſon 'can you pretend to require Chaſtity in a Woman, whom 'you have taught from the very firſt day to be impudent, 'and before whom you ſuffer that to be ſaid and done, 'which your Footmen would bluſh to do or hear? To 'what purpoſe do ye bring in a Prieſt to crave a Bleſſing, 'and the next day your ſelves commit baſe Actions?' In the ſame Homily there are a great many Exhortations of the ſame nature againſt ſuch Diſorders, which are not leſs frequent in our days, than they were in the time of this Biſhop. Afterwards he adviſeth both Men and Women to behave themſelves holily in Marriage; and not only to avoid Adultery, but not ſo much as give an Occaſion of ſuſpicion: He proves that ſecond Marriages are not forbidden, though it is better to forbear, and concludes with a ſenſible Declamation againſt Adultery and Fornication.

The twenty-firſt is upon theſe Words, 1. Cor. c. 10. Our Fathers were all under the Cloud, &c. After a large Expoſition of which Words, he ſpeaks of Alms-deeds, and of the neceſſary Diſpoſitions to communicate worthily.

The twenty-ſecond is upon theſe Words of St. Paul. There muſt be Hereſies. He commends the Old Agapæ, or Feaſts of Charity.

The twenty-third is of Alms-deeds, and the care which Men ought to have of ſuch as are in want. This ſhould be placed among the Sermons of Morality.

The twenty-fourth is upon theſe Words, 2. Cor. c. 4. Having the ſame Spirit of Faith, &c. He gives great Praiſes to Virginity, and to a Monaſtick Life; which he deſcribes in theſe Words: 'Do you not take notice of thoſe Monks 'who live privately, and dwell upon the Tops of Moun'tains? What Auſterities and Mortifications do they not 'practiſe? They are covered with Aſhes, cloathed with 'Sackcloth, loaden with Chains and Irons, ſhut up in lit'tle Cells, ſtrugling continually with Hunger, they ſpend 'their time in Watchings to blot out part of their Sins.' He obſerves alſo, that tho' Virginity is a ſupernatural Gift, yet it is unprofitable if it be not accompanied with Charity and Meekneſs.

The

St. John Chryſoſtom.

The twenty-fifth is upon the ſame Text; he oppoſes the Manichees, and exhorts them to give Alms.

The twenty-ſixth upon the ſame Words, preſſes the Duty of Alms-giving.

The twenty-ſeventh is upon theſe Words, 2 Cor. Bear a little with my Folly. He lays down Rules very judicious, both at what time, and upon what occaſions a Man may commend himſelf.

The twenty-eighth reproves them who abuſe what St. Paul ſaith, Phil. c. 1. v. 18. What matters it how Chriſt is preached? His Diſcourſe is about Prayer and Humility.

In the twenty-ninth he treats of the Marriage of Chriſtians, and of the Duties of thoſe that are married.

The thirtieth is upon theſe Words, 1. Theſſ. c. 4. v. 13. But I would not have you to be ignorant, Brethren, concerning them which are aſleep, that ye ſorrow not even as others which have no hope. He diſcourſes of the way how Chriſtians ſhould bear with the Death of Relations, and confirms what he ſays by the Examples of Job and of Iſaac.

The thirty-firſt is concerning the Duty of Widows, on theſe Words, 1 Tim. c. 5. v. 9. Let not a Widow be choſen of leſs than ſixty Years. He there diſcourſes of Childrens Education.

The following Sermons have leſs relation to Texts of Scripture, being, for the moſt part, upon ſolemn Feſtival-days.

The thirty-ſecond is about Judas's Treaſon, where he ſpeaks of the neceſſary Diſpoſitions to communicate worthily.

The thirty-third concerns the Feſtival of Chriſtmaſs, which was celebrated for Ten years before in the Eaſt upon the 25*th.* of December, as it had been before at Rome. St. Chryſoſtom proves by ſeveral Reaſons, that this was exactly the Day of Jeſus Chriſt's Nativity.

The thirty-fourth and thirty-fifth are upon the Paſſion of Jeſus Chriſt: In the latter he ſpeaks of forgiving Enemies, upon occaſion of the Good Thief.

The thirty-ſixth is upon the Reſurrection from the Dead.

The thirty-ſeventh is a Sermon upon the Reſurrection of Jeſus Chriſt, preached upon Eaſter-day.

The thirty-eighth upon the Aſcenſion, was preached in a Church of Martyrs.

The thirty-ninth and fortieth Sermons are upon Whit-ſunday. In the former he anſwers that curious Queſtion, Why Miracles are not wrought now, as they were in the time of the Apoſtles?

The forty-firſt is of the Dignity of the Euchariſt, and the Reſpect we ought to ſhew to the holy Myſteries. This Diſcourſe ſeems to me to be neither of the Stile nor the Order of St. Chryſoſtom.

The ſeven following Sermons being Panegyricks upon St. Paul, were tranſlated by Anianus, who lived in Athalaricus's time.

The forty-ninth is of Meekneſs.

The fiftieth upon the Converſion of St. Paul, was preached at Antioch after that upon the Title of the Acts.

The fifty-firſt is upon the Inſcription in the Temple of Athens, To the unknown God, ſpoken of Acts, c. 17. v. 17.

The fifty-ſecond is upon the beginning of the firſt Epiſtle to the Corinthians: Paul called an Apoſtle, &c.

The fifty-third ſhews the Profitableneſs of reading the holy Scripture. It is dedicated to Perſons newly baptized; there he extolls the Quality of an Apoſtle. It is one of the four upon the beginning of the Acts, preached at Antioch before Flavianus.

The fifty-fourth of Chriſt's Prayers and Qualities, is the firſt Sermon upon the Incarnation.

The fifty-fifth is againſt thoſe that faſt at Eaſter.

The fifty-ſixth againſt ſuch as obſerve the Jewiſh Faſts.

In the fifty-ſeventh he ſpeaks of Alms-deeds, upon occaſion of the Hoſpitality practiſed towards the Prophet Elijah, who was relieved by the Widow of Sarepta.

The fifty-eighth of the Pleaſures of the Life to come, and of the Vanity of this World's Goods.

The fifty-ninth is againſt thoſe that deſpair, when they receive not what they ask of God, or who petition for unjuſt things; he there occaſionally ſpeaks of the Duty of Huſbands towards their Wives.

In the ſixtieth he compares Riches with Poverty; treats of the manner how Sinners are to be reproved, and blames thoſe who call upon God againſt their Enemies.

The ſixty-firſt begins with an Exclamation againſt thoſe that communicate unworthily: He ſhews that a Preacher is not to preach God's Word with Complaiſance, but to reprove Vice with Fervency, becauſe this is profitable for Sinners to make them know and confeſs their Sins.

The ſixty-ſecond concerns Martyrs; there he proves, That the beſt way of honouring Martyrs, is to imitate their Virtues.

The ſixty-third is againſt thoſe who teach, That Dæmons govern the Affairs of this World, and againſt ſuch as do not endure with Patience the Chaſtenings of God; and, laſtly, againſt thoſe who are ſcandalized at the Proſperity of the Wicked, and the Misfortune of the Righteous.

In the Sixty-fourth he treats of St. Paul's action in reſiſting St. Peter; and endeavours to prove, that both did it by agreement for the inſtruction of the Faithful.

St. John Chryſoſtom.

The Sixty-fifth is a Diſcourſe, or rather a Treatiſe againſt Jews and Gentiles, to prove the Divinity of Jeſus Chriſt.

The Sixty-ſixth is another Treatiſe againſt thoſe who were offended, becauſe of the miſchiefs that happened to the City, and the perſecution of the Prieſts, and of the faithful. It is an excellent Explanation of that hard Queſtion, Why there is ſo much evil in the World, if the Providence of God governs it? Both theſe Pieces ſhould be put among St. Chryſoſtom's Treatiſes.

The Sixty-ſeventh is an Homily concerning the two Paralyticks of the Goſpel: There he proves the Divinity of the Son of God.

The Preface to the Sixty ſeventh is about the Uſe that Men are to make of Sermons preached in the Church. He gives a reaſon why the Acts of the Apoſtles are read in the Church at Whitſuntide. Laſtly, he ſhews that the Miracles of the Apoſtles proved the Certainty of Chriſt's Reſurrection, and rendred it more famous. This Sermon follows that which he made upon the Title of the Acts.

In the Sixty-eighth, having reproved thoſe who complained that his Sermons were either too long or too ſhort, he gives a reaſon of altering St. Paul's Name, and that of Abraham, and of the Signification of that of Adam.

The Sixty-ninth Sermon was preached at Antioch, in the abſence of the Biſhop. He commends the Martyrs, and treats of Contrition of Heart, and of Alms-deeds.

The Seventieth is upon the Feaſt of St. Baſſus Biſhop and Martyr, upon an Earthquake that happened at Antioch, and upon the Words of Jeſus Chriſt, Matthew, c. 11. v. 29. Learn of me, for I am meek and lowly of heart.

The Seventy-firſt is a Panegyrick upon St. Droſis.

The Seventy-ſecond is a Sermon of Penance, mentioned in the ninth Homily of Penance.

All theſe Sermons now mentioned were preached at Antioch by St. Chryſoſtom, when he was Prieſt of that Church. There are but two more in this Volume preached at Conſtantinople; the firſt was after the expulſion of Gainas from the City; and the other was after St. Chryſoſtom's return from his firſt Exile.

At the latter end of the fourth Volume there are three Sermons of the ſame. The firſt was preached at Antioch by St. Chryſoſtom immediately after his being made Prieſt. This Sermon is a Panegyrick upon Flavianus, who Ordained him. It is the firſt that St. Chryſoſtom ever preached. The two others in the ſame place were preached towards the latter end of his Life: The firſt at the time when they contrived his Depoſition and former Baniſhment; the ſecond after he was recalled: In it there is an excellent Compariſon of Sarah ſeized upon by the King of Egypt, and of the Church of Conſtantinople, deprived of his preſence, by the Caballings of Theophilus an Egyptian Biſhop; and a dextrous Commendation of the Empreſs Eudoxia.

The firſt Volume contains ſeveral other Sermons, preached for the moſt part at Antioch: The firſt Twenty-one are called Sermons of Statues; becauſe they were preached at the time, and upon the occaſion of a ſedition in Antioch, in the beginning of the Year 388, wherein the People had thrown down and dragged about the Streets the Statues of Theodoſius, and of the Empreſs Flaccilla.

The firſt Sermon is upon theſe words of St. Paul to Timothy; Uſe a little Wine for thy Stomach's ſake, and often Infirmities, wherein he alledgeth ſeveral reaſons, why God permits his Saints to be afflicted; he preached it ſometime before that Tumult, which obliged him to diſcontinue his preaching. But the heat of that ſedition was no ſooner over, and the People of Antioch, aſtoniſhed with the fearful Threatnings of the Emperor, had acknowledged their fault, and turned their fury into Mourning; but he reſumed the Chair for the comfort of that deſolate People: And Flavianus their Biſhop as a good Father, went to the Emperor to aſſwage his Anger.

The firſt Sermon of St. Chryſoſtom upon this Subject, is that which is called the ſecond of Statues: There he bewails the Unhappineſs of that City, exhorting the Inhabitants to implore the Mercy of God by fervent Prayers, and turn away his Wrath by good Works, to prevent the Danger that threatned them. This Diſcourſe is very eloquent: Here are ſome Fragments whereby one may judge of the reſt. 'What ſhall I ſay? What ſhall I ſpeak of? Our preſent 'Condition calls for Tears rather than Words, Lamenta'tions rather than Diſcourſes, and Prayers rather than Ser'mons. The blackneſs of our Action is ſo great, the 'Wound we have given to our ſelves is ſo deep, and ſo 'hard to be cured, that we have need to apply our ſelves to 'an Almighty Phyſician. Then having compared the Miſery of that City to that of Job, he adds, 'Seven Days have 'I kept ſilence, as formerly did Job's Friends: Give me 'leave to open my Mouth, and bewail our Miſery.—I 'groan, I weep, not for the ſeverity of the Threatnings, but 'for the exceſs of our Folly: For though the Emperor were 'not angry with us, and ſhould forbear to puniſh us, how 'ſhould we ſuffer the ſhame of our Actions?' After this, he deſcribes very elegantly the Happineſs which that City enjoyed before that Mutiny, and the Miſery it was now reduced to; and concludes this Deſcription with theſe Words. 'The great City of Antioch is in danger of being 'utterly deſtroyed; ſhe that lately had an infinite Number 'of Inhabitants, will ſhortly prove a Wilderneſs; none in 'this World can help her: For the offended Emperor, hath 'no equal upon Earth, he is the Sovereign and the Maſter 'of all Men. All we can do is to make our Application 'to the King of Heaven; let us addreſs our ſelves to him, 'and call upon him for help. If we obtain not Mercy from 'Heaven, we have no remiſſion to hope for.' He obſerves, that God permitted that Miſchief, to puniſh the People for their Blaſphemies, and teaches rich men what uſe they are to make of their Riches.

The next Sermon was preached when Flavianus was gone to Court to ſollicit the Buſineſs of the City of Antioch. there he repreſents the Charity of Flavianus, who would undertake that Journey: He tells them the things that the Biſhop was to repreſent to the Emperor, and bids them hope that theſe Remonſtrances will be heard, affirming that he is confident of all through God's Mercy. 'God, ſays he, will 'ſtand betwixt the petitioning Biſhop, and the Emperor ad-'dreſſed to; he will ſoften the King's Heart, and put in the 'Biſhop's Mouth the Words which he ſhould ſpeak.' He intreats the People to pray earneſtly, that God would mollifie the Spirit of the Emperor. He ſpeaks of faſting in Lent, affirming that right faſting is to abſtain from Sin. At laſt he adviſes the People to avoid three Vices, Evil-ſpeaking, hatred of their Neighbour, and Blaſphemy.

He goes on to inſtruct and comfort the People of Antioch, in the following Sermons. In the 4*th*. he praiſes God, that the Chriſtians Affliction in the City of Antioch, had put them upon thoughts of their Salvation, and exhorts them to Patience: And in the laſt place, inveigheth againſt Swearing, and promiſes to ſpeak of it all the Week. This Sermon was preached upon Monday of the Firſt week in Lent.

Next day he continued the ſame Subject, encouraging the People of Antioch to bear with Conſtancy and Generoſity all the Threatnings againſt them, and not to fear either Death or Sufferings. He ſhews, that Sin is the only thing that Chriſtians ought to fear, and he ſpeaks again eagerly againſt Swearing.

The 6*th*. Sermon was preached the next Day after, for the Conſolation of the People that were intimidated by the Magiſtrate. He giveth God thanks that Flavianus was arrived before thoſe that carried the News of the Mutiny. He tells the reaſons that the Biſhop was to uſe to the Emperor, and explains a Law, that was to be urged: He tells them, that Sin only was to be feared, and that Swearing ought to be avoided.

The 7*th*. and 8*th*. were preached upon Thurſday and Friday of the ſame Week: He comforts the People, and explains the beginning of Geneſis, which was then begun to be read in the Churches in Lent. He diſcourſes againſt Swearing, and reminds them, that it was the ſixth Day, that he had preached againſt that Sin, and that it ſhould be the laſt time: Which ſhews, that the 15*th*. Sermon followeth this, for there he tells them, that though he had reſolved the Day before to ſpeak no more of God's Command not to ſwear, becauſe he had ſufficiently diſcourſed on that Subject the Day before, yet he found himſelf obliged to inſiſt upon it, till he ſaw them reformed.

The 16*th*. Homily was preached upon Saturday, in the ſecond Week in Lent: Becauſe he ſays, at the latter end, behold we have paſſed the ſecond faſting Week. He ſpeaks of the foregoing Sermon, as of his laſt; though it had been preached ſome Days before.

It is very likely, that the 9*th*. and 10*th*. Sermons follow this, and that they were Preached before the Judges ſent by the Emperor had frighted the People; for St. Chryſoſtom ſays nothing there concerning the Deſolation of the City, but handleth ſome Points of Morality, particularly againſt Swearing, and againſt thoſe who refuſe to hear Sermons after Dinner.

The Officers of the Emperor having erected a Chamber of Juſtice at Antioch, to puniſh the Town for their Sedition, and to condemn thoſe that were moſt guilty; dreadful was the Conſternation of the People, which made them think upon nothing elſe, but how they might appeaſe the Judges, and mitigate the ſeverity of the Judgment. St. Chryſoſtom deſcribes the Day of that Judgment, as the moſt dreadful thing in the World: He ſays, that all the People expected nothing but Death, ſome fled, others hid themſelves, the Streets were empty; that the reſt of the Inhabitants aſſembled near the Palace-Gate, waiting there for their Condemnation: That within the Palace, all was full of Men put to the torture, or ſentenced to Death: That Mothers wept for their Children, and Siſters for their Brethren: In one word, that the whole City was in a fearful Deſolation, in expectation of all manner of Miſchief. In this ſad Conjuncture of affairs, the Hermits left their Solitude to come to Antioch, to ſollicit the Judges in behalf of the People; The Clergy alſo attended to move them to Clemency: And every one did his endeavour to work upon them, by all the Tokens of regret and ſubmiſſion, that can be given in ſuch occaſions. The Judges moved with theſe things, and touched eſpecially by the Remonſtrances of the Monks, inclined to Mercy, and contented themſelves to take from Antioch, the Quality of Metropolis of the Eaſt, and to forbid the acting of publick Spectacles for the recreation of the People: Having in the mean time ſent to Priſon ſome of the Magiſtrates, and chief Men of the City, till they ſhould know the Reſolution of the Emperor. This Judgment was no ſooner pronounced, but St. Chryſoſtom opened his Mouth to return God thanks for the Succeſs, as he doth in the 17*th*, 11*th*, 12*th*, and 13*th*. Homilies, which were preached one after another, thoſe ſucceſſive Days after the Judgment. But ſome having again ſtruck a new Terror into the People, St. Chryſoſtom endeavours to ſettle them in the 14*th*. Homily.

St. John Chryſoſtom.

The 18*th*. Homily was preached by St. Chryſoſtom, after Mid-Lent, as he ſaith in the beginning, complaining of ſome who rejoyced that half the time of Faſting was over, and of the Impatience which the Inhabitants of Antioch ſhewed, becauſe they were deprived of their Bathings and pleaſures. He takes notice, that they had not been deprived of them above 20 Days.

St. Chryſoſtom being fallen ſick, appeared not in ten Days, but was no ſooner able to go abroad, but he began again and preached the 19*th*. and 21*ſt*. Sermons, that are particularly directed to the People come out of the Country to Antioch, about the Feaſt of Eaſter.

The 22*d*. was preached towards the end of Lent. He diſcourſes there of the neceſſary qualifications, to communicate worthily at Eaſter; affirming, that it is abſolutely needful to forget injuries, and to be reconciled; from whence he takes occaſion to ſpeak againſt Enmities and reſentments; he adds threatnings againſt ſuch as had not left their Cuſtom of ſwearing, notwithſtanding his manifold Exhortations to this purpoſe in the time of Lent.

The laſt Sermon upon the ſame Subject is the 20*th*. about the return of Flavianus, who came back to Antioch before Eaſter, having obtained of the Emperor's Clemency, pardon for the City of Antioch. In this Diſcourſe St. Chryſoſtom eloquently deſcribes the wonderful conduct of Flavianus, the Diſcourſe he had with the Emperor, the Anſwers of that Prince, and the rejoycing of the People at Antioch, when they received the welcome news of the Pardon granted them. This is the true Order of thoſe 22 Sermons of St. Chryſoſtom, which is much perverted in the Editions.

The other Homilies in this Volume, are either Sermons upon ſome points of Doctrine, or of Morals, or panegyricks upon Saints. The Sermons of the former kind are theſe: ſix Homilies of the incomprehenſible Nature of God againſt the Anomœans, the laſt whereof was preached at Conſtantinople; a Diſcourſe of the Conſubſtantiality againſt the Arians, quoted by Theodoret in the ſixth Council. A Diſcourſe of the Judgment, which follows immediately after the laſt. One againſt thoſe who like the Pagans kept the firſt Days of the Months, preached upon New-years Day: A Sermon of Jeſus Chriſt's Baptiſm; a Diſcourſe about the Devil's Temptation; ſix Sermons againſt the Jews: The Homilies of Penance, which formerly were more in Number, and are now to be reduced into the following order. The firſt beareth that Title in the firſt Volume; the ſecond and third are loſt, the fourth and fifth are alſo right ſet down in the firſt Volume: We have neither the ſixth nor the ſeventh, except that which is in the fourth Volume be one of theſe two, for it is falſly entituled, The third Homily of Penitence, ſeeing he ſays in the beginning, that he had been ſome Days without preaching; whereas it is evident by the beginning of the 4*th*. Homily of Penance, that he had preached the four firſt Homilies of Penance one after another without interruption. The 9*th*. is the 65 Sermon of the 5*th*. Volume of Penance, and of the ſorrow of King Ahab. The 10*th*. Homily is the 9*th*. in the firſt Volume, and the laſt is the eleventh.

The Diſcourſe againſt the Gentiles, is not a Sermon, but a Treatiſe which is to be placed amongſt St. Chryſoſtom's Treatiſes: But the Diſcourſe of Baptiſm, is a Homily directed to the Catechumens.

The Diſcourſe of Anathema's is St. Chryſoſtom's, though ſome Criticks have doubted it. It is his Stile, and therein he ſpeaks of the Homilies of the Incomprehenſible Nature of God; and it was quoted near 400 Years ago by Philotheus, Patriarch of Conſtantinople; as written by St. Chryſoſtom. He proveth in that Homily, that an Anathema is not lightly to be pronounced againſt any, nor others raſhly to be condemned.

The two Treatiſes of Prayer, are probably written by St. Chryſoſtom: but the ſix Diſcourſes about Providence, which are in the ſame Volume are none of his, no more than the laſt of Penance, and Continence, which are ſuppoſed to belong to John, the Faſter, Patriarch of Conſtantinople, who lived long after St. Chryſoſtom.

The firſt of St. Chryſoſtom's Panegyricks, is upon St. Philogonius Arch-Biſhop of Antioch; the ſecond upon St. Babylas, likewiſe Arch-Biſhop of Antioch; the third upon Maximus and Juventinus Martyrs, who ſuffered Martyrdom under Julian the Apoſtate. Theſe two Sermons were preached preached one after the other upon the 24*th.* and the 26*th.* of January, after the three firſt Homilies of Lazarus, as is noted in the fourth. The third is of St. Pelagia a Virgin of Antioch, who threw her ſelf headlong rather than loſe her Virginity. The fourth of St. Ignatius Biſhop of Antioch. The fifth of St. Romanus, Martyr of Antioch. The ſixth is a Diſcourſe to the praiſe of the ſeven Macchabees. The ſeventh of a Panegyrick upon St. Meletius. The Eighth of St. Lucianus Martyr of Antioch, preached the next day after the Feaſt of Chriſt's Baptiſm. The ninth upon St. Julianus. The tenth is a ſecond Diſcourſe upon St. Romanus the Martyr. The eleventh is a ſecond Diſcourſe of the Macchabees. The twelfth is a third Diſcourſe upon the ſame Subject. The thirteenth is of St. Domnina, and of her two Daughters Berenice and Proſdoce, who choſe a Voluntary Death before the Violation of their Virginity. The fourteenth of St. Euſtathius Biſhop of Antioch. The fifteenth is a Diſcourſe of Helias and St. Peter. The ſixteenth is of the Egyptian Martyrs. The ſeventeenth upon St. Barlaam Martyr in Cæſarea in Cappadocia. The Panegyrick upon the Martyr Phocas, and the Fragment of that of St. Thecla, which is in the ſame Volume, are not of St. Chryſoſtom's Stile: But the Diſcourſe upon all the holy Martyrs, is an excellent Sermon worthy of St. Chryſoſtom. Among the reſt, this is one of the fineſt Paſſages there. 'The Devil, ſays he, has introduced Death into the World, 'and God makes uſe of Death to introduce us into Heaven by Martyrdom. Martyrdom is a Combat, the Martyrs are on the one ſide, and Tyrants on the other: The Tyrants are armed, and the Martyrs naked: Yet they that are naked get the Victory, and they that bear Arms are vanquiſhed. What wonder is this? He that is beaten proves Victor over him that beats him: He that is bound overcomes him that is at liberty: He that is burnt tames him that burns him; and he that dies ſurmounts him that puts him to Death. It is Grace that Works theſe Miracles, they are above the ſtrength of Nature.'

The ſixth Volume of the Greek and Latin Edition of Paris contains ſeveral Sermons, which Fronto Ducæus, and other Criticks, have judged not to be of St. Chryſoſtom's Stile. Fronto Ducæus Paſſes this Judgment upon it: 'We 'have collected in this ſixth Volume ſome Sermons which 'are not upon whole Books of Scripture, but upon ſome places, written in a Stile differing from that of 'St. Chryſoſtom's Works; for theſe Diſcourſes are Dramatical and full of Proſopopœia's, the Stile is ſententious and conciſe, with frequent Allegories; and we find not there thoſe Similitudes and other Beauties ſo frequent in St. Chryſoſtom's Works; and yet the Authors of theſe Sermons lived either in the time of St. Chryſoſtom, or not long after him. But we ought not to Wonder, that ſome of theſe are quoted under St. Chryſoſtom's Name in very antient Councils; becauſe they were already publiſhed under his Name, and Councils do not uſually examine narrowly into the Authors of thoſe Books which they quote: Being contented to debate the queſtions offered, and to oppoſe to Heretical Errors the Writings received in the Church; as did the Apoſtles and other Fathers who quoted Apocryphal Books.' That is the Judgment which this learned Jeſuit makes of the Sermons contained in this Volume; but if we would know whether it is juſt, we muſt examine them ſtrictly one after another.

The Firſt Homily, (the Author whereof ſhews, that there is the ſame Law-giver both of the Old and New Teſtament) is not St. Chryſoſtom's, though Photius quotes it under his Name; for, 1. The Stile is quite different from St. Chryſoſtom's: 2. The order and diſpoſition of this Homily differs much from thoſe of St. Chryſoſtom. 3. It is full of Allegories, which are very rare in St. Chryſoſtom. 4. Moſt of the Thoughts are unworthy of him. 5. There is great Confuſion. 6. It both begins and ends in a different manner from the Homilies of St. Chryſoſtom. 7. It is obſerved at the end of that Diſcourſe, that it was written in a Time when the Roman Empire was under Oppreſſion. 8. The Bleſſed Virgin is there often called Θεοτοκος; ſo that it is plain, this was not done without Affectation.

The two following Homilies upon two places of the Beginning of Geneſis, are unworthy of St. Chryſoſtom for the ſame Reaſons.

The Homily upon theſe Words of Abraham to his Servant, Gen. 24. v. 2. Put thine Hand under my Thigh, &c. is more rational than the foregoing, as to its Notions, but the Stile is too conciſe and cloſe, and comes not near the eaſineſs of St. Chryſoſtom. Yet this Diſcourſe is antient and worth reading, and I am apt to believe that it may have been written by Severianus of Gabala, to whom the following Sermon of the Brazen Serpent lifted up by Moſes in the Wilderneſs, is attributed in the Manuſcripts, and under whoſe Name it is quoted by St. John Damaſcene, in the three firſt Diſcourſes about Images, by Pope Adrian I. Ch. 26. and by the Aſſembly of Biſhops at Paris, in the Year 824. The Author treats of the Trinity, and of the Divinity of the Holy Ghoſt. It appears both by the Stile, and by the Beginning, that it is written by the ſame Author as the foregoing.

The Four Homilies upon Job, are Sermons written by a Monk of the latter Times, who having ſtudied Iſocrates his Oration to Demonicus, coldly imitates him in his four Diſcourſes, where there is neither Wit, nor Order, nor Eloquence, nor Thought, nor Reaſoning; yet he fooliſhly fancies that he out-did St. Chryſoſtom, in Point of Eloquence, many Bars length. St. John Chryſoſtom.

The fifth Homily upon Job, is the 22*d.* of thoſe Homilies, which Simeon Logotheta compoſed out of ſeveral paſſages taken out of St. Chryſoſtom.

The Homily upon this Verſe of Pſalm 38. Man diſquieteth himſelf in Vain, comes nearer to St. Chryſoſtom's Stile, and yet is not quite the ſame.

The Oration of the Turtle-Dove, or of the Church, is an impertinent Diſcourſe, like the Treatiſe, entituled, the Supper, falſly aſcribed to St. Cyprian, from which the Author of this hath taken ſome of his Impertinencies.

The Homily upon the Prophet Elias, is more valuable, and yet ſeems not to me to be St. Chryſoſtom's. I ſhould rather attribute it to Severianus of Gabala, as well as the three following, of Joſeph, Suſanna, and the three Children in the fiery Furnace.

The Homily of Seals written in the ſame Stile with the foregoing, does certainly belong to Severianus of Gabala, being quoted under his Name by Theodoret in the third Dialogue, and by Adrian I. The ſame Character and Stile may be found in the Sermons of Faith, and of the Law of Nature; in that of the Holy Trinity; in the Diſcourſe of the Divinity of the Holy Ghoſt, quoted by Photius under St. Chryſoſtom's Name; in the Sermon upon Penteceſt; in the Sermon preached before Arcadius, Theodoſius's Son, upon the words of the beginning of St. John, In the beginning was the Word, &c. in the Sermon of Circumciſion, that of the Remembrance of Martyrs, and upon Jeſus Chriſt being Shepherd and Sheep; in that upon theſe Words of St. Paul, My grace is ſufficient for thee; in that of the Prodigal Son, of Herodias's Daughter's Dancing; in that upon the Words of St. Matth. 13. The Jews being aſſembled, took Council; in the Sermon of the Ten Virgins, the Homily of the Woman taken in Adultery, and of the Phariſees; in that upon Good-Friday, of the Man that was born Blind, and upon theſe Words of Jeſus Chriſt, Matth. 6. Take heed that you doe not your Alms before Men to be ſeen of them; in the Sermon againſt Hypocriſie; in that upon the beginning of the Year; in the Homily about the barren Fig-tree; in the Sermon of the Phariſees Feaſt; that of Lazarus and Dives; and in that upon the beginning of Pſalm 52, which is the 105*th.* in the 5*th.* Volume of St. Chryſoſtom, of the Eton Edition. The Author of theſe Homilies, writes in a ſhort conciſe Stile; enlarges much upon Dogmatical points, and very little upon Moral ones: What he ſays is intermixt with Allegories: In a word, if one compares theſe Homilies one with another, and with them that are certainly written by Severianus, he will find that they are very like.

The Homilies of the Theophany and the Marriage in Cana, are two inconſiderable Diſcourſes unworthy of St. Chryſoſtom.

That of the Evil Woman, is yet worſe. It was compoſed by ſome modern Greek, who having read in Hiſtory that St. Chryſoſtom had made a Diſcourſe againſt Women, made one to repreſent it: In which either he or ſome body elſe, hath put theſe words in the beginning, that Sozomen relateth: Herodias is mad again, and asketh for St. John's Head. The reſt of this diſcourſe is a continual Repetition of impertinent things.

The Homily of the Canaanitiſh Woman, is alſo in Latin among the Homilies upon ſeveral paſſages of the New Teſtament, aſcribed to Origen, and in the Collection of Homilies upon St. Matthew, Hom. 14*th.* and 17*th.* But here it is in Greek, and larger. The Doctrine, and Thoughts of this Diſcourſe are rational enough, but the Stile is very different from St. Chryſoſtom's.

The Sermons upon St. John the Fore-runner of Jeſus Chriſt; upon the Apoſtles, St. Peter, and St. Paul; upon the Twelve Apoſtles, St. Thomas the Apoſtle, and St. Stephen; are unworthy of St. Chryſoſtom, not only for the Subſtance, but alſo the Stile. Yet the laſt of them is ſomething more rational than the foregoing. The Diſcourſe of St. Thomas is quoted under St. Chryſoſtom's Name, in the ſixth Council, and in that of Lateran, under Pope Martin I.

The Homilies of the Annunciation, Theophany, and the Reſurrection, have no Relation to St. Chryſoſtom's Stile.

The Sermon concerning the Woman of Samaria, is a Diſcourſe, whoſe beginning is quite of another Stile than St. Chryſoſtom's: The latter end is taken Word for Word from the 31*ſt.* Homily of St. Chryſoſtom, upon the Goſpel of St. John.

The four Sermons of the Aſcenſion, publiſhed by Voſſius, are not unworthy of St. Chryſoſtom, though the Stile is not altogether the ſame with that of this Father's Works: In all probability, they are part of thoſe Two and Twenty which Photius read, which he mentions in the 25*th.* Volume, as well as the Sermon upon the ſame Subject, cited by Facundus, l. 11. c. 14.

The Homily which proves, that a Diſciple of Jeſus

St. John Chrysostom.

Christ ought never to be Angry, does not come near to the Stile, or the loftiness of St. Chrysostom.

The Sermon of the false Prophets, is a Declamation made by some Greek, rather than a Discourse really preached by St. Chrysostom, before his Death, as the Title proves.

The Homily of the publick Games in the Cirque, is a pitiful Discourse not worth reading.

The Sermon of Christ's Nativity, Page 493. is quoted by St. Cyril, as St. Chrysostom's, in his Treatise to the Empresses, mentioned in the Council of Ephesus; there is no considerable difference of Stile; which convinces me that it is St. Chrysostom's, or at least, that it was taken out of his Works.

The three following Sermons, the first whereof is upon the Words of St. Luke's Gospel, ch. 2. Cæsar Augustus made a decree, that all the World should be taxed, &c. the second upon the Answer given to Zachariah, Ch. 1. of St. Luke, and the third upon St. John's Conception, are all written in the same Stile, very different from St. Chrysostom's; they contain abundance of insipid Observations upon the Text of St. Luke, which one cannot read without tediousness and trouble.

The Homily upon the Parable of the Housholder, that hired Work-men into his Vine-yard, doth much resemble St. Chrysostom's Stile; if it be not his, it belongs to some antient eloquent Author, and ought to be placed among those Discourses, which though perhaps not Genuine, yet are not to be despised. Some Fragments of it may be found amongst the Homilies, which were collected out of the Works of St. Chrysostom.

I think the same Judgment ought to be made concerning the Sermon, or rather the Fragment of the Homily upon the Publican, and the Pharisee, and of that about the Blind-Man, and Zacheus, which are not unworthy of St. Chrysostom.

A Discourse made to prove, that Monks ought not to use raillery or freedom of speech, is of the kind and Stile of St. Chrysostom; there is a digression against those that kept Women with them. The Authors of St. Chrysostom's Life observe, that he wrote six Orations upon that Subject. This might perhaps be one of them.

The Panegyrick upon St. John the Evangelist, is not worth any thing, but is a pitiful Discourse made up of obsolete and senseless Words.

The second Homily of the Holy Cross, is written by the Monk Pantaleon, Deacon of Constantinople, who lived in the 13*th*. Century: The first Discourse upon the same Subject, does not belong to a better Author.

The beginning of the Homily of St. Peter's Abjuration, is likewise written by some modern Greek, who added at the latter End an Exhortation, taken out of St. Chrysostom's Discourse upon these Words of St. Paul, Having the same Spirit, &c.

The Homily of Bread and of Alms, is a Collection of several Notions of St. Chrysostom's upon that Subject.

The Discourse of Easter, is very like St. Chrysostom's Stile.

The Sermon about Jesus Christ's second Coming, is a Preface annexed to the moral Exhortations of the 25*th*, and 31*st*. Homilies, upon the Epistle to the Romans.

There are several other Sermons in the Greek Edition of St. Chrysostom, printed at Eton, which were not inserted into the Greek and Latin Edition of Paris, as not belonging to St. Chrysostom, or else but Collections out of this Father's Works.

In the 5*th*. Volume, page 680, there is one upon these words, Psal. 92. Dominus regnavit, &c. and upon those of St. Paul, When Jesus Christ shall have given up the Kingdom to the Father, wherein he speaks of Baptism.

Another in the same Volume, page 740. of those Women that brought Spices to embalm the Body of Jesus Christ: Wherein the Author proves, that the Evangelists do not contradict one another, upon the Subject of Christ's Resurrection: Both these Homilies are well enough written, but they are not St. John Chrysostom's.

There is a third in the same Volume, page, 789. upon these words of St. Paul, The good that I would, I do not, but the Evil that I would not, I do. The Author shews there, in what Sense Jacob was a Type of Christ, and declaims against publick Shows. This Discourse is full of Allegories contrary to St. Chrysostom's Custom: It may be attributed to the Author of the following Discourse on these words of the same Apostle: My Grace is sufficient for thee.

St. John Chrysostom.

The 123*d*. Homily in the same Volume, pag. 807. upon these words of the Epistle to the Hebrews, When we sin willfully, there remains no more Oblation, is a Collection out of the 20*th*, 15*th*, and 14*th*. Homilies of St. Chrysostom, upon the Epistle to the Hebrews.

The Homily upon the Nativity of Jesus Christ in the same Volume, pag. 843. where the guardian Angels of Countries and Provinces are discoursed of, is cited by Photius under St. Chrysostom's Name: Yet the Stile shews it not to be St. Chrysostom's: It is more probable, that it belongs to Severianus of Gabala.

At the latter End of this Volume are several other Homilies, yet more unworthy of St. Chrysostom: Viz. the second Panegyrick upon St. Stephen, the Homily upon Palm-Sunday, upon the Thief, upon Judas his Treason, and many Sermons upon Easter, &c.

The sixth Volume is intermixt with several Homilies, which are only Fragments or Collections, taken out of the genuine Works of St. Chrysostom, such as these following Sermons; Of Charity, pag. 742. Of Meekness pag. 750. Sermons concerning Fasting, pag. 883. A Discourse against those that slept upon the Saturday before Whitsunday, pag. 857. That the Salvation of the Soul is to be preferred before the Welfare of the Body, pag. 893. That Priests ought not to be upbraided with Living at Ease, pag. 896. Three Discourses of Penance, pag. 903. That we ought not to weep for the Dead, pag. 943. Of Patience, pag. 949. Of the Soul's Salvation, pag. 961. Against those that abused Virgins consecrated to God, pag. 976. Sermon to Catechumens, pag. 971. A Discourse against Hereticks, pag. 979.

Lastly, The 7*th*. Volume from pag. 271, to 587. contains above a hundred Sermons upon all sorts of Subjects, whereof some are not printed in the Greek and Latin Edition of Paris; namely, those that are either unworthy of St. Chrysostom, impertinent and foolish, or discourses of modern Authors, or Collections and Fragments taken out of St. Chrysostom. The Catalogue and Titles are in the Table of that Volume.

I believe, that most of St. Chrysostom's Sermons, which Photius professes to have read, and which are not, now extant, ought to be placed in the same rank. In the 25*th*. Volume of his Bibliotheca, he speaks of a Book bearing the Name of St. Chrysostom, intituled, Remarks upon the Death of Jesus Christ: 'Which, says he, contained two and twenty short Sermons, upon the Death of Jesus Christ: there were besides, as he adds, in the same Volume, two and twenty Discourses upon the Ascension, and seventeen upon Whitsunday.' St. Chrysostom did not use to make short Sermons; his are generally long and full; he abounded in words and notions which he could not easily contract. Yet Photius hath taken no notice, that these Discourses were not St. Chrysostom's.

But he says, in the 274*th*. Volume, concerning three Discourses of the beheading of St. John the Baptist, that their Subject and Method were very different from the other Sermons of this Father, as well as their Stile, which was flat, and far from the Elegancy of St. Chrysostom. The extracts in the same place, which he made out of a Discourse, concerning the 40 Martyrs ascribed to St Chrysostom, do prove his Assertion.

Among those Homilies, which he abridges in the 277*th*. Volume, there are several which are rejected, as not being St. Chrysostom's (i), but Severianus's of Gabala, or of some other antient Author.

But one ought not to pass the same Judgment upon those which Theodoret quotes in his Dialogues, which are certainly St. Chrysostom's, and which are now extant, most of them (k) at least.

Facundus l. 4. c. 2. quotes a Sermon of St. Chrysostom's, in Commendation of Diodorus, this Discourse was published both in Greek and Latin, by the Learned Bigotius, with

(i) There are several which are rejected as not being St. Chrysostom's.] There are extracts, out of the Homily of the Holy Ghost, out of the Discourse upon these Words, Jesus Christ is the last, &c. Of the Sermon upon the Incarnation, and the Guardian Angels; of the Treatise which proves, that both the Old and New Testament have the same Law-giver; of the Discourse upon these Words of St. Paul, My Grace is sufficient for thee, &c. The Homily of the Holy Ghost is in the sixth Volume of the Paris Edition: See the 221*st*, and 222*d*. page. The Homily upon the Nativity, and of the Angels, are in the Eton Edition, Vol. 5. pag. 843. That of the Law-giver in the Old and New Testament, is the first of the sixth Volume of the Paris Edition. There is also in the same Volume the Discourse upon those Words of the Apostle, My Grace is sufficient for thee: the Sermon upon these Words, 2 Cor. c. 11. If any one be in Christ, let him be a new Creature, &c.

(k) But one ought not to pass the same Judgment upon those which Theodoret quotes in his Dialogues, which are certainly St. Chrysostom's and which are now extant most of them.] He quotes a Discourse preached by St. Chrysostom, after the Speech of the Gothick Ambassador, which is not found among St. Chrysostom's Discourses. The second passage which he quotes in the first Dialogue, is taken out of the Homily of the Nativity, Vol. I. pag. 428. The Homily which Theodoret cites, under this Title, A dogmatical Homily, shewing that what is said of Jesus Christ, seems unworthy of the Power, and of the Divinity, is that which is entituled, Of Consubstantiality, which is in the first Volume, pag. 360. The place which he quotes out of the Commentary upon Psal. 41. is not in that which is now extant: I have not found the Homily of the Confusion of Languages, nor the Passage taken out of the Homily, preached in the great Church. The Homilies against those that Affirm that Dæmons govern the things of this World, against those that Fast upon Easter-Day, and the Homily of Christ's Assumption are among those that we have; as well as the passages taken out of Theodoret's Commentaries upon the Epistle to the Ephesians, upon the Gospel of St. John, and that of St. Matthew.

St. John Chryſoſtom.

the Life of St. Chryſoſtom, written by Palladius: It is a Thankſgiving of that Saint to Diodorus of Tarſus, who had publickly commended him. He there confeſſeth, that the Commendations given him by Diodorus, did put him to ſome trouble: 'For, ſays he, with much humility, great praiſes 'do not leſs check the Conſcience than Sins, when a Man 'finds not in himſelf thoſe Virtues which are commended 'by others.' After that, he returns upon Diodorus the Praiſes which he had given him; and as he was compared with St. John Baptiſt, becauſe of his Name; he ſhews that Diodorus deſerved that Name better than he, having all the Virtues of that holy Fore-runner of Jeſus Chriſt.

Laſtly, Cotelerius in the third Volume of his Monuments, hath publiſhed an Homily under St. Chryſoſtom's Name, upon theſe Words of Matth. 20. By what Authority doſt thou thoſe things: This Diſcourſe is Written by ſome antient Author, but not St. Chryſoſtom; it has his Genius, the reflections are juſt, and the reaſons ſolid: But one does not find that over-flowing Eloquence, nor that abundant fruitfulneſs which was ſo Peculiar to St. Chryſoſtom, though it is not unworthy of him. There the Anomœans are refuted; and he proves, that none ought to pretend to penetrate into Myſteries with human reaſon; but that we ought to depend upon what the Scripture ſays, without ſearching further.

Theſe are almoſt all the Sermons that are attributed to St. Chryſoſtom, which were printed in Greek and Latin. There are ſeveral other Manuſcripts in Libraries that falſly bear the Name of this great Saint, and which are not only unworthy of him, but alſo are not worth publiſhing. For in my opinion, it is equally prudent to ſuppreſs the ill pieces that are in Libraries, as to publiſh thoſe that are worth it. It is a kind of Theft, to keep in obſcurity from the publick thoſe Monuments that may be uſeful: But it is alſo a great Impoſition upon the World, to ſet forth ſuch Books as ſerve for nothing elſe, but to weary the Readers, to encreaſe the number of bad Books, and to fill Libraries with unprofitable Volumes. I wiſh, that as Men prohibit ſelling of bad Wares, ſo they would forbid publiſhing of bad Books, though they are under the Name of great Men. Had this Law been obſerved in the Common-wealth of Learning, from the beginning of Printing, the World would not have been over-whelmed with infinite Loads of Bad Books, which cauſe ſo much confuſion in all Arts and Sciences, and particularly in Divinity. This may be ſaid by the bye, upon occaſion of the vaſt Number of Sermons, which have been printed under St. Chryſoſtom's Name. But is it leſs to be wondered at, that the modern Greeks, to advance the worth of their own productions, which of themſelves were of very little value, would raiſe them by the Glorious Name of our Saint. That which is moſt ſurpriſing, is, that Men ſhould have the impudence to give Diſcourſes written by Latin Authors, the Name of a Greek Father. It may ſo happen, that the Original Greek of ſome Book might be loſt, and that nothing might remain but a Verſion, as upon the Sermon of St. Joſeph, and Continency quoted by St. Auſtin, which is in Latin, among the Works of St. Chryſoſtom: But it is impoſſible, that Sermons taken out of the Works of Latin Fathers, or which were viſibly compoſed at firſt in Latin, ſhould be written by a Greek Father. As for example, it were ridiculous to ſay, that the Diſcourſe of Adam and Eve, which is made up of ſeveral paſſages of St. Auſtin, and which contains the 31*ſt*, and 32*d*. Chapters of Gennadius his Book of Eccleſiaſtical Dogmes: It were, I ſay, ridiculous to believe that this was ever written by St. Chryſoſtom: And that Man is little acquainted with the Stile of Authors, that cannot perceive, that the imperfect Commentary upon St. Matthew, is written by a Latin Author; and that moſt of the Homilies upon the Old and New Teſtament, whereof we have no Greek Originals, and which are found in the Latin Editions of St. Chryſoſtom, mixt with his own proper Works, were compoſed Originally in Latin and not in Greek. Theſe are, the ſecond Homily upon Geneſis, and thoſe that follow, to the 16*th*. from pag. 206. of the laſt Edition, at Lyons, to pag. 222. Eight Sermons upon ſeveral Hiſtories of the Books of Kings, from pag. 243, to pag. 250. Five Homilies upon Job, pag. 261; &c. Two other Homilies, pag. 267. Two Prefaces upon the Pſalms, pag. 269, and 270. A Diſcourſe upon the uſefulneſs of the Pſalms, pag. 272. Homilies upon Pſalms; 9*th*, 14*th*, 22*d*, 24*th*, 25*th*, 26*th*, 29*th*, 33*d*, 37*th*, 38*th*, 39*th*. 40*th*, 42*d*, 68*th*, 71*ſt*, 84*th*, 90*th*, 93*d*, 95*th*, 96*th*, 121*ſt*, 122*d*. A Sermon upon theſe Words, Wiſdom, Chap. 3. They ſeem Dead in the Eyes of Fools, and of Men without Senſe. Four Homilies upon four places of Iſaiah, pag. 598*th*, 613*th*, and 614*th*. An Homily upon Jeremiah, pag. 616*th*. A Sermon of the three Children, pag. 617*th*. One of Suſanna, ibid. and one upon Zach. Chap. 6. pag. 619*th*. Almoſt all theſe Diſcourſes have the Stile of the Latin Preachers, they are full of Sentences, Antitheſes, Figures, and playing upon Words (l) which are uſual in Latin Authors. One neither meets with the Eloquence, nor the Copiouſneſs, nor Fruitfulneſs, nor Sublimity of the expreſſions of St. Chryſoſtom, and the Method is quite different from his (m): In a Word, the matters there treated of are not ſuch as St. Chryſoſtom uſes to diſcourſe of (n).

St. John Chryſoſtom.

We cannot judge otherwiſe of the greateſt part of thoſe Homilies upon ſeveral Paſſages of the four Goſpels which are not in the Greek, viz. the 27 Homilies upon St. Matthew, in the ſecond Volume of the Lyons Edition, pag. 465, &c. to 502. Of the 14 Homilies upon St. Mark, from pag. 503, to pag. 519. Of ſix Homilies upon St. Luke, from pag. 519, to pag. 529. Of that upon Zacchæus, pag. 551. and of 13 Homilies upon St. John, from pag. 164, to pag. 172. All theſe Homilies are either Sermons of Latin Authors, whereof ſome are among thoſe of St. Chryſologus (o), or extracts from the imperfect Commentary upon St. Matthew, or Verſions of ſome paſſages of St. Chryſoſtom, collected and ſtitched up together.

The 59 laſt Homilies upon the Statues, which are in the fifth Volume of the Edition of Lyons, from pag. 75, to pag. 188. are of this laſt ſort as well as ſeveral other Homilies upon different Subjects, from pag. 287, to pag. 298, and from pag. 312, to pag. 355. Three Sermons of Penance and Confeſſion, and ſome Sermons of Faſting, and Almsdeeds, from pag. 361, to pag. 376. and laſtly, common places upon Providence, Riches, Blaſphemies, Debaucheries, and Pleaſures, and upon ſome other matters of Morality which are in the ſame Volume, from pag. 582, to pag. 601.

The imperfect Commentary upon St. Matthew (p), divided into 54 Homilies, is undoubtedly written by a Latin Author, who quotes the old latin vulgar Verſion, and cites Apocryphal Books. There are alſo erroneous notions, contrary to St. Chryſoſtom's Doctrine.

The Latin Sermon ſuppoſed to have been preached by St. Chryſoſtom, after his Return from Aſia, is written by (l) Almoſt all theſe Diſcourſes have the Stile of the Latin Preachers, &c.] They are full of alluſions to words, of rhiming Sentences, as Pſal. 33. Eja fratres mei, hic modo reſpondere voto; quanti modo dicunt; nolo, qui jam dicebant, volo. To this may be added this fine Notion. Oracula ſanctæ lectionis, quæ ſonant in auribus veſtris, nidum faciant in cordibus veſtris. One may find alſo Explications of Latin and Greek Terms, as upon Pſal. 90. Meridies dicitur quia dividit diem; meros enim pars eſt diviſa diei. And upon Pſal. 118. Veritas tres ſuns ſyllabæ & ſeptem literæ, quia in ſeptima die Deus requievit ab operibus ſuis. There are ſeveral ſuch paſſages which juſtifie their Author to be a Latin. The Stile is ſententious, conciſe, and full of Antitheſes, and ſtrokes of Wit, which are ordinary faults in the Latin Preachers, to which St. Chryſoſtom was never liable.

(m) The method is quite different from his.] St. Chryſoſtom divides his Diſcourſes into three parts. The firſt is a Preface: The ſecond an Expoſition of one or more places of Scripture: And the third a Moral Exhortation. This Diviſion may always be obſerved, in St. Chryſoſtom's Sermons. Theſe have nothing like, they have neither Preface, nor moral Exhortation, neither do they conclude with the Doxology. The Author Divides the Scripture into Verſes, and cites Latin Authors as St. Cyprian and Hippolitus: which St. Chryſoſtom never did.

(n) In a Word, the matters treated of, are not ſuch as St. Chryſoſtom uſes to diſcourſe of.] St. Chryſoſtom always handleth Points of Morality, or common Doctrine; he never inſiſts upon thorny and hard Queſtions, but avoiding them carefully, he expounds the Letter of the Scripture, and that in a plain way. The Author of theſe Sermons doth the quite contrary, he fills them with common places, upon Original Sin, Predeſtination, Grace, and hardning of the Heart, &c. Queſtions which St. Chryſoſtom never meddled with. This Author ſeeks for the allegorical and myſtical Senſe, and takes little notice of the literal. In ſhort, nothing can be imagined more unlike to St. Chryſoſtom's way of writing, than the Sermons here examined.

(o) All theſe Homilies are either Sermons of Latin Authors, whereof ſome are among thoſe of St. Chryſologus.] The 13*th*, and 16*th*, are amongſt thoſe attributed to St. Chryſologus: The 17*th*. is among thoſe that are attributed to Origen; the 6*th*. is taken out of the 15*th*. Homily of St. Chryſoſtom, upon St. Matthew. The 21*ſt*. and 22*d*. are part of the 32*d*. and 33*d*. Homilies of the imperfect Work upon St. Matthew: The 25*th*. is taken out of the 37*th*. Homily of the ſame. The 27*th*. and 28*th*. out of the 40*th*. Homily. The Commentary upon St. Mark, is written by ſome ignorant Monk.

(p) The imperfect Commentary upon St. Matthew, &c.] The Author of this Treatiſe cites the Scripture according to the vulgar Verſion, he quotes Apocryphal Books, as that of Seth, Ezechias, and the Itinerary of St. Clement. He has heretical Notions concerning the Trinity, as in the 49*th*. Homily, where he calls the Catholicks Homoouſian Hereticks. In the 7*th*. Homily he rejects the Baptiſm of Hereticks. In the firſt Homily he ſpeaks ill of Marriage; and condemns ſecond Marriages, Homily 32*d*. Sixtus Senenſis pretends that theſe Errors, and eſpecially thoſe that concern the Trinity, have been added ſince, becauſe they are not in ſome antient Manuſcripts, and alſo becauſe in ſome places, he teaches the Divinity of the Son. However he confeſſes with all the Criticks, that it is not St. Chryſoſtom's, but a Latin Author's: There are ſome ſhort Commentaries upon St. Mark, St. Luke and St. Matthew aſcribed to St. Chryſoſtom, and printed at Paris 1576. which bear St. Chryſoſtom's Name, but are none of his.

St. John Chryſoſtom.

one that deſigned to exerciſe himſelf; as alſo the Diſcourſes of St. Chryſoſtom, and Severianus upon their Reconciliation, which are at the latter end of the 7*th*. Volume of the Eton Edition, and of the ſecond of that of Paris. They rather belong to ſome Rhetorician, who deſired to be thought eloquent, than Sermons written in earneſt.

And now we are come to the Books which St. Chryſoſtom writ in his Study, which are almoſt all collected in the 4*th*. Volume. The firſt and moſt excellent are the ſix Books of the Prieſthood, which, according to Suidas's Obſervation, exceed all the other Books of St. Chryſoſtom, both for Elevation of Stile, Beauty of Elocution, and Sweetneſs and Elegance in the Choice of his Words: 'St. Iſidore 'Peluſiota obſerves, in the 156*th*. Letter of his firſt Book, 'that all thoſe that read that Book, reap a conſiderable Advantage from it, ſeeing, that on the one ſide, this Book 'repreſents the Prieſthood as an eminent Dignity, not to be 'approached unto but with much Reſpect: And on the other ſide, it teaches Men to enter into it with great purity and innocence. It is compoſed with ſo much Subtilty, Diſcretion, and Exactneſs, that as they who perform as they ought the Duties of the Prieſthood, do find 'there a Picture of their Virtues; ſo they who negligently 'go about the Functions of their ſacred Miniſtry, cannot but 'diſcover there the Repreſentation of their Vices and Sins.' And indeed there is not any one Book in all Antiquity, that ſpeaks more nobly concerning the Honour and Functions of the Prieſthood. It is in form of a Dialogue between his Friend Baſil and himſelf, and divided into ſix Books. The firſt is a kind of Preface, in which, having ſpoken firſt of the intimate Friendſhip that was betwixt St. Baſil and him, and of the Deſign they had to embrace a retired Life; he relates, that when it was noiſed abroad, that they would make both Baſil and him Biſhops, he did not diſcover to Baſil his Reſolution to retire, and that having hid himſelf at the time of the Election, Baſil was choſen and conſecrated Biſhop. On this occaſion, Baſil is introduced complaining of that Deceit, and accuſing him of refuſing the Biſhoprick out of Vanity.

St. Chryſoſtom juſtifies himſelf from the Injury that Baſil pretended to have received of him, by ſhewing that there are innocent Cheats, which are Cauſes of much good. He proves in the ſecond Book, that he had deceived him to his own Advantage, by giving him an Opportunity of exerciſing his Love to Jeſus Chriſt after a moſt excellent manner, in feeding his Sheep. Afterwards he diſcourſes of the Virtue, and Wiſdom, which that Office required, proving how great the Charge of Paſtors is by the great difficulty of healing Souls fallen ſick, either by the Contagion of Vice, or by Errors in Faith. Baſil interrupting him there, and telling him, that therefore he was to blame, for avoiding the Cure of Souls, ſince it was the beſt way to juſtifie his Love of Jeſus Chriſt; he anſwers, That he did it, becauſe he thought himſelf unworthy of it; but on the contrary, that Baſil was very capable of it. And then to excuſe himſelf towards thoſe, who thought, that by his Refuſal he had offended them that had choſen him; he anſwers in the firſt place, That none ought to be afraid of offending Men, when they cannot any other ways avoid it, but by offending God: 2. He ſhews, that he was ſo far from diſgracing them by his Denial, that he pretended on the contrary, that he obliged them very much, by not expoſing them to the Reproaches to which they might otherwiſe have been ſubject, and the falſe Reports which might have been raiſed againſt them. 'Is it not certain, ſays he, that had I accepted the Biſhoprick, then thoſe that love to calumniate, 'might have ſuſpected, and ſpoken many things, not only 'of me, but alſo of my Electors? They would have ſaid, 'for example, that they had Reſpect to Riches, or were 'blinded with the Luſtre of Birth, or won by my Flatteries. I know not whether they would not have dared to 'ſay, that I had bribed them with Money. But, thanks be 'to God, I took from them all theſe Occaſions of Evil-ſpeaking, and they can no more tax me with Flattery, 'than they can accuſe theſe good Men of being corrupted. 'For why ſhould he, that beſtowed Money, or uſed Flattery to get an Office, ſuffer another to take it, when he 'might have it himſelf? Again, what might not have been 'ſaid, by detracting Men, after my coming to the Office? 'Could I have made Apologies ſufficient to anſwer their 'Accuſations? Tho' all my Actions had been without Reproach, had they found no Pretence to blacken me? But 'now they have none, for I have delivered thoſe that might 'have choſen me from all Imputations; No Complaints 'will be made of them; It will not be ſaid publickly, They 'have entruſted young Fools with the higheſt, and moſt conſiderable Offices; they have expoſed God's Flock to 'all ſorts of Corruption; Chriſtianity is now made a Jeſt 'of, and they delight to render it ridiculous; Now the 'Mouth of Iniquity muſt be ſtopped: For if Calumniators 'do thus complain of You (addreſſing himſelf to Baſil) 'you will let them ſee, that a Man's Wiſdom is not to be 'judged of by the number of his Years, nor old Age meaſured with gray-hairs; and that not young Men, but 'Neophytes are to be excluded from Eccleſiaſtical Dignities.' Thus he concludes the ſecond Book.

St. John Chryſoſtom.

To defend himſelf againſt ſuch as accuſed him of refuſing the Biſhoprick out of Pride, he ſays, that it is not to be preſumed, that any Man could refuſe ſo eminent a Dignity out of Vanity, and that ſuch as are of that Opinion, muſt needs be Deſpiſers of that high Office. To undeceive them, he ſpeaks of the Prieſthood in theſe Terms. 'Tho' 'the Prieſthood is exerciſed upon Earth, yet it ought to be 'reckoned amongſt Heavenly Goods, ſince neither Man, 'nor Angel, nor Archangel, nor any created Power, but 'the Holy Ghoſt himſelf, eſtabliſhed that ſacred Order, 'and made Men think, that they exerciſed a Miniſtry of 'Angels in a mortal Body. Wherefore, whoſoever is raiſed up to the Prieſthood, ought to be as pure as if he were 'already in Heaven, among thoſe bleſſed Spirits. When 'you ſee our Lord placed, and offered upon the Altar, 'the Biſhop celebrating the Sacrifice, and praying for the 'whole People, dyed, and made red with his precious Blood, 'do you think that you are amongſt Men, and upon Earth? 'Do you not believe your ſelves to be taken up into Heaven 'for that Moment? And do you not put off the Thoughts of 'the Fleſh? Do you not behold Heavenly Things with a 'pure Spirit, and a naked Soul? O Miracle! O Bounty 'of God! He that is above with his Father, ſuffers himſelf to be touched by the Hands of all in this Moment, 'and gives himſelf to be held and embraced by thoſe that 'deſire it.' Afterwards he compares the Divine Myſteries to Elias's Sacrifice, which cauſed Fire to come down from Heaven to conſume the Victims. He ſaith, that the Biſhop in like manner cauſeth by his Prayers, not Fire from Heaven, but the Holy Ghoſt to deſcend upon the Altar. Having thus exalted the Dignity of the Prieſthood, becauſe of the Power which they have to conſecrate the Body and Blood of Jeſus Chriſt, he diſcourſes of their Power of binding and looſing Sinners, which is not leſs honourable, nor leſs uſeful to the Salvation of Men. 'For, ſaith he, living 'as yet upon the Earth, they diſpoſe of the things of Heaven, and they have received a Power which God would 'give neither to Angels, nor to Archangels; having ſaid 'unto Men, and not to them, What you ſhall bind on Earth, ſhall be bound in Heaven; and whatſoever ye ſhall looſe on Earth ſhall be looſed in Heaven. Temporal Princes have 'a Power to bind, but that is the Body only, whereas Epiſcopal Power bindeth the Soul, and reacheth unto Heaven, becauſe God ratifieth above, what the Biſhops do 'here below, and the Maſter confirmeth the Sentence of 'his Servants. This Power is as much above the Temporal, as Heaven is nobler than the Earth, and the Soul 'than the Body. It were Madneſs to deſpiſe a Power, 'without which we could hope for no Salvation, nor the 'Poſſeſſion of the promiſed Goods: For if none can enter 'into the Kingdom of Heaven, unleſs he be firſt regenerated with Water, and the Holy Ghoſt: And if he that 'eateth not the Fleſh of the Lord, and drinketh not his 'Blood, is deprived of Eternal Life: And if it be theſe 'holy Hands, I mean by the Hands of Biſhops, that all 'theſe things are done; How can either the Fire of Hell 'be avoided, or the Crowns prepared for us in Heaven, 'be obtained without their Help? They, and only they, 'are entruſted by God with theſe ſpiritual Births, and that 'Regeneration which is wrought by Baptiſm: By them 'we put on Chriſt, we are united to the Son of God, and 'become Members of his ſacred Body. Biſhops do not 'judge of the Leproſie of the Body, as the Prieſts did under the old Law; they judge of that of the Soul, and 'they do not only enquire whether Souls be purified, but 'they have Power alſo to purify them: Wherefore thoſe 'that deſpiſe them, commit a much greater Crime, and 'are worthy of a much ſeverer Chaſtiſement than Dathan, 'and his Companions.'

Having thus exalted the Dignity of the Prieſthood, he diſcovers the Dangers that attend this Office on all ſides: He compares a Biſhop that has the Care of a Dioceſs, with a Pilot that hath the Charge of a Ship. 'But a Biſhop, ſaith 'he, is more agitated with Cares, than the Sea with Winds 'and Storms: The firſt Rock he meets with, is vain Glory, Anger, Peeviſhneſs, Envy, Quarrelling, Calumnies, 'Accuſations, Lying, Hypocriſies, Treachery, and precipitate Violence againſt the Innocent; joy to ſee thoſe 'that ſerve the Church, neglect their Duty; and ſorrow 'to ſee them diſcharge it worthily; love of Praiſe, deſire 'of Honour, which is one of the moſt pernicious Paſſions 'of the Soul; Diſcourſes where Pleaſure is more looked 'after, than the Profit of the Hearers, ſervile Flatteries, 'baſe Complacency, Contempt of the Poor, degenerate 'Civilities towards rich Men without Reaſon, Favours 'ill-beſtowed, which prove hurtful both to the Giver and 'to the Receiver; guilty Fear, Baſhfulneſs in ſpeaking, 'falſe Modeſty, Silence, Cowardice and Fear of reproving 'great Men. There is no Slavery equal to ours, which 'makes us do even ſhameful Things to pleaſe Women. 'They have got ſuch Power, that they give and take away Biſhopricks, even to whom, and from whom they pleaſe: Hence 'it

St. John Chryſoſtom.

'it is, that all things are turned upſide-down: Thoſe that 'ſhould obey, will be Directors of thoſe that are to com-'mand. Yet I pretend not to tax all Biſhops with the 'Crimes now mentioned, there being many; I ſay many, 'who have not been caught in theſe Snares, and who far 'exceed thoſe in number, that are unhappily fallen into 'them. Neither will I ſay, that the Epiſcopal Dignity is 'the Cauſe of theſe Evils, I am not ſo extravagant as to 'have any ſuch Thought. The Sword is not the Cauſe of 'Murder, nor Wine of Drunkenneſs, &c. All wiſe Men 'accuſe and puniſh ſuch as abuſe God's Gifts, as the true 'Authors of thoſe Abuſes: And the Epiſcopal Dignity is 'ſo far from being guilty of theſe Evils, that it may ra-'ther complain, that Men do not exerciſe it well: We 'are thoſe whom it may upbraid: Since we diſhonour it as 'much as in us lies, when we admit the firſt that comes, 'who having not examined their own Strength, nor con-'ſidered the Greatneſs and Importance of that Office, re-'ceive it readily, as ſoon as it is offered. And when they 'are obliged to act, being blinded with Darkneſs, they en-'gage their People in a thouſand Diſorders. For, from 'whence think you, do ſo many Troubles ariſe in the 'Church? I ſee no other Spring of them beſides the want 'of Circumſpection, and Choice in the Election of Bi-'ſhops.'

He diſcourſes afterwards of the neceſſary Qualities in a Biſhop, and affirms, that the firſt is to have no Deſire to that Dignity, which ought to be looked upon with Reſpect, and ſuch a Moderation as may inſpire Men with a Deſire to avoid ſo important and difficult an Office: And alſo, that when a Man engages in it, he ſhould not ſtay for the Judgment of others, to quit it, but having committed Faults unworthy of the ſame, he ſhould depoſe himſelf. 'Perhaps, ſays he, it will be objected to me, that I con-'tradict the Words of St. Paul, That he that deſireth to 'be a Biſhop, deſireth a good Work, but I am ſo far from 'oppoſing, that I do only follow them, ſince it is the De-'ſire of the Power and not of the Work which I con-'demn.' The ſecond Quality noted by St. Chryſoſtom as requiſite in a Biſhop, is to be clear-ſighted and vigilant, becauſe he lives not for himſelf, but for a great People. The third, according to his Opinion, is Meekneſs; he obſerves, That a Biſhop ought not to be peeviſh, violent or angry; and that whatſoever his other Virtues be, if theſe be in him, he is not worthy to be a Biſhop. He ſaith further, That the Vices of a Biſhop are of worſe Conſequence than thoſe of a private Man, becauſe, when they are once diſcovered, they cauſe a general Scandal, and draw others by their example; and beſides, the leaſt Faults of a Biſhop, being magnified by envious Men, will utterly ruin his Reputation. In the next place, he gives an account of the Diſputes and Diſſentions which commonly attend the Election of a Biſhop, and that the Reaſon of it is, becauſe they do not all agree in the only Deſign which they ought to have, which is to chuſe the wiſeſt and moſt virtuous. 'They, 'ſays he, have all different Pretences of promoting a Man 'to an Office; one will have this Man becauſe he is of a 'noble Family; another votes for the other, becauſe he is 'rich, and a third endeavours to advance his Friend, or 'his Kinſman: This laſt goes by Caballing and getting of 'Favour: No Man chuſes the moſt worthy; no Man 'hath Reſpect either to Virtue or Merit.' Then he concludes this Book by a Deſcription of the three main Duties of a Biſhop, viz. The Care of Widows, of Virgins conſecrated to God, and their Obligation to do Juſtice to the People, and to help them in their Neceſſities.

St. Chryſoſtom having ended this Diſcourſe, Baſil told him, That had he ſued for that Dignity, his Fear might have been rational, but having been choſen when he ſought it not, he ought to think himſelf ſecure in accepting it. St. Chryſoſtom anſwers, That not only thoſe that ſeek for Eccleſiaſtical Promotions thro' Ambition, but alſo thoſe that do not diſcharge them well ſhall be ſeverely puniſhed, becauſe they ſhould have refuſed them, knowing that they were above their Capacity; and that even thoſe ſhall be without excuſe, who thro' Inſufficiency do not perform their Functions in the Church as they ought, under pretence that they were forced to accept of them; neither ſhall they be acquitted before God, who chuſe inſufficient Men, by ſaying that they were deceived, and that they knew them not. This ought to oblige thoſe that are to chuſe, to conſider well what Choice they make; and thoſe that are choſen, to examine themſelves, Whether they are capable of the Dignity to which they are to be promoted. He diſcourſes afterwards of a Biſhop's Learning, that being to preach God's Word with Strength and Knowledge, to refute Pagans, Jews and Hereticks, and to inſtruct the Faithful, he hath great need of Learning, of Prudence and Eloquence.

He goes on in the next Book to ſpeak of the Conditions which are neceſſary to exerciſe the miniſtry of God's Word, as we ought: He obſerves, That commendation is not to be regarded, and that Envy and Malice is to be deſpiſed; but that a good Reputation is to be maintained by conſtant Labour: That a good Biſhop ought not to be proud for being praiſed, nor dejected when he is blamed; and that his only aim in his Diſcourſes ſhould be to pleaſe God. 'This, 'ſaith he, is the only Rule, and the only Object which they 'ought to propoſe to themſelves in this excellent Miniſtry, 'and not to be applauded and praiſed. If Men do com-'mend them, let them not reject their Commendations; 'if they do not, let them not deſire it, nor be concerned at 'the omiſſion: this is ſufficient comfort for him in his La-'bour; yea, the greateſt he can have, if he knows in his 'Conſcience, that he hath ſtudied his Diſcourſes for no o-'ther end, than that they might be acceptable to God on-'ly; adding, that he cannot be envious againſt, nor jealous 'of thoſe who have more talents than himſelf.'

St. John Chryſoſtom.

In the laſt Book he proves, that Biſhops have need of a higher degree of Virtue than Monks, becauſe they are expoſed to many more dangers; and that it is eaſier to live well in a Solitude than as a Biſhop; yea, that whatſoever Virtues Monks may have, yet they are not fit to be Biſhops, becauſe the accidents of a Biſhop's life may eaſily excite thoſe Vices and Infirmities which were hid in Solitude. Laſtly, he declares, that the trouble he was in, when they ſpake of making him Biſhop, made him reſolve to hide himſelf. He ſets forth this trouble by two Compariſons; the one by deſcribing the vexation which a Princeſs, incomparable both for Beauty and Virtue, might be in, who being paſſionately beloved by a Prince, ſhould be forced to marry a mean and contemptible Man; the other, by deſcribing the aſtoniſhment of a Clown, that was forced to take upon him the Conduct of both a great Land-Army, and of a Navy that was ready to give Battle to a dreadful Enemy. He concludes by comforting Baſil, who was afflicted to ſee himſelf engaged in ſo hard an Employment, and loaded with ſo heavy a Burden.

Some ſay, that he writ theſe excellent Books when he was very young, which is not likely. Others think with Socrates, that he compoſed them while he was a Deacon; but it ſeems rather, that he made them in his Retirement, before he was ordained Deacon, about the Year 376.

The three Books in defence of a Monaſtical Life, againſt thoſe that blamed that ſtate, were the firſt fruits of St. Chryſoſtom's Retreat. In the firſt he argues for a Monaſtical way of life, becauſe of the uſefulneſs and neceſſity of ſeparating from the World. In the ſecond he anſwers the Gentiles, who complained that their Children forſook them to retire into deſart places; and then he comforts the Chriſtians who were troubled to ſee themſelves bereaved of their Children that embraced a Solitary Life, to dwell in Wilderneſſes. He affirms in theſe Books, that a Monk is more Glorious, more powerful and richer than a Man of the World; repreſenting the great difficulty of ſaving our ſelves in the World, and how hard it is to bring up Children to Chriſtianity; and comparing the condition of a Monk with that of Saints and Angels.

The ſhort Diſcourſe upon the compariſon of a Monk with a Prince, is upon the ſame Subject. He ſhews, that Men are miſtaken, who prefer the condition of Kings before that of Monks and retired Men. Firſt, Becauſe the greatneſs of Kings ends with them, whereas the advantages of a retired Life continue after death. 2. Becauſe the advantages of Retirement are much more conſiderable than the Fortune of Great Men. 3. Becauſe it is more glorious for a Man to command his Paſſions, than to rule whole Nations. 4. Becauſe the War of a Monk is nobler than that of a great Captain, and his Victory more certain; the one fights againſt inviſible Powers, and the other againſt mortal Men; the one engages for the defence of Piety, and the honour of God, the other for his own Intereſt or Glory. 5. Becauſe a Prince is a charge to himſelf and to others by reaſon of thoſe many things which he needs; whereas a Monk wants nothing, does good to all, and by his Prayers obtains thoſe Graces, which the moſt powerful Princes cannot give. 6. Becauſe the loſs of Piety may ſooner be repaired than the loſs of a Kingdom. Laſtly, Becauſe, after death, a Monk goeth in ſplendor to meet Jeſus Chriſt, and entreth immediately into Heaven; whereas, tho' a King ſeems to have ruled his Kingdom with Juſtice and Equity (a thing very rare) yet they ſhall be leſs glorious and not ſo happy, there being a great difference in point of Holineſs, between a good King, and a holy Monk, who hath beſtowed all his time and care upon praiſing God: But if this King hath lived ill, who can expreſs the greatneſs of thoſe puniſhments that attend him? He concludeth in theſe words; 'Let us not ad-'mire their Riches, nor prefer their happineſs before that of 'theſe poor Monks. Let us never ſay, that this rich Man 'is happy, becauſe he is cloathed with ſumptuous Apparel, 'carried in a fine Coach, and followed by many Footmen: 'Theſe Riches and great Pomps laſt but for a time, and 'all the Felicity that attends them ends with their Life, 'whereas the Happineſs of Monks endures for ever.'

It was likewiſe in his Solitude that he writ the two Books of Compunction of Heart, whereof the firſt is dedicated to Demetrius, and the ſecond to Stelechius. In theſe Books he diſcourſes of the neceſſity and conditions of a true and ſincere Repentance; affirming, that Chriſtians ought to have their Sins always in view, to abhor them with all their Heart, to lament, and continually beg of God the forgiveneſs of them: that this ſorrow ought to be a motion of that Charity which the Holy Ghoſt inſpireth into our Hearts, and to be animated with the fire of a Divine Love, which conſumeth Sin, and is accompanied with a Spirit of Mortification and Diſintereſtedneſs from the Goods of this World, with an eſteem of the Treaſures of Heaven, and of Spiritual Virtues. He ſaith in the firſt Book, That it is not Grace only which makes us do good, ſince we ought our ſelves to contribute on our part, all that depends upon our Wills and Strength; wherefore, ſaith he, God's Grace is given to every one of us, but it abideth only in the Hearts of them that keep the Commandments, and departeth from them that correſpond not with it; neither doth it enter into their Souls, who begin not to turn to the Lord. When God converted St. Paul, he foreſaw his good Will before he gave him his Grace.

The three Books of Providence were compoſed by St. Chryſoſtom, when he came out of his Solitude, and returned to Antioch. There he comforted a Friend of his, one Stagirius, who having quitted the World, was ſo tormented with an Evil Spirit, that he was ready to fall into Deſpair; exhorting him to look upon that affliction as a Grace of God rather than a Puniſhment; for as much as it appears by the moſt notable Examples both of the old and of the new Law; that from Adam to St. Paul, Troubles and Afflictions have commonly been the lot of the Saints and Righteous Men: For this reaſon theſe Books are intituled, Of Providence, becauſe they clear that great Queſtion which ſo much perplexed the learned Gentiles, Why the Righteous are afflicted and perſecuted if there be a Providence over-ruling the things of the World? He ſheweth there, that this Queſtion hath no difficulty, if Men believe, that there is another Life, a Heaven and a Hell: For, ſaith he, ſince every one is puniſhed or rewarded in another World, to what end are we concerned at what happens in this? If wicked Men only were perſecuted here, we ſhould eaſily believe, that out of this World there are neither Puniſhments nor Rewards; and were there none but good Men in affliction, Virtue might be looked upon as the cauſe of Adverſity, and Crimes the reaſon of Proſperity. Of neceſſity therefore there muſt be in this World righteous and wicked Men, ſome happy and others unhappy. He adds, that by God's permiſſion the Righteous are afflicted, to expiate their Sins, and to correct them for their faults. He ſaith further, that God makes uſe of the Righteous Man's Fear, to oblige others to look to themſelves, and to mind their own Salvation. But why doth it happen, that ſuch as lived well before they were tempted by Afflictions, ſhould fall into Sin, when Temptation cometh? St. Chryſoſtom anſwereth, Firſt, That many ſeem to be Righteous before men, who are great Criminals before God, that ſearcheth the Hearts. Secondly, That God permits the moſt righteous to fall into ſin, to humble them, to keep them from Pride, and from an Opinion of their own Merit; and to put them in mind, that if they have any thing that is good, it is not of themſelves, but of the Grace of Jeſus Chriſt.

The Book of Virginity is written with much prudence and Wiſdom: For, whereas moſt of the Authors that have written of Virginity, could not forbear, whilſt they commended this Virtue to condemn Marriage, or at leaſt, to ſpeak ſlightingly of it: On the contrary St. Chryſoſtom anſwereth, at firſt, thoſe Hereticks that condemn Matrimony; and proveth that their Virginity will not only be unprofitable, but alſo pernicious; adding withal, that as many as condemn Marriage are Deſpiſers of Virginity: It being a greater advantage to be what it is, a good thing, a nobler and more excellent than another good thing, than ſimply a Virtue in oppoſition to Vice. 'I commend Matrimony, ſaith he, 'it is the Haven of Continency for thoſe that will uſe it 'well; but there are excellent Perſons, who have no need 'of that help, and are able to quench the Fire of Luſt by 'praying, watching, and lying upon the Ground. Theſe I 'exhort to Virginity, but forbid them not to Marry: if they 'follow not my advice, I condemn them not; I excom-'municate thoſe that commit Adultery and Fornication, 'but commend thoſe who make an holy uſe of Matrimo-'ny. Marriage is Good that is my Opinion, but Virgi-'nity is better. This I own, and if you will have my Senſe, 'It is as much above Matrimony as Heaven is above the 'Earth, and makes Men like to Angels.'

Afterwards he makes an Objection to himſelf againſt Virginity, which ſeems natural enough: If it be better to live unmarried, why did God inſtitute Marriage? Why did he make Women? And ſhould all Men embrace Virginity, how ſhould Mankind be propagated? To anſwer theſe Queſtions, St. Chryſoſtom goeth back as far as the Creation of the firſt Man; and takes Notice, that while he was in the earthly Paradiſe with Eve he was taken up with a Converſation with God, that he was then freed from luſt and the deſires of the Fleſh, and lived in perfect Virginity, and the whole world was at that time a vaſt Solitude. But Man having diſobeyed God's Commands, and becoming mortal and corruptible, with that happy Life which he enjoyed, he loſt alſo the Glory of Virginity; ſo that Sin being the cauſe of Death, became at the ſame time the cauſe of Marriage. It is probable, that tho' there had been no Marriage, yet the World might have been peopled, and that God had created other Men as he had done the firſt: adding, that it is not the frequent uſe of Marriage that multiplieth Mankind, But God's Bleſſing; and he believes that Marriage is more neceſſary to the World at preſent, for a remedy againſt Incontinency, than for the preſervation of Mankind; he grants, That it is neceſſary for the weak, but that Virginity is far more honourable and profitable too. He pretendeth, that whatſoever St. Paul ſaid of Marriage ought to induce Men to embrace Virginity; and at laſt he deſcribes the troubles and inconveniencies of a married life, and oppoſes to them the quiet, liberty, ſweetneſs, pleaſure, and other advantages of a ſingle one, and then concludes with this noble Sentence; 'Here below we are ſeriouſly 'to Work out our Salvation; let him that has a Wife 'live as if he had none; and he that hath not, ſhould en-'deavour with Virginity to get all other Virtues, and that 'ſo in the next World he may not lament the Diſorders 'that he committed whilſt he was in this.' This Treatiſe of Virginity is quoted in the 19*th*. Homily upon the firſt Epiſtle to the Corinthians, preached at Antioch. It was by conſequence compoſed in that Town, St. Chryſoſtom being a Deacon, or newly ordained Prieſt.

St. John Chryſoſtom.

The two Treatiſes againſt the cohabitation of Clerks and Women, were compoſed, if Palladius may be believed, at Conſtantinople, againſt the abuſe of thoſe Churchmen who lodged devout Women with them, or themſelves lodged in the Women's Houſes.

Againſt theſe Diſorders St. Chryſoſtom wrote two Books, whereof the firſt reproveth the Virgins that dwelt with Churchmen; and the ſecond admoniſheth Churchmen who admitted Women into their Lodgings, and ſhews, that ſuch mixt-habitation is an occaſion of Scandal, and cannot be wholly free from ſin.

In the Diſcourſe to a young Widow, he both comforts and exhorts her, To continue in her Widow-hood. He made another little Book on purpoſe to ſhew, That ſhe ought not to marry again; where he proves, That tho' ſecond marriages be not abſolutely forbidden, yet it is much better to continue in Widow-hood.

The ſmall Treatiſe upon this Paradox, That no Man is offended, but by himſelf, was written by St. Chryſoſtom in his Exile. It is upon a Subject very proper to adminiſter Comfort to a Man in Perſecution, for he proveth there by ſeveral Examples out of Holy Scripture, that Perſecutions and Vexations are ſo far from doing any harm to thoſe that are tormented wrongfully, that they make them more happy and glorious and that nothing but Sin can make Men truly Miſerable.

In the firſt Exhortation to Theodorus, who is thought to be the Perſon who afterwards was made Biſhop of Mopſueſta; he adviſeth him to do Penance for quitting a retired life to return into the World; ſhewing him that how great ſoever his fault might be, yet he might hope for pardon from God's Mercy, becauſe he always granted it to thoſe that truly and earneſtly repent; which Penance is not to be judged of according to the length of Time, but by the diſpoſition of the Heart, and which conſiſts in a change of life. Afterwards he repreſents Heaven, Hell, and Judgment, whereof he maketh an excellent Deſcription, to oblige him to do Penance, and then he comforts him, by the hope that his Repentance will recover, not only his former Innocency, but alſo an higher degree of Holineſs and Perfection.

Among the Examples which he mentions, to confirm this Truth, he citeth the Hiſtory of that famous Thief who was converted by St. John, which Euſebius takes out of Clemens Alexandrinus.

The ſecond Diſcourſe to Theodorus containeth ſome milder Motives to oblige him to forſake a Secular life; where he repreſents the Labours and cares of the World, to make him out of love with it. This laſt Exhortation ought to be placed firſt: Theſe Treatiſes were written at Antioch.

All St. Chryſoſtom's Letters were written during his Baniſhment.

The firſt is a Circular Letter to Innocent Biſhop of Rome, Venerius Biſhop of Milan, and Chromatius Biſhop of Aquileia, in which, having deſcribed the attempts of Theophilus; the injuries which he received from him; the Injuſtice and Violence exerciſed towards him; and the Diſturbance in the Churches of the Eaſt, upon his account, very eloquently, he entreats them to write to the Eaſt to tell them, that what was done againſt him, was to be looked upon as of no force, as being done againſt the Laws, in his abſence by his Enemies, and to the prejudice of thoſe proffers which he had made to appear before lawful Judges; and conſequently, that ſuch as acted ſo Uncanonically were to be puniſhed according to the ſeverity of Eccleſiaſtical Laws; declaring that he was ready to juſtifie his Innocence, and to convince his Accuſers of Impoſture and Violence before uncorrupt Judges.

There is another Letter to Pope Innocent, wherein he thanks him for the good Offices which he had endeavoured to do him; but it was written long after the former, in the third Year of St. Chryſoſtom's Baniſhment.

The

St. John Chrysostom.

The Letter to the Bishops and Priests that were put in Prison for defending his Innocence, and refusing to Communicate with Arsacius, was written in the first Year of his Exile. There he commends the Constancy and Courage of these generous defenders of Justice, whom he scruples not to call Martyrs.

The seventeen following Epistles are directed to the Widow Olympias, who was united to him by the bonds of an intimate Friendship; he comforteth her for the Persecutions she had endured, the Affliction she was in, and for the Sickness she lay under.

These are some of the maxims which he lays down to comfort her and himself. 'Nothing is to be feared but sin, 'all other accidents of this Life are but a Fable and a Comedy; Afflictions, Persecutions, Sicknesses, and Death it 'self should not move us; these are to be born with Patience for God's sake, no other Blessing is to be compared 'with patience. We are neither to desire Death, nor to neglect Sickness; not the Persecuted but Persecutors are 'Objects of pity; and the latter are so much the more to 'be lamented, because like Men in a Phrenzie, they feel 'not their Distemper. This present life is but a passage, all 'the Goods of this World are but Dust and Smoke.' Such Christian Thoughts as these employed the Spirit of St. Chrysostom in his Exile, and furnished him with Matter for the Letters he writ to his Friends: He thanked them likewise in his Epistles, for the care they had of him, and for the generous Methods which they followed to justifie him; with other Letters to oblige his Friends to continue stedfast to him, to let them hear of him, to let them know what they might do for him, and to pray them, that they would Write to him. These are the subjects of the greatest part of 225 Letters written to his Friends. Some are concerning the Affairs of the Church in Phœnicia, the conversion of the Goths, and the helping of the Poor; which shew, that tho' he was banished and deprived of his Bishoprick, yet he preserved an Episcopal Spirit, and Pastoral Watchfulness.

The Judgment which the learned Photius makes of these Letters is this: (Vol. 36. of his Bibliotheca) 'I have read, 'saith he, the Letters which St. Chrysostom writ to several 'Persons in the time of his Banishment; the most useful 'are those seventeen to Olympias, and that to Innocent Bishop 'of Rome; wherein he gives an account of the Persecutions which he suffered, as much as the extent of a Letter could permit. The Stile of these Letters is not very 'different from that of his other Works, for it is clear 'and lofty, florid, pleasant, and persuading. The Letters 'to Olympias, are not so artless as the others, because he 'could not suit an Epistolary Stile, with the matter he 'was to Write, which, if we may so say, has done Violence 'to the Laws of the Art of Writing.'

This Reflection of Photius is particularly to be applyed to the Letter Directed to Pope Innocent, and the other Western Bishops, wherein he describeth the Persecutions which he endured with great force of Eloquence. There is not among these Letters That directed to Cæsarius the Monk: Peter Martyr was the first that quoted it in these latter times; and since he did not tell whence he took it, and that the Words seemed contrary to the Doctrine of the Church, and of St. Chrysostom, upon the Eucharist, those of the Church of Rome, did long suspect Peter Martyr as guilty of imposture, and looked upon the Fragment of that Letter as a piece of his own Invention. But since that time, Bigotius having found an antient Manuscript of the Version of that Letter in the Dominicans's Library at Florence, it was no longer doubted, but that Peter Martyr took from thence the Fragment which he quoted, and I think we ought not to reject it as unworthy of St. Chrysostom: for tho' the Greek Original is not extant entire, yet, something of St. Chrysostom's Eloquence appears in that Version; and this Letter is mentioned by several Greek Authors (q), who have taken several Quotations that are Printed with the Antient Version.

By this Letter it appears, that Cæsarius to whom it was written, admired a certain Book, wherein it was averred, that in Jesus Christ, there was such an Union, or mixture of Humanity with Divinity, that they made but one Nature: St. Chrysostom tells him, that this was the Errour of Apollinarius, Arius, Sabellius, and Manichæus, about the Incarnation of Jesus Christ. And to inform him better, he bids him take notice, that there were two Natures in Christ; and each of them doth preserve its Properties, without mixture, and without confusion, tho' united together in the same person: to explain this truth, he alledges the Example of the Eucharist, and saith. † That as Bread is called Bread before the Sanctification, but that after the Divine Grace hath hallowed it by means of the Priest, it ought no longer to be called Bread, but to bear the name of Christ's Body, tho' it remains in the same nature of Bread, and that Men do not say, that they are two Bodies, but One only Body of Jesus Christ; so we ought to say, that the Divine Nature being united with the Human, makes but one Christ, and one Person. And yet it must be acknowledged, that each of these Natures continueth perfect and intire, without mixture, and without confusion; for if there remained but one Nature, how could it be said that there is Union? These words of St. Chrysostom, instead of destroying the real Presence of Jesus Christ in the Eucharist, do suppose and prove it invincibly: for otherwise how could he affirm, that the Body of Jesus Christ is as truly in the Eucharist, as the Divine Nature is in the Person of Jesus Christ? He saith indeed, that the Bread remains in its own Nature. Which seemeth to be against Transubstantiation: but we may understand by Nature, the consistency and appearance of Bread. In a word, this passage is not harder to be understood, than those of Theodoret and of Gelasius, who use the same Comparison: Nay it is much easier, because St. Chrysostom in several places explaineth his Opinion very clearly upon the real change of the bread, and Wine into the body and blood of Jesus Christ.

St. John Chrysostom.

mus, Divinâ autem illum sanctificante Gratiâ, mediante Sacerdote, Liberatus est quidem Appellatione panis, dignus autem habitus est DOMINICI CORPORIS appellatione, etiamsi naturâ Panis in eo permansit, & non duo corpora, sed unum corpus filii prædicatur: Sic & hic Divinâ indigvedens, id est, insidente corporis Naturâ unum filium, unam Personam, utraque hæc fecerunt: Agnoscendum, tamen inconfusam & Indivisibilem rationem, non in unâ solum Naturâ sed in duabus perfectis: Thus translated into English by the Learned Defender of the Exposition of the Doctrine of the Church of England, against the Bishop of Meaux. 'For 'as (in the Eucharist) before the Bread is Consecrated, we call it Bread, 'but when the Grace of 'God by the Priest has 'Consecrated it, it is no 'longer called Bread, but 'is esteem'd worthy to be 'called the Lord's Body, 'altho' the Nature of Bread 'still remains in it; and 'we do not say there be 'two Bodies, but one Body of the Son; so here 'the Divine Nature, being joyn'd with the (human) Body, they both 'together make up but 'one Son, one Person. But 'yet they must be Confessed to remain without confusion, after 'an indivisible manner, not in one Nature, but in two perfect 'Natures.'

Now if we suppose that St. Chrysostom designed his Comparison to be just, or believed that it was so, it will not be easie to find other words more expressive of the sense of the Church of England in this matter, than those here made use of: and there is no Dispute, but those who took so much Pains to conceal this Testimony, believed that the greatest force that could be put upon this Passage, could never persuade unconcerned Readers, that the Person who wrote it believ'd that Doctrine of the Eucharist, which is at present taught in the Church of Rome.]

This Letter ends with an Exposition of his Doctrine, about the Mystery of the Incarnation of Jesus Christ, in these words. 'It must be Confessed, that the same Jesus Christ 'who is Mortal, hath two complete Natures, the Divine, 'and the Human, and yet he is one and the same only 'Son, not divisible into two, who comprehends in himself the properties of both Natures, without any Alteration. They are not two Persons, but the same God, 'Lord, and Saviour, Word of God, who hath put on our 'Flesh, but animated Flesh, not Flesh without Soul, as 'the impious Apollinarius maintains. To this we are to 'hold; let us avoid those that separate the two Natures, 'for tho' there are two Natures in Jesus Christ, yet their 'Union is indissoluble and inseparable. We ought to acknowledge that this Union is made in one and the same 'Person, and Hypostasis of the Son. Neither let us hear 'those who affirm, That after this Union there is but one 'Nature in Christ; since they are obliged by their own 'Hypothesis, to ascribe Sufferings to the Divine Nature, 'which is impassible.' The Version of this Letter which Bigotius could not get Printed at Paris, for some particular Considerations *, was Printed after the Latin Copy, by Mr. le Moyne, at the end of the first Volume of his Varia Sacra, at Amsterdam, 1685. and with the Greek fragments in the margin at Rotterdam by Achers, 1687. This Edition was publickly sold at Paris, which shews, that tho' it was not suffered to be Printed in France, before it was more exactly examined, yet they never design'd to suppress it. And indeed the most skilful Criticks having well considered it, do con-cenſers might ſuppreſs it, he reſerved ſome few entire Printed Copies of the Book, before it came into their hands. His fears proved very Reaſonable, for ſome of the Doctors of the Sorbonne, whereof Mr. Grandin, and Mr. Favre were charged as Principal, ſuppreſſed the Letter it ſelf, and cut out ſo much of the Preface of Mr. Bigotius, as related to it, without taking care to fill up the Blank. The Learned Vindicator of the expoſition of the Doctrine of the Church of England, againſt Mr. de Meaux, tells the Story, and Prints that part of Bigotius's Preface which was eraſed, with St. Chryſoſtom's Letter to Caſarius, at the end of his Vindication, in London, 1688. And this explains Mr. Du Pin's particular Conſiderations, leaving every Body to gueſs at the true reaſon.] feſs that it was written by an antient Author, and is not unworthy of St. Chryſoſtom: and the Learnedeſt Divines of the Church of Rome agree, that the Doctrine ſet forth in this Letter, is agreeable to that of this Father, and do not find it a difficult thing to expound that paſſage concerning the Euchariſt.

The Liturgy attributed to St. Chryſoſtom now extant, in all probability is not written by him: It is a Liturgy of the Church of Conſtantinople, made or altered at leaſt ſince St. Chryſoſtom, to which his Name was given, becauſe it was for the uſe of the Church of Conſtantinople [and to give it more Authority.] We do not find there the Prayers and Ceremonies, which St. Chryſoſtom mentions in his Homilies, as in uſe in his time, in the Celebration of the Euchariſt; and there were ſome things which do not ſuit with the Cuſtoms of that Age. The Manuſcripts of this Book are very different; in ſome there are the Names of St. Chryſoſtom, of Pope Nicholas II. and of the Emperor Alexius Comnenus, who lived long after St. Chryſoſtom. Theſe paſſages indeed are not found in that which was tranſlated by Eraſmus, but for all that, there is enough to prove that that Liturgy is not of the time of St. Chryſoſtom.

This Father is one of the moſt Eloquent Chriſtian Orators, and his Eloquence is the more to be eſteemed, becauſe it is without Affectation and Conſtraint: Fruitfulneſs of thought, and abundance of Words and Notions is natural to him; tho' he did not tye up himſelf as St. Gregory Nazianzen, and St. Baſil did, to an Attick purity; yet there is a lofty Greatneſs in his Stile; His Stile is pure and pleaſant; His Diſcourſe is beautifyed with a wonderful Variety of Conceptions and Figures; He extendeth his Matters by an infinite Variety of Expreſſions; he is very ingenious in finding out Similitudes between things, abundant in Examples and Compariſons; His Eloquence is popular, and very proper for Preaching; His Stile is natural, eaſie and grave; He equally avoideth negligence, and affectation; He is neither too plain, nor too florid; He is ſmooth yet not effeminate; He uſeth all the Figures that are uſual to good Orators very properly, without employing falſe ſtrokes of Wit, and he never introduces into his Diſcourſes, any Notions of Poets or prophane Authors, neither does he divert his Auditory with Jeſts; His Compoſition is Noble, his Expreſſions Elegant, his Method Juſt, and his Thoughts Sublime; He ſpeaks like a good Father, and a good Paſtor; He often directs his words to the People, and expreſſes them with a Tenderneſs and Charity becoming an holy Biſhop; He teacheth the principal Truths of Chriſtianity, with wonderful Clearneſs, and diverts with a marvellous art, and an agreeable way of ranging his Notions, and perſuades by the ſtrength and ſolidity of his Reaſons; His Inſtructions are eaſie; His Deſcriptions and Relations pleaſant; His Inducements ſo meek and inſinuating, that one is pleaſed to be ſo perſuaded; His Diſcourſes how long ſoever are not tedious, there are ſtill ſome new things which keep the Reader awake, and yet he hath no falſe Beauties, nor uſeleſs Figures; His only Aim is to convert his Auditors, or to inſtruct them in neceſſary Truths; He neglects all Reflections, that have more ſubtilty than profit; He never buſies himſelf to reſolve hard queſtions, nor to give myſtical Senſes, to make a ſhow of his Wit, or Eloquence; He ſearcheth not into Myſteries, neither endeavours to comprehend them; He is contented to propoſe, after an eaſie way, palpable and ſenſible Truths, which none can be ignorant of, without danger of failing of Salvation; He particularly applies himſelf to moral Heads, and very ſeldom handleth ſpeculative Truths; He affects not to appear Learned, and never boaſts of his Erudition; and yet whatever the Subject be, he ſpeaks with Terms ſo ſtrong, ſo proper, and ſo well choſen, that one may eaſily perceive he had a profound Knowledge of all ſorts of Matters, and particularly of true Divinity.

In lib. Quod Chriſtus ſit Deus: In Orat. de S. Babyla: contra Gentes: In expoſit. Pſ. xliv. Hom.

He proveth the truth of the Chriſtian Religion, by the ſtrongeſt, the moſt probable, and ſenſible Reaſons; He urgeth Miracles, Prophecies, and other Proofs of the truth of Religion; but particularly inſiſts upon the miraculous Eſtabliſhment of the Church, and in this Argument he triumphs; He ſhews that it is impoſſible, that the Doctrine of Jeſus Chriſt could have been received, and believed all the world over, notwithſtanding the oppoſition of Secular Power, the Contradictions of the Wiſe men in the World, and the endeavours of Devils, had it not been ſupported by the power of God himſelf: 'For, he ſays, there is need 'of more than human Ability, to produce ſuch wonder- 'ful Effects, both in the Earth, and upon the Sea, and to 'oblige Men already prejudiced by extravagant Opinions, 'and prepoſſeſſed with prodigious Malice to ſuch Actions; 'yet Jeſus Chriſt delivered all mankind, not only Romans, 'but Perſians alſo, and all other barbarous Nations from 'their Calamities: And to bring about theſe Wonders, he 'made uſe of no Arms, and was at no expence; raiſed no 'Armies, and fought no Battles; but by eleven Men, who 'at firſt were unknown, deſpicable, ignorant, Ideots, poor, 'naked, and without Arms; He perſuaded different Na- 'tions, and made them embrace an high Philoſophy, not 'only relating to the Government of this preſent Life, but 'alſo to things to come, and Eternity it ſelf; His power o- 'ver all mankind was ſuch, as that it made them aboliſh 'the Laws of their Fathers, renounce their antient Cu- 'ſtoms, and follow new ones; He ſpoiled them even of the 'love of thoſe things they were moſt fond of to faſten their A- 'ffections upon ſuch things as are moſt difficult and painful.' But the Promulgation of the Goſpel, and the ſettling of the Church, are not the only Proofs of the truth of our Religion, the ſtedfaſtneſs and perpetuity of the Church, is alſo in St. * Chryſoſtom's Opinion an invincible Argument of it. 'For he addeth, that it is not only a thing worthy of Ad- 'miration, that Jeſus Chriſt ſhould ſettle his Church over 'all the Earth, but alſo that he ſhould render it invincible 'againſt ſo great numbers of Enemies as aſſaulted it on e- 'very ſide. The Gates of Hell that cannot prevail againſt 'it, are the Dangers which ſeem to hurry it to the very 'Gates of Hell. Do you not perceive the truth of that 'prediction of Jeſus Chriſt.... Tho' Tyrants took up 'Arms againſt it, tho' Soldiers conſpired her Deſtru- 'ction, tho' the People raged furiouſly, tho' a contra- 'ry Cuſtom oppoſed it ſelf, tho' Preachers, Philoſo- 'phers, Magiſtrates, and rich Men ſtood up to deſtroy 'it; The Divine word breaking with greater force than 'fire it ſelf, conſumed theſe Thorns, cleanſed theſe Fields, 'and diſſeminated the Seed of preaching over the whole 'Earth. And though ſuch as believe the Goſpel were ſhut 'up in Priſons, ſent into Baniſhment, ſpoiled of their 'Goods, thrown into the Fire, caſt into the Sea, and ex- 'poſed to all manner of Torments, Reproaches, and Per- 'ſecutions, and tho' they were treated every where, as pub- 'lick Enemies; yet they multiplyed daily; their being per- 'ſecuted increaſed their zeal.... Thoſe Rivers of Blood cau- 'ſed by the Maſſacres of the Faithful, before their eyes excited 'their piety, and the Pains they endured inflamed their zeal.'

* In Pſ. xlix.

The ſame Saint obſerves in another place, that Chriſtians are never ſo diſorderly in their Behaviour, and ſo cold in their Devotion, as when he that ſits on the Throne is of their Religion. 'Which, ſaith he, juſtifies that this Religion 'is not eſtabliſhed by the Powers of the World, and is not 'upheld and preſerved by Earthly force.'

Orat. contra Gentiles, de S. Babyla.

St. Chryſoſtom's way of dealing with Hereticks is not leſs rational, than that which he uſeth towards Heathens and Jews. He expoundeth the Myſteries very plainly, and proveth them by Teſtimonies of Holy Scripture, and the Authority of the Church, not pretending to penetrate, or give the Reaſons of them, and to anſwer thoſe Difficulties, which have no other Foundation but human Reaſonings. He confeſſes, that he does not underſtand the Reaſons of what he believes. 'I know, ſaith he, that God is every where, and en- 'tire in every part of the World, but I know not how this 'can be. I doubt not, but that God is without beginning, 'but I conceive not how that is, for human Reaſon can- 'not comprehend a thing that hath no beginning. I know 'that the Son is begotten of God the Father, but I cannot 'imagine how that was done.' He believes that the Divine Nature is ſo high and unſearchable, that it is not poſſible to comprehend it; and purſues this Reaſoning ſo far, that he ſticketh not to ſay, that Seraphims and Angels themſelves do not ſee the Subſtance of God, but only an Emanation of his Divine Light. This paſſage hath made ſome modern Greeks ſuppoſe, that the Saints do not ſee the Subſtance of God, but only a Corporeal Light, ſuch as (they ſay) appeared upon Mount Tabor. This alſo hath exerciſed the Subtilty of our Divines, who conſtitute Happineſs in the Viſion of the Subſtance of God: And yet St. Chryſoſtom hath reſpect in this paſſage, neither to that Light of the Modern Greeks, nor to the Diſputes of the Schoolmen; his only deſign is to ſhew againſt Aëtius, that the Divine Nature is not to be comprehended, and that evident Reaſons of the Myſteries are not to be given.

Ep. ad Caſarium, Homil. de Conſub. in lib. Quod Chriſtus ſit Deus: V. Theodor. in Dialog.

It is not neceſſary to enlarge upon the Opinions of St. Chryſoſtom, concerning the Myſtery of the Trinity; it is certain, that he maintained the Faith of the Council of Nice, and that he proved the Divinity both of the Son, and of the Holy Ghoſt; yet it ought to be obſerved, that he was of Meletius's opinion, concerning the Signification of the word Hypoſtaſis, and that he owned three Hypoſtaſes, and one Nature in God.

two Natures, and their Properties; yet he in ſeveral paſſages of his Writings, declared againſt the latter Opinion very eagerly.

Hom. 3. de Incomprehen. Hom. 3. in ep. ad Coloſſ. Hom. 14. in ep. ad Hebr. Hom. de Diabolo tentatore. Hom. 22. in Geneſim.

In his Panegyricks of the Saints, he aſcribeth to them all manner of Felicity; he places them in Heaven, in the ſame Rank with Angels, and Archangels, of Prophets, and Martyrs; and yet in other places, he ſeems to affirm, that their Happineſs is referred to the Day of Judgment; but theſe may agree well enough, if we ſay, that he ſpake in the latter of a perfect and conſummated Happineſs.

Angels, if we believe St. Chryſoſtom, are ſo called, becauſe they declare the Will of God unto Men; for which cauſe the Scripture repreſenteth them with Wings: They take care of Men, are preſent at Divine Services, and every Chriſtian hath his Guardian Angel.

The Devil is not wicked of his own Nature, but is become ſuch by Sin. God permits him to tempt Men for their good. It is a Childiſh thing to believe, that thoſe are Angels which the Scripture calleth the Children of God in Geneſis, and of whom it is ſaid, that they converſed with the Daughters of Men; ſince they are of a ſpiritual and incorporeal Nature.

He Confeſſes in ſeveral places, that the fall of the firſt Man was prejudicial to the whole Race, which ever ſince is become ſubject to Pains, Sickneſſes, and Death, from which it was free before Sin: He acknowledgeth, that an inclination to Evil, and Luſts, are Conſequences of the firſt Man's ſin: but he ſeemeth not to have owned Original Sin, after the ſame manner that St. Auſtin doth; at leaſt it cannot be denied, that he hath given another Senſe to thoſe places of St. Paul which ſeem to prove it moſt. As for Example, when he expoundeth that famous paſſage, Rom. 5. 12. By One man Sin entered into the World, &c. He underſtandeth of Death what St. Paul ſaith of Sin, becauſe it is the Wages of Sin; and upon thoſe other words of the ſame Chapter, As by the diſobedience of one, many are become Guilty, &c. This Sentence, ſaith he, ſeems to have much of Difficulty: for how can it be, that one only Man having Sinned, many ſhould be made guilty by his Sin? We may eaſily conceive, that the firſt Man being become mortal, it was neceſſary that his Off-ſpring ſhould be mortal likewiſe; but what Likelihood, and what Reaſon is there, that a Man ſhould be a Sinner, becauſe of another's diſobedience? ... What then ſignifieth the word Sinner? In my Opinion it ſignifieth nothing elſe, but a condemned Man, ſubject to Pain and Death: This is a way of ſpeaking which does not agree with St. Auguſtin's Doctrine: tho' it is not hard to defend St. Chryſoſtom, by ſaying, that tho' he ſpake thus, yet he admitted all that Divines own concerning Original Sin: For what is Original Sin, according to them? It is either a Privation of Original righteouſneſs, or Luſt with the guilt of Sin, or pain and Guilt together. But St. Chryſoſtom acknowledges all theſe: for in the firſt place he Confeſſeth, that by the firſt Man's Sin, all Men were deprived and ſpoiled of the State of Innocence, that they are become not only mortal, and ſubject to Pain and Grief, but alſo inclined to Evil. Thus, in his Opinion, Luſt is an effect of the firſt Man's Sin: and that Concupiſcence in Men, makes them unworthy of eternal Life, if the Grace of Jeſus Chriſt ſaveth them not by Baptiſm.

He aſcribes much to the ſtrength of Free-will; He always ſpeaks as if he believed that it depends upon our ſelves to do good or evil, and affirms that God always gives his Grace to thoſe who on their ſide do all they can; that we muſt begin, and God makes an end; that he followeth the motions of our Wills, and giveth them their Perfection; yet he owns the neceſſity of Grace to do good, but ſubmits it ſtill to our Will: ſo that according to him, We are to will and chuſe the good, and God gives us the neceſſary Grace to fulfil the ſame; he prevents not our Will, that our Liberty may not be prejudiced; he worketh good in us, but that is when we are willing: when our Will is determined, he draweth to himſelf, but only thoſe who do all their endeavours to come near to him. Theſe Principles about foreknowledge, and Predeſtination, agree very well with theſe Concluſions. God did not predeſtinate men, but as he foreſaw their merits: foreknowledge is not the cauſe of the event of things, but God foreſaw them becauſe they ſhall happen. He calls all Men; Jeſus Chriſt died for all Men; he prepared his Grace for all, he predeſtinated thoſe whom he foreſaw would uſe his Grace well: He Confeſſes, that no man is free from Sin in this Life, nay he excepteth not the holy Virgin Mary.

St. John Chryſoſtom.

'Sins, but only exhorted Men to Repentance. The Baptiſm of Jeſus Chriſt, not only frees the Soul from Sin, but alſo ſanctifieth it, wherefore it is called the Laver of Regeneration, becauſe it reneweth the Soul through Grace.' Yet he does not believe, that Baptiſm produces theſe Effects in thoſe of riper Years, unleſs they are well diſpoſed to receive it. 'He exacts from thoſe that come to this Sacrament, that they be watchful in the things of their Salvation, diſ-engaged from worldly Cares, and that they renounce all diſorderly Converſation: that they be zealous in their Devotion, and baniſh from their Hearts all thoughts unbecoming ſo holy an Action, and keep their Souls prepared for the coming of this great King.'

Ibid.

And becauſe the Clinicks, (that is ſuch as receive Baptiſm at the point of Death) have not time thus to prepare themſelves, he doubts of their Salvation. He ſpeaketh of their Condition in ſuch terms, as deſcribe the Caſe of a dying man very naturally, who deferred to repent of his Sins till the hour of Death, and then would receive the Sacraments. 'Altho', ſaith he, Sacraments contain the ſame Graces, when the Preparation is different, yet all may not receive them. They receive Baptiſm laying upon their Beds, you receive it in the boſom of the Church, which is the Mother of all the Faithful; they receive it weeping, and you with joy; they with groans, and you with thankſgiving; they in the heat of a Fever, and you under the Senſe of the heavenly Grace: every thing here hath a Relation to the Grace received, there every thing diſagrees with it; there are ſighings and tears, while the Sacrament is adminiſtred, Children cry, the Wife tears her Hair, Friends are dejected, Servants weep, the whole Houſe is in Mourning; and if you mind the Spirit of the ſick Perſon, you ſhall find it more full of Sorrow, than that of the Standers by; for as a ſtormy Sea divides into ſeveral Waves, ſo his Soul being agitated with troubles is torn with a thouſand Diſquiets, racked with infinite Troubles. ... In this torture comes in a Prieſt, whoſe Preſence is more dreadful both to the Company, and to the ſick Man, than the Sickneſs it ſelf: his Viſit ordinarily cauſeth greater Deſpair, than the Phyſicians Sentence, that there is no hope of Recovery. They imagine that Sacraments, tho' inſtruments of the Spiritual life, are infallible tokens of Corporal death. But this is not yet the end of his Miſery, nor the height of his Affliction; ſometimes while Neceſſaries for the Sacrament are preparing, the Soul departs out of the Body; and often, tho' remaining in the Body, yet it receives not the fruit of the Sacrament; for when the Sick perſon knows no body, hears not the Prayers, and cannot utter the Words whereby he is to engage with God, when he is half dead; what benefit can he reap from the Sacrament?'

St. Chryſoſtom doth not diſcourſe oftner, nor in higher terms of any one Myſtery, than of the Euchariſt. He ſays in many places, that the Body and Blood of Chriſt are upon the Altars: that Jeſus Chriſt hath left us his Body and Blood: that the Bread and Wine become the Body and Blood of Chriſt: that we ought not to doubt of it, ſeeing Chriſt himſelf affirmeth it: that it is a ſurprizing Miracle, comparable to the greateſt Wonders: that by vertue of Chriſt's Words, in the Celebration of this Myſtery, Chriſt is offered in Sacrifice: that Jeſus Chriſt offereth himſelf to God the Father: that this Sacrifice is made without ſhedding of blood: that Angels and Arch-angels are preſent at it: that fire from Heaven conſumeth the things offered, and changeth them into the Body and Blood of Jeſus Chriſt: that this Table is to be approached unto with reverence and trembling: that there is need of Holineſs, to receive holy things: that Penitents ought not to come near; and that theſe Myſteries muſt be hid from Catechumens: that Men ought not only to be freed from Sin, but alſo from Earthly affections, and penetrated with divine Love, tranſported with an holy Zeal, and poſſeſſed with fervent Charity. Three ſorts of Prayers were made at the Celebration: the firſt for thoſe that were poſſeſſed; the ſecond for Penitents; and the third for the Faithful. There was mention made of the Dead, and Invocation of Saints; the Sanctus was recited; the Catechumens and Penitents were put out; the Energumenes were brought in at the Conſecration, and Prayers were made for them.

St. Chryſoſtom wiſht that all thoſe who were preſent might communicate; and ſticks not to ſay, that all thoſe that are unworthy to communicate, are not worthy to partake of the Prayers: and that as he who finds not himſelf guilty of any Sin, ought to communicate every day: ſo he, on the contrary, that hath committed Sin, and repented not, ſhould not do it, even upon Feſtival days.

Hom. de Bapt. Chriſti.

St. Chryſoſtom attributes much vertue and efficacy to Sacraments, but he requires very holy diſpoſitions, that Men may be the better for them. 'He ſaith, that Circumciſion and the other Sacraments of the Jews, did not blot out Sins, but cleanſed only Bodily filthineſſes; whereas our Baptiſm hath far greater Vertue, purifying the Soul, delivering it from ſin, and filling it with the Grace of the Holy Spirit; that John's Baptiſm was indeed more excellent, than that of the Jews, but much inferior to ours, becauſe it conferred neither the Holy Ghoſt, nor the remiſſion of

St. John Chryſoſtom.

But there is another Power inveſted in them, which is not inferior to the other, which is that of binding and looſing, of retaining and remitting of Sins. It were to be wiſhed that Men needed no repentance, but that they might keep their Baptiſmal Purity without ſpot: But it being impoſſible not to Sin, God hath prepared the remedy of Repentance. Thoſe that are Guilty of High Crimes, as Murder, Adultery, or Fornication, and the like, are put out of the Church and enjoyned publick Penance; but if they mend their faults, they may come in again, having purified themſelves by Repentance. As many as continue in Sin, and yet will come into the Church, notwithſtanding the Admonitions of Chriſt's Miniſters, aggravate their Crime. Men may hope for pardon, whatſoever their Sin be; but let them have a care of being too confident: Few days are enough to get Pardon for Sin. * 'God, ſaith he, in the ninth 'Homily of Repentance, doth not conſider the length, but 'the zeal of Penance. If you have ſinned ſeveral times, 'repent; come into the Church, and put away your Sins. 'As you uſe to riſe up as often as you fall, ſo as often as 'you have ſinned repent of your Sin, and never deſpair. 'If you ſin a ſecond time repent again; and beware leſt 'ye fall into that Conſternation, which may make you 'loſe the hope of future benefits. Tho' ye ſhould Sin in 'the laſt day of your Life, yet enter into the Church by re'pentance; this is the Time of Remedy, and not of Judg'ment: God requireth not the penalty of Sin, but grants 'pardon for it. He wiſely addeth in the following Homi'ly, that none ought to deſpair, but every one ought to be'ware of preſumption; for theſe two extreams are equal'ly dangerous, becauſe Deſpair hinders Men from riſing a'gain, and Preſumption makes thoſe fall that ſtood upright before: Sloth cauſes us to come ſhort of Heaven, and Deſpair precipitates into an Abyſs of Malice.

*Hom. 41. in 1 ad Cor. Hom. de Seraphim. Hom. 15. in ep. ad Cor. Hom. 3. in ep. ad Eph. Hom. 17. in ep. ad Heb. Hom. 29. ad Pop. Ant. Hom. 17. & 83. in Matth. Hom. 24. in ep. ad Cor. Hom. 31. de B. And thus St. Chryſoſtom obſerves a juſt medium between the exceeding Severity of ſome, who thruſt Men into deſpair, and the ſoft Compliance of others, who promiſe remiſſion without a true and ſincere Repentance. Whoſoever hath committed Sin, muſt own and confeſs it before God, if he would obtain pardon: he muſt be truly affected with a ſenſible grief for his wickedneſs; he muſt truly return to the Lord and be converted: abhor his iniquity, forſake his vicious habits, alter his courſe of life, and love God with all his heart, and above all things, and do every thing for his ſake, &c.

In Hom. de Pœnit.

The only thing that may ſeem difficult in St. Chryſoſtom's Diſcourſes concerning Penance, is what he ſaith of confeſſion of Sins: For in ſeveral places he ſeems to affirm, That it is not neceſſary to confeſs to Men, but that it is ſufficient to confeſs to God, who knoweth the ſecrets of the Heart. Thoſe paſſages are remarkable, and have often been alledged by the Enemies of Confeſſion. It hath been anwered by ſome, that St. Chryſoſtom ſpoke only in oppoſition to a publick Confeſſion, ſuppoſed to have been aboliſhed by Nectarius, but theſe Men do not obſerve, that moſt of theſe paſſages, even the moſt expreſs, are taken out of the Homilies preached at Antioch by St. Chryſoſtom. The beſt, and the moſt Natural Anſwer is, that St. Chryſoſtom does not ſpeak in thoſe Places of thoſe enormous Crimes that are ſubject to Canonical Penance; but in general of ſuch light offences as Chriſtians daily commit; for the remiſſion whereof, they need neither Confeſſion nor Abſolution, but only true Motions of inward repentance. He likewiſe diſcourſeth of that ſort of Sins, when he ſaith, That they are forgiven by Tears, by Alms, by Humility, by Prayer, and other Remedies of that Nature. However, St. Chryſoſtom was very ſevere in the puniſhment of Sinners; and he not only wiſht that notorious Sinners might be put out of the Church, and enjoyned Penance, as Adulterers and Blaſphemers; but he threatned alſo to excommunicate thoſe who came to the Holy Myſteries negligently, and ſuch as lived in hatred and quarrels, that minded Stage-plays, that were envious, proud, &c. Neither would he have great Lords to be ſpared; * For, ſaith he, as to Eccleſiaſtical Correction, Princes are but as other Faithful, there ought to be no diſtinction. He adds, that the Miniſters of Jeſus Chriſt ſhould do their Duty, tho' there were no hope that their reproof could prevail: Yet he would not have the Sword of the Church uſed lightly, or that Anathema's ſhould be indiſcreetly pronounced. This is the ſubject of the Diſcourſe concerning Anathema's; wherein he endeavours to refute thoſe, who without lawful Authority, undertook boldly to condemn, their brethren, and to pronounce Anathema's upon ſuch matters as they were ignorant of. And he obſerves, that Men ought to be extreamly reſerved in this caſe, and not to publiſh Anathema's inconſiderately againſt any: but when there is neceſſity, it ought to be done with an intention to cure, and not to deſtroy thoſe that are under that penalty. † He ſaith further, in another place, That Zeal muſt be tempered with Mercy, for otherwiſe it degenerates into Fury, and other Men's faults are not hardly to be judged of.

In St. Chryſoſtom's time Martyrs were had in Honour; they were commemorated in the Publick Services; their Feſtivals were kept, and their Relicks reverenced; nor that they believed there was any Vertue in thoſe Bones, but becauſe the Sight of their Graves, Urns, or Bones, affected and awakened the Mind, after the ſame Manner, as if the Dead were Preſent, and prayed with us; becauſe the ſight of their precious Relicks made an Impreſſion upon the Mind, they viſited the Holy Places with Devotion; but St. Chryſoſtom obſerves, that the chief intention of thoſe Pilgrimages ought to be the aſſiſting of the Poor. The Dead were prayed for: and St. Chryſoſtom exhorts their Relations to give Alms in their behalf.

Sundays and great Feſtivals were kept with great ſolemnity. St. Chryſoſtom exhorteth Chriſtians to ſpend that Day in exerciſes of Devotion: He zealouſly reproveth all thoſe who employ that Day about Buſineſſes or Recreation; affirming, That God's Curſe will light upon their Labours, and diſſipate what they get by neglecting his Service. In ſeveral places he encourageth the Faithful to frequent Divine Service and the Publick Prayers of the Church, and ſhews that they are more powerful and of greater efficacy, than private ones: He reproves thoſe that gave attention to Sermons, but would go out as ſoon as the Sermon was ended. 'When I Preach, (ſays he, in the Third Diſcourſe 'of the Incomprehenſible Nature of God) I that am Chriſt's 'Servant as you are, you come in Throngs to hear me; 'you hearken to my Words, and exhort one another, 'and attend with Patience unto the end; but when Jeſus 'Chriſt appeareth in the Myſteries, the Church is empty; 'you go out as ſoon as you have heard the Sermon, which 'is a ſign that you have profited nothing; for had the 'Truths preached unto you made any impreſſion upon 'your Minds, you would have ſtayed in the Church, and 'have partaken of thoſe ſtupendious Myſteries with Re'verence and Devotion; but, alas! you depart immediately 'after the Sermon, as if you came only to hear a Conſort 'of Muſick. Some, to excuſe themſelves, uſe this weak 'reaſon; we can pray at Home, but can hear no Sermons 'but at Church: You deceive your ſelves; for tho' ye may 'pray at Home, yet your prayer cannot have the Efficacy of that in the Church, where ſo many Prieſts joyn their 'Prayers with yours, and where a common Voice cryeth 'to Heaven to implore God's Mercy. Common-Prayer is 'a wonderful Conſort, proceeding from a Concord of Charity: 'To which we are to add the Prayers of the Prieſts, who 'are ſet over the Aſſemblies; That the Prayers of the 'People, tho' Weaker of themſelves, may gather ſtrength 'by being joyned to thoſe of God's Miniſters.'

St. Chryſoſtom looks upon the Holy Scripture, As the ground and rule of all the truths of Religion; He exhorts all the Faithful to read it exactly: and this advice he preſſes an infinite number of times; He expounds it litterally, and draws from it edifying moral Inſtructions, but he never propoſes any forced Allegories, nor reſolveth thoſe Queſtions that have more of Curioſity than Profit, as moſt Writers of Commentaries, whether antient or Modern very frequently do: I ſhould never make an end, if I ſhould Collect all the common places of St. Chryſoſtom upon moral Subjects: I ſhall only mention two or three of the moſt conſiderable upon every Subject, and point at ſome others.

Hom. 9. in ep. ad Col. Hom. 19.

Opinions of St. Chryſoſtom upon ſeveral moral Principles.

Of the Love of God.

MOſt Men have taken up a falſe Notion of the Love of God, looking upon it as an Act of the mind, which thinks it has a Love for God, and expreſſes it with words. St. Chryſoſtom to undeceive them of this Error, proves by a compariſon with the love men have for the Creature, that the love which they ought to have for God, is a ſtrong cleaving of the Heart to God, which is the rule, Principle, and Motive of all their their Actions, and which begets in them a contempt of all that is not God. 'If thoſe (ſaith he in his Comment upon 'Pſalm 91.) that are in love with Corporeal Beauties, have 'no Senſe for all other things in the World, and follow 'no buſineſs, but that of beholding continually an Object 'which is ſo dear and ſo acceptable to them; Can a man 'that loveth God, as God ought to be loved, have any 'Senſe afterwards of the good and evil, of the Pleaſures 'and Afflictions of this Life; No truly, for he is above 'all theſe things, and his delight is only in good things 'that are Immortal, and of the ſame Nature with him 'whom he loveth; thoſe that love the Creatures do quick-'ly change, 'tho unwillingly, their affection, for oblivion; 'becauſe the things which they love decay and corrupt; 'but this ſpiritual love hath neither end nor bounds, but 'contains in it ſelf more Pleaſure and Profit than any thing 'elſe, and nothing is able to extinguiſh it.

He compareth the love that we ought to have for God, with that which covetous Men have for riches? in the Sixth Homily upon the Second Epiſtle to Timothy. 'It is a ſhame-'ful thing' ſaith he, 'that men poſſeſſed with a violent Paſ-'ſion for riches, ſhould ſhew nothing of that love which 'they ought to have for God; and that, we have leſs con-'ſideration for God, than covetous men have for wealth. 'For to get Money they watch much, undertake long Jour-'neys, expoſe themſelves to Dangers, Hatred and Ambuſh-'es, and undergo all Extremities, but we refuſe to bear 'with the leaſt word for God, or to expoſe our ſelves to 'the leaſt hatred for his ſervice. &c.

In the Third Homily upon 1 Cor. he tells Chriſtians, That they love Jeſus Chriſt leſs than their Friends. 'Many, 'ſaith he, have endured the loſs of their goods for the 'Service of their Friends; but none are willing, I will not 'ſay, to be deprived of their goods for Jeſus Chriſt, but 'even to be reduced to mere Neceſſaries for his ſake, or 'to content themſelves with what they have at preſent. St. John Chryſoſtom.
'We often bear with Affronts, and make our ſelves Ene-'mies for our Friends; but none will incurr the hatred of 'any for the ſervice of Jeſus Chriſt, and both this hatred 'and Love are looked upon as unprofitable things; we 'never deſpiſe a Friend when we ſee him hungry, but 'would not give a Morſel of bread to Jeſus Chriſt who 'cometh to us daily .... if our Friend be ſick we viſit him 'immediately; but tho' Chriſt is often detained in Priſon in the 'Perſons of his Members, we come not at him. When a 'Friend is going a Journey we melt into tears, but tho' 'Chriſt daily departeth from us, or rather we daily put him 'away by our ſins, yet we are not affected with Grief up-'on that account.

Laſt of all, St. Chryſoſtom obſerveth Hom. 52. upon the Acts, That, 'Whoſoever loveth God truly, will deſpiſe all 'the things of this World, even thoſe that are the moſt 'precious and illuſtrious, Glory and Shame are indifferent 'things to him; he is no more Sollicitous than if he were 'left alone in the World: He deſpiſeth Temptations, Scour-'gings, Dungeons, with as much Courage, as if all theſe 'were endured by another, or as if his Body were a Dia-'mond; he laughs at the Pleaſures of this Life, and is not 'in the leaſt ſuſceptible of Paſſions.

See the Twentieth Homily upon St. Matthew, where he ſhews that God is to be loved not in words but in Deeds. Hom. 30. upon 2 Cor. Hom. 3. upon 1 Tim. Hom. 52. up-on the Acts.

Of the Love of our Neighbour.

'CHarity (ſaith St. Chryſoſtom in the Sixth Homily 'upon the Epiſtle to Titus) is the greateſt of all 'Vertues, it brings the Lovers thereof to rhe very 'Throne of God. Virginity, Faſtings, and Au-'ſterities profit only thoſe that practiſe them, but alms-deeds 'reach to all, and embrace all the Members of Jeſus Chriſt: 'Now there is no Vertue greater than that which reunites 'ſcattered and ſeparated parts. Charity is the Badge of 'Chriſtian Religion, whereby the Diſciples of Jeſus Chriſt 'are known: That is it which cures our Crimes, clean-'ſes the Spots of our Souls, it is a Ladder to aſcend into 'Heaven, and it joyns all the parts of Chriſt's Body toge-'gether.

See the ſixtieth Homily upon St. Matthew, the 15*th.* and 78*th.* upon St. John, the 40*th.* upon the Acts, the 8*th.* upon the Rom. the 32*d.* upon 2 Cor. the 9*th.* upon Epheſ. the Second upon the laſt to Tim. the 33*d.* upon 1 Cor. the 4*th.* upon Theſ. the 10*th.* upon the Epiſtle to the Epheſ. the Second upon the Epiſtle to the Philippians.

Of Alms-deeds.

THe firſt effect of Charity is to give Alms, and the Obligation to Alms-deeds, is included in the com-mandment of Loving our Neighbours as our ſelves. St. Chryſoſtom, recommends this vertue in ſo ma-ny places, that he ſayeth himſelf in the 89*th.* Homily upon St. Matthew, that they upbraided him with ſpeaking of no-thing elſe. 'Giving of Alms (ſaith he in ſeveral places) ren-'ders Men like nnto God cleanſeth from ſin, and appeaſeth 'the Anger of God. To give to the Poor, is to give un-'to God, it is to lend to him upon uſe. We are not on-'ly adviſed, but commanded to give alms. Men are not 'Maſters but only Stewards of their Goods. God who is 'the Soveraign Lord hath entruſted them with the rich, 'that they might relieve the poor. All other good works 'are unprofitable without Alms-deeds. Alms ſhould be 'given with Joy, and in abundance. Men ought not to 'ſtay till Death to diſpoſe of their Charity; but if they have 'done nothing in their Life-time, it is good to leave to the 'poor after Death, and give them as much as to a Child, 'or at leaſt as to a Servant. Theſe Principles and Maxims St. Chryſoſtom repeateth often in his Homilies, as the Thir-tieth Homily upon Geneſis, that upon Pſalm 101. the Second Sermon concerning Lazarus, the Seventeenth Ho-mily upon 2 Cor. the Sixth upon Titus, The 5*th.* 35*th*, 45*th*, 47*th*, 48*th*, 52*d*, 66*th.* 78*th*, 80*th*, 86*th.* upon St. Matth. The 23*d*, 25*th*, 27*th*, 40*th*, 76*th.* upon St. John, the Se-venth upon Coloſ. the 11*th*, 15*th*, 18*th*, upon Rom. the 20*th*, 21*ſt*, and 43*d*, upon 1 Cor. the 5*th*, Homily of Penance, the Sermon upon the Petition of the Sons of Zebedee, the firſt Homily of Faſting, and in an infinite number of places beſides.

Of Riches and Poverty.

AS the Luxury of Riches hinders Men from giv-ing of Alms, ſo we ought not to wonder that St. Chryſoſtom preaching upon Charity, declaims ve-hemently againſt Riches, and ſpeaks in Commen-dation of Poverty. 'Riches (ſaith he in the Second Hom-'ily of ſtatues) are not forbidden, if a good uſe be made 'of them. But what Probability is there that Men ſhould 'not neglect Jeſus Chriſt who is naked, while they build 'marble Palaces for themſelves? O wretched Man! to 'what purpoſe is the Magnificency of thy Houſe? This 'Palace will not, but thy good works will follow thee.... 'To day rich, and to morrow poor. I muſt confeſs, that 'I cannot forbear ſmiling when I read in Wills and Teſta-'ments, I give and bequeath to ſuch a one, the Revenue 'of my Eſtate for Life and to ſuch a one the Feeſimple. 'To ſpeak Properly, we have but the uſe of things, the 'Propriety belongs not to us, and tho' we ſhould poſſeſs 'them all our Life-time, yet will they leave us when we 'die.... Poverty is a ſingular advantage to thoſe that know 'how to uſe it well. It is a Treaſure that cannot be ta-'ken away, a ſupport that cannot fail, and a Sanctuary that 'cannot be violated. If you ask the Admirers of that foo-'liſh Magnificence, what is the Object of their Admira-'tion? They will anſwer you, that it is either the brave 'Horſe that carrieth this new Croeſus, or his rich Livery, 'his gilded Clothes, or the delicate Meats that are ſet be-'fore him, or the Pleaſures he enjoyeth. This is what is 'admired, and what cannot be too much deplored; and 'yet none of theſe Commendations are directed to this 'rich Man, they all belong to his Horſe, his Clothes or 'his Equipage, they admire how well he is mounted, they 'praiſe his Men, his Clothes, but they ſay nothing of his 'Perſon. Can there be a greater Folly? But on the other 'ſide, if you ſee a poor Man in want, and under contempt, 'deſpiſed by thoſe that ſee him, make much of him, and 'by your eſteem of him, the beholders will be excited to 'Vertue. They will tell you, that he is an indigent Fel-'low, a Wretch; but do you ſay on the contrary that he 'is a happy Man, becauſe he hath God for his Friend, be-'cauſe he hath not faſtned his Heart to periſhing Riches, 'nor defiled his Conſcience. With ſuch Chriſtian Diſcour-'ſes as theſe inſtruct your Brethren; let both your Praiſes

St. John Chryſoſtom.

‘ and your Contempts have no other Aim than the Glory ‘ of the Almighty.... One may commend, reprove, and ‘ be angry for God's ſake. If you find a Servant, a Friend, ‘ a Neighbour, robbing, or committing Lewdneſs; If you ‘ hear one telling a lye, or Blaſpheming; If you perceive ‘ that your Neighbour is going to proſtitute his Soul at a ‘ Play, call him back, check, and correct that Sinner: ‘ Theſe good works will be done to the Honour of God. ‘ If this Servant, or this Friend hath offended you, and is ‘ departed from his Duty, forgive him, that will be For- ‘ giveneſs for God's ſake; make alſo Friends and Ene- ‘ mies to your ſelves for God's cauſe. Do you ask how? ‘ thus it is: Never contract that ſort of Friendſhip which ‘ is gotten by Luxury, Intereſt or Ambition, but ſeek to ‘ make you ſuch Friends, as may adviſe you to Moderati- ‘ on under a great fortune, and Comfort you in Adverſity, ‘ who may prompt you only to Honeſty, and who by their ‘ Counſels and prayers may unite you to Jeſus Chriſt. If ‘ you ſee a lewd Perſon, one full of dangerous Opinions, ‘ break off all commerce with him.... If you ſpeak in a- ‘ ny Company, let your words be Godward. He did ſo ‘ often diſcourſe againſt Riches, and the abuſe of them, ‘ that he ſaith himſelf, in the Sermon againſt Eutropius, up- ‘ on Pſalm 44. that they accuſed him of hating rich Men. ‘ But, ſaith he, why ſhould I not ſpeak continually againſt ‘ them, ſince they ceaſe not to torment the Poor? I com- ‘ plain not of them becauſe they are rich, but becauſe they ‘ uſe their Riches ill: for I make this Profeſſion, Never to ‘ blame any body for being wealthy, but for with-holding ‘ what is not his own.... The preſent Life (addeth he) is ‘ a Pilgrimage; let no man ſay, I have a Town, a Houſe, ‘ and Eſtate, &c. No Man hath any thing here below: ‘ all the good things of this Life, are the Inſtruments of our ‘ Journey; we are travelling as long as this Life laſteth. ‘ Some gather wealth in this Journey, and bury Gold in the ‘ way, and pray tell me, when you are come into an Inn, ‘ do you furniſh it with ſuperfluous Houſhold-ſtuff? No ‘ certainly, you are contented to eat and drink there, and ‘ to be gone as ſoon as you can. This Life is an Inn, we ‘ are ſcarce come into it, but we are obliged to quit it, ‘ therefore let us do it readily; let us keep nothing here, ‘ that we may loſe nothing in the next Life. You are ‘ Travellers in this Life, and leſs then Travellers; for a ‘ Traveller knoweth, when he cometh into his Inn, and ‘ when he goeth out, &c. In this dreadful Ignorance ‘ I loſe a great deal of time; and while I am laying up of ‘ Proviſions, God calls me, and upbraids me thus, Thou ‘ Fool! whoſe ſhall theſe things be which thou haſt prepa- ‘ red? for this very Night thy Soul ſhall be demanded of ‘ thee.... But what, will ſome Perſons ſay, muſt be done ‘ in this Caſe? even this, Hate temporal Goods, love eter- ‘ nal Life, part with your Eſtate, I do not ſay with all, but ‘ with what is ſuperfluous; do not covet what is another's; ‘ ſpoil not the Widow, nor rob the Orphan; raviſh not ‘ the Goods of this World, but take Heaven by violence; ‘ Jeſus Chriſt approves of this violence, &c. Do not vex ‘ the Poor, but do him Right, &c.

St. John Chryſoſtom.

See Hom. 4. upon St. Matthew, where he proves by the Example of three Children, that were caſt into the Fiery Furnance, that Riches are not to be worſhipped: the 9*th*, Homily upon St. Matthew, where he ſhews, that we ought not to be lifted up, becauſe of Riches: the 20*th*, and 64*th*, againſt the deſire of wealth: the 42*d* againſt Luxury and Pleaſures: the 48th. againſt exceſs in Clothes: the 80*th*, and 81*ſt*. Homilies againſt Covetouſneſs: The 88*th* againſt the Luxury of Women: and, the 19*th* Homily upon St. John, concerning the uſe that ought to be made of Riches.

Of Forgiving, and againſt Revenge.

THE ſecond effect of Charity towards our Neighbour, is forgiving of our Enemies, in oppoſition to a Spirit of Revenge, of Enmity and Reſentment. St. Chryſoſtom declaims ſeverely againſt this Vice, in an Homily purpoſely compoſed on that Subject, which is the Twenty-ſecond, concerning Statues. Theſe are ſome of his Notions. ‘ The revengeful Man, ſaith he, ‘ is not leſs unworthy of the Communion, than the Blaſ- ‘ phemer and Adulterer. The lewd Perſon puts an end to ‘ his Crime when he has ſatisfied his impure Deſire; but he ‘ that keeps up an obſtinate Hatred, Sins continually, and ‘ never makes an end. The fire of Luſt is ſpent by enjoy- ‘ ment; but that of Hatred feeds it ſelf, and is renewed ‘ every moment. With what face then can we implore the ‘ Mercy of God, whilſt we are full of bitter hatred againſt ‘ our Brethren? Your Brother hath done you an injury; ‘ but do you not often commit injuries againſt God? Do ‘ you compare the Servant with his Maſter? In the mean ‘ time, he that wrongeth you, was perhaps wronged by ‘ you before: But what wrong hath God ever done you? ‘ or rather what benefits hath he not taken pleaſure to be- ‘ ſtow upon you, and you in requital return only injuries ‘ to him again? In a word; pretending to be revenged of ‘ others, you puniſh your ſelves: The hatred you harbour, ‘ is your own tormenter, to tear your own bowels. Is there ‘ any thing more unhappy than he who meditates revenge? ‘ He is a Mad-man that never enjoyeth any reſt, his Heart ‘ being filled with Storms and Troubles: He abhorreth all ‘ the Actions, the Words, and the very Name of his Ene- ‘ my. And to what end is this Fury, and theſe Torments? ‘ We ought to forgive our Enemies to prevent the pains ‘ we feel by hating them. What folly is it to ſeek revenge ‘ at our own coſt; to do our ſelves a great miſchief, that ‘ another may receive a leſſer, &c.

See the 61*ſt*. Homily upon St. Matthew; the 30*th*. upon St. John; the 38*th*. upon the Acts; an Homily upon the Epiſtle to the Theſſalonians, and ſeveral other places.

Of Faſting.

NExt to giving of Alms, Faſting is one of the moſt powerful means to obtain pardon for Sin; but that Faſting may be profitable, it muſt be accompanied with a regular life. This St. Chryſoſtom takes notice of almoſt every-where, when he diſcourſes of Faſting. See how he expreſſeth himſelf, in the ſecond Homily of Statues. ‘ I do not call Faſting a meer abſtinence from ‘ Meats, but forbearance from Sin: For faſting is not able ‘ of its own nature to blot out the pollution of our offences, ‘ except neceſſary diſpoſitions do attend it..... Let us there- ‘ fore have a care, that in Faſting, we fall not ſhort of the ‘ price and reward that belongs to it: But let us learn per- ‘ fectly to practiſe it holily. Afterwards he ſets forth the ‘ qualities of a Faſt by the example of that of the Ninevites.... ‘ He (ſaith our Author) offers an injury to Faſting, who ‘ defines it to be an abſtinence from Meats. You Faſt, ‘ Brother; but ſhew me your Faſting by your Works: but ‘ you will ask me, what Works? I require therefore, that ‘ when you ſee a poor Man, you be ſure to help him in ‘ his miſery; that you reconcile your ſelf to your Enemy; ‘ that another Man's Glory may not excite your Envy; ‘ and that you ſhut your Eyes when you meet an handſome ‘ Woman: For Faſting reſpects not the Mouth barely, ‘ but the Ear, the Hands, the Feet, and all the other Parts ‘ of the Body. Covetous Hands ſhould faſt, and touch no ‘ more other Men's goods; the Feet ſhould faſt, and run ‘ no more to profane Shews; and the Eyes ſhould faſt, by ‘ turning aſide from that beauty, whoſe ſight is ſo danger- ‘ ous.

In the fourth Homily of Statues, he lays down the ſame Maxims again. ‘ We ſee, ſaith he, nothing but People ‘ making merry, and ſaying one to another; Victory, all ‘ is our own, Midlent is over. My advice to theſe is, that ‘ they ſhould conſider, whether the inward Man is in a bet- ‘ ter condition than it was when the Faſt begun: For then ‘ indeed we have reaſon to rejoyce, when our Faſting does not ‘ end with thoſe Vices that it begun with, and when we ‘ are come to the Feſtival of Eaſter with a Conſcience puri- ‘ fied by Faſting. I know ſome who, in the middle of ‘ Lent, do dread already that of the next year.... Can ‘ there be a greater weakneſs? But whence cometh it? Even ‘ from this, that we make Faſting to conſiſt only in for- ‘ bearing of Meats, and not in the reforming of our Man- ‘ ners.

‘ There may be (ſaith he in the 22*d*. Homily) ſeveral rea- ‘ ſons not to Faſt; but there is none not to correct a vici- ‘ ous habit. You have broken your Faſt, becauſe of a bodi- ‘ ly infirmity. Well: But why do you not forgive your ‘ Enemy? Is there any corporal indiſpoſition that hinders? ‘ Laſtly, He obſerveth in the 7*th*. and 11*th*. Homilies upon Geneſis, that the true Faſt is abſtinence from Sin; for for- ‘ bearance of Meat was introduced to reſtrain the motions ‘ of the Fleſh, and to ſuppreſs the Paſſions. See the Ho- ‘ milies of Faſting and of Alms-deeds, and the 57*th*. upon ‘ St. Matthew.

Upon

St. John Chryſoſtom.

Upon this; That Man is obliged to do all for God, and to direct all his Actions to him alone.

St. John Chryſoſtom.

CConcerning a Chriſtian's Duty, St. Chryſoſtom diſcourſeth thus in the 23*d*. Homily, againſt thoſe that kept the Feaſts of the New Moons. 'St. Paul (ſaith he) commands us to do all things to the 'Glory of God: For whether you eat, or whether you drink, or whatſoever ye do, do all to the Glory of God. You will ask 'what relation have theſe things to the Glory of God? 'Invite a poor Man to your Table; this is called to eat 'and drink to the Glory of God. You may alſo work for 'God by ſhutting up your ſelves in your own Houſes: 'How, and by what means, will you ſay? When you hear 'the Diſorders and Inſolencies committed in the Streets, by 'lewd Men, then ſhut your doors, have nothing to do with 'that helliſh Crew, and you ſhall keep your Houſes for the 'Glory of God. You may alſo glorifie the Lord both by 'your Praiſes and by your Contempt: As for example; 'When you ſee a wicked Man gorgeouſly apparelled, and 'ſumptuouſly adorned with the ſpoil of the Countries, which 'he hath brought to Deſolation and attended with a great number of Servants; and ſome weak Soul is blinded with that vain 'luſtre, diſcover to him his error, and make him ſee the vanity 'of that inſignificant Pomp, and pity the happineſs of that unhappy Man. Thus may Men deſpiſe things for the Glory 'of God. This contempt is an inſtruction for thoſe that 'are witneſſes thereof. We prove God to be preſent at all 'the actions of our lives, even in our purchaſes and ſales, 'when we are contented with an honeſt gain, and when we 'take no advantage of other Men's neceſſities to advance 'the rates of our Commodities.

'In your Faſts and Prayers, in your Contempt and Praiſe, 'in your Silence and Diſcourſes, in ſelling and buying, 'think always on the Glory of God.

Of the neceſſary Diſpoſitions to communicate worthily.

NOne of the Fathers have ſpoken more powerfully and largely than St. Chryſoſtom, concerning the neceſſary Diſpoſitions to communicate worthily, nor more dreadfully againſt unworthy Communicants.

He requireth in the firſt place, that thoſe who draw near to the Lord's Table, ſhould put away their Sins. 'It is 'written (ſaith he in the Firſt Sermon of Penance) that 'without Holineſs no man ſhall ſee God; but whoſoever 'is unworthy to ſee God, is not worthy to partake of the 'Body and Blood of Chriſt; wherefore St. Paul will have 'a man to examine himſelf. &c. Reform the Diſorders of 'your life paſt, and then come to that holy Table, and 'participate of that Sacrifice with a pure and unſpotted 'Conſcience.

'He ſaith the ſame things in the 22*d*. Homily of Statues; 'ſeeing we are advancing into Lent, let us advance in Vertue; it is in vain to run, except we get the prize of the 'Race: Our Auſterities and Faſtings will profit us nothing, 'if we come not to the holy Table with an exact purity 'of Heart: For Lent, Prayers and Sermons are appointed 'in the Church, for no other purpoſe, but to make us participate ſafely of the unbloody Sacrifice, and to waſh away 'with the Waters of Repentance, the filthineſſes of our 'Sins; without this our labour is vain: But if by Abſtinence you have corrected one Vice, and gained one Vertue, and put off one evil habit, then you may boldly take 'place at the Table of the Lord.

'He recommends the ſame thing in the Homily of Seraphims. I tell you plainly, ſaith he, I pray, I beſeech you not 'to come to the Lord's Table with a Conſcience defiled 'with Crimes: For to communicate in this condition, is 'not Communion, but Condemnation; and tho' you ſhould 'a thouſand times come to the Body of Jeſus Chriſt in that 'condition, yet inſtead of receiving benefit by it, you would 'become the more guilty. Let Sinners therefore keep away; that is, thoſe who perſevere in their Sin. This I 'warn you of betimes, even now, that when the day of 'that heavenly Feaſt ſhall come, you may not ſay, I am 'unprepared, you ſhould have given me warning.... I know 'that we are all guilty, that no man can boaſt of having a 'pure heart in this World: that's not the worſt; but that 'not having a pure heart, they will not draw nigh unto 'him that can purifie them.

But to be pure is not ſufficient, according to St. Chryſoſtom, to partake of that holy Table; Men muſt have a care beſides, that they come not thither negligently. 'Let no Man '(ſaith he in the 83*d*. Homily upon St. Matthew) approach 'this ſacred Table with diſguſt, negligence or coldneſs; 'but let all come with a longing deſire, with zeal and love.... 'You ought therefore to watch over your own actions 'carefully, knowing that thoſe who receive unworthily the 'Body and Blood of Jeſus Chriſt, are threatned with a 'dreadful puniſhment. If you cannot endure, without horror, Judas's crime, who ſold his Maſter; and the Jew's 'ingratitude, who crucified their King; beware alſo of becoming guilty of profaning the Body and Blood of Jeſus 'Chriſt: Let no Judas, no covetous Man come hither; 'let none but true Diſciples of Jeſus Chriſt be preſent at 'that Feaſt, &c. For this Reaſon this holy Father obſerves in the Homily of Judas's Treachery, that this holy Altar is not to be approached unto without reverence.... That no Hypocrite, no Man full of iniquity ought to come near to this ſacred Table. 'According to theſe Principles, (he 'ſaith in the 17*th*. Homily upon Hebrews) that, generally 'ſpeaking, no reckoning is to be made either of thoſe who 'communicate but once in the Year, or of thoſe that do it 'often, or ſuch as receive ſeldom; but of thoſe that communicate with a pure Conſcience, a clean Heart, and a 'blameleſs Life. Let as many as are thus diſpoſed come 'always; and as many as are not, let them not come once, 'becauſe they cannot but draw God's Judgments upon 'themſelves, and become worthy of Condemnation. Do 'you think that Forty days Penance is ſufficient to cleanſe 'you from all your Sins?

Homily upon St. Matthew; the 24*th*. 27*th*. and 41*ſt*. upon 1 Cor. the 3*d*. upon the Epiſt. to the Epheſians; the 17*th*. upon the Epiſt. to the Hebrews; the 5*th*. upon Titus and ſeveral other places.

Of Prayer.

'GOD requireth of us fervent and conſtant Prayer; he often with-holds thoſe things that we ask of 'him to excite our Zeal.' This Obſervation is found in the firſt Homily concerning Statues, in thoſe upon Geneſis, in the Commentary upon Pſal. 7. and in the Homily upon theſe Words, Phil. 1. What then? Chriſt is preached. He deſcribeth both the Conditions and the Effects of Prayer in the 2*d*. Homily upon Hannah. In the 5*th*. Homily upon the ſame Subject, he ſheweth the Strength and Virtue of Prayer; He lays down the Neceſſity of Prayer in ſeveral places of his Works. See the 22*d*. Homily upon St. Matthew, the 36*th*. upon St. John; he ſpeaks of Thankſgiving in the 25*th*. upon St. Matthew, in the 35*th*. upon St. John's Goſpel, and in the 14*th*. upon 2 Cor.

Of Attention in Prayer.

'WE pay leſs reſpect to God, than a Servant doth to his Maſter, a Soldier to his General, or even a Friend to his Friend; for we ſpeak to our Friends with attention: But whilſt our Knees 'are on the ground, and we are treating with God about 'the buſineſs of our Salvation; whilſt we beg pardon for 'our Crimes, we faint, our Mind is at Court, or at the 'Bar, and there is no correſpondence betwixt our Thoughts 'and our Words. We daily commit this fault, &c.

'Many go into the Church, and there utter a great number of Prayers; and then come out, not knowing what 'they have ſaid: They move their Lips, but they do not 'apply their Minds to their Diſcourſes. What? you hearken 'not to what you ſay, and would you have God hear it?

St. John Chryso-stom.

'I kneeled, say you, but your Heart was some-where else: 'Your Mouth uttered Petitions, but your Mind was about 'Bargains, Trading, Exchange or Visits. It is in the time 'of Prayer that the Devil assaults us, knowing that then 'we profit spiritually; he suggests to our Spirits a multi-'tude of Thoughts.' See the 36*th.* Homily upon the Acts, wherein he exhorts Christians to pray in the Night.

St. John Chryso-stom.

Of Humility, against Pride.

HUmility according to St. Chrysostom, is the principle of all Vertues, and the ground of all good Works. This he proveth in the 47*th.* Homily upon St. Matth: 'We should not be lifted up for 'our good Works, but acknowledge our unworthiness be-'fore God. Vertues are like Riches; if we expose them 'publickly, we are in danger of losing them; to preserve 'them, they must be hid. The more good we do, the less 'we should boast of it; if we be proud of it, we lose its 'reward. The greatest Action, and the most acceptable to 'God, is to entertain low Thoughts of our selves.... No-'thing conduces more to make us beloved of God, than to 'reckon our selves most imperfect; that is the heighth and 'perfection of Wisdom.

See the 3*d.* Homily upon St. Matthew; the 4*th.* upon the same Gospel; the latter end of the 25*th.* and 65*th.* upon the same; the 28*th.* 38*th.* 41*st.* and 48*th.* upon St. John; the 21*st.* upon the Romans; the 11*th.* upon 2 Thessal. and the 2*d.* Homily upon the Epistle to Titus; where he speaks against the love of Glory.

Of Christian Watchfulness.

ST. Chrysostom describeth in several places the various Devices which Satan useth to tempt us, very eloquently. Upon this Subject one may consult the Homily of the Tempter, where he proves that Temptations are profitable for us, provided we stand always upon our guard, and watch continually over our selves. This he recommends in that place, and in the 13*th.* Homily upon St. Matthew; where he proves, that in this World the Devil's temptations are to be resisted: In the 14*th.* where he shews that the diseases of the Soul are not to be neglected; and in many other places, where he gives both Precepts and Means to avoid Temptations and Sins.

Against Covetousness.

ST. Chrysostom declares his Indignation against Covetous Men in many places, and the Picture which he makes of them is enough to beget in us an abhorrence to them. Thus he speaks of them, Hom. 9. upon 1 Cor. 'What can be more impudent, shameless, and 'bold, than a Miserably covetous Man,? A Dog is more 'modest than the covetous Man, who seizeth upon that 'which is another Man's. Nothing is more filthy, than 'those Hands which take all; nothing more cruel than that 'Mouth which devoureth all, and is never satisfied. Look 'not upon his Face and Eyes, as if they were the Eyes 'and Face of a Man. The covetous Person is never con-'tented, till he hath got all that the World hath; all is 'brutish in his Face; he is Inhumanity it self, &c. In the 39*th.* Homily upon 1 Cor. he sheweth how abominable a thing a covetous Man is, who having gathered great quantities of Corn, to sell it dear, laments, because it is growing cheap. In another Place, Hom. 18. upon the Epistle to the Ephesians; He says that Covetousness is a kind of Idolatry. He carries the same Notion in the 64*th.* Homily upon St. John. In a Word, all his Homilies are full of Invectives against covetous Men; he writes against Usury in the 56*th.* Homily upon St. Matthew, in the 12*th.* upon the Romans, and in the 15*th.* upon 1 Cor.

Of Meekness, and against Anger.

THo' St. Chrysostom's Zeal gave his Enemies occasion to accuse him of being passionate; yet one may easily judge by his Writings, that he was a great lover of Meekness, and that he disapproved of Passion; See his Moral exhortations, in the 29*th.* Homily upon St. Matthew, the 33*d.* and 48*th.* upon St. John, the 6*th.* upon the Acts, and the 17*th.* upon the Epistle to the Ephesians.

Against Envy.

'ENvy is the most abominable of Sins: Hell never 'produced one more to be abhorred. Other Sin-'ners have some pleasure; but the Envious Man 'torments himself, whilst he torments others. En-'vy hath been the cause of all Mischief. This crime is so 'much the more dangerous, because no Penance is enjoy-'ned for it. Men fansie they may blot it out by some 'small Alms, or a short Fast; they do not weep bitterly 'for it, as for Adultery or Fornication, &c.

These are some of St. Chrysostom's Notions about Envy, taken out of the 40*th.* Homily upon St. Matthew. One may read upon the same Subject the Homily upon Psal. 49. Hom. 37. upon St. John, the 3*d.* upon 1 Cor. the 24*th.* and 27*th.* upon 2 Cor. and the 3*d.* upon the Epistle to the Philippians.

Against Drunkenness.

'THere is not a more dangerous or hateful Sin than 'Drunkeness, saith St. Chrysostom, in the first Dis-'course upon these Words of St. Paul to Timothy, use a little Wine for thy Stomach's sake, and thine often Infirmities. A Drunkard is a Dead Man 'livings voluntarily sick, a Person useless either for the 'Common-wealth, or for his Family; one whose presence 'is intolerable, whose Breath, Voice and Steps are equally 'odious.

See the 27*th.* Homily upon the Acts, the 25*th.* upon the Epistle to the Romans. See also the 56*th.* Homily upon St. Matthew, and the 27*th.* upon the Acts.

Against Swearing and Blasphemies.

ST. Chrysostom Discourseth against Swearing and Blasphemies almost in all the Homilies of Statues, wherein he declaimeth Vehemently against that Vice. See also the 8*th.* 10*th.* 11*th.* Homilies upon the Acts.

Concerning

Concerning Publick Shows and Stage-plays.

St. John Chryſoſtom.

ST. Chryſoſtom living in two great Imperial Cities, where Plays, Shows, Comedies, &c. were very frequent, to which the People were much addicted; one needs not wonder that he ſhould ſo often and ſo earneſtly inveigh againſt thoſe diſorders. He calls their Stages, Schools of Lewdneſs, Academies of Incontinence, and Peſtilential Pulpits. 'There, ſaith he, you ſee lewd Women repreſenting Adulteries, and uttering Blaſphemies. 'With what Eyes will you look upon your Wives, your 'Children, Servants or Friends at your going out of ſuch 'places? He refuteth in another Sermon the Specious pretences they had to plead for Plays: Theſe are his Words. 'What harm, ſay you, is there in going to ſee a Play? 'Is that ſufficient to keep one from the Communion? But 'I will ask you, whether there can be a more ſhameleſs Sin, 'than to come to the Holy Table, being defiled with A'dultery? Yes, it is a kind of Adultery to go to a Play; 'and if you will not believe me, hear the Words of him 'who is to judge of our Life. Jeſus Chriſt tells us, That 'whoſoever looketh upon a Woman to luſt after her, 'committeth Adultery. What can be ſaid of thoſe, who 'paſſionately ſpend whole days in thoſe Places, in looking 'upon Women of ill fame and reputation: With what 'face will they dare to affirm, that they beheld them not 'to luſt after them, and ſo much the rather, becauſe they 'hear laſcivious Speeches, they ſee wanton Actions, they 'are entertained with amorous Songs, and with Voices 'capable of ſtirring up ſhameful Paſſions; they ſee Wo'men dreſſed, painted, and adorned on purpoſe to inſpire 'Love. The Aſſiſtants are in ſuch confuſion and idleneſs, 'as promote Riotings; and theſe are natural effects both 'of the preparations and conſequences of Plays. The Mu'ſical Inſtruments, Conſorts and Songs, are equally dan'gerous; they flatter ſtrangely, they effeminate the Heart 'and prepare it to yield to the ſnares laid for them by 'profligate Women. For if in the Church it ſelf, where 'Pſalms are ſung, the Scripture is read, where the dread 'of the Almighty appears, and Men are in a poſture of 'reverence? If, I ſay, in that ſo venerable a place, Luſt will 'creep in as a Thief, how ſhall they be able to overcome 'the motions of Concupiſcence, that conſtantly frequent 'the Stage, who neither ſee nor hear any thing but what 'is prophane and dangerous; whoſe Hearts are full of evil 'Thoughts, and whoſe Eyes and Ears are aſſaulted con'tinually? But if this be impoſſible, how ſhall they juſti'fie themſelves from the guilt of Adultery? And if they 'are Adulterers, how can they pretend to come into the 'Church, and to participate of the Holy Table before they 'have done Penance.'

Of Balls and Gaming.

ST. Chryſoſtom exclaimeth as much againſt Balls and publick Meetings, as he does againſt Stage-plays. 'There are (ſaith he in the 23*d*. Homily to the Peo'ple of Antioch) no Enemies ſo dangerous as thoſe 'nocturnal Recreations, thoſe pernicious Meetings and 'Dances. Our former Miſcarriages call for Tears, for Shame 'and Sorrow, and yet Mirth breaks out every-where.... 'I ſhall ſay nothing of idle expences; but I am very much 'troubled at Gamings and Taverns; how much is there 'of Impiety and Intemperance?' He ſpeaks againſt Games of chance in the 15*th*. Homily to the People of Antioch; where he ſhews, that they are occaſions of Blaſphemies, Loſſes, Anger, Quarrels, and all manner of Crimes.

Of the Dignity and Qualifications of the Miniſters of Jeſus Chriſt.

WE have already ſet down St. Chryſoſtom's Opinion concerning the Dignity and excellency of the Prieſt-hood, when we mentioned his Books upon that Subject and the Homilies concerning the Hiſtory of Uzziah. We alſo joyned to that ſome places of the ſame Treatiſe, concerning the Qualifications of a Biſhop, and the weight of his Office. But to thoſe one may add, what he ſays to the ſame purpoſe, in the 1*ſt*. Homily upon the Epiſt. to Titus, and in the 3*d*. upon the Acts; where he openly declares his Opinion, that few Biſhops were ſaved. Upon the ſame Subject one may conſult the 1*ſt*. Homily upon the Epiſtle to the Corinthians, the 4*th*. upon that to the Philippians, and the 3*d*. upon the Acts. He enjoyns Chriſtians in ſeveral places to be very reſpectful towards the Prieſts; as in the Homilies upon the Song of Hannah, in the 22*d*. upon St. Matthew, in the 86*th*. upon St. John, and in the 2*d*. upon the 1*ſt*. Epiſt. to Timothy. His obſervation in his laſt is, That we ſhould not hear thoſe Paſtours that are fallen into Hereſy; but, on the contrary, we ought to avoid them, and ſeparate from them: But not from wicked Prieſts, whoſe Character is to be honoured; becauſe notwithſtanding their Wickedneſs, they truly offer the Holy Sacrifice, and validly adminiſter the Sacraments.

Upon the Uſefulneſs and Excellency of a Monaſtick Life.

WE have ſufficiently declared St. Chryſoſtom's Opinion of a Monaſtick Life, in the extracts of the Treatiſes which he compoſed in his retirement. To thoſe one may add the Homily of Statues, where he ſpeaks of the Egyptian Monks, the 1*ſt*. 8*th*. 55*th*. 69*th*. 70*th*. 71*ſt*. 72*d*. upon St. Matthew, and the 14*th*. upon the 1*ſt*. Epiſt. to Timothy.

Of the State of Marriage, and of the Duties of Married Perſons.

IN the firſt place St. Chryſoſtom requireth that in chuſing a Wife, Men ſhould have greater regard to Vertue than riches. He lays down this Maxim in the 74*th*. Homily upon St. Matthew; there he pleaſantly ſhews how much rich Wives prove troubleſome to their Huſbands. He ſays the ſame thing in the 48*th*. and 56*th*. Homilies upon Geneſis, in the 49*th*. upon the Acts, in the 12*th*. upon the Epiſtle to the Coloſſians, and in the 17*th*. 19*th*. and 28*th*. Sermons of the 5*th*. Volume. He exhorts Husbands to live well with their Wives, and ſhew them good Examples. In the 38*th*. Homily upon Geneſis, in the expoſition of the 43*d*. Pſalm; in the 30*th* Homily upon St. Matthew, and the 20*th*. upon the Epiſtle to the Epheſians; in the 10*th*. upon the Epiſtle to the Coloſſians, he treateth at large of the Love which Husbands ought to have for their Wives, and of the reſpect that Wives ought to ſhew towards their Husbands. He diſcourſes upon the ſame Subject in the 26*th*. Homily upon 1 Cor. and the 60*th*. upon St. John.

Of the Education of Children, and the Duties of the Maſter of a Family.

ST. Chryſoſtom being yet in his Retirement and ſenſible of the little care that Fathers took to bring up their Children well, employs part of the Third Book againſt thoſe that found fault with a Monaſtick Life, to complain of that Miſcarriage; and goes ſo far as to affirm, That a Father who breeds up his Child ill, is more cruel than he that puts him to Death; becauſe he makes him liable to eternal Damnation, which is infinitely worſe than loſs of Life. This matter is handled likewiſe in the Homilies concerning Hannah; where he ſhews, That not only Fathers, but Mothers alſo are obliged to give their Children good Education. In the 60*th*. Homily upon St. Matthew, he blameth the careleſneſs of Parents in the choice of a Tutor. Laſtly, in the 21*ſt*. and 22*d*. Homilies upon the Epiſtle to the Epheſians, he admoniſhes Fathers to be leſs ſollicitous about their Children's getting School-learning; and to take more care that they be taught Piety and the Chriſtian Religion. Read the 59*th.* Homily upon St. Matthew; the 9*th.* upon 1 Tim. and the 1*ſt.* upon Rom. where he diſcourſeth of the Duties of a Maſter in a Family, in relation to his Wife, Children and Servants. He obſerves in the 15*th.* Homily upon the Epiſtle to the Epheſians, that a Miſtreſs is not to abuſe her Maid-ſervants. See alſo the 16*th.* Homily upon the 1*ſt.* Epiſtle to Timothy.

St. John Chryſoſtom.

St. John Chryſoſtom.

Of Afflictions.

ST. Chryſoſtom not only teaches us that we ought to bear the loſſes, ſickneſſes, and other afflictions that may happen in this World patiently: But he ſhews, beſides, that they are the Portion of all good Men: He gives eight Reaſons for it, worth Reading, in the Homily upon theſe words of St. Paul to Timothy, Uſe a little Wine; in the 4*th.* and 5*th.* Diſcourſes concerning Statues; in the 28*th.* Homily upon the Epiſtle to the Hebrews; in the 33*d.* upon St. Matthew; in the 8*th.* upon 2 Tim. and in the 28*th.* and 29*th.* Homilies upon the Epiſtle to the Hebrews.

Of Death.

ST. Chryſoſtom's Homilies are full of excellent Inſtructions concerning Death; wherein he ſhews, that inſtead of fearing Death, a Chriſtian ought to deſire it. 'To what purpoſe, ſaith he in the 5*th.* Homily of 'Statues, ſhould a Man fear ſudden Death? Is it becauſe 'it brings us the ſooner to our Haven, and haſtens our paſ'ſage to a happy life? What folly is this? We expect eter'nal felicity, and thoſe good things which no Eye hath 'ſeen, nor Ear heard, and which never entred into the 'Heart of Man; and yet we do not only put of the fru'tion of them, but we fear it, yea we abhor it.' He tells us in other places, That this life, being but a journey, a train of Miſeries, a baniſhment from our own Country, &c. we ſhould be very miſerable if it never were to end.

See the 21*ſt.* and 32*d.* Homilies upon Geneſis; the Diſcourſe upon theſe Words of St. Paul, Be not ſorry for the Death of your Brethren; where he carries this Notion further, and ſaith, that we ſhould be as glad to go out of this World as Criminals are to get out of Priſon. See the 1*ſt.* Homily upon Geneſis, the 14*th.* upon the Epiſtle to Timothy, and the 7*th.* upon the Epiſtle to the Hebrews.

Laſt of all he hath one Sermon to prove that Death is not to be feared.

From theſe Principles, he concludes in ſeveral places, that we ought not to weep for the Dead, but on the contrary rejoyce; for that they have quitted this miſerable life, to enter into one which is both eternal and happy. See the 34*th.* Homily upon St. Matth. the 62. upon St. John, the 21*ſt.* upon the Acts, the 6*th.* upon the Epiſtle to the Theſſalonians, and the 4*th.* upon the Epiſtle to the Hebrews.

Chriſtian Maxims which St. Chryſoſtom lays down and maintains in his Sermons.

WE ought not to be addicted to the Goods of this World. Hom. 2. upon Matthew.

Perſons who are not Vertuous, will receive no advantage from the Vertues of others. Hom. 5. on Matthew.

The Vertue of our Relations will do us no good, if we our ſelves want Piety. Hom. 10. on Matthew.

Men ought to exerciſe themſelves in the practice of all Vertues. Hom. 11. on Matthew.

No Mercy is to be looked for after Death but only ſevere Juſtice; there is no middle place between Hell or Heaven. Hom. 14. upon Matthew.

He that reflects upon the joys of Heaven, will find it eaſy to practiſe Vertue. Hom. 16. upon Matthew.

The commandments of God are not impoſſible to thoſe that are wiling to keep them. Hom. 21. on Matthew. Nay, they are eaſy with God's grace. Hom. 56. and 76. on Matthew, and 87. upon St John.

Let him that is in the ſtate of Grace, not truſt too much to his own Strength, leſt he fall; neither let him that is fallen, deſpair. Hom. 26. and 67. on Matthew.

Spiritual advantages are to be preferr'd before thoſe things that otherwiſe ſeem to be moſt neceſſary. Hom. 26. upon Matthew.

A Man of an ill life, is worſe than a dead Man. Hom. 26. upon Matthew.

Paſſionate, intemperate, debauched, and covetous Men are worſe than thoſe that are poſſeſſed with the Devil. Hom. 28. upon Matthew.

The Yoke of Vertue is light and eaſy, that of Sin is heavy and troubleſome. Hom. 38. upon Matthew. and 88. upon John.

We ought to examine, and be ſorry for our faults, and not be concerned for thoſe of other Men. Hom. 24 upon Matthew, and 60. upon St. John.

One only Sin, one evil Action is ſufficient to condemn us eternally. Paſſim.

The ignominy of this World, is glory in the eyes of God. Paſſim.

This preſent life is death, and death is life. Paſſim.

Afflictions, Perſecutions, and Sickneſſes, are deſirable; but delights, pleaſures and joy are to be feared. Paſſim.

God's chaſtiſements are great benefits: The good things which he beſtows in this world are great temptations. Paſſim.

St. John Chryſoſtom.

Giving of alms is the trade that brings the greateſt profit. Paſſim.

Solitarineſs and a Monaſtick life, are more to be deſired than the greateſt Kingdoms. Paſſim.

True Soveraignty conſiſts in commanding our own Paſſions. Paſſim.

It is an effect of God's bounty, that the execution of Precepts, which are neceſſary to our Salvation, does not depend upon the weakneſs of our Bodies. Hom. in illud, Modico vino utere.

Sorrow is the product of Sin, and ſorrow takes away Sin: That which was the penalty of Sin is become the ſalvation of Man. Sin brought weakneſs into the World. and ſorrow hath deſtroy'd Sin. Hom. 1. de jejun.

Our Worſhip is not like that of the Jews, which was loaded with many Ceremonies, and needed much preparation. He that went into the Temple to pray, was to buy Pigeons, to carry Wood, Fire, a Knife, and a Victim. Chriſtians want no ſuch things: In every place they have an Altar, a Knife, and a Victim; or rather they themſelves are the Altar, the Prieſt, and the Victim. In what place, or what condition ſoever they are, they may offer their Souls to God. Hom. 4. de Anna.

Man ſhall be puniſhed for his Sins, either in this world, or in the next: He ought to be puniſhed here, to prevent puniſhment hereafter. Serm. 5. de Lazaro.

Ignorance of the Scripture makes Hereſies. Serm. 3. de Lazaro.

Theſe are ſome of thoſe Maxims wherewith St. Chryſoſtom filleth his Diſcourſes; but he enlargeth upon them with ſuch abundance, expoundeth them with ſo great Eloquence, and purſues them whith ſo great ſtrength, that it is impoſſible to diſcover their beauty without reading them in their Original. In reading of theſe Sermons, all Preachers ought to ſpend their time, and not in the Sermons of Modern Authors; which, for the moſt part, are full of nothing but empty Allegories, falſe notions, forced Declamations, unprofitable Queſtions, affectations of Wit, Jingles, Antitheſes, and other things of this nature, that have no correſpondency with thoſe Evangelical truths, which ought be preached with maſculine and natural Eloquence.

But that St. Chryſoſtom's Works may be more eaſily read, and that the Editions which ſhould be uſed, may be known, I ſhall draw up a Catalogue of the moſt conſiderable.

The firſt Collections of St. Chryſoſtom's Works were made of the Verſions of his Principal Books.

The firſt was Printed at Baſle by Pfortzen anno 1504. There was another made in Germany by Cratander anno 1522. and one at Paris 1524. Theſe were followed by the Edition of Frobenius in five Volumes, anno 1533, and 1547. which laſt is larger and more correct. That of Venice in 1574, in five Volumes, by Hervetus, is better than the foregoing; but the moſt perfect of theſe ancient Latin Editions is that of Nivelle, in four Volumes in Folio, of 1581. which was made by the advice and care of the moſt learned Men of that Age; as Billius, Hervetus, Nobilius, Zinus, &c.

The firſt Greek Edition of all St. Chryſoſtom's Works, is the famous Edition of Eaton, procured by the care and vaſt labour of the learned Sir Henry Savil, who having made enquiry in all the Libraries of the World for the Books that went under St. Chryſoſtom's Name cauſed them to be Printed in a very fair Character, and very exactly, with very juſt, very learned and uſeful Notes. He diſtinguiſhed the Books that are St. Chryſoſtom's, from thoſe that are dubious or ſuppoſititious, and hath put them in an excellent order for a firſt Edition. It is divided into eight Volumes.

The firſt contains the 67 Homilies upon Geneſis, the Commentaries upon the Pſalms, and Iſaiah, the two Homilies upon the 50th. Pſalm, and Iſaiah, which he places among the doubtful Books, and the Expoſition of the 51ſt. 95th. and 100th. Pſalms, and ſo on to the 107th. and upon the 119th. which he placeth among the ſuppoſititious Writings.

The ſecond Volume contains the 90 Homilies upon St. Matthew, and the 88 upon St. John.

The third and the fourth comprehend all the Homilies upon St. Paul.

The fifth hath ſixty two Sermons upon ſeveral particular paſſages of the Holy Scripture, and thirty four other Sermons upon the Saints or Feſtival days, with ſeventy three Sermons upon ſeveral ſubjects which he ranks among the ſuppoſititious Books.

The ſixth Volume is made up of the Treatiſes of St. Chryſoſtom, the Homilies againſt the Jews, that of God's incomprehenſibility, the Sermon of Anathema, his Sermon after he was ordained Prieſt, the twenty two Diſcourſes about Statues, and ſeveral other Sermons upon divers ſubjects, and particularly of Penance, Faſting, Alms-deeds, and other Chriſtian Vertues. At the latter end there are ſome Homilies which he puts among the Collections, that were anciently made out of St. Chryſoſtom, and ſome ſuppoſititious Sermons, with the Liturgy, and two Prayers to God.

The ſeventh Volume begins with a Diſcourſe upon the ſcandal of certain Perſons, cauſed by the Perſecution and Malice of ſome Prieſts. After this is the Treatiſe wherein he proves that none is offended but by himſelf, ſeventeen Letters to the Widow Olympias, and two hundred forty three Letters to his Friends, with five Letters of Conſtantius the Prieſt, and a hundred and five Sermons, which falſly bear St. Chryſoſtom's Name, the Authors whereof are not certainly known. Theſe Sermons are followed by other Diſcourſes of known Authors, viz. Six Homilies of Severianus of Gabala upon Geneſis, the Homily of John the Faſter about Penance, the Homily upon the Epiphany aſcribed to St. Gregory Thaumaturgus, the Homily of the Croſs, by Pantaleon a Monk of Conſtantinople, and forty eight Homilies upon ſeveral Points of Morality, collected out of St. Chryſoſtom's works by Theodorus. That Volume endeth with ſeven Prayers of St. Chryſoſtom, which are in Latin, the three laſt of them are ſuppoſititious.

St. John Chryſoſtom.

The laſt Volume containeth ſome ſupplements of Books Printed in the other Volumes, the ſeven Orations, in praiſe of St. Paul, the Sermons upon Eutropius, upon the deſign which Men ought to have in Preaching, and upon ſome other Subjects. The Appendix to this Volume, hath ſeveral Books which are ſomething like St. Chryſoſtom's. The firſt is an Anſwer in Theodorus's Name, to an Exhortation made by St. Chryſoſtom: Which is certainly ſpurious. The ſecond and third are two Diſcourſes of Libanius to Theodoſius, upon the Sedition at Antioch. After theſe Diſcourſes follow the Extracts which Photius hath taken out of St. Chryſoſtom and Iſidore Peluſiota's Letters in Commendation of this Father. The Life of St. Chryſoſtom takes up a good part of this Volume: There are thoſe that were written by George of Alexandria, the Panegyrick by Leo the Emperour, the Life of St. Chryſoſtom by an Anonymous Author, that of Simeon Metaphraſtes.

The various Readings, Conjectures, Reſtitutions, and Notes of Savil, Bois, and Downs conclude the Volume, with a very uſeful Table of St. Chryſoſtom's Books, by their beginnings diſpoſed in an Alphabetical Order. Another Table upon the Notes, and an Errata upon all the Volumes.

Almoſt at the ſame time that Sir. H. Savil was at work in England, to publiſh an Edition of the Original Text of St. Chryſoſtom's works, Fronto Ducæus labour'd in France, to Print them in Greek and Latin. He Printed at Paris, Anno 1609. the firſt Volume which contains the twenty one Sermons of Statues, and fifty ſix others, with Notes at the end. In the ſame Year came out a ſecond Volume containing the Homilies and Sermons upon Geneſis, the five Sermons concerning Hannah and Samuel, three Homilies upon David and Saul, a Sermon againſt Idleneſs, a Tranſlation of St. Chryſoſtom's Life written by Palladius, a Latin Sermon of Continency, and ſome other Sermons in Latin with Notes. The third Volume Printed in 1614. contains the Homilies and Sermons upon the Pſalms, and the Commentary upon Iſaiah. The fourth Volume Printed the ſame Year, contains the Works and Letters of St. Chryſoſtom, his firſt Sermon, and two others upon his Exile; it ends with the Notes of Fronto Ducæus. The fifth Volume is a Collection of ſeventy Sermons upon ſeveral paſſages, both of the Old and New Teſtament, and upon ſome other ſubjects; it was Printed in 1616. The ſixth contains ſeventy three Sermons, which Fronto Ducæus does not attribute to St. Chryſoſtom; the Homilies made up of Collections taken out of St. Chryſoſtom by Theodorus, and the Notes by Fronto Ducæus. The works of St. Chryſoſtom upon the New Teſtament were not Printed then, becauſe they had been lately Printed by Commelinus in four Volumes. The firſt contains the Homilies of St. Chryſoſtom, and the imperfect Work upon St. Matthew, the ſecond, the Homilies upon St. John, the third the Homilies upon the Acts; and the laſt, the Homilies upon St. Paul, and the Commentary of Andreas Cæſarienſis upon the Revelations of St. John. Theſe Books are in the Greek and Latin Edition of St. Chryſoſtom, Printed at Paris in 1633, and divided into ſix Volumes, which is not ſo exact as the Edition of Commelinus, and the ſix firſt Volumes that were Printed in 1636, are not ſo exact as thoſe that were Printed before.

The Latin Edition of Ducæus printed at Paris in 1613. containeth, beſides the Books that are named already, a great many other Homilies which are not in the Greek, and which in all Likelihood were Compoſed by Latin Authors as we obſerv'd before. The Tranſlation was all Reviſed by Fronto Ducæus; it was Printed at Antwerp, and lately Printed at Lyons with ſome Additions. It is very ſtrange, that thoſe who took Care of this Edition, did not only leave the ſame confuſion that is in the others, but have even confounded it more, and loaded it with many uſeleſs things.

[Theſe are all the General Editions of St. Chryſoſtom's Works. I ſay nothing here of particular ones, whether Greek or Latin, of ſeveral of his Works, which are the Antiochus and Severianus of Gabala.

Antiochus, and Severianus of Gabala.

IN the days of St. Chryſoſtom there were two famous Preachers, who preached in his Church, in his Abſence; the firſt, Antiochus, was Biſhop of Ptolemais in Phœnicia; and the ſecond, Severianus, was Biſhop of Gabala in Cœloſyria. Antiochus came firſt to Conſtantinople, where having preached a long time, and got ſome Money, he returned to his Church. Severianus having heard that Antiochus was become rich by preaching at Court, reſolved to imitate him, and therefore went thither with ſeveral Sermons which he had prepared. He was well received by St. John Chryſoſtom, into whoſe favour he endeavoured at firſt to inſinuate himſelf, afterwards he grew acquainted with ſeveral Perſons of Quality, and got into the favour both of the Emperor and the Empreſs: and tho' he wanted Antiochus his parts, yet he got into great Eſteem and Reputation. St. Chryſoſtom being obliged (as hath been obſerved) to go into Aſia, to compoſe the Affairs of the Church of Epheſus, found not a Biſhop fitter to preach in his Abſence than Severianus of Gabala, whom he thought to be his Friend. But whether this Biſhop, taking occaſion of St. Chryſoſtom's Abſence, had a deſign to get into the Eſteem and Affection of the People of Conſtantinople to uſurp that See, or whether Serapion, St. Chryſoſtom's Archdeacon, had by his Letters begot in St. Chryſoſtom an Averſion to Severianus of Gabala as a Perſon that diſturbed the Peace of his Church, aiming at getting into his place; or laſtly, whether there was any ſecret Jealouſie betwixt them; theſe two Biſhops were never Friends ever afterwards. St. Chryſoſtom being come back, drove away Severianus, accuſing him of ſaying, that the Son of God was not made Man, becauſe that Biſhop finding that Serapion would not ſtand up before him had uttered theſe Words, If Serapion dies a Chriſtian, the Son of God is not made Man. This Serapion told St. Chryſoſtom, leaving out the firſt part, If Serapion dies a Chriſtian. But Severianus being well at Court, the Empreſs recalled him, and did all ſhe could to reconcile them, which St. Chryſoſtom refuſed to do, till the Empreſs intreated him for the ſake of Theodoſius her Grand-Child, whom ſhe laid at his Feet in the Church of the Apoſtles. St. Chryſoſtom (if Socrates may be credited) could not then reſiſt the intreaties of the Empreſs: but this Reconciliation was not ſincere, and both theſe Biſhops harboured ſtill an Averſion one to the other. And therefore, in the time of St. Chryſoſtom's Diſgrace, Severianus ſided with Theophilus, and the reſt of his Enemies to deſtroy him. This is the Account which Socrates gives of the Diſſention of Severianus of Gabala; Hiſt. Eccl. B. VI. cap. 11.

Antiochus, and Severianus of Gabala.

The Author of St. Chryſoſtom's Life accuſes this Hiſtorian of want of ſincerity upon this occaſion; But till we meet with another Hiſtorian of greater credit, ſetting forth the matter of Fact after another manner, we cannot reject this Relation, nor feign other Motives of Diſſention betwixt theſe two Biſhops, than thoſe related by Socrates, who lived near St. Chryſoſtom's time.

The ancient Tranſlator of ſome of St. Chryſoſtom's Homilies, Anianus obſerves, that Antiochus had, plauſibilem dicendi pompam, a pompous and lofty Stile, which got him the applauſe of the People. There is no doubt, but formerly they had ſeveral of his Sermons. Gennadius mentions but two of his Books: The former is a long Treatiſe againſt Covetouſneſs, and the latter a Diſcourſe upon the Miracle of the blind Man, to whom Jeſus Chriſt reſtored ſight, ſpoken of in the ninth Chapter of St. John's Goſpel: A work of Unction and Humility. Trithemius mentions ſeveral Sermons, and other unknown works of this Author. Theodoret quoteth a paſſage of his, but does not Name the Book where he found it, the words are theſe. That if we do not confound the two Natures in Chriſt, there will be no difficulty in underſtanding the Myſtery of the Incarnation. Gelaſius in his Book of the two Natures, citeth alſo ſome places of Antiochus upon the Incarnation, taken out of his Sermons upon the Nativity, Eaſter, againſt Hereticks, and from another Sermon. Laſtly, Poſſevinus tells us, that there were ſome Homilies of this Author in the Mediceam Library at Florence. I don't know whether they were ever publiſhed.

Severianus of Gabala was leſs eloquent, dryer, and more barren, than Antiochus. Socrates obſerves, that he pronounced the Greek Language ill, becauſe he ſtill kept ſome thing of the Syriack Accent. Gennadius ſays, that he had read a Commentary of this Author, upon the Epiſtle to the Galatians, and a Treatiſe upon the Feſtival of Chriſt's Baptiſm, and the Ephiphany.

We have obſerved already, that among St. Chryſoſtom's works there are ſeveral Sermons, which in all appearance belong to Severianus of Gabala, and among the reſt a Diſcourſe of the Seals, and upon the brazen Serpent, which are quoted by Theodoret, under the Name of Severianus of Gabala, and several others in the same Stile, whereof we have given a Catalogue amongst St. Chrysostom's Works: To these we may joyn the Homily upon Christ's Nativity, which is in the fifth Volume of the Eaton Edition of St. Chrysostom's Works, Pag. 843. and the Sermon of the Cross in Greek in the same Volume, Page. 891. which afterwards was printed in Greek and Latin by Father Combefis, cited by St. Damascen, in the third Discourse of Images, under the Name of Severianus of Gabala. We have also six Sermons of the same Man upon the Creation of the World, Printed in Greek in the Eaton Edition of St. Chrysostom, and in Greek and Latin in the last Volume of the Supplement to the Bibliotheca Patrum, by Father Combefis. Severianus observes in the Preface, that all the Books of the Holy Scripture have the Salvation and Benefit of Men for their ultimate end: but that the Book of Genesis is the Ground and Fountain of all the Truths, both in the Law and in the Prophets, because it containeth the History of the World's Creation, without which God's Works cannot be known. He adds, that he very well knew that several Fathers had written of that Matter, but that did not discourage him from Writing upon the same Subject, since the latter Writers were not discouraged by the Discourses of the Former: That he pretended not to destroy what others had done, but to add such things as might serve for the Edification of the Church: At last, he desireth his Auditors, not to enquire whether his Notions be new, but only whether they are right: In prosecution of the same Subject he saith, that Genesis is an History written by the Law-giver Moses, and dictated by the Holy Ghost who Inspired him: That tho' it be a Narration, yet it may be called a Prophecy, because that, as there are three sorts of Prophecies, the first of Writings, the second of Actions, and the third of both: So likewise there are three parts of each Prophecy: That the first respects the present, the second what is to come, and the third what is past. Men Prophesie upon the present, when they discover what is designed to be kept from them: as Elisha did, who knew Gehazi's wickedness: Men prophesie upon the future, when what is to come is foretold. And there are also Prophecies of what is past, when by Divine Inspiration things already past are written, whereof no knowledge was had otherwise. In this Sence Severianus saith, that Moses was a Prophet in the History of the World's Creation. He observes further, that Moses proposed to himself two things in his Writings, to teach, and to give Laws: That he began by Instruction in relating the Creation of the World, to teach Men that God having created them, had a Right to give them Laws and Precepts, For, saith he, had he not shew'd at first, that God is the Creator of the World, he could not have justified, that he was the Sovereign Law-giver of Men: because it is Tyranny to pretend to impose Laws upon those, that do not belong to us, whereas it is very natural to instruct such as depend upon us. He endeth this Preface by shewing the Reason, why Moses spake not of the Creation of Angels and Archangels: First, because it was not pertinent to his Subject: Secondly, because had he done it, there was danger that Men would have worshipped them.

Antiochus, and Severianus of Gabala.

Antiochus, and Severianus of Gabala.

After this he explains the Text of Genesis about the World's Creation, in a plain and literal way: He doth not enlarge upon the spiritual Sence, but rather finds fault with some Explications, as being too much Allegorical. But he maketh several trifling Reflections, as when he observes in the 5*th.* Homily, that the first Man was called Adam, a Word signifying Fire in the Hebrew, because that as this Element easily spreads and communicates it self, so the World was to be peopled with this first Man. Several other Notions of this Nature may be found in that Work, which have neither Beauty, nor Exactness, nor Truth. He answers the Arians and Anomæans. He observes in the fourth Homily, that all Heresies bear the Names of their Authors, whereas the true Church has none other Name, than that of Catholick Church. He enlargeth but little upon Morals; yet at the latter end of this fourth Homily he recommends Fasting, provided it be accompanied with Abstinence from Vices. In a Word, One may say that this whole Work, tho' full of Erudtion, yet is of no great Use, and deserveth not the Esteem of Men of true Judgment.

Father Combefis hath added to these Homilies some Fragments taken out of some Catena's upon the Scripture, attributed to this Author, and extracted out of his Commentaries upon Genesis, Leviticus, Numbers, Deutoronomy, and upon Joshua. But if these passages did not shew themselves to be written in Severianus his Stile, one could not affirm it upon the credit of these Catena's. One might with greater Confidence produce two passages of Severianus of Gabala upon the Incarnation, quoted by Gelasius in the Book of the two Natures, where he observes, that the first is taken out of a Discourse of this Bishop against Novatus.

ASTERIUS AMASENUS.

Asterius Amasenus.

ASterius (a) Bishop of Amasea, a City of Pontus, flourished at the latter end of the Fourth Century (b), and in the beginning of the Fifth. The Sermons of this Bishop have been quoted with Commendations by the Ancients (c). There is but a small number of them extant, collected by F. Combefis at the beginning of his first Volume of the Supplement to the Bibliotheca Patrum; the Five first were Printed formerly by Rubenius, who published them at Antwerp, Anno. 1698. and afterwards inserted into the Bibliotheca Patrum: The six following were lately published by F. Combefis, who joyned to them the Extracts made by Photius out of the Homilies of Asterius Amasenus, and a Discourse upon St. Stephen the Proto-Martyr, formerly published under the Name of Proclus.

The first Sermon is upon the Parable of Dives and Lazarus. He begins it with this Reflection; 'That our Saviour not only made use of Precepts to teach us Vertue, 'and to forbid Vice, but that he further proposed illustrious examples to instruct us in that way of Life, which 'we ought to follow.' Afterwards he sets down the Text of St. Luke's Gospel, making Moral Reflections upon each Verse.

Upon these Words, Verse 26. There was a rich Man which was Clothed with Purple and fine Linnen. He observes, that the Holy Scripture by these two Words, understands all Extravagancies of Riches, that the only use of Garments is to cover our Bodies, and defend them from the injuries of the Air: That God hath provided for this, by creating Beasts with Hair and Wool, whereof Stuffs are made to secure us both against cold weather, and the Beams of the Sun. That besides he hath given the Use of Flax for a greater Conveniency; That these things ought to be applyed to our Use, in giving God thanks, not only because he made us, but also because he has provided all necessaries, to cover and defend us from the injuries of the Season. 'But saith he, if you leave the Use of Wool and Lin-'nen, if you despise what God hath prepared, and to sa-'tisfie your Pride, you will have Silk Garments, thin like 'Cobwebs; if after this you hire a Man at a dear rate to 'take out of the Sea a small Fish, that you may may dye 'them in its Blood; Do you not act the parts of effeminate 'Men.

Asterius Amasenus.

He reproves those afterwards whose Garments were painted with several Figures, of Men, Beasts, and Flowers, and spares not those, who by a ridiculous Devotion, printed upon their Cloths some Godly Histories: As the Marriage of Cana in Galilee, the Sick of the Palsie in his Bed, the blind Man cured, the Woman that had an Issue of Blood, the Sinner at the feet of Jesus Christ, Lazarus raised again, Asterius speaks against this Practice after this Manner: If these Persons will believe me, let them sell those Cloths, and honour the true Images of God. Do not paint Jesus Christ, it is enough that he humbled himself by taking voluntarily a Body for us.... Paint not the Paralytick upon your Garments, but seek for the poor to succour them. It is to no purpose to look upon the Woman having the Issue of Blood, but it is very necessary to help this poor Widow. It signifies nothing to behold the sinful Woman at the feet of Jesus Christ, but it will signifie much to bewail your own Sins. What Good will the Picture of Lazarus his Resurection do you? Endeavour rather to rise spiritually. To what purpose do you wear upon your Backs the Image of him that was Born blind? Ease this blind Man rather. Why do you draw the Shrines of Relicks? rather feed the poor. And wherefore do you carry about you the Representation of those Water-Pots at the Marriage where our Saviour made Wine; while you suffer the poor to die for thirst? This passage hath been alledged by the Iconoclasts as favouring their Opinions. The Catholicks on the contrary have quoted another, taken out of an Homily of the

(a) ASterius] There were several of that Name. The oldest is an Heretick of Arius his Party, mentioned in the first Volume. There is another Asterius commended by Theodoret, in Philotheo, c. 2. but different from this, as well as the Catholick Bishop of the same Name, who lived in the time of St. Athanasius.

(b) Towards the latter end of the Fourth Century.] We have observed, That in the Sermon upon New-Years-Day, he speaks of Ruffinus his Death, and of Eutropius his Disgrace which he tells us happened the Year before, which justifyeth that he lived at the same time with St. Chrysostom.

(c) The Sermons of this Bishop have been quoted with Commendation by the Ancients.] He is cited in the Second Council of Nice, Act. 4. and 6. Photius made some Extracts out of his Works, Cod. 271. Hadrian in lib. de im. quotes his Homilies, and Nicephorus defends them against the Iconoclasts.

Aſterius Amaſenus.

ſame Authors concerning the Woman afflicted with the Iſſue of Blood, where he ſpeaks of the Statue of Jeſus Chriſt erected by the ſame Woman in Paneas, a Town of Paleſtine. But neither of theſe paſſages, belong to the queſtion betwixt the Catholicks, and the Iconoclaſts; for this which we have tranſcribed, is not againſt Images placed in Churches, but againſt the Fancy of particular Men, who trimmed their Habits with Figures, repreſenting ſome Hiſtories of the Bible; and that of the Statue of Jeſus Chriſt, ſet up by the Woman that was afflicted with the Iſſue of Blood, hath no Relation to the publick Service of Images.

But to return to our Sermon, Aſterius Amaſenus purſuant to his Subject, ſaith that Chriſtians ſhould beware of Luxury and Pleaſures, becauſe none can live in Pleaſure without Riches. But, ſaith he, It is impoſſible to heap up Riches without Sin. He excellently deſcribes all the things that are neceſſary to thoſe that ſeek their pleaſure, and having numbred them, he adds, 'To have theſe things, how many poor 'Men muſt ſuffer? how many Orphans muſt be ruined? 'how many Widows muſt have weeping Eyes? and how 'many Perſons muſt be brought to the utmoſt Miſery? A 'Soul taken up with theſe, forgets her ſelf, remembers not 'what ſhe is, thinks not upon Death, nor a Reſurrection, 'nor Eternity. And when the fatal and unavoidable mo'ment comes, that the Soul is ready to ſeparate from the 'Body, then a Remembrance of the life paſt will be of 'little uſe: She then will think of Repentance, but it will 'be to no purpoſe. For then only will Repentance be a'vailable, when there is a Reſolution of correcting our 'former Life. And regret and ſorrow for Sin ſeem to be 'of no uſe, when a Man is not in a condition either to do 'good or to practiſe Vertue.' The reſt of this Homily is a literal and moral Explication of that Parable, full of ſolid Notions, and Natural Reflections.

There is not leſs Eloquence in the ſecond Sermon of this Author, upon another Parable of St. Luke's Goſpel, concerning that Steward whom his Maſter called to an account for his Adminiſtration and for his Goods. It beginneth with this Maxim; That moſt Men's Sins proceed from an opinion that the Goods which they poſſeſs are their own, and that they are abſolute Maſters of them; That this falſe perſuaſion is that which makes us go to Law, quarrel, and make War for the Wealth of this World, looking upon it as proper and convenient for us, and deſerving our Love and Eſteem. 'Yet, ſaith he, it is nothing ſo; on the 'contrary we are to look upon all which we have recei'ved, as none of ours; we are not Maſters of the things 'which we have at Home; we are like Pilgrims, Strangers, 'Baniſhed and Captives, carried whither we would not, 'at a time when we expect it leaſt, and at once we are 'ſtript of all, when the Sovereign Diſpenſer of our for'tune pleaſeth.' This Notion he enlargeth upon in his Expoſition of the Parable of the unjuſt Steward. There one may find excellent Sentences, upon the contempt that Men ſhould caſt upon Riches, and upon the uncertainty of this preſent Life. He inſiſts particulary upon proving that Men are not owners, but Stewards of their Wealth; and from this Principle he concludes, that as many as have received of God ſuch good things ought to diſtribute them faithfully, and be always ready, yea even deſirous, to give God an Account. And at laſt he obſerves, that after Death there will be no time for Repentance. That this Life is the proper time to keep God's Commandments in, as the other is of enjoying the Reward of good Works.

The third Sermon againſt Covetouſneſs was preached by St. Aſterius in one of thoſe Aſſemblies which were made in Churches to celebrate the Feſtival of ſome of the Martyrs. This Homily is full of very natural Deſcriptions of the Hard-heartedneſs of covetous Men. Covetouſneſs in his Opinion, doth not conſiſt only in the unjuſt deſire of having that which is another's, but in a deſire of having more than we ought to have. According to this Notion, it is eaſie to find in the Scriptures ſeveral Examples of covetous Men; and having produced them, he ſheweth, that all other Vices waſte with time: but that the older a man grows the more covetous he is. This Remark is followed by a Deſcription of a covetous Man, where he omits none of thoſe Characters that can make him appear miſerable, and render him odious to all the World. He proveth that Covetouſneſs is the Spring and Cauſe of all the Crimes and Sins committed in the World. And in ſhort, he ſhews that it is to no purpoſe to be concerned for this World's Goods: but far better to put all our truſt and confidence in God's providence and mercy.

The fourth Sermon is againſt the profane Feſtival of the firſt day in the Year, and againſt the cuſtom of New-years-gifts. Aſterius Amaſenus declaimeth againſt that Practice. 'He ſaith, 'That the Liberalities of that day have no rational Ground; 'that they cannot be called Tokens of Friendſhip, becauſe 'true Friendſhip is not grounded upon Intereſt; that neither 'can they be called Alms, ſince the Poor partake not of 'them; that they are not of the Nature of Contracts, ſee'ing there is neither loan nor exchange in that Traffick. 'In a word, that they are not pure Gifts, ſince there is a ne'ceſſity of giving them. What Name then, ſaith he, can 'be given to the Expenſe of that day? The Church gives a 'Reaſon for all the Feaſts which it celebrates. It keeps the 'Feaſt of Chriſtmas, becauſe upon that day God made him'ſelf known unto Men. At Candlemas it rejoyceth, be'cauſe we are drawn out of the obſcurity of Darkneſs 'wherein we lay. Laſtly, we celebrate with Joy, Pomp, 'and Alacrity the day of the Reſurrection, for as much as 'this day repreſents unto us the Immortality which we are 'to enjoy. Theſe are the Reaſons which the Church hath 'to keep Feaſts, and there are the like for the celebrating 'of all the reſt: But what Reaſon can be given for the 'Feſtival of New-Years-Day, and for the profuſion then 'practiſed? O Folly! O Impertinence! At that day every 'one runs with a deſign to get another Man's goods. 'Thoſe that give, do it with grief, and they that receive 'Preſents do not keep them, but beſtow them upon others. 'One ſends to his Patron, what he received of his Client: 'Another makes his Compliment to receive Money. The 'poor give to the rich, and inferior people ſend Preſents to 'the great ones. As Brooks make ſmall Rivers, which at 'laſt fall into great ones; in like manner the Preſents which 'the common People make to thoſe above them, do all turn 'to the profit of great Lords, upon whom they beſtow 'them: And thus this Feaſt is the beginning of Miſeries, 'and the overwhelming of the poor. Farmers and La'bourers are conſtrained to give to their Landlords; if they 'fail, they are abuſed. Miſerable People run like Fools 'through the Streets, asking from Door to Door, deaf'ning every Body with their Noiſe and Cries. Itis a day 'of Riot for Soldiers. The Conſuls and Governours hav'ing made themſelves rich with the Pay due to Soldiers, 'the Spoyls of Widows, and the publick Treaſury, hav'ing got Money by ſelling Juſtice, by ſhameful Contracts, 'by diſtributing this Money to Fidlers, Stage-Players, 'Dancers, and Comedians, lewd Women, and baſe Fel'lows, are at this Expenſe to feed their Vanity. O Folly! 'O Blindneſs! God promiſes an eternal reward to thoſe 'who diſtribute to the poor, but theſe rather chuſe to 'ſpend fooliſhly, that they may get a vain and tranſitory 'Glory. But after all, what is the end of all that Vanity? 'what figure ſoever any can make in this World, the end 'is always a Grave that buryeth Men in eternal oblivion.'

Aſterius Amaſenus.

He deſcribes here the fatal end of Ruffinus, and Eutropius, who juſt before were deprived both of their Dignities and of their Eſtates, and concludes with theſe words of the wiſe Man: Vanity of Vanities. 'Dignities, ſaith he, 'are Dreams and Viſions, which vaniſh after having given 'ſome kind of delight for a very ſhort time: They are 'Flowers, that dry on a ſudden, having flouriſhed for a 'while.'

The fifth Sermon is about Divorce. Aſterius ſhews there by ſeveral Reaſons that Men are not to put away their Wives, yet he excepteth Adultery, and ſaith, 'that if a 'Man puts away his Wife for Adultery, inſtead of taking 'her again, he commends him for avoiding a Perſon who 'by violating Chaſtity hath broken the indiſſoluble bond 'of Marriage. He obſerves, that the Law of the Goſpel 'is the ſame for Men as for Women; but that the Ro'man Laws, have not obſerved the ſame Equity; not per'mitting Wives to leave their Husbands, but only 'Husbands to put away their Wives. The Reaſon commonly alledged of this difference, is that Husbands do not prejudice their Wives, in committing Adultery, whereas by this Crime, Wives do introduce into Families other Men's Children, and make them Heirs, who have no manner of right. Aſterius ſticks not to ſay, that this Reaſon is impertinent, becauſe Men abuſing either Virgins or Wives, overthrow and diſhonour their reſpective Families, and wrong their Parents and their Husbands very conſiderably.

The ſixth Sermon upon the Hiſtory of Suſanna, is full of curious moral Notions. This is one. 'A Man overtaken 'with a Sin is often drawn by that firſt Crime into all ſorts 'of Iniquity, as on the contrary one Vertue is the cauſe of 'another.'

The ſeventh Sermon is upon the miraculous Cure of the Man that was born blind, he exalts the greatneſs of the Miracle, and draws an Argument for Chriſt's Divinity from it.

The eighth is a Panegyrick in Commendation of St. Peter, and St. Paul; he ſhews there how wonderful their Miracles were, and in ſeveral places eſtabliſheth St. Peter's Primacy amongſt the Apoſtles. 'All the Apoſtles, ſaith he, 'muſt give place to St. Peter, and confeſs, that he alone 'deſerveth the firſt rank, if a compariſon of the Graces 'God gave to the Apoſtles, is a Token of Priority of Ho'nour.'

The following Sermon is a Diſcourſe in commendation of Phocas the Martyr. He affirms in the Preface, that a remembrance of the Actions of Saints, and of the Martyrs engagements, is one of the moſt powerful Arguments that can be, to encourage Chriſtians to Piety and Vertue. He addeth that for this Reaſon they kept their Relicks, that they are expoſed to ſight in Shrines, that their Feaſts are kept, and Churches built to their Honour, to refreſh the memory of their generous Actions. Afterwards he relates the Life of

Phocas

Aſterius Amaſenus.

Phocas the Martyr, in a very plain and natural manner, without any mixture of ſuch Hiſtories as are rather miraculous than rational. He ends, with the Honours that were paid to that Saint. He ſays, that the memory of him was famous in the Country, where his Body lay; That at Rome he was reſpected almoſt as much St. Peter and St. Paul, and that his head was had in great Veneration. Aſterius tells us that the Martyr Phocas, he ſpeaketh of, was born as Sinope, and a Gardiner by Profeſſion, without mentioning that he was a Biſhop. This is it perhaps, which hath occaſioned the diſtinction of two Phocas's Martyrs. The one martyr'd under Trajan, whoſe Feaſt is kept July 14. and the other ſimply a Martyr; whoſe remembrance is celebrated on the 5th. of March. The Greeks mention them both upon the 22d. of September. Perhaps it is but one and the ſame Man, whoſe Hiſtory hath been variouſly reported. For both are ſuppoſed to have been of Sinope, and the ſame Miracles are aſcribed to both. Be it as it will, Seamen choſe this Saint for their Patron, as Aſterius obſerves at the latter end of this Homily.

The tenth Sermon in Commendation of Martyrs, was preached in an Aſſembly, met together for the Honour of the Martyrs. He begins with this reflection. 'Very often 'we receive much Good from our greateſt Enemies unawares. Had not Satan perſecuted the Church, we ſhould 'have had no Martyrs. He afterwards obſerves, that Martyrs are not only Patterns of Vertue, but alſo Accuſers of 'Vice. And this, ſaith he, is thus to be underſtood. A 'Martyr hath conſtantly endured fire and flame, why will 'you not tame the heat of luſt with chaſtity? A Martyr 'hath not regarded all the Wealth of the World, wherefore do you not deſpiſe a ſmall Sum for the love of God? 'a Martyr hath put off his own Body for God's ſake, why 'then will ye not part with the meaneſt Garment to cover 'a poor Man? We ought either to Honour and imitate 'the Saints as our Maſters or fear them as our Accuſers. 'Out of Honour to Martyrs, we preſerve their Relicks 'with veneration, looking upon them as Veſſels of Benediction, Organs of bleſſed Souls, and aſſured Pledges of 'their Good-will. The Churches are guarded by the Martyrs, as by ſo many Soldiers. The afflicted make Addreſſes to them, and with confidence implore their Interceſſion. It cureth Diſeaſes, comforteth in Poverty, and appeaſeth the anger of Princes. Finally the Churches of 'Martyrs are an Harbour in a ſtorm, and a refuge in all 'Miſeries. The Father whoſe Child is ſick, prayeth unto God for his Cure by the Interceſſion of a Martyr, 'ſaying, You Holy Martyr that ſuffered for Jeſus Chriſt interceed for us. You who can addreſs to God with greater Boldneſs, carry this Word for your fellow Servants. Tho' you are no longer in the World, yet you know the Pains and Afflictions of this Life. Your ſelves have formerly pray'd to the Martyrs, before you were Martyrs, they heard you when you intreated them, now that you can bear us grant us our requeſts. But leaſt ignorant Perſons ſhould yield to Martyrs the Honour which belongs only to God, he adds, 'We do 'not adore the Martyrs, but we honour them as Gods's 'Servants. We honour not Men, but admire them: 'We lay up their Relicks in beautified Shrines, and we 'build magnificent Churches to their Memory, to render 'them the ſame Honour in the Church, that is given in the 'World to thoſe that have done famous Actions.' He goeth on to eſtabliſh this Principle in the reſt of this Diſcourſe, where he ſpeaks ſo ſtrongly of the worſhip of Saints and Martyrs againſt ſuch as deſpiſe them, that it gives occaſion of ſuſpicion whether this be not of a younger Age, than that of Aſterius Amaſenus.

The eleventh Sermon is a Panegyrick upon St. Euphemia cited in the ſeventh General Council, Act. 4. and by Photius. It ſeemeth not to me to be of Aſterius Amaſenus his ſtile. The Author relateth the Hiſtory of that Saint, and obſerves, that ſhe was repreſented upon a winding-ſheet that was near her Grave.

After theſe Sermons come thoſe Extracts produced by Photius, Vol. 271. The firſt is taken out of a Sermon of Penance upon the ſinful Woman, among the Works, of Gregory Nyſſen, to whom he aſcribed it in the ſecond Volume of his Bibliotheca; but after ſerious reflection, I have found that it is more likely to be written by Aſterius Amaſenus.

The ſecond Extract is taken out of the Sermon upon St. Stephen, among Proclus's Sermons. It differs from that which St. Gregory Nyſſen, made upon that Subject, tho' I confounded them in the ſecond Volume.

The third is taken out of the Homily upon the Parable of the Traveller, who going to Jericho, was taken and wounded by Thieves, Luk. 10. He ſuppoſeth that this Accident was real, and that Jeſus Chriſt makes uſe of it to inform the Jews of the greatneſs of his Charity and Mercy. This wounded Man going down to Jericho, is the Figure of Adam, who by his Sin fell from the happy State wherein he was created and at the ſame time cauſed the Fall of all Mankind. The Levite and the Prieſt are Moſes and St. John, who finding this Man, that is all Mankind deſtitute of Grace, Vertue and Piety, and wounded by his Enemies, did indeed look upon him with Compaſſion, but could not cure him. That the Samaritan is Jeſus Chriſt, who carries a Treaſure of Grace, hidden, till the time of the New-Law. This Expoſition of the Parable is pretty exact ſo far, but the Compariſon he makes afterwards, betwixt the Body of Jeſus Chriſt and the Horſe that carried the Samaritan is hardly tolerable, Becauſe, ſaith he the Body of Jeſus Chriſt is as it were the Vehicle of the Divinity.

Aſterius Amaſenus.

The fourth Extract of Photius is taken out of an Homily upon the Prayers of the Phariſee and of the Publican, ſpoken of Luk. ch. 18. Here is an excellent Definition of Prayer. 'Prayer is a conference with God, a forgetting of 'earthly things, and an Aſcenſion into Heaven. He that pray-'eth ſtanding with his hands lifted up to Heaven, doth by 'this poſture of his Body repreſent the Croſs; and if he 'prayeth with the Heart, and Prayer is acceptable to God, 'he hath the Croſs in his Heart. For Prayer extinguiſhes 'in him the Deſires of the Fleſh, the love of Riches, and 'puts off from his Spirit the thoughts of Pride and Vani-'ty. He addeth, That Vain Glory corrupts the beſt Acti-'ons, as Prayer, Faſting, and Alms, &c. and renders them 'unprofitable.'

The fifth Extract is out of the Homily upon the Hiſtory of Zacchæus, it containeth nothing conſiderable.

The ſixth is upon the Parable of the Prodigal Son. He ſaith that the Father ſpoken of in that Parable repreſents the Father of Eternity; that the two Sons are two ſorts of Men; that the Prodigal Child is a Figure of thoſe that have loſt the Grace of Baptiſm; that the Portion of Goods which he deſires of his Father, is the Grace of Baptiſm, and the Participation of the Body of Jeſus Chriſt; that this Child doth indeed ask it well, but does not keep it, but goes into a foreign Country, that is, he departeth from God's Commandments; that the Devil is that Citizen and Prince who commandeth the Swine, that is debauched Perſons; that this Sinner at laſt acknowledging his Fault, cometh back to God his Father, but with fear and confeſſing his unworthineſs; that the Father full of Compaſſion and Mercy, receiveth him, embraceth, and puts upon him new Robes; that theſe new Robes cannot be Baptiſm which cannot be received a ſecond time, but Repentance, which is inſtead of Baptiſm, and which blotting out our Sins with tears, makes us clean and acceptable to God; that the Ring afterwards given to this Prodigal Child, is the Seal of the Holy Ghoſt, which is given in Repentance as well as in Baptiſm.

The ſeventh Extract is of a Sermon upon the Cure of the Centurion's Servant. Photius ſaith that Aſterius upon occaſion of that Hiſtory, treateth of the Duties of Maſters and Servants; that he adviſeth Servants to obey their Maſters readily and heartily; and exhorteth their Maſters to uſe them with Meekneſs and Bounty, looking upon them as Brethren. 'For, ſaith he, they are made of the ſame 'Mould with us, they have the ſame Creator, the ſame Na-'ture, the ſame Paſſions; they have a Body and a Soul as 'we have, &c.' The Homily at the beginning of the Faſt, from which Photius hath taken out the eighth Extract, is in Latin among the Works of St. Gregory Nyſſen. I now confeſs, that it rather belongs to Aſterius, than to that Father.

The ninth Extract is of the Homily upon the Man born blind, which we have entire.

The tenth is upon the Woman having an Iſſue of Blood. There he ſpeaks of the Hiſtory of the Statue, which that Woman cauſed to be ſet up in Honour of Jeſus Chriſt in the City of Paneas.

This is all that F. Combefis hath collected of the Works of Aſterius Amaſenus: but ſince that Cotelerius in the ſecond Volume in his Eccleſiaſtical Monuments, hath given us three Homilies upon Pſalm. 5, 6, and 7. which he aſcribeth to Aſterius Amaſenus, upon the Authority of two Catenæ upon the Pſalms. He obſerves that before theſe Homilies there was one upon Pſalm 4. Printed in the ſeventh Volume of the Eaton Edition of St. Chryſoſtom, pag. 431. which he likewiſe attributeth to the ſame Aſterius. I confeſs I miſtruſt very much the Quotations of theſe Catenæ, and I ſhould rather believe, that theſe Commentaries belong to Aſterius the Philoſopher; who according to the Teſtimony of the Ancients, writ a Commentary upon the Pſalms, than to the Biſhop of Amaſea, who is not ſaid to have writen upon that Subject. Cotelerius pretends that the Conformity both of Stile and Doctrine demonſtrate that theſe Homilies were written by Aſterius Amaſenus. But tho' I pay a great deference to the Judgment of that learned Man, yet I find no ſuch Reſemblance; however I would not be believed upon my own Word, but leave it to thoſe to judge, who will take the pains to compare them.

The Stile of Aſterius Amaſenus is plain, but with a great deal of natural Beauty. His Characters and Deſcriptions are excellent: His Sermons would be eſteemed in this Age, where thoſe things are extreamly valued. He is very ſevere in his Morals; the Reflections he makes are exact and ſolid. He explains the Scripture-Parables after an ingenious manner, and draws from them very uſeful Thoughts. He Aſterius Amaſenus. doth not excite his Auditors by Violent Motions as great Orators do; but inſinuates into their Minds Chriſtian Truths, by his agreeable and natural way of propoſing them: and inſenſibly begets in them an Abhorrency of Vice, and Love of Vertue, only by a bare Picture lively drawn. Aſterius Amaſenus.

ANASTASIUS.

Anaſtaſius ANaſtaſius was choſen Biſhop of Rome, after the Death of Pope Siricius, Anno. 398. He was an illuſtrious Perſon, as commendable for neglecting his private Intereſt, as for his Paſtoral Vigilance. Under his Pontificate, Flavianus and the Eaſtern Biſhops were reconciled to the Church of Rome, and to the other Weſtern Churches. The buſineſs of the Origeniſts making a great noiſe in the Church, he thonght it his duty to declare his Senſe of that matter: He therefore made a Decree after the Example of Theophilus, whereby he condemned both the Works and the Perſon of Origen, and being informed that Ruffinus the Prieſt was his chief Defender, he cited him to come to Rome, and appear before him: But Ruffinus deferring to appear, he condemned him as an Heretick in the Year 401. at the Sollicitation of a Lady called Marcella, who produced Evidences againſt him her ſelf, and ſhewed the Errors that he had left in the Tranſlation of the Books of Origen's Principles, as St. Jerome ſays, Ep. 16.

John of Jeruſalem having heard of this Judgment, writ him a very civil Letter, wherein after abundance of Commendations he ſpake in Ruffinus his behalf. Anaſtaſius, having returned him thanks for his Compliments, anſwered, that he could not but condemn Ruffinus his conduct, becauſe he had tranſlated the Books of Origen's Principles, with a Deſign that the People ſhould read them as Catholick Books, that the fear he was in leſt they ſhould corrupt the Doctrine of the faithful in his Church, obliged him to condemn them: that he was informed that the Emperors had made an Edict to forbid the reading of Origen's Works: That Ruffinus having approved in this Tranſlation the Opinions of Origen, deſerved to be treated after the ſame manner, as he that firſt publiſhed them. Laſtly, he declares, that he will hear no more of him; that he might ſeek for Abſolution where he pleaſed, for his part he looked upon him as an excommunicated Perſon. Anaſtaſius

This is the only true Letter of Anaſtaſius, the two others were written by Iſidore. The firſt directed to the German, and Burgundian Biſhops is dated fourteen Years before Anaſtaſius was Pope. Thoſe of Burgundy to whom it is directed, were not then converted. It is made up of ſeveral paſſages of the Letters of Innocent, St. Leo and Flavianus, &c. It is full of Faults, and far from the Stile of the true Anaſtaſius. The ſecond addreſſed to Nectarius, is dated fourteen Years after Anaſtaſius his Death, and is taken out of Innocent, St. Leo, Gregory, &c.

We have not the firſt Synodical Letter of Anaſtaſius, wherein he condemned Origen's Books, nor the Letter wherein he cited Ruffinus, nor that directed to Venerius of Milan, whereof he ſpeaks in his Letter to John. It is believed, that he writ a Treatiſe of the Incarnation directed to Urſinus, whereof ſome Fragments are found at the latter end of Liberatus's Breviary. But it is certain, that they belong to Anaſtaſius. This Pope died in the Beginning of the Year 402. and left Innocent his Succeſſor.

CHROMATIUS, Biſhop of Aquileia.

Chromatius, Biſhop of Aquileia. CChromatius, Biſhop of Aquileia whom St. Jerome in his Preface to the Chronicles, calleth the moſt Holy and Learned Biſhop of his time, writ and preached ſeveral Sermons. There is but one Diſcourſe of his extant upon the Beatitudes, upon Chriſt's Sermon on the Mount, and upon the Words of St. John to Jeſus Chriſt, I ought to be Baptized of thee. Which probably is a Fragment of a Commentary, compoſed by this Saint upon the whole Goſpel of St. Matthew. He explaineth the Letter of the Goſpel, inſiſting particularly upon the Moral Precepts thereof. In the Expoſition of what the Goſpel ſaith, concerning Divorces, he ſeems to have believed, that a Man might marry another Wife, after being divorced for the cauſe of Adultery, but he condemneth thoſe that abandon their Wives upon any other account, and marry again, tho' he confeſſeth that Human Laws allowed it, He expounds the Lord's Prayer, and recommends the Exerciſe thereof, the Love of our Neighbour, Alms-deeds, Faſting, and other Vertues ſpoken of in Chriſt's Sermon upon the Mount. In the laſt Fragment he diſcourſeth of the Efficacy of Chriſt's Baptiſm. Chromatius, Biſhop of Aquileia

The Stile of this Author is not very lofty, but his Words are well choſen, his Notions juſt, his Expoſitions literal, and his Reflections uſeful. He was one of the moſt Famous Biſhops of the Weſt, and held Correſpondence with the learneſt Men of his Time. He is one of the Three to whom St. Chryſoſtom directed the Letter, to demand help of the Weſtern Biſhops: and he ſubſcribed the Letters written for him to the Eaſt. His Works were printed by themſelves at Baſil in 1528. and at Lovain in 1548. and afterwards in the Bibliotheca Patrum: I ſay nothing of a Letter bearing the Name of Chromatius directed to St. Jerome, in which he deſires to have the Martyrology of Euſebius; It being certain, that both this Letter, and the pretended Anſwer of St, Jerome are ſpurious, as Baronius evidently proves in the ſeventh Chapter of his Preface to the Roman Martyrology.

GAUDENTIUS, Biſhop of Breſcia.

Gaudentius, Biſhop of Breſcia. SAint Philaſtrius, Biſhop of Breſcia, who compoſed the Book of Hereſies mentioned in the foregoing Century, dying in 386. In the Year 387, the Biſhops of the Province, together with St. Ambroſe, did, with the conſent of the People, chuſe for his Succeſſor Gaudentius, who was gone to travel in the Eaſt; but fearing, leſt he ſhould abide in the Eaſt, dreading the burthen of the Epiſcopal Charge, they not only ſent Deputies to him, with a Letter to deſire his Return; but wrote a Letter beſides to the Eaſtern Biſhops to intreat them that they would not admit him to the Communion, if he refuſed to come and govern the Dioceſs, of which he was choſen Biſhop. Whereby Gaudentius found himſelf obliged to accept of that Charge, and being come back, was ordained by St. Ambroſe and the Biſhops of his Province. Gaudentius, Biſhop of Breſcia.

All theſe Circumſtances are recorded in the Diſcourſe which he made to them immediately after his Ordination. He was but young when they choſe him, as he ſays, in the ſame place. He was one of the Deputies ſent to Conſtantinople in the 404, or 405. by the Weſtern Biſhops, to demand St. John Chryſoſtom's Re-eſtabliſhment in his See. Poſſibly he lived a great while afterwards.

To this Biſhop is attributed the Life of his Predeceſſor St. Philaſtrius, which Surius printed upon the eighteenth day of July. Yet I cannot believe that it is certainly his; but we find in the Bibliotheca Patrum nineteen Inſtructions, or Sermons, which are unqueſtionably Genuine, and which he collected himſelf, to ſend them to one Benevolus, one of the moſt conſiderable Men in Breſcia; who had formerly been Receiver of the Emperor's Memorials, and Injunctions, and who had quitted that Employment, that he might not be obliged to do any thing againſt his Conſcience in obedience to the Empreſs Juſtina, who countenanced the Arians, and perſecuted St. Ambroſe. Gaudentius, Biſhop of Breſcia.

This Benevolus was conſtant at Divine Service, and heard the Sermons of Gaudentius with Pleaſure; but having been hindred by Sickneſs from hearing thoſe which this Holy Biſhop preached at Eaſter, he prayed him to commit them to Writing; and to anſwer the Deſire of this Man, the Holy Biſhop did write his Sermons almoſt in the ſame Words that he preached them: He joyned to them four ſmall Treatiſes upon the ſame places of the Goſpel, and a fifth upon the Martyrdom of the Maccabees.

As to the other Sermons which the Copyers writ as Gaudentius was preaching, he will not own them for his, fearing that there may be ſome Errors in them; this Gaudentius declares in the beginning of his Preface: Afterwards he comforts Benevolus in his Sickneſs, ſhewing that God permits often Saints and righteous Men to be afflicted with Poverty and Sickneſſes, whereas he lets the wicked enjoy a perfect Health and much Wealth, becauſe both Puniſhments and Rewards are reſerved to the Day of Judgment: that in the mean time he inflicteth viſible Chaſtiſements upon the impious and refractory, to frighten others by their Puniſhments: but permits likewiſe the Righteous to be afflicted for three Reaſons, 1. to correct, 2. to purifie, and 3. to try them. The Severity he uſeth towards them is a Fatherly Severity. He ſends them Affliction, to manifeſt their Vertue both to Men and Angels, and ſo all the Sufferings of the Righteous are either for their Profit, or for their their Glory. Whoſoever honoureth, and loveth God truly, thinks himſelf happy in the midſt of Tribulations, and bleſſeth God for all that happeneth to him.

The firſt of thoſe Sermons preached on Eaſter-Eve, is directed to the Catechumens that were to be baptized: He begins it with a Thought that is rather ſubtle than ſolid, to give a Reaſon why Eaſter is celebrated in the Spring, after the ill Weather of Autumn, and the ſeverity of Winter, and before the heat of Summer. It is, ſaith he, to ſhow that Jeſus Chriſt the Sun of Righteouſneſs, diſſipates by his light the Darkneſs of Jewiſh Errors, and ſoftens the hardneſs of the Heathens Hearts, by preventing with his Beams, the hot Fire of the Judgment of the great Day. He adds, that the World having been created in the Spring, it is juſt that it ſhould be repaired in the ſame ſeaſon. Afterwards he compareth the Chriſtian's Paſſover with that of the Jews; and the deliverance of the People of Iſrael from Egypt thro' the Red Sea, with the Regeneration of Sinners, by the waters of Baptiſm.

The ſecond Sermon is directed to the Novices: Gaudentius expoundeth in that inſtruction the Myſtery of the Euchariſt, which was hid from them till that time. He compares it with the Jews Paſchal Lamb, taking notice that that was but the Figure, and not the real thing. 'Where-'as in the truth of the new Law, it is the ſame Lamb dead 'for all; which being offered in all Churches, nouriſhes 'under the Myſtery of Bread and Wine, thoſe that offer 'it, giveth life to them that have a lively Faith, and ſancti-'fieth by Conſecrate thoſe that conſecrate the ſame. 'This is the Fleſh of the Lamb, this is his Blood.... It 'is the ſame Lord Creator of all things, who having made 'Bread out of the Earth, forms his Body of this Bread, 'becauſe he is able, and hath promiſed it. He who for-'merly changed Water into Wine, now changeth Wine 'into his Blood.' Having expounded thus plainly the Myſtery of the Euchariſt, he ſpeaks of the Diſpoſitions that Men ought to be in to come to it: He findeth them all repreſented by the Ceremonies obſerved by the Jews in eating the Paſchal Lamb; but his Similitudes are ſo far fetcht. that one would hardly have obſerved them. For who can believe that the Leathern Girdle that the Iſraelites were girded withall, was a Figure of the Mortification of Sins? Who would imagine, that when they are forbidden to break a bone of the Lamb, the meaning is that the Scripture-Precepts ought to be obſerved? And who can conclude from burning the remainders of the Lamb, that Men ſhould conſume by a lively Faith the doubts which they might have about the Euchariſt. Theſe Allegories, and ſuch-like in this place, are ſomething forced, and I queſtion whether many People can reliſh them. At laſt he exhorteth the new baptized ſtrongly to believe that Myſtery, and giveth two myſtical Reaſons why Jeſus Chriſt choſe Bread and Wine to be the matter of that Sacrament.

He proſecutes, in the five following Sermons, his Lecture upon that place of Exodus, which ſpeaketh of the Circumſtances and Ceremonies wherewith the Jews offered the Paſchal Lamb; and he applies them to the Sacrifice of Jeſus Chriſt upon the croſs, and to what is done among Chriſtians; and ſometimes he draws from them ſome moral inſtructions.

The eighth and ninth are upon the Goſpel of the Marriage in Cana of Galilee; He commendeth Virginity, reproving thoſe at the ſame time who condemn Matrimony, and warneth Parents, that though they may inſpire into their Children the Love of Virginity, yet they cannot enjoyn them the Vow of perpetual Continency. He maintains, that the Virgin Mary did not loſe her Virginity in bringing Jeſus Chriſt into the World. Both theſe Inſtructions are full of many Similitudes. He exhorteth the new baptized not to loſe the Grace of their Baptiſm.

The tenth Inſtruction is upon Exodus; There he brings many Allegories upon the Paſſover, and upon the Lord's Day. He ſeems to be perſwaded, that the World ſhall end after the accompliſhment of ſix thouſand Years; and that thoſe Dead who appeared after Chriſt's Death, were of the number of thoſe Righteous ones, whom the Soul of Chriſt, that deſcended into Hell, delivered in that day. Theſe are the ten Sermons which Gaudentius preached in Benevolus his abſence during Eaſter Holy-days.

The other Sermons are particular Tracts which he collected to joyn them to the foregoing. The firſt is upon the ſick of the Palſie, whom Jeſus Chriſt cured on the Sabbath-day. The ſecond is upon Chriſt's Words, John 12: And now is the Judgment: Which he expoundeth thus: The World is going to judge its Creator and Maſter. The third is upon the Nativity of Jeſus Chriſt, and of that Patience wherewith he endured Judas his Treaſon. Upon occaſion of this unhappy Apoſtle's covetouſneſs, he exhorteth to Alms-deeds, which he makes no ſcruple of comparing with Baptiſm; ſaying, That as the Water of Baptiſm quenches Hell-fire, ſo abundance of Alms quenches the fire of Luſt that remains after Baptiſm, or at leaſt hinders it from breaking out in a Flame. He occaſionally ſpeaks by the bye againſt thoſe who ſay they cannot faſt, becauſe they will not. He concludes with an Exhortation to love God and our Neighbour. This Sermon is better written and more uſefull than the others.

Gaudentius, Biſhop of Breſcia.

The fourth is about the ſending of the Holy Ghoſt, and contains a curious Obſervation againſt ſuch as pretend to fathom Myſteries. We ought to believe that God is what he hath revealed himſelf to be; his Actions are not to be examined with a rebellious Spirit, but to be admired with Faith, and Submiſſion: For the Word of God is direct, and all his Actions are for the exerciſe of our Faith.... And ſo let us have a care of aſſaulting, if we may ſo ſpeak, the Divine Myſteries with injurious Queſtions. Neither Scrupulouſneſs nor Curioſity will help us to diſcover them, but only make us loſe the Faith which leads to Salvation and Eternal life.

The fifth Sermon is in commendation of the Maccabees. Gaudentius endeavoureth to give Reaſons, why Swine's Fleſh was forbidden to the Jews.

The ſixth Sermon is that which he Preached at his Ordination in the preſence of St. Ambroſe and the other Biſhops. He ſpeaks at firſt of the Violence that was uſed towards him to make him accept the Biſhoprick of Breſcia. He commends his Predeceſſor Philaſtrius: He entreateth St. Ambroſe, the firſt of the Biſhops there, to ſpeak in the Name of all the Biſhops, as St. Peter the Prince of the Apoſtles ſpeaketh for them all. He ends, deſiring the Biſhops to implore God's mercy, that he would aſſiſt him with the Virtue of the Holy Ghoſt to govern his Dioceſs well.

The ſeventh is a Panegyrick upon the forty Martyrs, for whoſe Honour they had built a Church, to depoſit their Relicks. St. Gaudentius, who called many Biſhops to that Feaſt, having ſpoken concerning the Relicks of ſeveral Martyrs, which he hath gathered; viz. thoſe of St. John Baptiſt, St. Andrew, St. Thomas, St. Luke, St. Gervaſius St. Protaſius, St. Nazarius, and the Aſhes of the SS. Siſinius and Alexander, who had lately ſuffered Martyrdom: He adds, that Travelling through Cappadocia, he found at Cæſarea a Convent of Women, where St. Baſil's Nieces were, who were ſo kind as to give him part of the Relicks of the forty Martyrs, left with him by their Uncle. He deſcribeth afterwards thoſe Saints Martyrdom, taken out of St. Baſil's Diſcourſe; then he makes an end, ſaying, that the then conſecrated Church being adorned with the Relicks of ſo many Saints, was to bear the Name of an Aſſembly of Saints.

The eighth Diſcourſe is a Letter to Germinius, wherein he explains the Parable of the unjuſt Steward, related Luke 16. Where he treateth chiefly of the obligation to give Alms.

The laſt Diſcourſe is likewiſe a Letter to a Deacon called Paul, to expound that notable place of St. John's Goſpel, which the Arians did alledge againſt the Divinity of Jeſus Chriſt: My Father is greater than I. Gaudentius there refutes Arius and the Arians with great earneſtneſs; affirming, that this place is to be underſtood of Chriſt's human Nature.

It is not neceſſary to give a character of St. Gaudentius. He is ſufficiently known by what we have ſaid of him. His Style is plain and without affectation, full of forced Alegories, extraordinary Notions, and far-fetcht Alluſions. His Sermons are dry, barren, neither inſtructive nor moving in any conſiderable degree. In one word, they have not the ſtrength, eloquence, beauty or exactneſs obſerved in the Sermons of thoſe Greek Authors formerly mentioned.

JOHN of Jeruſalem.

John of Jeruſalem.

After the death of St. Cyril, which happened in the Year 387, a Monk called John, a great Defender of Origen's Books, Opinions and Followers, ſucceeded in that See. St. Ephiphanius being perſwaded, that the Origeniſts were very dangerous Hereticks, reproved him before ſeveral Perſons for taking their part. But inſtead of yielding to St. Epiphanius's admonition, John declared himſelf openly againſt him, and upbraided him as a Patron of the Anthropomorphites; that is, of thoſe who affirmed that God had a Body. Soon after St. Epiphanius ordained Paulinianus, St. Jerom's Brother, out of his own Dioceſs in that of Cæſarea; and that gave John an occaſion to complain of him, and to accuſe him of violating the Canons. St. Epiphanius excuſed himſelf upon the account of the cuſtom of his Country; and obſerves in his Letter, that it was not this Ordination which moſt offended John, but that he was accuſed of being an Origeniſt. This Letter of St. Epiphanius was written in 392. St. Jerom was much engaged in the quarrel, and upholding St. Epiphanius's Party, was excommunicated of John, who uſed all his endeavours to expell him out of Paleſtine. On the other ſide, Ruffinus took John's part; ſo that this quarrel betwixt two zealous Biſhops, being fomented by theſe two learned Men, grew to a great heighth in a little time. Count Archelaus endeavoured to accommodate the matter; and as they accuſed one another of Hereſie, it was agreed, that for their Reconciliation, they ſhould make a Confeſſion of Faith; but John appearing not in the Aſſembly called for that purpoſe, the Accommodation was broke off.

John of Jeruſalem.

John of Jeruſalem.

Theophilus, Biſhop of Alexandria, informed of this Diviſion, thought it his Duty to endeavour to quiet it: Therefore he ſent his Deacon Iſidore for that end; who being already prepoſſeſſed in Origen's behalf, ſtrengthned John's Party, and returned without effecting any thing; and only brought Theophilus, a Letter from John, wherein he juſtified himſelf, and accuſed St. Epiphanius. This Letter having been ſpread in the Weſt, obliged both St. Jerom and St. Ephiphanius to write to Theophilus, that he ſhould make haſte to declare againſt the Origeniſts. This Biſhop deferr'd for ſome time to make this Declaration, ſuſpecting that St. Ephiphanius was guilty of the Anthropomorphites Error, which he abhorred. But he found himſelf obliged to declare himſelf of a Party, by the Seceſſion of certain Monks of Egypt, infected with the Anthromorphites Error; who after they had read a Letter of this Biſhop againſt that Doctrine, came in great fury to Theophilus with a deſign to kill him. Theophilus to appeaſe them, made uſe of Jacob's words to Eſau, I ſee your faces as the face of God. This perſwading the ſilly Monks, that his Mind was altered, and that he really believed that God had a face, they were quieted. But they being perſwaded that Origen was the greateſt Enemy of the Doctrine which they maintained, ſaid unto him; If you be of this mind, then condemn Origen's Books. This was the Reaſon (if we may believe the Hiſtorians of that time) for which Theophilus was forced to declare againſt that Author and his Party; at the time when Theophilus was fallen out with Iſidore, the Long-brethren and the other Monks of Nitria. He accuſed them of Origeniſm, and forced them to retire to Conſtantinople. All this while John of Jeruſalem continued in his Opinion, and writ a Letter in favour of Ruffinus and of Origen, to Pope Anaſtaſius. His enmity againſt St. Jerom laſted long, as we learn by a Letter of Pope Innocent; and he joined himſelf to Pelagius, and cauſed him to be abſolved in the Council of Dioſpolis, as appears by the Letter which St. Auguſtin wrote to him. He died in 416.

John of Jeruſalem.

Gennadius ſaith that he writ a Book againſt his Adverſaries; wherein he profeſſed to admire the Wit but not the Doctrine of Origen. That Diſcourſe is loſt.

There is attributed to this Author a Treatiſe dedicated to Capraſius of the Inſtitution of Monkery; but that viſibly appears to be the Work of a Latin Author, who compoſed it of purpoſe to prove, That the Order of the Carmelites, which began in the time of the Old Law, was very ancient in the Church, and that many Chriſtians were of this Order in the Primitive Church. It is a heap of Fables, Viſions and Dreams concerning Elias, and ſome other Prophets, whom this Author feigneth to have been Monks of Mount Carmel. But what is more ſurprizing, is, that upon occaſion of this ſuppoſititious Book, there was a Carmelite that either had ſo little ſence himſelf, or rather believed that others were ſo dull, as to attribute to the ſame Author ſeveral Books, which are either without the Name of an Author, or falſely aſcribed to others; which he hath had the confidence to collect and publiſh at Bruxells in Folio, ann. 1643, under the Name of John of Jeruſalem's Works; as if this pretended Author muſt neceſſarily be the Father of all theſe unknown Children. But in one word; Though this famous * Carmelite, who took the pains to collect them, hath beſtowed a whole Volume to ſhew that the Diſcourſes contained in his Firſt Volume, were truly written by John of Jeruſalem, and hath endeavoured to juſtifie them from all ſorts of Errors; yet one may ſay that he hath done nothing leſs than what he promiſeth in the Title, and that he hath filled that long and tedious Treatiſe with idle Conjectures, groundleſs Suppoſitions, manifeſt Falſhoods, or with Matters no ways pertinent to his Subject. So that this great Building failing at the foundation, is quickly fallen into ruine, and is become an Object of Laughter to all perſons that pretend to Learning.

[* Petrus Waſſellus]

THEOPHILUS of Alexandria.

Theophilus of Alexandria.

Theophilus was ordained Biſhop in the Year 385, after the Death of Timotheus. We have alſo obſerved that he was a politick and daring Man. He took away the Remains of Idolatry in the City of Alexandria, by cauſing the Temples and Idols that were left to be pulled down, and by diſcovering to the People, the Frauds and Stratagems which the Idol-Prieſts made uſe of to uphold their Superſtition; having hollow Statues wherein Men were hid, who perſuaded the People that the Statues ſpoke.

This generous Action got Theophilus much credit and reputation, and gave him great power in Alexandria. The Council of Capua having referred to him the judgment of Flavian's buſineſs, he dealt very moderately with him; but he ſhewed much partiality in the Ordination of St. Chryſoſtom; being deſirous to have preferred Iſidore to that See: However, they were Friends in appearance for a while, and they united together to procure the Reconciliation of the Eaſtern, with the Weſtern Biſhops. We have ſpoken before of his Carriage in the caſe of Origen, and the Origeniſts, of the Policy of his Conduct, and the Paſſion which he ſhewed in the buſineſs of St. Chryſoſtom. There is no likelihood that he ever repented of the injuſtice and violence which he exerciſed againſt St. John Chryſoſtom: For though St. John Damaſcene ſaith, that when he was near Death, he cauſed the Image of that Saint to be brought to him; yet one cannot affirm it upon a Teſtimony of that Nature, eſpecially becauſe St. Cyril his Succeſſor, in the Church of Alexandria, perſiſted after his Death to refuſe to pay any Honour to the Memory of this Saint, and to inſert his Name into the Diptychs. It is more likely, that what is related in the the Lives of the Fathers in the Deſart, is true; viz. That this Biſhop, being at the point of yielding up the Ghoſt, and reflecting upon the long Penance of St. Arſenius, cried out; O happy art thou Arſenius, to have always had this Hour before thine Eyes! Which ſheweth, ſaith an Author of that Time, That Monks who have quitted all the hopes of the World, and of the Court, to mourn in the Wilderneſs, die more peaceably than the Arch-Biſhops that go out of their Dioceſes, to diſturb the peace of the Church by caballing at Court againſt the moſt innocent and holieſt of their Brethren. Yet St. Leo calls him Theophilus of happy Memory; not that he had an opinion of his Sanctity, but becauſe dying in the Communion of the Church, that Title of Honour could not be denied him.

Theophilus of Alexandria.

'He wrote, ſaith, Gennadius, a large Treatiſe againſt Origen, wherein he condemns both his Writings and his Perſon; ſhewing at the ſame time that he was not the firſt 'that condemned him, but that he had been Excommunicated by the Ancients, and particularly by Heraclas. He 'compoſed another Book againſt the Anthropomorphites, 'who hold that God hath an human ſhape, and members 'like unto ours: Wherein he refuteth their Opinions, and 'convinceth them by Teſtimonies of Holy Scripture; proving, that God is of an incorruptible and ſpiritual Nature; whereas all Creatures are in their Natures corruptible 'and ſubject to change.' He likewiſe preſented to Theodoſius the Emperor a ſmall Treatiſe concerning Eaſter, wherein he fixes the Day and time of the Moon when it ought to be celebrated according to the deciſion of the Council of Nice, adding ſome Obſervations touching the Solemnity of that Feſtival. This Cycle began in the Year 380, and determined Eaſter-Day for 100 Years conſecutively, as St. Leo aſſures us in the 94*th.* and 95*th.* Letters of the new Edition.

Theophilus of Alexandria.

Gennadius ſaith further, that he had read three Books concerning Faith, that bore Theophilus his Name; but addeth, that he did not believe them to be his, becauſe they were written in a different Style.

St. Jerome mentions Five Epiſtles of Theophilus, which he had tranſlated into Latin. The firſt was a Synodical Letter againſt Origen of the Year 399. The ſecond was a Paſchal Epiſtle for the Year 401, and three other Paſchal Epiſtles for the Years 402, 403, and 404. We have not the two firſt, the other three are among St. Jerom's Epiſtles. The firſt is divided into four Parts, according to the Obſervation of that Saint. In the firſt Theophilus exhorts the Faithful to celebrate the Feaſt of Eaſter worthily. In the ſecond and third he ſpeaks againſt Apollinarius. In the laſt he adviſeth Hereticks to repent. In all the three he ſhews his averſion to Origen, accuſing him with great vehemence, of ſeveral Errors. It is obſerved in the laſt that the Chriſtians of that time forbore in Lent the Uſe of Wine and Meat. In theſe Diſcourſes he interſperſes ſome Moral Notions, and endeth all his Epiſtles with giving Notice of the Day when Lent ſhall begin, and Eaſter Day, and Whit-Sunday.

We have beſides, amongſt St. Jerom's Epiſtles, three Letters of Theophilus: One to St. Epiphanius, wherein he exhorts him to aſſemble a Council againſt Origen, and two other Letters againſt the Origeniſts.

There are ſome Greek Fragments of the Paſchal Letters cited by Theodoret in the Council of Epheſus, and in that of Chalcedon, which are among thoſe that we have, or elſe are taken out of other Letters of the ſame Nature: For the Council of Epheſus quoteth a ſixth Paſchal Letter; and Juſtinian in his Writing againſt Origen, produces a great part of the Synodical Letter againſt Origen, and two other Frag-

Theophilus of Alexandria.

Fragments of a Letter, and of a Treatiſe directed to the Monks of Scheta.

Facundus, l. 6. ch. 5. quoteth a Book of Theophilus againſt St. Chryſoſtom, full of Invectives and Calumnies againſt that Saint, whereof he gives ſome Inſtances, which ſhew how much Paſſion and Rage had blinded him.

Laſtly, one may ſee in Zonara's and Balſamon's Collections ſome Laws and Canonical Letters of this ſame Biſhop.

The firſt is a Paſtoral Letter; wherein he ſaith, that when Chriſtmas Eve happens upon a Sunday, ſome light Meat may be eaten, that ſo we may not ſeem to follow the practice of Hereticks, by eating nothing on the Sunday, and yet not to break the Law of Faſting altogether.

The ſecond is a Letter containing ſome Rules for the Province of Lycapolis, directed to Ammon.

The firſt concerneth thoſe that had communicated with Arian Biſhops; he ordereth that they ſhould be depoſed, allowing them ſtill leave to dwell in the Place, and to be dealt with as was appointed by the Biſhops of Thebais.

The ſecond is upon the occaſion of a Prieſt, who was Ordained after he had committed a crime with a Woman that was divorced from her Husband. Theophilus determines that he ought to be Suſpended from his Miniſterial Function.

The third is concerning a Prieſt who had been Excommunicated by his Biſhop. Theophilus declares, that the Prieſt that was Excommunicated by his Biſhop, ought to be eſteemed Excommunicate till he had juſtified himſelf by the Law.

The fourth concerneth a Deacon, who was accuſed to have married his Brother's Daughter. Theophilus ſaith, that if he married her before Baptiſm, and had not co-habited with her ſince he was Baptized, he might continue in the Clergy; but if he had co-habited with her after Baptiſm, he ought to be degraded from the Clergy.

In the fifth that relateth to an Accuſation brought againſt a Reader, Theophilus gives this Order; that if he be convicted of Fornication, he ought to be degraded; but if this Accuſation is grounded only upon ſuſpicion, no regard is to be had to it.

In the ſixth he ſets down a Rule to be obſerved in the Ordinations; he ſaith that the Biſhop is to Ordain none, who is not choſen by the whole Clergy in the preſence of the People; and that the Biſhop is to give his Approbation before he can be Ordained.

Theophilus of Alexandria.

The ſeventh appointeth, that whatſoever is left of the Offering after Communion, ought to be diſtributed to the Clerks, and to the Faithfull, and none of it to the Catechumens.

The eighth is alſo concerning a Clerk that was accuſed of Fornication. Theophilus affirms, that if he be convicted of the Crime, he ought to be depoſed; but if he gives a good Account of his Behaviour, and it cannot be proved that he he committed the Fact, they ought not to give him any trouble.

The ninth Canon is about chooſing a new Steward in the Church.

The tenth enjoyns, that the Poor, the Widows and the Pilgrims ſhould not be diſturbed, and that none ſhould uſurp the Church-Goods.

The ſecond Letter contains a Rule, whereby it is ordered conformably to the Canon of the Concil of Nice, that the Novatins, who had a mind to come into the Church, might receive Ordination.

The third to Agatho, was written upon occaſion of a Perſon, who knowing not the Laws of the Church, had contracted an unlawful Marriage; and being cenſured for it, had left his Wife with her conſent. He adviſeth the Biſhop to whom he Writeth, to place them among the Catechumens, if he thought fit, and if he judged that they did it ſincerely; otherwiſe he will have him deal more ſeverely with them.

The laſt Letter is directed to Menna; where he forbids him to admit into the Communion of the Church, a Woman that had wronged another, before ſhe had made reparation.

Theophilus hath nothing in his Writings that can turn to his Commendation: They are dark, unintelligible, full of falſe Reaſonings and Reflections, that do not concern his Subject. He was a good Politician, but an ill Author. He knew better how to manage a Court-intrigue, then to reſolve a queſtion of Divinity. The only Rule of his Opinions was his Intereſt or his Ambition. He was ready to embrace any Opinion or Party that came firſt, provided it could ſaisfie his Paſſion, without examining much whether it was juſt or reaſonable.

THEODORUS of Mopſueſta.

Theodorus of Mopſueſta.

THeodorus, a Prieſt of Antioch, Diodorus's and Flavian's Diſciple, St. Chryſoſtom's Companion, and, as ſome have affirmed, Neſtorius's Tutor, was choſen Biſhop of Mopſueſta, about the beginning of the Fifth Century of the Church. Many were the Works that he writ; but the misfortune which they had to be condemned with his Perſon, in the Fifth Council, by the Intrigues of Juſtinian the Emperor, cauſed them to be loſt, except the Titles and Fragments that were collected either by his Accuſers, or by his Defenders.

It is probable that he writ Commentaries upon the whole Bible: Photius, Vol. 25*th*. of his Bibliotheca, ſaith, that he had read a Commentary of Theodorus upon Geneſis, divided into ſeven Parts. Facundus and the fifth General Council mention Commentaries of Theodorus upon the Pſalms, the Book of Job, the Canticles, the Twelve leſſer Prophets, the Goſpel of St. Matthew, St. John and St. Luke, upon the Acts, the Epiſtle to the Romans, and upon the Epiſtle to the Hebrews. In theſe Commentaries he inſiſted moſt upon the Hiſtorical ſence, avoiding all Allegories: He writ a Book likewiſe to juſtifie that way of expounding the Scripture, intituled, Of Allegory and of Hiſtory againſt Origen, quoted by Facundus. Photius obſerveth further, that Theodorus's Commentaries are full of frequent Repetitions; that they are tedious, and unpleaſant to read. The firſt of his Commentaries is that upon the Pſalms; he ſaith himſelf, that it was the moſt imperfect and leaſt exact. In his Commentary upon Job, he ſaith, That though the Hiſtory of Job be true at the bottom, yet it is written in a fabulous way: He obſerveth beſides, when he Comments upon the Book of Canticles, that it is a difficult thing to write an uſeful Commentary upon that Book; and that it was forbidden both among the Jews, and among the Chriſtians to read it publickly, ſince in all probability it was a Nuptial Song, though it is to be underſtood of the Love of Wiſdom.

The other Treatiſes of this Author were very long, and very numerous: When he was young he compoſed a large Work of the Incarnation againſt the Apollinariſts and Anomæans, divided into fifteen Books, which, according to his own Teſtimony, contained above Fifteen Thouſand Verſes; wherein he ſhewed, ſaith Gennadius, by convincing Proofs, and by Teſtimonies of the Scripture, (for he ſpeaketh of Theodorus, in the 12*th*. Chapter of his Book, concerning Eccleſiaſtical Writers,) That in Jeſus Chriſt there is the fulneſs both of the Divinity and of the Humanity; That Man is made of two Subſtances, the Soul and the Body; That Senſe and Underſtanding are not ſeparate Subſtances, but Faculties of the Soul. The Fourteenth Book is concerning the Trinity: But in diſcourſing of uncreated Nature, he treateth alſo of Creatures. The laſt Book contains many Quotations out of the Fathers, to confirm his Doctrine by the Authority of Tradition. Some conſiderable Fragments of this Treatiſe of the Incarnation are cited by Facundus, and in the Fifth Council.

Theodorus of Mopſueſta.

He wrote beſides Five and Twenty Books againſt Eunomius, in defence of St. Baſil's Books, mentioned by Photius in the 25*th*. Volume of his Bibliotheca; ſome whereof are cited by Facundus, and in the Fifth Council: Four Books againſt Apollinarius; a Book intituled the myſtical Book; a Treatiſe to thoſe that had been Baptized; two Letters to Artemius of Alexandria; an Epiſtle to Cerdo upon the Interpretation of the Pſalms; five Books of the Creature; five other Books to ſhow that God permitted Sin, becauſe it is for Men's advantage; which are all cited by Facundus, and in the fifth Council; and three Books of the Magick of the Perſians, directed to a Suffragan Biſhop of Armenia, mentioned by Photius in the 81*ſt*. Volume of his Bibliotheca; where he ſaith, that Theodorus in the firſt of thoſe three Books, explains that abominable Axiom of the Perſians, introduced by Zarades; whereby Zarovas, the God of Fortune is put for the firſt Principle of all things, from whom they ſuppoſe Oromazus to be deſcended, by whom they mean the Evil Genius or Satan; that when he had given an account of that Doctrine, which was as baſe as it is impious; he refuteth it in the ſame Book. In the two laſt Books he treateth of the True Religion; and having begun with the World's Creation, he falls inſenſibly upon the Law of Grace.

The Fifth Council attributes to Theodorus of Mopſueſta, Chariſius's Creed that was produced in the Council of Epheſus: But Facundus ſays, that it was none of his, and that it was an injury to him to aſcribe it to him.

Theodorus of Mopſueſta was charged with ſeveral Hereſies after his Death; and particularly, that he was Neſtorius's Tutor; and that he taught in his Writings thoſe Errors, which ſince bear the Name of that Hereſiarch. This perſonal Accuſation occaſioned a great Conteſt, that was agitated with much heat in the beginning of the Sixth Century. Juſtinian cauſed this Author to be condemned in the Fifth General Council, in deſpite of Vigilius, who defended him. He would have obliged all the Biſhops to ſubſcribe that Condemnation; but ſome refuſed to do it, and undertook to plead for Theodorus. Facundus, Biſhop of Hermiana, a Theodorus of Mopſueſta.

City in Africa, proved one of his moſt zealous Defenders, and compoſed twelve Apologetical Books for him; wherein he endeavoured to juſtifie him fully of all the Accuſations that were formed againſt him. This is not a fit place to examine that Queſtion, which we ſhall handle at large hereafter, when we come to ſpeak of the Fifth Council, and of Facundus's Books: And ſo inſtead of examining the Doctrine of Theodorus Mopſueſtenus, I ſhall only give ſome Remarks upon his Style, and way of Writing. His Style, if Photius may be credited, is neither lofty nor clear; he is full of tedious Repetitions, but he brings ſtrong Proofs, and hath the Scriptures very ready at Command: This Judgment of Photius is confirmed by the Fragments of his Writings that are extant: His Style is perplexed and diffuſe, no clearneſs in it, but the Notions are ſolid and exact enough: He thought and ſpoke with Freedom: He deſpiſed allegorical and myſtical Interpretations of Scripture; but inſiſted much upon Moral Heads, and made it his main buſineſs to ſet forth the Hiſtory, and expound the Prophecies. Theodorus of Mopſueſta.

Here is a Catalogue of the Latin Fragments of this Author, ſet down in the Fifth General Council; and by Facundus, which may be conſulted to judge both of his Doctrine and of his Style.

PALLADIUS.

Palladius.

Palladius, Originally of Galatia, Evagrius his Diſciple, left his Country at Twenty Years of Age, in the Year 388 (a), and went into Egypt, to learn of the Monks of that place the Exerciſes of the Monaſtick Life. Being arrived at Alexandria, he addreſſed himſelf to Iſidore to be adviſed by him; who committed him to the Conduct of a Monk, who lived in a Cave near Alexandria. But Palladius not being able to undergo the Auſterities practiſed by that Monk, was forced to leave him; but nevertheleſs he continued three Years in the Monaſteries about Alexandria: afterwards he undertook to viſit thoſe of Nitria and Thebais, and he ſtayed a great while in thoſe ſolitary places: But falling ſick of a dangerous Diſtemper, he returned to Alexandria, and put himſelf into the hands of the Phyſicians there, who adviſed him to go into Palæſtine, where the Air might agree with him better. From Palæſtine he came to Bithynia, where he was ordained Biſhop of Helenopolis in 401. Being one of St. Chryſoſtom's Friends, when that Saint was condemned, he was obliged to retire to the Weſt, and returning to the Eaſt with the Deputies of the Weſtern Biſhops, he was put into Priſon, and ſent back with them. From the Biſhoprick of Helenopolis, he was tranſlated to that of Aſpuna (b); a City of Galatia under the Metropolitan of Ancyra. He was Ruffinus his Friend, and defended Origen, ſided with Pelagius, and oppoſed St. Jerome. He writ in the Year 421. an Hiſtory of the Life, Actions, Miracles, and Diſcourſes, of the holieſt Monks that he had ſeen in Egypt, Libya, Thebais, and Palæſtine. It is dedicated to one Lauſus, wherefore it has had the Name of Hiſtoria Lauſiaca. This Relation, (as moſt other Works of this Nature) contains many extraordinary things. Among ſeveral Examples of ſound Vertue, and uſeful Reflections, one may find childiſh Sentences, Examples dangerous to be followed, enormous Auſterities, unreaſonable Practices, and raſh Undertakings: The Style of this Hiſtory is flat, a meer Relation without Ornament or Order; it was Printed in Latin, in the Lives of the Fathers by Roſweidus, and in the Bibliotheca Patrum: The Greek was publiſhed by Meurſius, and Printed at Amſterdam in the Year 1616. It is Printed likewiſe in Greek and Latin, in the Supplement to the Bibliotheca Patrum, in 1624. Cotelerius added ſome Greek Supplements in the laſt Volume of the Monuments of the Greek Church, Pag. 117, 158. Palladius.

This ſame Palladius is thought to be the Author of St. Chryſoſtom's Life, and it is very likely. For, 1. The Style of that Work is like that of the Hiſtoria Lauſiaca. 2. Palladius Author of the Hiſtoria Lauſiaca was St. Chryſoſtom's Friend, and perſecuted upon his Account. 3. It is certain, that the Author of St. Chryſoſtom's Life was called Palladius, and that he lived in the beginning of the Fifth Century. But there is no Palladius known beſides this. 4. It is manifeſt, that the Writer of St. Chryſoſtom's Life, was of the ſame Party, and in the ſame Intereſt and Sentiments with Palladius of Helenopolis. 5. The Author of St. Chryſoſtom's Life is called Biſhop of Helenopolis, in a Greek Catalogue of the Authors, that wrote St. Chryſoſtom's Life mentioned by Sir Henry Savile. The Greek Title of that Dialogue in the Florence Manuſcript, which is Six hundred years Old, beareth the Name of Palladius of Helenopolis; and it is obſerved in the Margin, that he was Biſhop of Aſpuna. Laſtly, Diodorus of Trimithus ſaith, that the Author of St. Chryſoſtom's Life was Biſhop in Bithynia. Yet ſome Conjectures ſeem to prove, that Palladius Author of St. Chryſoſtom's Life, and Palladius of Helenopolis are two different Perſons: For, 1. The Writer of St. Chryſoſtom's Life ſpeaks of the Voyage of Palladius of Helenopolis to Rome, as preceding his. 2. He ſpeaks as if he writ the Dialogue which relates that Life, whilſt Palladius of Helenopolis was detained Priſoner in the Eaſt: Laſtly, Palladius of Helenopolis was but Thirty nine years Old when St. Chryſoſtom died, whereas the Author of the Dialogue makes Theodorus ſpeak of him as of an ancient Biſhop. Theſe Reaſons perſuaded Bigotius, that Palladius

(a) In the Year 388.] What he ſaith in his Preface, and at the beginning of the Hiſtoria Lauſiaca, determines the Chronology of this Author's Life. He ſays at the beginning of the Hiſtory, that he went into Egypt under the Second Conſulſhip of Theodoſius, which was in the Year 388. And in the Preface, he ſaith, that he had been a Monk 33 Years, and 20 Years a Biſhop, and that he was 53 Years old. He was therefore 20 Years old when he left his Country to become Monk. He was Ordained Biſhop in 401, and wrote his Hiſtory in 421.

(b) Biſhop of Aſpuna.] Socrates Hiſt. Eccl. l. 7. c. 36. reckons him amongſt the tranſlated Biſhops, and ſaith, that he went from Helenopolis to Aſpuna.

Author

Palladius. Author of that Dialogue, was not Palladius Disciple to Evagrius. Yet it is easie to Answer, that Palladius feigned these things, after the Custom of Dialogists, perhaps to hide himself the better, being unwilling to be known to be the Author of that Treatise. However, this History is composed in the Form of a Dialogue held at Rome, betwixt Theodorus Deacon of Rome and Bishop Palladius. It contains St. Chrysostom's Condemnation, the History of his Life, and a Justification of the Accusations that were brought against him. It is written with great Plainness, but with much Exactness and Truth. It was formerly translated by Ambrosius Camaldulensis, but his Version was not sincere. Bigotius having since found a Manuscript in the Library of Florence, which contained the Greek Original of that Dialogue, caused it to be Printed, with a new Version on the side, composed with all the Fidelity and Exactness that can be expected from so able a Man. This Volume is Printed in Quarto at Paris by Martin, Ann. 1680. Palladius.

P. INNOCENT I.

P. Innoc. I. POpe Innocent succeeded to Pope Anastasius in the Year 402. and governed the Church of Rome till 417. This Pope being consulted from all parts, upon divers Questions, both of Doctrine and of Discipline, was put upon writing of Letters, which contain very useful Rules and most judicious Decisions.

The first Letter, which should have been one of the last, since it was not written before 416. is an Answer to Decentius Bishop of Engubium a City of Umbria in Italy, upon several Questions put to him by that Bishop.

The Preface of that Epistle, setteth forth the advantage of the City of Rome. He pretends that if all Churches had held the Practices which they received from the Apostles, they had all agreed in the same Discipline, and that all the difference, which so much scandalizeth the People, is caused by the Deviation from the Apostles Tradition. Upon this Principle he concludes, that they ought every where to observe the Discipline which Rome received of St. Peter, and which it hath always kept. 'Especially, saith he, because it 'is evident, that the Churches of Italy, Gaul, Spain, Africa, 'Sicily, and other Islands that are between Italy and Africa, 'have been setled by the Bishops whom St. Peter or his 'Successors sent thither.

Tho' this Pope lays down these Maxims as indubitable, yet are they not without Difficulty; and it would have been hard for him to have proved them well: for what Evidence is there to justifie, that the Apostles setled all Points of Discipline themselves? and how can we know that they established them all after the same manner? On the contrary is it not certain, that St. John celebrated the Feast of Easter in the East, upon other days than Sundays, tho' probably both St. Peter and St. Paul did the contrary at Rome? And had the Apostles setled the same Usages, and Ceremonies in all the Churches which they founded, would it therefore follow, that there is a necessity of observing them? Do not all Men know, that Discipline may and is to alter according to the various Circumstances of time? And what Proof is there, that the Church of Rome hath preserved the Discipline setled by St. Peter, better than other Churches have kept that which was given them by other Apostles their Founders. Is there any certainty that the Churches of France, Spain, and Africa, were all founded by those whom St. Peter, or his Successors sent thither? And Lastly, where is the necessity to oblige them all to change their Rites and Customs, to embrace those of the Church of Rome? Many such Queries may be made upon this Principle of Pope Innocent, which could not easily be resolved. But an Italian Bishop his Suffragan, could not in reason propose such Difficulties; he ought to conform to the Discipline of his Metropolis. He had often been at Rome, and present at the publick Service, and so might well be acquainted with the Ceremonies practised there. That was sufficient to instruct, and oblige him to reform the Abuses of his own Church: Yet he advised with Pope Innocent; and the Pope thought fit to make him an Answer, not so much to instruct him, as to teach, advise, and reprove with the greater Authority those that receded from the Customs of the Church of Rome, and even to impose them if they would not yield to his Admonitions.

In the first Canon he declares, that the Blessing is not to be given before the Consecration of the Holy Mysteries; That so it may be as a Sign and Token, that the People approve of the Consecration of the Mysteries.

The second enjoyns that those who are to be recommended in the Service of the Eucharist be not named, before their Offering be presented.

The third forbids Priests to confirm Children, because they have not the Soveraignty of the Priesthood: That they may Baptize, and Anoint the Baptized with the Oyl that is consecrated by the Bishop, but not lay it upon their Foreheads, because this is allowed to none but Bishops, when they confer the Holy Ghost: He declares that he cannot recite the Words, for fear of discovering the Mysteries, if he would answer the advice that was required of him.

In the fourth Canon he pretends to give an evident Reason of the Saturday's Fast, by saying, that as all Sundays are kept with joy in remembrance of the Resurrection, and as they fast every Friday, because of the Passion of Jesus Christ: So they should fast likewise upon Saturday, as being between the day of sorrow and that of rejoycing, and the rather because the Apostles mourned all that day. In a word, that since holy Saturday is a Fasting Day, all other Saturdays should be such in remembrance of that Day. He observeth that in his time the Divine Mysteries were not celebrated either upon Fridays or Saturdays. P. Innoc. I.

The fifth Canon is obscure enough. St. Innocent saith there, that it was to no purpose for Decentius to consult him concerning the leavened Bread, which the Bishop of Rome sent every Sunday to the Parish-Priests in the City of Rome, after he had consecrated it, because his Custom could not concern the Countrey Parishes, for as much as the Sacraments ought not to be carried far, quia non longe portanda sunt Sacramenta: Wherefore, addeth he, we do not send them to Priests in distant Parishes, because they have Power to consecrate.

The sixth declares, that a Priest may not lay hands upon an Energumen, without leave from the Bishop, but that he may if the Bishop gives him Commission to do it.

In the seventh it is enjoyned, that those who have done Penance should be reconciled upon Holy Thursday, whether they were guilty of great Crimes, or of lesser Offences, except some Distemper requireth another time: And to judge of Repentance, regard must be had to the pains, mourning and tears of the Penitent, and his Sin must be remitted, if it appears that he hath made a proportionable satisfaction.

The eighth is about the anointing of the Sick, spoken of in the Epistle of St. James. Innocent saith, that the Words of the Apostle are without Question to be understood of the Sick that are faithful, that these may be anointed with the Oyl that is consecrated by the Bishop, and the Use of this is not peculiar to Priests only, but all Christians may anoint themselves, and those that belong to them in Case of necessity: That it is not necessary that the Bishop should make this Unction; that it should not be administred to Penitents, because it is a kind of Sacrament, and since other Sacraments are denied, they have no Right to this.

He concludeth with an Exhortation to Decentius, that he should cause the Discipline of the Church the of Rome to be observed in his Church, and to instruct the Priests and Clerks under his Care well, that so they might discharge their Ministry worthily.

The second Letter was written in 404. to Victricius Bishop of Roüen, who likewise asked Questions about points of Discipline. It begins also with the Praises of the Roman Discipline; he exhorts him to send this Letter to his Brethren, that they might learn what Rules they were to follow.

This Preface is followed by thirteen Canons.

The first agreeable to the Decision of the Council of Nice, forbids a Bishop to be ordained without the Consent of the Metropolitan of the Province: declaring farther, that one Bishop alone cannot ordain.

The second prohibits the admitting of those into the Clergy, that have been Soldiers after they were baptized.

The third allows a Synod of the Provincial Bishops to take Cognizance of all Causes relating to the Persons of Clerks and Bishops, according to the Decree of the Nicene Council; but he addeth, Yet without Prejudice to the Rights of the Roman Church, to which great Regard is to be had in all Causes. And if they be Causæ Majores, devolved to the Holy See, they are not to be brought hither nor judged; before Judgment is given by the Bishops of the Province.

The fourth forbids to admit into Orders, a Person that has married a Widow, or a Woman that is divorced from her Husband.

The fifth extends this Prohibition, even to those that have married such a Woman before Baptism.

He confirmeth the same Law in the sixth, with respect to those that have been twice married.

The seventh forbids Bishops to ordain Clerks of the faithful of another Church, except the Bishop of that Church permits it.

The eighth ordaineth, that the Novatians and Donatists be received by the sole Imposition of hands; because that tho' they were baptized by Hereticks, yet were they baptized in the Name of Jesus Christ. He addeth, That if any Catholicks being entred into their Sect, were baptized, and are willing to return to the Bosom of the Church, they must be put to a long Penance, before they be admitted.

P. Innoc. I. The ninth is concerning the Celibacy of Prieſts and Deacons.

The tenth forbids the Monks that were ordained Clerks, to leave their way of living.

In the eleventh, the Officers of the Emperor, and ſuch as are in publick Employments, are not to be admitted into Orders.

The twelfth prohibits the admitting of thoſe Virgins that being ſolemnly conſecrated to God, married, or were corrupted, to Penance, before the Death of the Perſon with whom they have committed the Crime, For, ſaith he, if a Woman, who during the Life of her Husband marrieth another is an Adultereſs, and is not admitted to do Penance before the Death of one of them, with how much more reaſon ſhould the ſame rigour be obſerved towards her, who being united to an immortal Husband, went over to an human Marriage?

The thirteenth enjoyns a Penance of ſome time to the Virgins that marry, after promiſing Virginity, tho' they had not ſolemnly been veiled by the Biſhop.

Pope Innocent finiſhes his Letter, ſaying, that if theſe Canons were obſerved by the Biſhops, there would be no more Ambition among them, Diviſions would ceaſe, Schiſms, and Hereſies would be ſtifled, and the Devil would have no occaſion to aſſault the Flock of Jeſus Chriſt, &c.

The third Epiſtle of the ſame Nature with the two former, is written in 405. to Exuperius Biſhop of Tholouſe.

In the firſt Canon of this Letter, he confirms Siricius his Law concerning the Celibacy of Prieſts and Deacons; yet he forgiveth thoſe who thro' Ignorance obſerved it not, upon condition that they ſhall continue in that Order, and not be admitted to an higher. But he ordains that thoſe ſhould be degraded who violated it knowingly.

The ſecond Canon relates to Sinners, who ſtay till the hour of Death to deſire Penance: Pope Innocent ſaith, that they were dealt withal after two different manners. That the ancient Diſcipline was more ſevere, becauſe Penance was granted them without allowing them the Communion: but in his time, it was adminiſtred to dying Men, that they might not imitate the hardneſs of Novatian. Theſe laſt Words with ſeveral others that are in the Text of that Canon manifeſt that by the Word Communion, is not to be underſtood the Adminiſtration of the Euchariſt: but Abſolution.

The third Canon exempts thoſe from Penance, that condemned any Perſons to Death, who put any to the Rack, or were obliged by their Office to condemn the guilty to any Puniſhment, becauſe the civil Powers, ſaith this Pope, are eſtabliſhed by God for the Puniſhment of Criminals.

The fourth Canon gives a Reaſon why more Women do Penance for Adultery than Men. Pope Innocent ſaith, That the Chriſtian Religion puniſheth this Sin equally both in Men and Women, but Wives not being able to accuſe their Husbands of this Crime, the Biſhop cannot paſs Judgment upon ſecret Sins, whereas Husbands do more freely accuſe their Wives, and diſcover them to the Prieſts.

The fifth excuſes thoſe, who by their Office are obliged to demand the Death of a Criminal, or to condemn him.

The ſixth ordaineth, that thoſe ſhould be put out of the Church, both Men and Women, that marry again after a Divorce; but this Penalty is not to extend to their Kindred and Allies, except they contributed to that forbidden Marriage.

The laſt Canon contains a Catalogue of the Sacred Books, comprehending all the Books, both of the Old and of the New Teſtament, which we now own for Canonical: He rejects the Acts publiſhed under the Names of St. Matthias, St. James the Leſs, St. Peter and St. John, St. Andrew, St. Thomas, and ſuch like.

The fourth Letter, without Date, is directed to Felix, Biſhop of Nuceria. Having commended that Biſhop for asking his advice about ſome doubts; he tells him in the firſt Canon, that thoſe are not to be admitted into Orders, who voluntarily have diſmembred themſelves. In the ſecond, that it is forbidden to ordain ſuch as have been married twice, or have married Widows. In the third, that thoſe muſt not be ordained that have been Soldiers; that have pleaded at the Bar, or have born Offices at Court. In the fourth, that thoſe of the Laity are to be choſen, who are Baptized, of approved Morals, who have ſpent their time with Clerks, or in Monaſteries, and who have kept no Concubines. Laſtly, in the fixth, he commands the Obſervation of the Interſtitia; [i. e, the Times between every Ordination, upon any promotion from leſſer to higher Orders,] that they ordain no Man a Reader, an Acolyth, a Deacon or a Prieſt of a ſudden; that ſo having been long in the inferiour Degrees, his Behaviour and Conduct may be tried.

In the fifth Letter, directed to two Biſhops of Abruzzo, he bids them depoſe the Prieſts that were accuſed of having had Children ſince their Ordination, if they be convicted of that Crime: He obſerves in the beginning, that a Biſhop ought not to be ignorant of the Canons.

The ſixth is to ſome Biſhops of Apulia: He enjoyns one Biſhop to be depoſed, though he had done publick Penance: He reproacheth them with allowing many things to be done in their Province contrary to the Canons, which might eaſily have been corrected, if Biſhops themſelves were not Authors of ſuch Diſorders. P. Innoc. I.

The ſeventh is directed to the Biſhops of Macedonia about two Biſhops, Bubalius and Taurianus, who had cauſed the Judgment that was given againſt them to be re-viewed again, and falſely boaſted of having a Letter from Pope Innocent, written in their behalf.

In the eighth he exhorteth Florentius, Biſhop of Tivoli to reſtore to his Brother Biſhop a Pariſh which he had taken from him.

The ninth declareth, that a Man who married another Woman while his Wife was in captivity, ought to return to the former; becauſe a ſecond Marriage cannot be lawfull, except the former Wife be Dead, or ſeparated by Divorce.

The tenth is a Letter of Compliment to Aurelius and St. Auguſtine.

The eleventh to Aurelius is touching the determining of Eaſter-Day the following Year.

The twelfth directed to the ſame, is upon the Choice which they ſhould make of Biſhops; he will have them to be choſen from the Clergy, and not from the Laity.

The thirteenth is to Juliana, a Lady, whoſe Devotion he commendeth.

The fourteenth to Bonifacius, and thoſe that follow, were written Anno 413, after Alexander, Biſhop of Antioch, had inſerted again the Name of St. Chryſoſtom into the Diptychs. Innocent writeth to Bonifacius, that he had admitted that Biſhop to his Communion, upon condition that he ſhould not diſturb thoſe that were ordained by Evagrius, and that he ſhould put St. Chryſoſtom's Name among thoſe Biſhops whoſe Memory was celebrated.

The fifteenth is directed to Alexander, Biſhop of Antioch; wherein he congratulates their Reconciliation.

In the ſixteenth to Maximianus, he ſaith, that he had not yet communicated with Atticus of Conſtantinople, becauſe he had not performed the Conditions, without which there could be no Peace.

The ſeventeenth ſubſcribed by twenty Italian Biſhops, is directed to the ſame Evagrius, whom he commendeth for re-uniting the remainders of Paulinus and Evagrius's Party.

The eighteenth to the ſame, conſiſts of three Canons; in the firſt, he extolleth the Dignity of the Church of Antioch, that he may magnifie that of Rome the more; ſaying, that according to the Authority of the Council of Nice, which gives the Senſe of all the Biſhops in the World, the Church of Antioch had Juriſdiction over a whole Dioceſs; that this Authority was not granted to it, becauſe of the greatneſs of the City of Antioch, but becauſe it hath been the firſt Seat of St. Peter; And that it deſerveth that the moſt ſolemn Aſſembly of the Apoſtles ſhould be made there: So that it had not given place to the Church of Rome; but only for this Reaſon, that the latter had the End and Conſummation of that which the former had but an occaſional Enjoyment of: and by reaſon of his Dignity, he tells the Biſhop of Antioch, that as he ordaineth the Metropolitans by an Authority peculiar to him, he ought not to ſuffer that other Biſhops ſhould be ordained without his Leave and Conſent, by writing to the Biſhops that are afar off, and cauſing them that are near to come to him for Ordination.

In the ſecond Canon he ſaith, that two Biſhops are not to be made Metropolitans, when Towns are newly erected into Metropoles, at the ſame time upon the dividing of a Province into two by the Emperor. He ſpeaketh afterwards againſt the Cuſtom of the Biſhops of the Iſle of Cyprus, who Ordained Biſhops without conſulting with the Biſhop of Antioch

In the laſt he affirms, that the Arians returning to the Church are to be admitted with Impoſition of Hands; but their Clergy are not permitted to continue in the Miniſtry of the Church.

The nineteenth, directed to Acacius of Beræa, is upon the Reconciliation with Alexander of Antioch.

In the twentieth, he writes to Lucianus, Biſhop of Signi, to ſtop ſome Meetings of the Photinians in his Dioceſs.

The twenty-firſt, directed to Martinianus, a Biſhop in Macedonia, is written from Ravenna, he writeth to that Biſhop, that he ſhould not refuſe his Communion to ſome Clerks, who were ordained by Bonoſus, but had abjured his Error. He ſaith, that he had already written a Letter to Rufus, and other Biſhops of Macedonia; wherein he gave his Judgment, that they were to be received to the Communion, and left in Poſſeſſion of their Churches.

This Letter is probably, the two and twentieth, which conſequently ought to be ſet before the foregoing; it beareth date from the Year 414, and is directed to Rufus and other Biſhops of Macedonia. He tells them in the beginning, that he was much ſurprized by a Letter directed to the See of Rome, as the chiefeſt of all Churches, becauſe they conſulted him about things that had no difficulty; and concerning which, he had plainly declared his Opinion. One of thoſe things is the Ordination of ſuch as had married Widows. Pope Innocent ſaith, that there is no Diſpute that they ſhould not be ordained; and affirms, that it was the Practice of all both the Eaſtern and Weſtern Churches; Nay, he would have thoſe to be degraded, who were found to be in Orders. The ſecond is concerning thoſe, who having loſt a former Wife, being yet unbaptized, had married a ſecond after Baptiſm. Some were of opinion, that this kind of Bigamy did not hinder them from being admitted into the ſacred Orders. Pope Innocent alledgeth ſeveral Reaſons to prove that ſuch a Practice is not to be followed.

The third Rule is touching the Ordinations by Hereticks. Pope Innocent ſcruples not to alledge the ſame paſſages, and the ſame expreſſions, uſed by St. Cyprian, to prove the invalidity of their Baptiſm, to ſhew the nullity of their Ordination: For he ſaith, that as many as are thus ordained, having their Heads wounded with the Impoſition of Heretical Hands, had Need of Penance for their Remedy; and that ſuch as need Penance, ought not to be ordained: That Hereticks having not true Orders, cannot confer Orders: That they cannot make thoſe on whom they lay their Hands, Partakers of any thing but of the Condemnation that themſelves are ſubject to. After this Obſervation, he refutes the falſe Principle of ſuch as believed, that a lawful Biſhop's Ordination remitted all Sins. He ſaith that the Cuſtom of his Church was to grant Lay-communion, after a ſingle Impoſition of Hands, to thoſe who, having been baptized by Hereticks, deſired to enter into the Church; but that thoſe were obliged to do Penance, who returned to the boſom of the Church, after they had quitted it, to enter into a Sect of Hereticks. He blameth thoſe who not only do not put them under Penance, but alſo ſuffer them to continue in their Miniſtry.

Afterwards he frames ſome Objections againſt this Rule. The firſt is the Law made by Anſius, concerning thoſe whom Bonoſus ordained; whereby he permitted, that they ſhould be received into the Church with their Orders. Pope Innocent anſwers, that this Example is of no conſequence, becauſe they made uſe of this Condeſcenſion in favour of thoſe that were ordained by Bonoſus, to prevent ſeveral Biſhops from perſiſting to follow his Party. That this particular Exigency of the Church obliged them to tranſgreſs the Rules; but when the neceſſity ceaſeth, they ought to return to the Law.

The ſecond Objection is grounded upon the Canon of the Council of Nice, which permits the receiving of the Novatians. Pope Innocent ſaith, that this Canon relates to the Novatians only, and is not to be extended to other Hereticks. He adds, that in this Canon the buſineſs is about Baptiſm; and that the Council ordains that the Paulianiſts ſhould be re-baptized, becauſe they baptized not in the Name of the Holy Trinity; whereas the Novatians baptized as the Catholicks did, in the Name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghoſt. And laſtly, he declareth that this Rule concerneth thoſe that were baptized by Hereticks; but as to thoſe who were baptized in the Church, and embraced an Heretical Sect, if they recover from their Apoſtaſie, they ought undoubtedly to be put to publick Penance; and having done Penance, they can never come into the Clergy. Whence he concludes, that thoſe who left the Church after Bonoſus was condemned, to joyn with him, and received Orders from Hereticks, are not to keep their Dignity, nor to be ordained, when they return again to the Church. Wherefore he exhorteth the Macedonian Biſhops to reform that abuſe; telling them that they ought not to allow that in time of Peace, which neceſſity commanded to be done in time of Trouble; that it often happens that a Fault remains unpuniſhed, becauſe a whole People is guilty of it. Upon ſuch occaſions, what is paſt muſt be left to God's Judgment, and care muſt be taken to prevent the like diſorders for the time to come. All this is a continuation of the ſame third Canon, though it be divided into four.

The Laſt Canon is concerning a Biſhop, one Photinus, who had been condemned by the See of Rome, with too much rigour. Pope Innocent approves of the Admonition of the Macedonian Biſhops; but ſaith, that the See of Rome was miſ-informed and deceived by the Calumnies of his Enemies. He owns him for a Biſhop, and commends the others for informing him better, and deſireth them to ſhew kindneſs to a Deacon called Euſtathius.

The twenty-third Letter is directed to the Spaniſh Biſhops, that were aſſembled in Council at Toledo. It is about particular affairs of the Churches in that Kingdom. The firſt Canon takes notice of a kind of Schiſm among the Biſhops of Bætica, and of other Spaniſh Provinces, who had given the Communion to thoſe of Gallicia, Pope Innocent proves that Lucifer's ſeverity was not to be imitated, in refuſing to admit converted Hereticks; but, on the contrary that all poſſible Means ſhould be uſed to cauſe them to return into the boſom of the Church.

The ſecond is againſt two Biſhops who ventured to ordain out of their Dioceſes.

The third Canon is concerning one Biſhop John, who by his Deputies had approved the Condemnation of Symphoſius and Dictinius. Pope Innocent's Opinion is, that his caſe ought to be examined, as well as that of others, to know whether he had acted with Sincerity. P. Innoc. I.

In the fourth he ſpeaks of irregular Ordinations practiſed in Spain, contrary to the Canons: He ſays, that they are ſo many, that it were impoſſible to apply a Remedy; and ſo he thinks it convenient to leave what is paſt to God's Judgment: But for the future to eſtabliſh a Rule, that whoſoever ſhall Ordain contrary to the Canons, ſhall be deprived of the Sacerdotal Dignity, together with thoſe that received Orders.

The fifth is concerning a Buſineſs of Patruinus, Biſhop of Merida, which, he ſaith, ought to be examined, and thoſe puniſhed that complain of his Ordination, if they had unjuſtly accuſed him.

The ſixth containeth Rules to be obſerved in the Choice of fit Perſons to be Ordained.

To underſtand well the three following Letters of Pope Innocent; it is to be noted, that the Biſhops of Africa and Numidia having condemned both Pelagius and Cœleſtius in the Councils of Carthage and Numidia, aſſembled in the Year 416, wrote to Pope Innocent, to give him an Account of the Sentence which they pronounced againſt both thoſe Hereticks, and their Doctrine, that ſo they might add to their Judgment the Authority of the See of Rome; and ſo ſo much the rather, becauſe Cœleſtius had thought fit to appeal, and it was reported that Pope Innocent countenanced them. And for this Reaſon Aurelius and four more of the principal Biſhops wrote another familiar Letter to him concerning ſome diſadvantageous Reports that had been raiſed againſt him about that Buſineſs.

In the three following Letters, Pope Innocent anſwereth the other three that were brought to Rome by Biſhop Julian; theſe are dated the 27*th.* of January, 417.

The firſt is directed to Aurelius and the Biſhops in the Council of Carthage. He commends them at the firſt for their Courage in condemning Error, and for their Reſpect to the See of Rome, in conſulting with it about what they had decided. From which he takes occaſion to exalt the Authority of the See of Rome; affirming, that it is of Divine Right to have its Opinion in Eccleſiaſtical Matters, before any thing be determined in the Provinces concerning them. It is probable that the African Biſhops did not own that Right, ſince they had definitively judged the Caſe of Pelagius and Cœleſtius, before they acquainted him with it; and they did not write to him as a Judge, that might diſanull what they had done, but only to get his Approbation of their Deciſion, as a thing which he could not refuſe to do without being ſuſpected of Hereſie. And indeed this Pope who was ſuppoſed to favour Cœleſtius, having known his Errors could not forbear declaring againſt them; and commending the African Biſhops, who had condemned their Authors. He ſubſcribes to their Judgment, and proves by ſeveral Reaſons the Neceſſity of the Grace of Jeſus Chriſt. The firſt is taken from Prayer, which ſuppoſeth that we owe to God's Help, and not to our Free-will, the Good that we do. He ſays, that Man being fallen by the Abuſe of his Free-will, muſt be raiſed again by the Grace of Jeſus Chriſt. That our Saviour not only delivered him from Sins paſt, but that knowing his weakneſs, he alſo prepared him Helps and Remedies to preſerve him for the future; and that we muſt of neceſſity be overcome, if we be not ſuccoured by him, who alone can make us Conquerors. Neceſſe eſt, ut quo auxiliante vincimus, eo iterum non adjuvante, vincamur. By which Principles he condemneth all thoſe who affirm that there is no Need of God's Grace to do Good, and judgeth them unworthy of the Church's Communion: He ſaith, that refuſing to others God's Succour, they are bereaved of it themſelves, and ought to be cut off from the Church as rotten Members. He ſaith further, that if they acknowledge their Error, and admit of God's Grace, being ſincerely converted, it is the Biſhop's Duty to help them, and not to deny them the Grace which the Church grants to thoſe that are fallen, by admitting them to the Communion of the Church.

He ſpeaks much to the ſame purpoſe in that Letter which follows, directed to Silvanus Valentinus, and other Biſhops, who had been preſent at the Council of Milevis. He ſeems to reſtrain that Maxim which he eſtabliſhed, of referring all Church-affairs to the See of Rome only to Matters of Faith: Præſertim quoties fidei ratio ventilatur. He refutes particularly the Pelagian Error concerning Children dying before Baptiſm, whom they pretended to have a ſhare of Eternal Life.

The Third Letter of Innocent upon that Subject is his Anſwer to the five Biſhops, who writ to him, upon the Suſpicion of his Siding with Pelagius. He tells them, that by his two former Letters he ſufficiently diſcovered his Opinion concerning the Doctrine of that Heretick; that as to his Perſon, he had received certain Acts, by which it appeared, that he had been heard and abſolved ſince the Council; but that he did not believe them, becauſe it was plain from the Acts themſelves, that he had not clearly abjured his Errors: He concludes with aſſuring them, that he had read Pelagius his Book which they ſent him, and that he had found it to be full of Blaſphemies; that he met with no-

P. Innoc. I. thing in it that pleaſed him, or rather that he met with nothing there that did not diſpleaſe him.

With this Letter there was a ſhort Letter directed to Aurelius, but there is nothing remarkable in it.

Theſe Letters ſhould be put laſt, being written but a little before the Death of P. Innocent, which was upon the 12*th*. of March of the ſame Year, and long after thoſe that follow about the buſineſs of St. Chryſoſtom, written in 404.

The twenty-eighth is a Letter of Conſolation to St. Chryſoſtom, ſoon after his Baniſhment.

The twenty-ninth is directed both to his Clergy and People upon the ſame Subject. The Thirty-firſt to Theophilus, which is in Greek in Palladius, is the firſt of the Three. In the ſame Author there is another directed likewiſe to Theophilus.

The thirtieth Letter to the Emperor Arcadius, as well as the pretended Anſwers of that Emperor to Innocent, and to his Brother Honorius, are ſpurious, grounded upon the Fable of Arcadius and Eudoxia's Excommunication. He that forged them, ſuppoſeth, that this Empreſs out-lived St. Chryſoſtom; but it is certain from Eunapius, who is quoted by Photius, Vol. 77. of his Bibliotheca, that ſhe died ſoon after St. Chryſoſtom's Baniſhment, and three Years before his Death. P. Innoc. I.

The 32*d*. 33*d*. and 34*th*. Letters of P. Innocent, are written about the Perſecutions exerciſed by John of Jeruſalem againſt St. Jerome.

This Pope was skilful in the Eccleſiaſtical Laws: He often ſpeaketh in commendation of the Nicene Canons: He was very zealous for the Grandeur of the Roman Church, and inſiſted much upon her Rights and Privileges. He writes indifferently well, and he giveth ſuch an Air to his Notions and Reaſonings as recommends them, though they have not always that ſolidity and exactneſs that might be expected. The Chronological Order of his Letters, which ought to have been obſerved in the Printing of them, is as follows:

Saint JEROME.

St. Jerome. SAint Jerome was born in the Town of Strigonium (a), Situated upon the Borders of Pannonia and Dalmatia. He came into the World about the 345 Year of Jeſus Chriſt (b).

His Father Euſebius (c) took very great Care of his Education: And having made him learn the firſt Principles of Languages in his own Country (d), he ſent him to Rome, St. Jerome.

(a) THE Town of Strigonium.] This Town is called Strigonium by Ptolomy; ſome confound it with Strigonium in Iſtria, others will have it to be different.

(b) About the 345 of Jeſus Chriſt.] The Chronology of St. Jerom's Life is much diſputed; Some ſay, that he was born under the Empire of Conſtantine; according to ſome, in the 25th. Year of that Emperor's Reign; and according to others in the 31ſt. that is, in the 331, or in 337. Proſper obſerves in his Chronicon, that he died when Theodoſius was the Ninth time Conſul, and Conſtantius the Third, which is in the Year 420; and that he lived 91 Years. If this be ſo, the Year of his Nativity ſhould be 329. Paulus Diaconus, Sigebert, Bede, and the Writers of the Martyrologies, give him 98 years; which would ſet the time of his birth yet ſeven years higher, if we depend upon Proſper's Epocha for the time of his Death. Baronius, on the contrary computes that he lived but 78 Years; ſo that if St. Jerome dy'd in 420, he was born, according to that Author, in 342. Laſtly, others affirm, that he was born in 348, or 350; and that he dy'd in 427. All that can be done in this diverſity of Opinions is to find out thoſe which agree beſt with what St. Jerome hath written of himſelf, and with the Circumſtances of his Life. He ſaith in his Commentary upon the Prophet Habakkuk, Chap. 3. That he was a Child, a Student in Grammar, when Julian the Emperor was killed. Being, ſaith he, yet a Boy, PUER, and in Grammatical Exerciſes, at the time that all the Cities of the World were polluted with the Blood of Victims; in the greateſt heat of Perſecution, on a ſudden came the News of Julian's Death. This expreſſion, Dum adhuc eſſem puer, might intimate that St. Jerome was then but 10 or 12 Years old, if St. Jerome did not often uſe the ſame word to ſignifie an an older Age; for in the Apology to Pammachius, he hath the ſame word when he ſpeaks of his Age when he was at Rome. Dum eſſem puer Romæ, & liberalibus ſtudiis erudirer, &c. Now it is certain that he was then above 12 Years of Age. In a Letter to Nepotian, ſpeaking of the time of his retiring, he ſaith that he was then adoleſcens, imo penè puer. And yet he was then 30 Years old at the leaſt. In the 15*th*. Chapter of his Commentary upon Iſaiah, making mention of the Earthquake that happened under the Conſulſhip of Valens and Valentinian, anno 365, he ſaith that he was a Boy, and yet he muſt be then above 24 Years old. Laſtly, In his Preface to the Commentary upon Obadiah, he ſaith, that he had formerly made a Commentary upon that Prophet, being yet a Child: Quid igitur condemnamus, in quibus pueri luſimus? Baronius affirms, that St. Jerome ſaith in the ſame place, that he was 30 Years old when he writ his firſt Commentary upon Obadiah, and that 30 other Years were gone ſince: If it is certainly ſo, there could be no difficulty to fix the Epocha of St. Jerom's Nativity; but he doth not ſay poſitively that he was 30 Years old, when he made the firſt Commentary. It is certain that St. Jerome was ordained Prieſt by Paulinus before the Peace was concluded with Meletius, and conſequently before the Year 378; but he could not be then leſs than 30 Years of Age. When he came to Rome, three Years before the Death of Pope Damaſus, in 382, he muſt have been 40 Years old at leaſt. In 382, he muſt have been 40 Years old at leaſt. In 392 he compoſed his Treatiſe of Eccleſiaſtical Writers, and he muſt needs have been then above 50. He began to grow in years, when he had ſome differences with St. Auguſtine; and he treated that Saint, who was born in 355, as a perſon much younger than himſelf. All theſe things give us Reaſon to believe, that St. Jerome was born in the Year 340, or 342; That he compleated his Studies at Rome in the 25*th*. Year of his Age, or thereabouts, towards the Year 365; That he went into the Solitudes of Syria at 30, in 370, or 371; that he was ordained Prieſt at 35, in 375; that he came to Rome in 382, and went from thence in 385; that he retired to Bethlehem in 386, or 387; that he compoſed his Treatiſe of Eccleſiaſtical Writers in 392, where he mentioneth the Books that he had wrote before; that he writ Letters and Treatiſes after the taking of Rome, in the Year 412; that he died about 420, Aged 78, or 80 Years.

(c) His Father Euſebius. He was of a good Family, and ſufficiently rich. St. Jerome ſays, that he had a great Family. The Name of his Mother is not known. His Aunt by the Mother's ſide was call Caſtorina. St. Jerome wrote to her the 36 Letter. He had a Siſter that vowed Virginity, and a Brother much younger than himſelf, called Paulinianus.

(d) The firſt Principles of Languages, &c.] He gives this Account of his firſt Studies, in his Apology againſt Ruſinus. Memini me puerum curſitaſſe per cellulas Servulorum, dum feriatum duxiſſe luſibus, & ad Orbilium ſævientem de avia ſinu tractum eſſe captivum.

(c) The

St. Jerome. where he had for his Tutor the famous Donatus (e), under whom he made a wonderful Progreſs in Philological Learning (f). But that he might make himſelf yet more perfect, having been baptized at Rome (g), he reſolved to go into Gaul, where were at that time many able Men, who made Learning flouriſh. Having performed that Journey with Bonoſus his ancient Companion (h), and collected all the curious things he could meet with in Gaul, he returned to Rome, where he raiſed a very fine Library, deſigning to ſpend the reſt of his Life in Studies and Retirement: But finding that neither Rome, nor his Native Country were fit Habitations for ſuch as intended to lead that ſort of Life, he reſolved to withdraw into a far Country, and ſo leaving his Country, his Kindred and Eſtate, carrying only his Library, with a Sum of Money to bear the Charges of his Journey, he departed from Italy with Heliodorus (i), Evagrius, Innocent, and Hylas to go to the Eaſt. Evagrius left him at Antioch, but Heliodorus, Innocent, and Hylas accompanied him to the place of his Retirement. He went firſt to Jeruſalem, and there ſtaid ſome time, afterwards he went thro' the Provinces of the leſſer Aſia; and, Laſtly, having tarried ſome time at Antioch, he went into the diſmal Solitudes of Syria, that were uninhabited, unleſs it were with a few Monks. He ſpent there four Years in Study, and Exerciſes of Piety: He learned the Rudiments of the Hebrew Tongue, and began to write Commentaries upon the Scripture. Heliodorus ſoon left him, Innocent and Hylas died in that Deſart, and himſelf was taken very Sick, and being forced at laſt to quit it, he returned to Antioch. That Church was then divided by the Factions of Meletius, Paulinus and Vitalis, who all aſſumed the Title of Biſhop of that City. St. Jerome made no difficulty what ſide to take. His Baptiſm made him a Son of the Church of Rome, and ſo he was obliged to own him, whom that Church acknowledged for lawful Biſhop of Antioch. Having therefore written upon that Subject to Damaſus, who was then Biſhop of Rome, and having received an Anſwer in favour of Paulinus, he embraced his party, and was ordained Prieſt by him, but upon condition that he ſhould not quit that kind of Life which he had embraced, nor be obliged to perform any of the Functions of his Miniſtry (k): This Ordination was about the Year 375. before the Peace was concluded betwixt Meletius and Paulinus in 378. St. Jerome might be about 35 Years old at that time. As he would not enter into Orders, but upon condition not to be compelled to exerciſe the Functions of his Miniſtry, ſo he did not think himſelf obliged to have his Name regiſtred, nor to reſide in the Church of Antioch; he left it therefore to go to Bethlehem, which he choſe for his conſtant Habitation. Yet he did not ſtay there long, but went to Conſtantinople, where he converſed with St. Gregory Nazianzen, whom he calls his Maſter, and of whom he profeſſes to have learned to expound the Holy Scripture. Having tarried ſome time with this Saint, he had a Call to Rome about the Affairs of the Church, with Paulinus and St. Epiphanius (l), whoſe intereſt he had eſpouſed againſt thoſe of the Eaſt; this Journey was in all probability undertaken after the Death of Meletius in the Year 382. Damaſus taking notice of St. Jerome's merit, kept him with him, that he might have a Man that was able to anſwer all Queſtions propoſed from all parts. St. Jerome did not only diſcharge the parts of that difficult Employment moſt worthily, but compoſed ſeveral Books beſides. He was likewiſe charged with the conduct of the moſt conſiderable Ladies of the Town (m), by which means he got many Friends and much credit. But as he ſeverely reproved the Miſ-demeanors of the Clergy, and the Vices of the People, ſo he got many Enemies, who endeavoured to render his Behaviour ſuſpected. After Damaſus his Death, St. Jerome who this whole three Years that he was at Rome, longed for his Solitude, took Shipping in Auguſt, 385. to go back to Bethlehem, with a great many Perſons that accompanied him. He paſſed thro' Cyprus, where he ſaw St. Epiphanius; from thence he went to Antioch, where Paulinus received him courteouſly; and from Antioch where Paulinus received him courteouſly; and from Antioch he went to Jeruſalem, and then into Egypt, where he ſtayed ſome time with Didymus. Afterwards he viſited the Monaſteries of Nitria, and finding the Monks there adhering to Origen's Opinions, he returned to Bethlehem, whither the Ladies Paula, Euſtochium, and Melania came ſoon after. He continued ſome time in that place in a little Cell. But the number of thoſe that embraced that kind of Life being increaſed, Paula built there a Church and four Monaſteries, one for Men, and three for Women. St. Jerome then enjoying perfectly that Quietneſs which he ſo much deſired, continued his Labours, and there compoſed the greateſt part of his Works upon the Scripture. His reſt was ſomewhat diſturbed by the Quarrels which he had with Ruſinus, and with John of Jeruſalem, upon the Account of Origeniſm; yet he went on with writing, and defended himſelf with a great deal of Vigour. He died very old in the Year of Chriſt, 420. St. Jerome.

This Saint wrote great numbers of Books, full of profound Learning, and written with great Purity and Eloquence. In our Accounts, and Abridgments, we ſhall follow Marianus Victorius's Order, that he uſes in the Edition which he publiſhed of St. Jerome's Works.

The firſt Volume contains the Letters which St. Jerome writ, either to exhort his Friends to Vertue, or to inſtruct them, or to commend them in Panegyricks, or funeral Orations.

The firſt, directed to Heliodorus, was written by St. Jerome from his Solitude, ſome time after this Friend left him to return into his own Country. He exhorts him to come back again, by repreſenting the great Advantages of a retired Life, with great Force and Fineneſs, and by anſwering all the Reaſons that might keep him from embracing it with abundance of Art. This Treatiſe is a Maſter-piece of Eloquence in its kind; nothing can be more florid, more agreeable, or more moving. 'This Letter, ſaith he, 'whereof you will find ſome lines blotted with my Tears, 'will put you in mind of the Tears I ſhed, and of the Groans 'I uttered at your going from me. You then endeavour-'ed by your Careſſes, to ſweeten the contempt that you 'caſt upon my Intreaties.... 'I was not able to ſtop you 'at that time, and now I ſeek after you now you are ab-'ſent... No, I will uſe no more Intreaties, I will em-'ploy no more Careſſes: Love that feels it ſelf offended 'ought to turn into Anger: You who regarded not my 'Supplications, will perhaps hearken to my Reproaches. 'Nice Soldier, what are you doing in your Fathers houſe? '.... Remember that day wherein by Baptiſm you liſted

(e) The famous Donatus.] He that writ Commentaries upon Virgil and Terence, as St. Jerome aſſures us, in the firſt Book againſt Ruſinus, where he calleth Donatus his Tutor, as well as in his Chronicon.

(f) A wonderful Progreſs in Philological Learning.] He learned the Latin and the Greek Tongues perfectly, and got an exact knowledge of profane Authors: He exerciſed himſelf in publick pleadings and frequented the Bar, as he confeſſeth in the ſecond Chapter of his Commentary upon the Epiſtle to the Galatians.

(g) Having been baptized at Rome.] He ſays ſo poſitively in two Letters to Damaſus, which are the 57th, and 58th, where he obſerves, that he took the Robe of Chriſtianity in the City of Rome.

(h) With Bonoſus his ancient Companion.] St. Jerome ſaith in his Letter to Ruſinus, that they had been bred together, had ſtudied together, and that they went together to Rome, and travelled together into Gaul; but he followed not St. Jerome in his Journey into Syria, but retired into a Deſart Iſland of Dalmatia.

(i) He departed from Italy with Heliodorus.] He would not continue in his Native Country for ſeveral Reaſons, but particularly, becauſe of the diſorderly Behaviour of Lupicinus the Biſhop; nor at Rome, by reaſon of the tumult of that great City, that diſturbed his reſt.

(k) He was ordained Prieſt by Paulinus, but upon condition that he ſhould not quit that kind of life, which he had embraced, nor be obliged to perform any of the Functions, &c.] He ſays in his Apology to Pammachius, that he told Paulinus, Si ſic Preſbyterum tribuis, ut Monachum nobis non auferas, tu videris de judicio tuo. St. Epiphanius writing to John of Antioch, ſays that St Jerome and Vincentius, two Prieſts would perform no Functions of their Miniſtry, refuſing ſo much as to offer the Sacrifice. Cum ſancti Presbyteri Hieronymus & Vincentius propter verecundiam & humilitatem, nollent debita nomini ſuo exercere Sacrificia, & laborare in hac parte Miniſterii, qua Chriſtianorum præcipua ſalus eſt.

(l) He was called to Rome with Paulinus and St. Epiphanius.] He ſays ſo himſelf in his 16th, and 27th Epiſtles. He came thither in the 382, and went away three years after, as he obſerves in the Letter to Aſella; he ſpeaks in the 11th Letter, and in his Apology to Pammachius of the Letters, and Anſwers which he writ in Damaſus's Name.

(m) He was charged likewiſe with the conduct of the moſt conſiderable Ladies of the Town.] Theſe Ladies are become famous by St. Jerome's Writings; their Names are Marcella, who being left a young Widow, and having been but ſeven Months with an Husband, refuſed to Marry a Man of the firſt quality called Cerealis, to continue in Widow-hood. Her Mother Albina, who came alſo to hear St. Jerome. Melania is not leſs famous by the Praiſes of St. Jerome, than by theſe of Ruſinus. Aſella, Marcellina, and Felicitas, are alſo of the number of thoſe whom he commended: but his greateſt affection appeared to be for Paula and her Daughters, Bleſilla, Euſtochium, Paulina, Ruffina, and Toxotium. This is what he ſaith himſelf in his Letter to Aſella, of the Eſteem, which he had gotten among the Women. I have, ſaith he, dwelt three Years at Rome, I was often encompaſſed with great numbers of Virgins and Women, I often expounded the holy Scripture to them, this reading made them conſtant, and their Aſſiduity begot a kind of Familiarity, upon which an ill Opinion was conceived of me, and yet he was not able to prevent wholly evil ſpeaking. The Clergy of that City, whoſe manners he reproved, found fault with his Carriage, accuſed him of too much Familiarity with Paula, and they ſuborned a Footman to tax him with diſorder; but the Fellow being impriſoned, and put to the Rack, diſowned all that he had ſaid before.

St. Jerome.

'your ſelf a Soldier of Chriſt, then you took an Oath of 'Fidelity to him, that you would ſpare neither Father nor 'Mother for his Service..... Tho' your little Nephew 'ſhould hang about your Neck, tho' your Mother ſhould 'tear her hair, and rend her clothes to ſhow you that Bo-'ſom that carried you, to oblige you to ſtay; and tho' 'your Father ſhould lie down upon the Threſhold of the 'Door to ſtop you, ſtep over your Father, and follow the 'Standard of the Croſs with dry Eyes: It is great mercy 'to be cruel on ſuch occaſions. I know you will tell me, 'we have not an Heart of Stone, nor Bowels of Iron..... 'The Love of God, and the fear of Hell break all Chains. 'The Scripture, you will ſay, commands us to obey our 'Parents: Yes, but whoſoever loveth them more than 'Chriſt, loſeth his own Soul. But this, you will ſay, is 'to be underſtood, when they perſecute us to make us de-'ny Chriſt. You are miſtaken, Brother, if you ſuppoſe 'that a Chriſtian can be without Perſecution: He is then 'moſt violently aſſaulted, when he thinks himſelf moſt 'ſecure. Satan our Enemy is always like a Lyon ſeeking 'to devour us;.... On the one ſide Pleaſures court us, 'on the other Covetouſneſs torments us..... You are not 'allowed to enjoy your own Eſtate, you muſt renounce 'all for Jeſus Chriſt. If you will be Heir to the Goods 'of this World, you cannot be Co-heir with Jeſus Chriſt. 'Do you know the meaning of the Word Monk? Why do 'you remain in the World, you that ought to be alone?..... 'But what! you will anſwer me then, are all thoſe that 'live in Cities no Chriſtians? You are not in the ſame 'condition with others. Hear the Words directed unto 'you by our Saviour; If you will be perfect, ſell all that 'you have, give it to the poor, and come and follow me. 'Have you vowed perfection? A perfect Servant ſhould 'have nothing but Jeſus Chriſt. So that if you be deſirous 'of this World's Goods, you are no longer in that State 'of perfection which you have embraced. Perhaps you 'will alledge the Example of thoſe Church-men who live in 'Cities; ſhall I find fault with their Reſolutions? God 'forbid, that I ſhould ſpeak evil of thoſe that ſucceed the 'Apoſtles, who conſecrate the Body of Jeſus Chriſt with 'their Sacred Mouths, who make us Chriſtians, and who 'holding the Keys of the Kingdom of Heaven in their 'hands, judge, if I may ſo ſay, before the day of Judg-'ment, and are the Guardians of the Virginity of the Spou-'ſes of Chriſt. It is not with Monks as with Secular 'Church-men: Theſe feed the Sheep of Chriſt, and we re-'ceive from them the ſpiritual Food: they live of the Al-'tar, and we ſhould be guilty if we did not bring our Of-'ferings to the Altar. I am not permitted to ſit down be-'fore a Prieſt, and if I ſin he may deliver me to Satan; if 'you are ſollicited to take Orders, I ſhall rejoyce with you 'for your Exaltation, but ſhall fear a Fall .... for as he 'who worthily diſcharges his Miniſtry, acquires a degree 'of perfection; ſo he on the contrary that comes to the 'Altar unworthily, is guilty of the Body and Blood of 'Chriſt. All Biſhops are not Biſhops. If the Example of 'St. Peter comforts you, let that of Judas terrifie 'you. If you admire Stephen's Sanctuary, let the Fall 'of Nicholas fright you. It is not the Eccleſiaſtical Dig-'nity that makes good Chriſtians.... It is not eaſie for all 'Men to have St. Paul's Graces, nor St. Peter's Holineſs, 'who now are reigning with Chriſt. If a Monk falls, a 'Prieſt may pray for him, but who ſhall pray for the Fall 'of a Prieſt? St. Jerome having thus far proſecuted his 'reaſonings, endeth with theſe Acclamations. 'Imitating, 'ſaith he, thoſe Pilots, who happily ſteered their Ship be-'tween Rocks and Banks of Sand! O Wilderneſs, he crys 'out, always covered with the flowers of Jeſus Chriſt! O 'Solitude, where the ſtones that were made uſe of to build 'the City of the great King, ſpoken of in the Revelations, 'are to be found! O happy Retirement, where Men may 'have familiar converſation with God! What do you do, 'Brother, in the World? how long will you dwell under 'the ſhadow of Houſes? till what time will you be in the 'Priſon of ſmoaking Cities? what are you afraid of in 'theſe ſolitary places? Is it Poverty? but Jeſus Chriſt call-'eth the poor happy. Do's Labour aſtoniſh you? Can he 'that ſtrives in the pulick Exerciſes be crowned before he 'has fought; Do you think of your Diet? a lively Faith 'fears not Hunger. Do you dread lying upon the naked 'ground, with your Bodies worn out with Faſting? Re-'member that Jeſus Chriſt reſts there along with you. Are 'you ſcared with the extent of this hideous Solitude? Pa-'radiſe is open to you. Theſe are ſome of the Arguments 'which St. Jerome uſes to perſwade Heliodorus to return 'to his Retirement.'

The Second Letter to Nepotian Heliodorus his Nephew was compoſed by St. Jerome long after the Firſt, as he ſays himſelf at the beginning. 'Being, ſaith he, yet young, when 'I ſtruggled with the firſt motions of Youth, by the Au-'ſterities of Solitude; I writ to Heliodorus your Uncle a 'Letter of Exhortation, full of Complaints and Tears, to 'ſhow how ſorry I was for the abſence of my Friend. I 'plaid then ſuitably to my Age, and uſed all the Flowers 'of Rhetorick with which my ſelf at that time was full. 'But now I am Old, and my Forehead is full of wrin-'kles, and my Chin covered with a white Beard, I can no 'longer do what I could do then.' And yet, he diſcour-ſes here after a manner youthful enough, producing ſeve-ral Examples taken out of Eccleſiaſtical and Prophane Hiſto-ry, to ſhew that Old Men have not the ſame heat nor vi-gour that young Men have. He addeth, 'Expect not there-'fore from me youthful Declamations, florid Sentences, 'ſweet Words, poignant or acute Expreſſions at the end of 'my Periods, to draw the applauſe of thoſe that hear us; 'I beg of God only the lights of his Wiſdom..... Hear-'ken then, as St. Cyprian ſaith to a Diſcourſe that hath 'more Strength than Sweetneſs; Hearken to him that is 'your Colleague, and your Father by his Age.... I know 'that your holy Uncle Heliodorus, who is now a Mini-'ſter of Jeſus Chriſt, has taught and do's teach you Ho-'lineſs, and that his Life is an Example of Vertue to you: 'But take from me beſides theſe ſmall Directions, and joyn-'ing this Treatiſe to that which I writ before to your Un-'cle, learn of this how to be a perfect Church-man, as 'the former may inſtruct you, how to be a good Monk. Theſe are the main Precepts which St. Jerome giveth to a Church-man in this excellent Letter. 'A Clerk, ſaith he, 'that ſerveth the Church of Jeſus Chriſt ought to begin 'with the knowledge of what his Name ſignifies; and 'then labour to be what is ſignified by it. The Greek 'Word κλῆρος ſignifieth a Lot or a Portion: Therefore the 'Name Clerk is given to Church-men, either becauſe they 'are conſecrated to the Lord, or becauſe the Lord is 'their Portion, but whoſoever belongeth to the Lord, or 'hath the Lord to his Portion, ought to live as one that 'poſſeſſeth the Lord, and in whom the Lord dwelleth: he 'is to poſſeſs nothing but the Lord.... And ſo indeed, 'in ſerving at the Altar, I ought to live of the Altar: 'but ought to be content with what is neceſſary for Food 'and Raiment; and ſtript of all things, I ought only to 'follow the Croſs.... I conjure you therefore, and I ad-'moniſh you, let not Intreſt make you enter into Chriſt's 'Service, neither heap up greater Riches in the Eccle-'ſiaſtical State than you did when you were in the World, 'leſt they ſay unto you: Their lot will do them no Good: 'We ſee ſome Men wealthier ſince they have been Monks, 'than they were before: Some Clerks have Riches while 'they ſerve poor Jeſus Chriſt, which they had not while 'they ſerved the rich Devil: ſo that the Church groans to 'ſee them rich in her Boſom, that were Beggers whilſt they 'were in the World. You muſt let the Poor and Pil-grims at your Table, and Jeſus Chriſt will be one of 'the Gueſts. Avoid thoſe Clerks as a Plague who make 'Merchandice of the Church's Goods, who become rich 'and proud, tho' they were poor and contemptible enough 'before.... Let Women never come near your Houſes, 'or at leaſt but ſeldom; have no Familiarity with the 'Virgins conſecrated to God, either be acquainted with 'none, or love them all equally: Dwell not in the ſame 'Houſes with them. Truſt not your paſt Chaſtity: you 'are neither holier than David, nor ſtronger than Sampſon, 'nor wiſer than Solomon. Viſit not Women alone, ſpeak 'not with them face to face: but avoid whatſoever may be-'get evil Suſpicion.... This is a thing ſhameful for us. 'The Prieſts of falſe Deities, Comedians, Actors, and the 'baſeſt of Men may be Legatees, only Clergy Men and 'Monks cannot, the Law forbids them; and the Law 'that was not made by Emperors who were Enemies to 'Religion, but by Chriſtian Princes. Yet I complain not 'of this Law, but I am ſorry that we deſerved it... The 'Law was enacted out of a prudent foreſight, and yet it 'is not ſtrong enough to ſuppreſs Covetouſneſs. We 'elude the Law by Truſtees..... The Glory of a Biſhop 'is to give eaſe to the Miſery of the Poor, and it is his 'greateſt diſgrace to apply himſelf to increaſe wealth.' St. Jerome deſcribes here the Lewdneſs of ſome Clergy-men, and the Baſeneſs of others to ingratiate themſelves with rich Men, that they might make them their Heirs. He adds afterwards, That a Biſhop ought to do what he preaches; that his mouth, his hands, and his mind are exactly to a-gree together. He recommends to Prieſts Submiſſion to their Biſhops, and that they ſhould honour them as their Fathers. But at the ſame time he warneth Biſhops, to re-member that they are Prieſts and not Maſters: Sacerdotes ſe eſſe noverint, non Dominos; And that they are to uſe Church-men as Church-men, if they themſelves would be honoured as Biſhops. He blames the Cuſtom of ſome Churches where Prieſts were not permitted to ſpeak before their Biſhop. He would have a Preacher to excite the tears of his Auditors, rather than their applauſe. He ſays, that his Preaching ought to be neither Declamatory nor Satyri-cal, but that he ought to expound the Myſteries of our Re-ligion, and the Morality of the Goſpel, with Clearneſs and Gravity. Afterwards he goes to the manner how Church-men ought to be habited. No Clergy-men in his Opinion ſhould affect either black or white Garments, but avoid Neatneſs and Slovenlineſs: the one is a Mark of Effemi-nateneſs, and the other is often the effect of a fooliſh Va-nity. As to Alms-deeds, St. Jerome complains that in his time

St. Jerome. time some Bishops and Ecclesiasticks distributed small Alms to the poor, to enrich themselves, by appropriating to themselves considerable Sums under the pretence of those Alms, He tells the the Bishops that they ought to take special care whom they intrusted with the Dispensation of Alms. He reproves those who were very careful to see Churches well built, sumptuously adorned with Marble and Gold, and the Altars covered with precious stones, but took no care to make a good Choice of Ministers of Jesus Christ. He forbids Church-men, and particularly Bishops to make any Feasts for Lay-men, but recommends to them Sobriety. Yet he desires them not to proceed to Excess in their Fasts, but that such as they shall observe should be pure, chast, modest, simple, and without Superstition. He laughs at those, who refusing to eat Oyl upon Fast-days, inquired after Dainties and Meats not easie to be had; and that those, who forbearing to drink Water or to eat Bread, drank the Juice of pleasant Herbs. He declaims against those Ecclesiasticks, that affected to make a shew of their Mortifications and good Works, to get Glory to themselves. Lastly he recommends to Clergy-men Charity, Prudence, Discretion, and Modesty. He takes notice at the latter end, that he writes this Letter in his Retirement at Bethlehem, Ten Years after the Book of Virginity, which he wrote at Rome. This shews that this Letter is of the Year 393.

Nepotian to whom this Letter was written, dying not long after, St. Jerome writ the third Letter to his Uncle Heliodorus, to comfort him for the Death of his Nephew, of whom he makes a Panegyrick. This Letter which is not less florid or less eloquent, is full of Historical Passages, collected with much Affectation: He produces the Examples of several Heathens who despised Death: and shews that it ought less to be feared by a Christian. That Heliodorus ought to be comforted, since Nepotian was in possession of eternal Happiness. Then he sets forth his Vertues, together with the Misfortunes and Miseries of this Life, whence he concludes, that we are to esteem those Happy, who are out of this World. There he makes an elegant Comparison, betwixt the power of Kings and Bishops. A King says he, commands Men that are obliged to obey whether they will or no; whereas the Bishop hath Dominion over those only that are willing to obey. The Prince brings Men under by Terror: The Bishop is bound to serve those that are under his Conduct. The former protects the Bodies which must die; but the latter takes care of Souls to give them eternal Life. All the Faithful have their Eyes upon their Bishop, as his Family and Conduct is observed by every Body, he is to be an example to the whole Church: and there is none but thinks he can do what he does.

Besides, there is in that Letter, an excellent Portraicture of the uncertainty of this Life, We die daily saith he, We alter continually, and yet we are so foolish, that we live as if we were to abide eternally. The time I spend in dictating, writing, reading over again, and correcting, is so much time towards the shortning of my Life. The Stops, and Letters of my Amanuensis, are many Moments to lessen the Length of my Life; the only thing that turns to an account, is the love which we have for Jesus Christ. Charity never comes to an end, but lives for ever in the Heart, and by it our Brother Nepotian is still present with us after his Death; It is that which unites us, tho' we be separated by a vast space of Land or Sea

The fourth Letter is directed to one Rusticus a Western Monk, to whom St. Jerome gives Rules for that kind of Life, which he was to follow. It begins with this Sentence, None is more happy than a Christian, seeing he hath a promise of the Kingdom of Heaven: None is to fight more, since he is in danger of his Life; none is stronger since he overcometh the Devil: And then he exhorts Rusticus to persevere with Zeal in that profession which he had embraced. He enjoyns him to be respectful to his Mother, but not to be too much tyed to her, nor to hold any Conversation with other Women. He adviseth him to renounce all these things, and to withdraw from the World. He warneth him not lightly to take upon him Holy Orders, or to affect to be a Master before he had been a Disciple; and to chuse rather, to live in a Monastery, than to be an Hermit in a Solitude; and he represents the inconveniencies of that kind of Life: 'Commonly, saith he, an Hermit becometh 'proud; he thinks himself to be some Body, and forgetteth 'what he is; he eats what he pleases, sleeps as much as he 'will, fears no Body, and you shall find him oftner in the 'Town, than in his Cell. Not, saith he, that I find fault 'with a solitary Life, which I have so often commended: 'but I would have these Soldiers come out of Monasteries where they have learned their Exercises, lest the 'severe beginning of Solitude should amaze them.' St. Jerome recommends to him afterwards the Vertues and Exercises of a right Monk, and particularly, Working with his Hands, Reading and Meditation upon the Holy Scriptures, Prayer, Obedience to Superiors, Chastity, Fasting, &c. He blames the Monks that live like Seculars, and observes, that they used to chuse Monks to make them Church-men. He tells Rusticus, That he ought not to begin to write early, but practise long before he undertook to teach. At the end of this Letter he praises two Bishops of Gaul, Proculus Bishop of Marseilles, and Exuperius Bishop of Tholouse; what he saith of the latter is very remarkable. This Holy Bishop, saith he, imitates the Widow of Sarepta; he feeds others, and starves himself; his Face is pale with fasting; nothing but other Mens hunger troubles him; He has given all his Estate to the Poor, and yet there is none richer than he; He carries the Body of our Lord Jesus Christ in an Osier Basket, and his precious Blood in a Glass Vessel; one may say, that he drove Covetousness out of the Temple of the Lord. Follow, saith he, to Rusticus, at the latter end of the Letter, the steps of this good Bishop, and of other Persons who imitate his Vertues, those Saints whom the Pastoral Dignity has made poorer and more humble. And if you desire to embrace a condition more perfect, get out of your Country, as Abraham did, leave your Kindred, and get you to an unknown place. If you have any Goods sell them, and distribute the price of them to the Poor. If you have none, you are discharged of a great Burthen. Strip your self of all things to follow Jesus Christ only. Nudum Christum nudus sequere. It is Hard, I confess, it is Great, and it is Difficult, but the recompence is Infinite. He mentions in this Letter, that which he had written to Nepotian, and so this was written after the Year 393, perhaps in 394.

St. Jerome. In the fifth to Florentius, who came to Jerusalem, he commends the Charity of that Holy Man: He sent him a Letter to be delivered to Rufinus, who was to go from Egypt to Jerusalem with Melania, where he speaks as much to the advantage of that Presbyter, as he spoke afterwards since to his Disparagement. I would not, saith he, to Florentius, have you judge of me by his Vertues, you shall see in him the visible marks of Holiness, I am but dirt and ashes, and I think my self happy if my weak Eyes can but behold his Vertues; he is, pure and white as Snow, but I am all over covered with Sins. St. Jerome writ this Letter from the Solitudes of Syria, about the Year 772.

Florentius having answered St. Jerome, this Saint wrote again a sixth Letter, to tell him, that having read his, he was tempted to go to Jerusalem, but he durst not quit his Solitude. He prays him to desire of Rufinus the Commentary upon the Canticles that was composed by Rheticius Bishop of Autun, that he might take a Copy of it; and to tell him that an Old Man one Paulus, desired the Copy of Tertullian which he had lent him: He intreats him likewise that he would cause some Books to be transcribed for him, which he had not, of which he sent him a Memorandum: and sent him St. Hilary's Commentary upon the Psalms, and his Book of Synods, which he himself had copied with his own hand at Triers: and in requital he proffers to communicate to him the Books which he had in his own Library.

The seventh is directed to Læta Wife of Toxotius Paula's Son. This Lady had a young Daughter called Paula, whom her Grand-mother designed for a Religious Life. St. Jerome writes this Letter to the Mother of this little Girl, to teach her how she should breed her up, and exhorts her to send her as soon as she could to his Monastery at Bethlehem. Her Grand-father was a Priest of Jupiter, but the rest of the Family were Christians. This made St. Jerome says pleasantly, that it was a surprizing thing that this Old Man should make much of a Girl that Sung the Praises of Jesus Christ, and be compassed about with a Family of Christians, which gave him hopes that he would be converted: For, saith he pleasantly, I fansie that Jupiter himself might have believed in Jesus Christ, had he had such a Family as yours; what he says afterwards is more serious. Though he laughs at my Letter, and calls me Fool and Senseless, yet I despair not of his Conversion, his Son-in-Law did the same before he embraced the Faith of Jesus Christ. No Man is born a Christian, but becomes one afterwards..... It is never too late to be converted.

It will not be thought amiss, that I should set down here some of those Precepts which St. Jerome gives for the Education of a young Woman, to shew that it is no new thing to see retired Persons, and those that are furthest from the commerce of civil Life, teach the People of the World how to breed their Children. It is strange that such as have Children to bring up, should be obliged, to do it well, and to have recourse to those that have made a Vow never to have Children, or a Family themselves. 'Thus, saith St. Jerome, is that Virgin to be educated, whose Soul is designed to be the Temple of God, let her not hearken to, 'let her not learn nor discourse of any thing, but what is 'proper to inspire the love of God. Let her never hear filthy Talk, nor learn prophane Songs, but let her Voice 'be betimes accustomed to the singing of Psalms: Let 'no Boys come near her, her Maids and Governesses 'should be wise, and kept from the Company of disorderly People, lest they teach her more Evil than they have 'learned themselves. Let them learn her to read with 'Box or Ivory Letters, whereof she may remember the 'Names... She ought to be made to love Study and Labour, 'either by promising her a Reward, or by provoking her by 'Example. If she be of a soft Temper, reprove her not too 'fiercely; she ought to be encouraged with Commendation to raise in her Mind a Desire to excell others, and

'ſome trouble to ſee her ſelf out-done. Above all, have 'care that ſhe be not diſguſted with Study, leſt ſhe come 'to hate it when ſhe becomes older. Let her read the Sen-'tences of the Holy Scripture, and chuſe for her an able 'Maſter, a Man of a good Life, who may take pains to 'teach her to read. Deſpiſe not theſe beginnings as incon-'ſiderable, for the reſt depend upon them. The beginnings 'of Reading and Pronounciation are not taught alike by a 'skilful, and by a heavy Man: Do not let her uſe her ſelf 'to ſpeak her Words by halves, nor to take pleaſure in 'handling of Gold or Purple: the one will hurt her Speech, 'and the other her Manners. Let her not learn that in 'her Infancy which ſhe muſt forget afterwards..... Evil is 'eaſily imitated, and we often take up their Vices, whoſe 'Vertues we cannot reach: Her Nurſe ſhould be ſober, 'no Tatler nor given to Wine.... Let her Cloths be mo-'deſt, convenient for the State for which you deſign her: 'Let not her Ears be bored, nor her Face uſed to paint-'ing: ſhe ſhould not have her Hair died fair, nor her Gar-'ments adorned with Gold, Pearls or Jewels, unleſs you 'deſign her for Hell fire..... When ſhe grows older, let 'her follow her Parents to the Church, but never go 'out to return to the Pomps of the World. Let her keep 'to her Chamber, and never appear at Feaſts, or publick 'Meetings: But ſhe ought not to uſe too much Abſti-'nence till ſhe comes to the Age of ſtrength, leſt ſhe pre-'judices her Health. Let her take that which helps Neceſſity, 'but not what feeds Luxury: Let her not be at Muſick-'Meetings, nor hear muſical Inſtruments, but learn and 'repeat daily Sentences out of the Holy Scripture; She 'ſhould never go abroad without her Mother, nor grow 'very Familiar with any one of her Servants; provide her 'a wiſe, prudent and vertuous Governeſs, that ſhe may ſhew 'her the way to riſe in the Night to ſing Pſalms, to re-'hearſe the morning Hymns, at Tierce, Sext, Nones, and 'Veſpers. Let her pray, and work Night and Day; let her 'learn to handle the Diſtaff, to turn the Wheel and ſpin 'Wooll; let her not meddle with Embroidering either of 'Gold or Silver; let her be modeſtly clothed, and ſober-'ly fed; ſhe ſhould not faſt exceſſively, but obſerve Lent 'regularly, and take no pleaſure in Baths.

To thoſe moral Precepts, St. Jerome adds an Inſtruction for the Studies of young Girls, and adviſes them to read all the Canonical Books, both of the Old and New Teſtaments, not excepting the Canticles. He adviſes them not to read the Apocrypha, but the Books of St. Athanaſius, and of St. Hilary. He concludes by exhorting Læta to ſend her Daughter to the Monaſtery at Bethlehem. This Letter is written from the ſolitude of Bethlehem about the Year 400.

The eighth Letter was written in the Year 411. after the taking of Rome by the Goths, it is directed to a Virgin of the firſt quality, one Demetrias, who was retired into Africa, and there had embraced a religious Life. St. Jerome having commended her Grand-mother Proba, directs her how to maintain her Virginity, by recommending to her ſeveral Exerciſes of Piety, as reading of the Holy Scripture, renouncing the Pomps of the World, exerciſing Penance, moderate Faſting, Obedience, Humility, Modeſty, Alms-deeds, Prayers at all hours of the Day, and working with her hands. He adviſes her to ſtick to the Faith of Pope Innocent, and to beware of the Errors of the Origeniſts, and tells her, that ſhe ſhould chuſe rather to dwell in a Nunnery with other Virgins, than to live alone. But he would have her avoid the Company of the Ladies of the World. He finiſhes his Letter with Commendations of Virginity. It is to be noted, that in thoſe days Virgins conſecrated to God might go out of their Cloyſters, but St. Jerome adviſes them to do it ſeldom. He calleth Penance, a ſecond Plank after Shipwrack. He obſerveth that Faſting is not properly a Vertue, but the ground of all Vertues; that Chaſtity is a degree to arrive at Perfection, but if it be ſingle, it is not enough to merit the Crown of Heaven. He admoniſhes Virgins not to be lifted up, becauſe of the perfection of their State, but to humble themſelves under the mighty Hand of God, who reſiſteth the Proud, and giveth Grace to the Humble. But, ſaith he, what is of Grace is no recompence for Works, but a Free-gift, wherefore the Apoſtle writeth, that the Good which Man doeth is not to be attributed, either to his Will or Labour, but to the Mercy of God; and yet to will or not to will, is in our Power; but what depends upon us, doth not ſo without God's help. Velle & non velle noſtrum eſt, ipſumque quod noſtrum eſt, ſine Dei miſeratione noſtrum non eſt. At laſt he exhorts Virgins rather to beſtow their Eſtates upon the Poor, than to beautifie Churches.

The ninth Letter is directed to a Lady of Quality, one Salvina, who had loſt her Husband Nebridius, Son to the Empreſſes Siſter. Tho' St. Jerome knew her not, yet he writ to her at the requeſt of one of her Friends called Avitus. He begins his Letter with commendation of Nebridius, whoſe Vertues were the more to be admired, becauſe he had ſpent his Life at Court, and in great Employments; and then adviſes his Widow to render to her Children what ſhe owed her Husband by giving them a good Education, exhorting her earneſtly to continue a Widow, and giving Rules for her Behaviour. He exceedingly blames ſecond Marriages, and looks upon them rather as tolerated to prevent a greater Evil, than permitted as a Good. He obſerves in that Letter, that Riches do not hinder a Man from being ſaved, provided he makes good Uſe of them; as Poverty doth not make a Man holy or juſt, if he doth not avoid Sin. He calls Penance the Remedy of the miſerable: He ſays, that Men ſhould have a care of Sinning, out of hopes of riſing again by Repentance; that ſuch Wounds ſhould be prevented, as cannot be cured without Pain; that it is a far greater advantage to enter the Haven of Salvation with a ſound Veſſel full fraught with Merchandices, than to be forced to ſwim upon a Plank, in danger of being broken againſt the Rocks, and the Waves of an agitated Sea. Salvina or Silvina, to whom this Letter was written, was the Daughter of that Gildo Governour of Africa, who going about to uſurp the Empire, after Theodoſius his Death, periſhed Anno 398. She was a Widow, and dwelt at Conſtantinople when St. Chryſoſtome was expelled from thence, as we learn from Palladius, who tells us, That St. Chryſoſtome before he went away, entred into the Baptiſtery, and called to him Olympias, the Deaconneſſes, Procla, Pentadia, and Silvina, Nebridius's Widow: ſo that St. Jerome's Letter might be written about the Year 400. not long after the Death of her Husband.

St. Jerom.

The tenth is written to another young Widow named Furia, of the Race of the Camilli. He diſſwades her from Marrying a ſecond time, tho' ſhe had had no Children by her firſt Husband; he tells her, that in this particular, ſhe ſhould not regard neither the Remonſtrances, or Threatnings of her Father, but he recommends to her, that ſhe ſhould be ſober, modeſt, conſtant in reading and praying, that ſhe ſhould give Alms, avoid the World, deſpiſe its Pomps, &c. Laſtly, he repreſents the inconveniencies of a ſecond Marriage very livelily, and ſays at the latter end of the Letter, that he writ it two Years after his Books againſt Jovinian, that were compoſed, ſometime before the Year 392. and ſo this Letter is of 394.

The following Letter to Ageruchia, is upon the ſame Subject: He does ſpeak there with no leſs Zeal againſt ſecond Marriages, than in the foregoing; and yet he profeſſes not to condemn them. He ſays that he had ſeen at Rome a Woman buried by her twenty ſecond Husband, and a Husband who had buried twenty Wives. At the end of this Letter he diſcourſes againſt ſuch as are too much in love with this Life, and the good things of this World. Men, ſays he, build as if they were to live for ever, and they live as if they were ſure of Life next day. There is none ſo aged but promiſes to himſelf, that he ſhall live one year more, and ſo forgets what he is: and when he is come to the age that he deſired, yet does he not think himſelf near Death, and flatters himſelf with the Life of many years to come. He concludes this with a Deſcription of the pitiful condition, the Roman Empire was reduced to by the Incurſions of the Barbarians, eſpecially in Gaul and Spain, which made him afraid of Rome it ſelf. This ſhews, that this Letter was written ſome time before the taking of Rome, which happened in 410.

In the twelfth Letter St. Jerome preſcribes to Gaudentius ſome Rules for the Education of his Daughter Pacatula, whom he deſigned for a Religious Life: It contains ſuch Precepts as are in the Letter to Læta; there he bewails the misfortune of the taking of Rome, in 410.

The thirteenth is directed to Paulinus afterwards Biſhop of Nola, who intending to be a Monk, addreſſed himſelf to St. Jerome, as a Perſon perfectly well skilled in the Exerciſes of a Monaſtical Life, to ask his advice how he ſhould behave himſelf. This Father having with great Humility anſwered Paulinus his Compliments, for his living ſo long ſolitary in the Wilderneſs of Bethlehem, counſels him to retire out of Cities, if he reſolved to embrace a Monaſtick State.

In this Separation from the World, he chiefly places the difference between a Monaſtical, and an Eccleſiaſtical State. If, ſays he, you will enter upon the Miniſtry of the Church, and perform the Functions of the Prieſthood, if you are pleaſed with the Epiſcopal Dignity; then keep in Towns, and work out the Salvation of your own Soul by ſaving others: but if you would be a Monk, that is, live ſolitarily, what do you do in Towns, which are no Habitations for Monks, but for thoſe that love the World? .... Prieſts and Biſhops ought to imitate the Apoſtles and Apoſtolical Men, to ſucceed them in their Vertue, as they do in their Dignity; as for us, we have for our Commanders, The Pauls, the Antonies, the Julians, the Macarii, the Hilarions; and to come to the Scripture it ſelf, Elias is the firſt of our Order, Eliſha is one of us, the Sons of the Prophets that dwelt in the Fields and Deſart places, and upon the Banks of Jordan, they are our Maſters. The Sons of Rechab, who drunk neither Wine nor Sider, are alſo of this Number. St. Jerome having exalted the Monaſtical State by theſe Examples, preſcribes ſeveral Rules to Paulinus for the Exerciſes which he was to follow in his Retirement. He thanks him afterwards for the Books that he ſent him, in Commendation of Theodoſius, and having commended it, he exhorts

St. Jerome. horts Paulinus to apply himself to the reading of the Holy Scripture, telling him that if he had but that Foundation, nothing would be more learned, more sweet, or more acceptable, and better written than his Works. From thence he takes occasion, to describe the Style and Character of the Latin Ecclesiastical Authors. Tertullian, saith he, is full of Sentences, but his Elocution is hard. St. Cyprian's Style is smooth, and like the running waters of a Fountain, which passes away quietly, and without Agitation; but having wholly apply'd himself to the teaching of Vertue, and being busy'd by Persecutions, he writ nothing upon the Holy Scripture: The glorious Martyr Victorinus can hardly tell his meaning. Lactantius is like a River of a Ciceronian Eloquence; would to God he could as easily have confirmed our Doctrine, as he overthrows that of other Mens. Arnobius his Style is uneven, without method or order. St. Hilary hath an high and swelling Style, like the Gallick Tragedies, but intermixing that way of writing with Grecian Flowers, he often writes long Periods and very intricate, which can neither be read nor understood by Men of ordinary Capacities. And having thus set forth the Character of those ancient Authors, he giveth that of Paulinus in these Terms: You have, saith he, a great deal of Wit, a wonderful abundance of Expressions, a natural pureness, and rare prudence. If you add to that Eloquence, the Study and Understanding of the Scripture, I shall quickly see you the first of our Authors. And to this he exhorts him. This Letter was written before Paulinus was ordained, and after his Conversion about the year 380.

The fourteenth Letter to Celantia, is not like St. Jerome's Style. It is thought to be written by Paulinus Bishop of Nola. It contains very useful Instructions, and Precepts for a Lady, to lead a Christian Life in the midst of Honours, Riches, and the Perplexities of managing her Family.

The fifteenth Letter to Marcella, is in Commendation of one Asella a Virgin.

The sixteenth directed to a Virgin, named Principia, is the Panegyrick of Marcella, a Roman Lady, Daughter of Albina, who being left a Widow seven Months after Marriage, resolved to continue so, though she was courted by the Consul Cerealis, and was the first of the Roman Ladies that embrac'd a Religious Life. St. Jerome after a description of her Vertues, commends her for procuring the Condemnation of Origen's Books, and for the Courage which she shewed when Rome was taken; he observes that she died quickly after, and that he writ this Panegyrick two years after her Death; which shews, that this Letter was written in 412 or 413.

The seventeenth Letter is from Bethlehem, in the Name of Paula and Eustochium, to Marcella, whom they invite to come to them, and to visit the Holy Places. It may have been written about the year 400.

The eighteenth is written in St. Jerome's Name to the same Lady, and upon the same Subject.

The nineteenth is a handsome Letter of Thanks to Eustochium, for a Present of some Fruits that she sent him upon St. Peter's Day.

The following Letter to Marcella is likewise to thank her for some Presents, which that Lady had sent him from Rome.

The twenty-first is written to an Old Man of Spain of 100 years of Age. St. Jerome congratulates with him, that God had given him a fine Old Age, freed from the ordinary infirmities, common to Persons of those years; he commends his Vertues, and desires of him the Commentaries of Fortunatianus, the History of Aurelius Victor, and Novatian's Letters, and tells him that he would send him the Life of the Blessed Paul the first Hermite. This Letter may have been written in St. Jerome's first Retreat.

The two and twentieth is a Treatise of Virginity to Eustochium. Having spoken of the Excellency of it, of the Difficulty of preserving and the Danger of losing it, he lays down Precepts which a Virgin is to observe to keep her self pure. He forbids her to drink Wine; he bids her avoid dainty Fare, Effeminateness, Pleasures and superfluous Ornaments; he recommends Solitude to her, and the Reading of the Holy Scripture, Prayer, Renouncing of the things of this World, Fasting, Humility, and other Christian Vertues. He speaks against some Clergy-men who kept devout Sisters in their Houses; And who (saith he) under pretence of Spiritual Consolation, entertained a carnal commerce. He blames those also that courted Ladies; and to please them, condescended to do several things unworthy of their Character. To dissuade Eustochium from reading prophane Books, he tells her, that being once too earnest in reading Cicero, Plautus, and other prophane Authors, he fell into a violent Fever, and by it into a kind of Agony, and then was caught up in the Spirit to the Tribunal of Jesus Christ; where having been soundly whipt for reading prophane Authors too much, he was forbidden to read them any more: He assures Eustochium, that this Story is not a Dream, and calls the Tribunal where he appeared, and the Judgment that was given against him to attest the Truth of what he says: Yet when Rufinus upbraided him afterwards, that for all that he had not given over reading prophane Books, he laughs at his Simplicity, and jests upon him for taking a Dream for a Truth. Declaiming against Covetousness, he says, that a Monk of Nitria having got together One hundred Pence which were found in his Cell after he was dead, they buried him with his Money, and with this Imprecation; Let this Money perish with thee. He observes upon that occasion, that there were five thousand Monks in the Solitudes of Nitria, dwelling in separated Cells; and that there were three sorts of Monks in Egypt, namely the Cœnobites, who lived in common; the Anchorets, who dwelt alone in the Wilderness; and those that were called Remoboth, who lived two and two together, and maintained themselves after their own way, with the Work of their own hands. He blames this last sort, and describes the manner of living of the Anchorets and Cœnobites, at large. After this digression, he concludes with commending the Purity of Eustochium. In all likelihood this Treatise was composed at Rome about the latter end of Damasus's Pontificate, about the year 385. St. Jerome

The two and twentieth is written to Marcella upon the Recovery and Conversion of Blæsilla, Paula's Daughter, and Sister of Eustochium. This young Widow, after the Torment of a violent Fever for thirty Days together, had embraced a Solitary Life. St. Jerome commends her for that generous Resolution, and confounds those that blamed her. One may find in that Letter a handsome description of the Habit of those ancient Nuns. St. Jerome speaks there against the Finery of Women. This Letter was written at Rome about the year 383.

The next was written much about the same time; it is directed to Paula, concerning the Death of an Holy Nun, one Lea. St. Jerome shews, that they ought to rejoyce for her Death, because she enjoyed Happiness. He commends her Vertues, and comparing her Death, with that of one designed to be Consul, which happened at the same time; he shews the vast difference betwixt a poor righteous Man's death, and that of a great, rich, and impious Lord.

The four and twentieth is a Letter of Consolation to Paula, upon the Death of her Daughter Blæsilla, who departed this Life four Months after her Conversion: St. Jerome shews, that we should not mourn for Christians who die in a State of Grace, but rather rejoyce for their Happiness. He reproves Paula severely, because she had given way to excessive Grief. This Letter may pass for an exact Pattern of Elegant and Christian Consolation. It was composed at Rome about the year 384.

The five and twentieth is likewise a Consolatory Letter to Pammachius, upon the Death of his Wife Paulina, who was also one of Paula's Daughters. He saith but little of Paulina's Death, but enlargeth much in Commendation of Pammachius, who left the World after his Wife's Death, and had bestowed great part of his Estate upon the Poor, and built an Hospital for Strangers in the Port of Rome. St. Jerome says at the latter end of this Letter, that so great a number of Monks flocked to his Monastery at Bethlehem, that he was obliged to send his Brother Paulinianus to sell the rest of the Estate which he had in his own Country, to enable him to support his Undertaking. This informs us that this Letter was written at Bethlehem in 398.

The twenty-sixth is a Funeral-Sermon for the famous Paula, whose Life he describes, and makes her Panegyrick. It is directed to her Daughter Eustochium. He sets down at the latter end some Epitaphs which he put upon the Grave and upon the Cave where that holy Lady was buried in Bethlehem, and he says that she died Febr. 22*d.* and was buried the 24*th*, under the Seventh Consulship of Honorius and Aristænetus: That is, after our way of reckoning, the 404*th*. Year since the Nativity of our Saviour: And this proves that Funeral Oration to be of that same Year.

The seven and twentieth Letter to a Spaniard, one Lucinius is very remarkable. St. Jerome exhorts that Man who had embraced a Monastical Life with his Wife's Consent, to prosecute the Design which he had to come to Jerusalem. He tells him, that he had given Copies of his Works to those whom he sent to him; that he had not translated Josephus his Books, nor the Writings of St. Papias, and St. Polycarp; that he translated only some Treatises of Origen and Didymus; that he had corrected the Version of the Septuagint, restored the Greek of the New Testament, and that he sent to him part of the Canonical Books, which he revised and made conformable to the Truth of the Hebrew. He afterwards answers two Questions, which Lucinius had put to him about Saturday's Fast, and a frequent Communion. That Answer is too considerable not to be translated here. As to what you ask me concerning the Saturday's Fast, whether it ought to be kept; and about the Eucharist, whether it should be received every day, as is Customary in the Churches both of Italy and Spain, we have upon that Subject a Treatise of Hippolytus, a very Eloquent Man, and several Authors have occasionally treated of that Matter; for my part, this is the advice I think ought to be given in that Point; That Ecclesiastical Traditions, not contrary to the Faith, ought to be observed after the same manner, that we received them from our Ancestors: And I am persuaded, that the Custom of one Church is not to be abolished, because of a contrary one in use in another Church. Would to God that we could faſt every day: Do we not read in the Acts of the Apoſtles, that both St. Paul, and they that were with him faſted in the Days of Pentecoſt, and even upon Sundays: Yet for all that they ought not to be accuſed for Manichees, becauſe they did it out of a Spiritual Good, before which a Carnal one is not to be preferred. As to the Euchariſt, it is good, to receive it daily, provided there be no prickings of Conſcience, and no danger of receiving our own Condemnation. Not that I would have Men faſt on Sundays, or in the fifty Days after Eaſter, but I muſt ſtill return to my Principle, That every Country ought to follow its own Cuſtom, and look upon the Ordinances of their Anceſtors as Apoſtolical Laws. This Letter was written about the Year 406.

Lucinius to whom this Letter is directed being Dead. St. Jerome comforts his Widow Theodora, in the following Letter, in which he citeth there the Books of St. Irenæus with Commendation.

St. Jerome's eight and twentieth Letter is a Funeral Oration, in Commendation of a Roman Lady called Fabiola. This Lady had a former very lewd Husband, and having procured a Separation, ſhe was married to another; but having acknowledged her fault, ſhe did publick Penance, and was admitted to the Communion. She built at Rome an Hoſpital for ſick Perſons whom ſhe had aſſiſted with wonderful Zeal, and ſurprizing Charity. St. Jerome commendeth chiefly thoſe generous Actions, and ſpeaks of the Journey which ſhe had undertaken to Bethlehem, where ſhe remained ſome time with him. This Letter was written in 400, two years after the Funeral Diſcourſe for Paulina, and four years after that for Nepotian, as St. Jerome ſays in the beginning.

The nine and twentieth is a Note to Theophilus, wherein he excuſeth himſelf, that he had not yet tranſlated into Latin that Biſhop's Book concerning Eaſter, becauſe of the troubles of the Church that had diſquieted him, and Paula's Death which had overwhelmed him with Grief; ſo that this Letter was written in the Year 404.

In the thirtieth, St. Jerome comforteth a Spaniard, one Abigaüs, for the loſs of his ſight, he commends his Piety, and deſires him to exhort Theodora, Lucinius his Widow, to continue her Journey to Jeruſalem, this ſhows that this Letter was written after Lucinius his Death, about the Year 408, or 409.

The thirty firſt is likewiſe a Letter of comfort to another Blind Man, one Caſtrutius, who was St. Jerome's Countrymen. He thanks him for beginning his Journey to come to ſee him, but deſires him, to undertake the Journey next year. The year of this Letter is not known. It is probable that it was written very near the ſame time with the foregoing.

In the two and thirtieth, having adminiſtred comfort to Julianus one of his Friends, for the loſs of two Daughters, of his Wife and Eſtate, and for the Diſcontents occaſioned by his Son in-Law, he adviſeth him to give himſelf to God, and embrace a monaſtical Life: This Letter is written from the Solitudes of Bethlehem about the Year 408.

In the thirty third, he exhorteth Exuperantius to forſake the Wars, and the World, and to withdraw himſelf with his Brother Quintillian to Bethlehem.

The thirty fourth is to his Aunt Caſtorina, with whom he had had ſome difference, he intreats her by this Letter to be reconciled to him, this Letter was in all probability written during St. Jerome's firſt retreat, and ſince he tells her, that he had written to her the year before upon the ſame Subject, this muſt be of the Year 373, or 374.

The five and thirtieth was written at the ſame time. He prays Julian the Deacon to ſend him News of his own Country, and gives him thanks for ſending word, that his Siſter continued in the reſolution not to marry.

The thirty ſixth to Theodoſius and the other Monks, was written by St. Jerome, after his quitting the Deſart of Syria in 374. where thoſe Monks dwelt. He deſires them to pray, that God would call him back into the Deſart.

The thirty ſeventh to the Virgins dwelling upon Mount Hermon, is written from the Deſart of Syria, about the Year 373. He complains that they had not anſwered the Letters that he had written to them.

The eight and thirtieth is certainly not St. Jerome's, and there is nothing in it worth Obſervation.

In the thirty ninth he invites Rufinus Presbyter of Aquileia, who was then in Egypt, to come to him in his Solitude of Syria, where he was alone with Evagrius only, after the going away of Heliodorus, and the Death of Innocent and Hylas. This Letter is of 373, or 374.

The fortieth, forty firſt, forty ſecond, and forty third, are very near of the ſame time, they are written to his old Friends at Aquileia. The firſt to Niceas Deacon of that Town, the ſecond to Chromatius, Euſebius, and Jovinus: the third to Chryſogonus a Monk of Aquileia: and the laſt to another Monk called Anthony. Theſe are of no great Conſequence. St. Jerome.

The forty fourth to Ruſticus is more uſeful. He exhorts that Man to do Penance, urging ſeveral places of Scripture touching Repentance. He invites him to viſit the Holy Places. This Letter is not of the ſame Style with the reſt of this Father's Letters.

The forty fifth Letter is a biting Satyr againſt Virgins and Women, who dwelt with Clergy Men that were not of their Kindred.

The ſix and fortieth is a Declamation againſt Sabinianus a Deacon, whoſe Life had been diſorderly both in his own Country and at Bethlehem. Thoſe three laſt are written from the Solitude of Bethlehem. The Year is uncertain.

The ſeven and fortieth is an Hiſtorical Narrative of a Woman of Vercellæ, who having been falſly accuſed of Adultery, and condemned to die, tho' ſhe conſtantly denied the Fact, was tortured ſeven times, but could not be put to Death. The Style of this Letter is florid and childiſh, tho' St. Jerome writ it when he was well in years.

The Life of St. Paul the firſt Hermite, is one of St. Jerome's firſt Works. This man at fifteen years of Age withdrew himſelf into the Deſarts of Thebais, when Valerian and Decius perſecuted the Church, fearing his want of ſtrength to reſiſt the Temptation. He ſpent there the reſt of his Life, which laſted 113 years. St. Jerome gives an account of the manner of his being viſited by St. Anthony, and deſcribes ſeveral Circumſtances of that Hiſtory that are very hard to be believed.

The Life of St. Hilarion is full of Miracles of that Holy Anchorete Sr. Anthony's Diſciple. St. Jerome places it in his Catalogue, amongſt thoſe Books which he wrote after his Return from Rome to Bethlehem. Likewiſe he makes mention there of the Hiſtory of a Monk in the Deſart of Chalcis called Malchus, who having quitted the Monaſtery to return into his Country, was taken and carried away Captive by the Saracens.

This Volume endeth with his Book of the Famous Men, or Eccleſiaſtical Writers, written in Latin by St. Jerome, and tranſlated into Greek, as it is ſuppoſed, by Sophronius (n). He did it at the requeſt of Flavius Dexter, Præfectus Prætorio, in imitation of Suetonius, and other prophane Authors, who writ the Lives of Philoſophers, and other Famous Men. He confeſſes that Euſebius his Books did him much Service: He intreats the Authors of his own time, whom he doth not mention, not to take it ill; he declares that he did not intend to conceal their Works, but that they had never come to his hands; but however, if their Writings make them Famous, his ſilence will not long prejudice them. Laſtly, he obſerves that this Treatiſe confounds Celſus, Porphyry, Julian, and the other ſworn Enemies of the Church, who reproached it as having no Philoſophers, no Orators, or learned Men; by proving to them that it was eſtabliſhed, upheld and adorned by very great Men. This Book comprehends the Catalogue of Eccleſiaſtical Authors, and Writers, from Jeſus Chriſt to St. Jerome's time. It concludes with a Catalogue of the Works which this Father had compoſed to the fourth year of the Emperor Theodoſius, which is the Year 392, of Jeſus Chriſt.

The ſecond Tome, which is in the ſame Volume contains the Letters, or rather the Diſcourſes of Diſpute and Controverſie.

The firſt is his Treatiſe againſt Helvidius, of the perpetual Virginity of the Bleſſed Virgin Mary, that Man had written a Book wherein he pretended to ſhow by Teſtimonies of the New Teſtament, and the Opinions of ſome ancient Fathers, that after the Birth of Chriſt the Virgin Mary had Children, by Joſeph her Husband. The firſt paſſage of Scripture which Helvidius cites for his Opinion is that of St. Matthew, ch. 1. The Virgin being eſpouſed was found with Chriſt, before Joſeph and ſhe came together: Helvidius concluded from this place, that therefore they came together afterwards. St. Jerome anſwers him, that this Conſequence doth not follow, becauſe that a thing is often ſaid to have been done before another, which other is never to be done: and that when it is ſaid ſuch a one died before Penance, it doth not follow, that he, of whom this is ſpoken, does Penance in the other World; ſo likewiſe from what St. Matthew ſaith, that ſhe was found with Child before Joſeph knew her, it doth not follow, that he knew her after ſhe was with Child. The ſecond paſſage quoted by Helvidius is another of the ſame Evangeliſt, Joſeph knew not his Wife till ſhe had brought forth her Son; Helvidius concludes from this paſſage as from the former, therefore he knew her after ſhe was delivered. He maintained that the Word until always ſignifyed in Scripture a fixed time, after which the thing would come to paſs. St. Jerome ſhews

(n) By Sophronius.] Eraſmus publiſhed this Verſion under Sophronius's Name upon the credit of a Manuſcript. None doubted at firſt, but that it was his. Mr. Voſſius the Father owned it, but Mr. Iſaac Voſſius his Son, contradicted that Opinion in his Notes upon St. Ignatius's Epiſtles: where he boldly affirms, that this Verſion is not Sophronius's: that it is very bad, that he that made it did not underſtand Greek; that it is viſible that it was written by an Impoſtor. Huetius in his Book, De optimo genere interpretandi, refutes Voſſius, and doth not doubt but that Tranſlation was made by Sophronius, him,

St. Jerome. him, that tho' this is often true, yet there are several passages where it signifies an unlimited time, as it is said of God, I am, till you are grown old, or untill that, which can never describe the Term, or the End of God's exittence, seeing he is for ever. And when Jesus Christ saith in the Gospel, I am with you to the end of the World; it were ridiculous to conclude, Wherefore he will be no more after the World's end.

Helvidius's third Objection is grounded on the Title of First Born given to Jesus Christ, Luk. ch. 2. St. Jerome affirms, that it doth not suppose that he had younger Brethren, for in the Language of the Scripture, every Child of the first lying in of a Woman is called First-born, these Words being Synonymous, Adaperiens vulvam and Primogenitum, as appears, Numb. 18. Exod. 13. Levit. 12. Luk. 2.

The last Objection is taken from what is said in Scripture that Jesus Christ had Brethren; now among his Brethren, said Helvidius, are reckoned St. James, and Joses Son of Mary: as it is said, Matt. 27. Mark 15. Luk. 24. That Mary the Mother of James and Joses was present at the Passion, and at the Burial of Jesus Christ, but this Mary, said he, is the Mother of the Lord; for it is not likely, that she should forsake him upon that occasion. St. Jerome answers, that it is very certain by St. John's Testimony, that Mary the Mother of God was near the Cross of Jesus Christ at his Passion, since he recommends her to that Evangelist; but that Mary the Mother of James and Joses is different from the Mother of the Lord, seeing that of the two Apostles called James, one was Son of Zebedee, and and the other of Alphens. But it cannot be said that the Lord's Mother was married to either of these two Persons. He maintains then, that Mary the Mother of James and Joses was the Wife of Alphens, and Sister to the Mother of our Lord, and is also called Mary Cleophe. The Conjecture not being very certain, St. Jerome gives this general Answer, that the Word Brother is equivocal, and is taken four ways, a Brother by Nature, by Nation, by Relation, and by Affection; but sticks to the Brother-hood by Blood, shewing by several places of Scripture, that Cousins, and near Kindred are called Brethren.

Having thus with much Wit and Learning, refuted the false Consequences that Helvidius drew from those passages of the New Testament: St. Jerome opposes to Tertullian, and Victorinus whom Helvidius had quoted, the Authority of St. Ignatius St. Polycarp, St. Irenæus, St. Justin, and other ancient Apostolical Authors, who had written against the Heretieks Ebion, Theodorus of Byzantium, and Valentinus, whom St. Jerome pretends to have been of Helvidius his Opinion. But the Error of those Heretieks was far more intolerable, and we do not read that the Fathers quoted by St. Jerome, did precisely refute Helvidius's Error. However St. Jerome rejects Tertullian's Authority, by saying, that he was not of the Church; and as for Victorinus Pataviensis, he saith, that his Testimony hath no greater difficulty than that of the Scripture, since he speaks of Christ's Brethren, but does not say that they were the Sons of Mary. In the latter part of this Discourse, he speaks like an Orator of the inconveniencies of Marriage, and the advantages of Virginity. This Treatise was composed at Rome, about the Year 383.

In his Treatise against Jovinian, he further defends the Excellency of Virginity. This Jovinian had asserted in a small Discourse published at Rome, that Widows and married Women were not to be less regarded than Virgins, if they have the same Vertues; this was the first Error of this Man. The second was, that a Christian baptized could not fall from Righteousness. The third, that Abstinence from certain Meats was unprofitable: The last, that the glorified Saints are all equally Happy. St. Jerome refutes the first of these Errors in the first Book. He explains at first St. Paul's Notions concerning Marriage and Virginity; afterwards he takes notice of the Examples of the Old and New Testament, which Jovinian had brought to prove, that the greatest Saints and most excellent Men of all Ages had been married. St. Jerome shews that he has multiplied those Examples too much: He affirms that the Apostles left their Wives, after their Call to the Apostleship, and that St. John being called before he was married, always lived in Celibacy: He answers those places of Scripture alledged by Jovinian, and discourses of the Celibacy of Bishops, Priests, and Deacons. He condemns second Marriages with much severity, and produces several Examples of Heathen Women that either kept their Virginity, or continued in Widow-hood.

In the second Book he refutes Jovinian's other Errors He shews against the second, that the Holiest of Men may fall from Baptismal Grace. Against the third, that tho' God is the Creator of all things fit for Man's Use, yet it is good to fast and use abstinence, and that it is very dangerous to indulge one's Senses, and satisfie greediness. Lastly, that as there are various degrees of Vice, and Vertue here in this Life, so there are likewise in the other several degrees of Felicity and Pain. These Books were not compleated by St. Jerome, when he writ his Book of famous Men, though he mentions these two Books there: and so they are of the year 392. St. Jerome.

These Books being published at Rome, several Persons found fault with the hard Terms which St. Jerome made use of in speaking of Marriage. Pammachius having sent word of it to St. Jerome hinting withall at the principal Passages excepted against. This Father expounds them in the Apology directed to him, declaring that it was never his intention to condemn Matrimony.

He found himself obliged a second time to defend himself from the same Accusation against a Monk; and this he does in the Letter intituled the fifty first to Domnion.

The fifty second Letter to Pammachius was joyned to the Apology directed to him. He thanks him for securing the Copies of his Books against Jovinian; but he tells him that it was impossible to suppress them: that he had not the good Fortune to be able always to correct his own Works, as some had; because he had no sooner composed them, but they were made publick even against his Will. He insults over them that found fault, challenging them to write against him. He adviseth him to read the Commentaries of Dionysius, Rheticius, Eusebius, Apollinarius, and Didymus, who expounded that Passage of the Epistle to the Corinthians, and spoke in the behalf of Virginity more powerfully than himself. He sends him Word, that he had translated out of the Hebrew, the Books of the Prophets, of Job, and that he had written Commentaries upon the Twelve Minor Prophets, and upon the Book of Kings. He observes that if his Translation of Job be compared with the Greek, and the old Latin Version, there will be found such a difference as is betwixt truth and falshood.

The fifty third Letter is directed to Riparius a Presbyter in Spain, who desired to know his opinion of a Book of Vigilantius a Presbyter of Barcelona; who condemned the Veneration of Relicks, and the Worshipping of Saints. St. Jerome explains that Error, and prayeth Riparius to send him his Book that he might refute it at large, and this he does with great earnestness in the Treatise that follows this Letter written two years after, as he himself affirms. He taxeth Vigilantius, with reviving Jovinian's Errors, and wonders that any Bishop should be of his mind. If saith he, the name of Bishops may be given to such as will ordain no Deacons, except they are married: What will the Churches of the East, those of Egypt, and even the See of Rome, which do not admit into the Clergy any but such as are unmarried, or being married profess to live as if they were not?

Having made this occasional remark concerning the Celibacy of Clerks, he particularly undertakes Vigilantius's Error about Relicks and the Invocation of Saints. This Man maintained that the Bones of the Dead were not to be honoured, and that the Saints could not hear our Prayers. St. Jerome puts himself into a great heat to prove the contrary, and falls upon Vigilantius with a great deal of reproachful Language. In that Treatise he likewise defends the Festivals of Saints, the Solemnites practised upon their Eves, Pilgrimages to Jerusalem, the Monastick State, and the Use of lighted Torches only in the Night; for he owns, that in his time they lighted none in the Day. We saith he, do not light Torches in the day time, as you accuse us, but only in the Night, that their Light may afford joy and comfort in the Obscurity of the Night. This Treatise was written long after the Book of famous Men, about the year 406.

The fifty fourth Letter to Marcella, is against the Errors of the Disciples of Montanus. He not only lays them open, but accuseth them. 1. Of owning but one Person in God. 2. Of condemning second Marriages, as adulterous. 3. Of holding the obligation to keep three Lents. 4. That they did not acknowledge Bishops to be the Apostle's Successors, and the first of the Hierarchical Order, but that there were two degrees of Persons above them. 5. That they were very rigid in imposing of Penances and never granted Absolution. 6. That they believed the Prophecies of Montanus, Prisca, and Maximilla. Lastly he says that they were accused of celebrating Criminal Mysteries with the Blood of a Martyred Child, but he declares that he had rather believe that this was not true. This Letter is written about the year 400.

In the fifty fifth Letter to Riparius, he say sthat Ruffinus, whom he calls his Catiline, had been expelled out of Palæstine.

In the fifty sixth he commends Apronius for opposing the Errors of the Origenists, and invites him to come to Jerusalem. Both these Letters were written under the Pontificate of Anastasius, about the year 400.

The two following Letters were wirtten to Pope Damasus, out of the Desarts of Syria. St. Jerome asks his advice, What he should do about the Disputes then in the East. I am, saith he, tyed to your Holiness's Communion, that is to St. Peter's Chair; I know that the Church is founded upon that Rock. Whosoever eateth the Lamb out of that House, is a prophane Man. Whosoever is not found in that House shall perish by the Flood. But forasmuch as being retired into the Desart of Syria, I cannot receive the Sacrament at your hands, I follow your Colleagues the Bishops of Egypt: I do not know

St. Jerome. Vitalis; I do not communicate with Meletius; Paulinus is a Stranger to me, He that gathereth not with us ſcattereth. He gives an account afterwards of the occaſion of thoſe Diviſions. After the Deciſion of the Council of Nice, after the Decree of the Council of Alexandria, enacted with the conſent of both the Eaſtern and Weſtern Biſhops, they yet ask of me that am a Roman a new Confeſſion of Faith, to acknowledge three Hypoſtaſes. It is an Arian Biſhop, and the Montaniſts who require that of me.... We ask what ſignifies this Word, Hypoſtaſis, they ſay, that it ſignifies a ſubſiſting Perſon; we anſwer that if it be ſo, we are of that opinion; They are not ſatisfied with our profeſſing that Sence, but they require further that we own theſe Terms. There muſt be ſome Poyſon hid under theſe Words. We ſay openly, that if any one owns not three ſubſiſting Perſons, let him be Anathema; but becauſe we do not uſe the Terms which they require we are accuſed of being Hereticks.... Order me if you pleaſe what I ſhould do, I will not be afraid to ſay, that there are three Hypoſtaſes, if you command me ſo to do. Yet he is afterwards of opinion that this way of ſpeaking is not to be approved of, becauſe the Term Hypoſtaſis is for the moſt part equivalent to that of Subſtance.

The fifty eighth Letter to Damaſus is much upon the ſame Subject, and he asks his advice with whom he ought to communicate, Meletius, Paulinus, or Vitalis. Theſe Letters are of 374.

The following Treatiſe is a Dialogue betwixt an Orthodox Chriſtian and a Diſciple of Lucifer Calaritanus. This Man defends the Conduct and Opinions of thoſe of his Sect, maintaining that thoſe are not to be owned as Biſhops, that communicated with the Arian Biſhops, and that ſuch as were baptized by Hereticks ought to be baptized again. The Orthodox Chriſtian affirms the contrary. St. Jerome introduces the Orthodox Chriſtian relating the Hiſtory of the Council of Ariminum, and the diſſentions that troubled the Church, and ſhewing that it was a reaſonable thing to pardon thoſe Biſhops that had been ſurprized. There is in that Treatiſe a curious paſſage about Tradition, which he proves by the Cuſtom of impoſing of Hands, and the Invocation of the Holy Ghoſt, after the adminiſtration of Baptiſm. He adds, That many other things are obſerved in the Church upon the account of Tradition without being authorized by a written Law; as, ſaith he, the dipping of the Head three times in Water at Baptiſm, the giving Milk, and Honey to the baptized: not bowing the Knee upon Sundays, not all the time betwixt Eaſter and Whitſontide. The Luciferian advances this Propoſition, and the Orthodox Chriſtian agrees to it, confeſſing that the Biſhop alone lays his Hands upon the Baptized, to cauſe the Holy Ghoſt to come down upon them: That he only conferrs the Sacrament of Confirmation. But he ſays that this Cuſtom was introduced rather for the honour of the Prieſthood, than through any neceſſity; That however the Holy Ghoſt, deſcends upon them that are baptized tho' they receive not the Impoſition of Hands from the Biſhop. This Treatiſe was written at Rome about the Year 384.

The 59th. Letter to Avitus, contains an enumeration of thoſe Errors which St. Jerome had found in the Books of Origen's Principles, tranſlated by Rufinus; which Pammachius had ſent him ten years ſince; which ſhews that it was written about the year 407.

The 60th. is a Tranſlation of St. Epiphanius's Letter to John of Jeruſalem, concerning the Ordination of Paulinianus, whom St. Epiphanius had ordained Deacon and Prieſt, in a Monaſtery of St. Jerome's, which John of Jeruſalem pretended to be under his Juriſdiction. This Letter is very cunningly written. He complains of the Anger which John of Jeruſalem had ſhewed for that Ordination, repreſenting to him, that ſuch behaviour was contrary to the Spirit of the Church; and that inſtead of being angry that he had ordained a Prieſt in a Monaſtery of ſtrange Monks that were not of his Dioceſs, he ought to ſhew much ſatisfaction, becauſe there ought to be no Diſſention among Prieſts, when no other thing is aimed at but the Good of the Church. 'That though all Biſhops have every one their Church 'committed to their Charge, and whereof they ought to 'to take Care, and that no Man is to incroach upon another's 'Juriſdiction, yet Chriſtian Charity which hath no Bounds 'is to be preferred in all things; and that the Action is not 'to be conſidered in its ſelf, but reſpect ought to be had 'to the Circumſtances of Time, Place, Perſons, and Oc'caſions.' He urges afterwards ſuch things as might excuſe his Ordination by laying, that there being but two Prieſts in their Monaſtery, Jerome and Vincentius, who would not perform any Function of their Miniſtry, he thought it his Duty to give them a Prieſt; and having met with Paulinianus, who ſo declined the Prieſthood, that John could not ſeize upon him to put him into Orders, he cauſed him to be taken by Force and ordained a Deacon: and that afterwards he ordained him Prieſt againſt his Will, when he waited at the Altar, and that however the Ordination was performed in a Monaſtery, and not in a Pariſh of his Dioceſs. He adds, that the Biſhops of Cyprus, were much more ſimple, and careleſs in the Sence of John of Jeruſalem; for they were ſo far from finding fault, that their fellow-Biſhops ordained out of their Dioceſes, thoſe Perſons that declined the Prieſthood; that on the contrary they exhorted them to do it. He ſpeaketh next againſt Origen's Errors, and deſireth John of Jeruſalem to condemn them. He reduceth them to eight principal Heads, which are theſe. 1. That the Son of God does not ſee his Father. and that the Holy Ghoſt doth not ſee the Son. 2. That Men's Souls were ſent from Heaven to the Earth for their Sins, and ſhut up in Bodies as in ſo many Priſons. 3. That the Devils ſhall repent one Day of their Faults, and ſhall reign with the Saints in Heaven. 4. That Adam and Eve had no Fleſh before they commited Sin: and that the Skins wherewith they are ſaid to have been covered, ſignifies their Bodies. 5. That Man ſhall not riſe again with Fleſh and Bones. 6. That the earthly Paradiſe is to be underſtood Allegorically. 7. That the Waters, which the Scripture ſpeaks of above the Firmament, are the Angels, and thoſe which are ſaid to have been under the Earth are the Devils. 8. That by Sin Man loſt the Image of God. The latter part of this Letter is concerning a Veil whereon was painted the Image of a Man, which St. Epiphanius had found in a Country-Church near Jeruſalem, and had cauſed it to be torn in Pieces, becauſe he condemned that Practiſe as contrary to the Cuſtom of thoſe times. We have ſhewed in another place, that this Letter was truly written by St. Epiphanius in 392, and tranſlated by St. Jerome in 393. St. Jerome.

John of Jeruſalem ſeeing himſelf thus accuſed by St. Epiphanius, made an Apology, which he ſent to Theophilus Biſhop of Alexandria, and cauſed it to be publiſhed every where, and chiefly in the Weſt. Pammachius having ſeen it at Rome, wrote to St. Jerome, to let him know that Men were divided about that matter, and deſired him to write to him about it. St. Jerome did not deferr to put Pen to Paper, and directed to him in 393. the ſixty firſt Letter, wherein he obſerves, that St. Epiphanius having by his Letter, laid Eight Articles of Origen's Errors to John of Jeruſalem's Charge, he had juſtified himſelf but from Three, without ſo much as mentioning the other Five. Thoſe Three Articles are about the knowledge of the Son of God, the Pre-exiſtence of the Souls, and the quality of the Bodies after the Reſurrection. As to the Firſt Head John of Jeruſalem had cleared himſelf, by declaring that he was no Arian; but St. Jerome pretends that he had not juſtified Origen. He had explained his Opinion very obſcurely upon the Second and the Third. St. Jerome relates Origen's Opinion upon thoſe three Articles, and refutes them with much Earneſtneſs. Then he enlarges upon the Quarrel betwixt St. Epiphanius and John of Jeruſalem: He complains, that the latter had addreſſed himſelf to Theophilus Biſhop of Alexandria; and that he had ſaid in the beginning of his Apology that he was charged with the Care of all the Churches. 'You, ſaith he, 'directing his Diſcourſe to John of Jeruſalem, who make your 'boaſt of following the Rules of the Church, and obſerve 'the Canons of the Council of Nice, and go about to ap'propriate to your ſelf the Clergy that depend upon other 'Biſhops, tell me I pray, is Paleſtine under the Juriſdiction 'of the Biſhops of Alexandria? If I miſtake not, it was 'decided in the Council of Nice, that Cæſarea was the 'Metropolis of Paleſtine, and Antioch of all the Eaſt. 'You ought therefore either to ſend to the Biſhop of Cæ'ſarea with whom you knew, we communicated; or if a 'Judge was to be ſought for further off, you might have 'ſent your Letters to Antioch. But I gueſs what it was that 'kept you from ſending to Cæſarea, or Antioch; I perceive 'what you were afraid of, and were willing to avoid: 'You choſe rather to apply your ſelf to a pre-ingaged Per'ſon, than to yield your Metropolitan that Deference which 'you owe him.' After that he accuſeth Iſidore, whom Theophilus had ſent to the place to inform himſelf of the ſtate of things, of being corrupted by John of Jeruſalem, of following his Paſſion, and declaring abſolutely for him; of being concerned in compoſing the Apology, and then undertaking to carry it himſelf. 'So that, ſaith he, He that 'dictated the Letter was he that carried it.' At laſt St. Jerome ſays, that the Original of that Quarrel was not Paulinianus's Ordination, but the accuſing of Origen's Errors. And this he ſets forth ſpeaking againſt John of Jeruſalem with all poſſible Vehemency. By this Letter it appears, that both St. Jerome, and the other Monks of Paleſtine had great differences with him.

But leſt Theophilus perſuaded by John of Jeruſalem's Letter, ſhould come to eſpouſe his Intereſt, St. Jerome directs the ſixty ſecond Letter to him, in defence of his own Cauſe. This Biſhop had ſent him a Letter, by Iſidore, whereby he exhorted him to Peace. St. Jerome declares in his Anſwer, that he was deſirous of nothing more; but that ſuch as could alone procure it, were contented only to make a ſhow of being for it. That the Peace which he would have, was a true Peace, the Peace of Jeſus Chriſt, a Peace without Enmity, a Peace without War. That there could be no Peace, when one would uſurp Dominion and Empire, when he excommunicated true Catholicks, when Men were forced to communicate with an Heretick, and to receive the Body of Jeſus Chriſt at his hands, and when Violence was uſed. Theſe things he charges upon

John

St. Jerome.

John of Jerusalem and complains of the injurious Treatment wherewith he uses him in his Letter. And as for that which John of Jerusalem upbraided him withal, that he had formerly translated Origen's Books, which this Author so much condemns; Now he answers, that he was not the only Man that did it: that before him St. Hilary the Confessor had done it: but that imitating him he had expunged what was dangerous in those Writings, and translated what was good and useful; and however he had always commended Origen for his Ability in expounding the Scriptures, yet he had always condemned him for his Errors. That he owned there was a vast difference betwixt the Apostles Writings, and those of other Ecclesiastical Writers, since the former wrote nothing but what was true, whereas the latter were sometimes deceived. Afterwards he justifieth the Ordination of his Brother Paulinianus, saying, that St. Epiphanius did not ordain him in the Diocess of John of Jerusalem, since the Monastery where that Ordination was performed, belonged to the Diocess of Eleutheropolis, and not to that of Jerusalem: That he had done very ill in asserting that St. Ephiphanius had ordained a Child, since Paulinianus was then thirty years old: That John himself was not older when he was ordained Bishop.

St. Jerome having thus pleaded for himself, doth in his Turn likewise accuse John of Jerusalem. He says, that this Bishop was the Author of all this trouble, and a Fomenter of the Division: that pretending to be for Peace, he prosecuted a cruel War: That he requested, and obtained his Banishment. Here he crys out in this manner: The Church of Christ, saith he, was established by sufferings, and shedding of Blood. Persecutions have increased it, and by Martyrdom it came to be crowned. If our Enemies were not of this Disposition; if they had rather persecute than be persecuted; In this Country there are Jews and Hereticks of all sorts, and particularly infamous Manichees, who hindred them from falling upon these; Their Spleen is against us, we are the only Persons whom they intend to drive away..... One Monk, I speak it with grief, one Monk who boasted of being the Bishop of an Apostolick See, threatneth another Monk, desires he should be banished, and accordingly 'tis done; but God be praised, adds he, Monks are not frighted with Persecutions, they wait for the Blow without Trouble, and without offering to defend themselves. For every Monk being out of his own Country is also out of the World. What need is there of the Prince's Authority, or of written Orders? Let them give us the least Summons, and we will depart immediately, knowing what we are, and and being perswaded that the Earth is the Lord's, and that Jesus Christ is not shut up in any place. He tells us of going to Rome to communicate with that Church, from which we seem to be separated; but this we need not do, we are as much in Communion with the Church of Rome in Palæstine as if we were at Rome, we communicate with it's Priests which are in the Town of Bethlehem. At last St. Jerome professes that he is ready to be reconciled to John of Jerusalem, provided he would put on a charitable Spirit, and prove the same towards him as he had been before. We know, saith he, what we owe to the Bishops of Jesus Christ; but let them be contented with Honour and Respect, and know that they are Fathers and not Masters; and particularly with relation to those who despising Ambition, preferr rest and quietness before all other things.

After St. Jerome's 63*d*. Letter follows Ruffinus's Preface to his Translation of Origen's Principles. He saith in that Preface, That several Persons desirous of learning the Holy Scriptures wished that Origen might be made to speak Latin: That his Colleague and Brother, St. Jerome, having translated two Homilies of this Author upon the Book of Canticles, had so much exalted him in his Preface, that Men were very desirous to see his Works: That he had given this advantageous Testimony of him, That he exceeded all others in his Commentaries, but had surmounted himself in his Homilies upon the Book of Canticles: That this same St. Jerome had promised to translate the other Works of this Author, but he thought it afterwards more glorious to write himself and to be an Author rather than an Interpreter. We therefore prosecute and compleat a thing which he has both approved and began, but we cannot render Origen's Words with the same Eloquence. And he adds, that this very thing had kept him from undertaking that Translation; but at last he yielded to Macarius's earnest Intreaties; however that in this Version he had followed the Rule of those who had translated that Author before him; and that he had imitated St. Jerome, by cutting off those things which seemed disagreeable to the Doctrine of the Church; and so much the rather, because in Origen's Works there were Notions quite contrary: That the Reason of that seeming Contradiction might be found in the Apology that Pamphilus had written for Origen, and which himself had translated; and that he pretended to shew, by undeniable Proofs, that Origen's Works had been corrupted in several places by Hereticks or Men of ill designs; and that for this very Reason he had either omitted or altered in the Translation of that Treatise, those Articles wherein he seemed to speak otherwise than he did in his other Books. This Preface was written in 397. when Rufinus published his Version of the Books of Origen's Principles at Rome.

St. Jerome.

It was no sooner published, but Oceanus and Pammachius sent it to St Jerome, observing that they had found still some Errors there, notwithstanding that great part was expunged: intreating him, that to secure them in the Truth, he would make a faithful Translation of that Work. The Note which they writ to him about that Business, is the sixty fourth Letter.

St. Jerome thinking himself indirectly affronted by Rufinus's Preface, intimating that he had formerly commended Origen, which might insinuate that he then approved his Errors, and approved them still, fell instantly to Writing, to let the World know in what Sence he had commended Origen: He owns that he did it in two places of his Works, namely, in the Prologue of his Translation of the Homilies upon the Canticles, dedicated to Damasus, and in the Preface to his Treatise of Hebrew Names. But he affirms, that in both these places, he had not spoken either of his Doctrine or of his Opinions. I have commended him, saith he, as an able Interpreter, and not as a man whose Dogm's ought to be followed; I have admired his Parts without approving his Doctrine, I have valued his Philosophy, and not his Preaching. He adds, That if any man would know what his Opinion has always been concerning Origen's Books, let him but read his Commentaries upon Ecclesiastes, and his three Volumes upon the Epistle to the Ephesians, whereby it will appear that he hath constantly contradicted Origen's Opinions. Huetius is not perfectly satisfied with this Excuse of St. Jerome: He says that it doth not appear by the Commentaries which he citeth, that he hath contradicted Origen's Notions, tho' he hath filled them with that Author's Dogm's without quoting him. If he believed them false, says he, ought he not to have censured them? Why did he not think it an Honour to copy them, as he affirms in the Preface to the second Book of his Commentary upon the Prophet Micah? Why hath he asserted in his Preface to the Book of Hebrew Names, That none but an ignorant man could deny that Origen was one of the Masters of the Church, after the Apostles. 'These Reasons made Huetius say, that Rufinus was in the right in accusing St. Jerome of being an Origenist, and upbraiding him in his first Invective, that the Name of a Master of the Church cannot be given to an Heretick; that St. Jerome's Excuse is pitiful; that Rufinus thoroughly proves that he commended Origen's Doctrine; and that at last this Father is obliged to confess that his Opinions were altered as to Origen: That Sulpitius Severus had a great deal of Reason to find fault, that St. Jerome having at first followed Origen, did of a sudden condemn all his Works: That St. Augustine did justly accuse him of Inconstancy and Lightness; and that Pope Pelagius the II. is not to be blamed for putting him amongst Origen's Disciples.' That in a word, tho' this Holy Doctor acted the part of a good Catholick in abjuring Origen's Errors after he had owned them; yet it were to be wished he had been more constant and moderate, and that he had not so much indulged the Motions of his inflamed Choler, so as to be carried away unto contrary Notions, according to the different Circumstances of Time, and outrageous railing against the greatest Men of his Age. For this must be acknowledged, that Rufinus reproved him often with Reason, and that he often blamed Rufinus without Ground.

* This is the Judgment which the Learned Huetius, now nominated to the Bishoprick of Soissons, doth with much Reason and Justice make of the Parts and Conduct of St. Jerome. I willingly subscribe to it, and do not doubt but that as many as have ever read this Father, will be of the same Mind.

[* By this it will appear that things are not always to be approved or disapproved upon St. Jerome's Word. In his management of his Quarrel he is deserted by the Papists, because they condemn the Errors of Origen as well as he, and therefore they cannot with any Decency excuse his Carriage towards Rufinus; but in his Controversies with Jovinian and Vigilantius, concerning Virginity, and Invocation of Saints, he is applauded by them; only the wiser Men amongst them are a little out of Countenance at his Heat: It is a Misfortune that Jovinian's and Vigilantius's Books are lost; and there is Reason to believe from those other Disputes wherein St. Jerome was ingaged, that if we knew what they said for themselves, instead of thinking them Hereticks, we should esteem them illustrious Defenders of the Christian Religion against that Superstition which an immoderate Zeal for a Monastical Life, did at that time introduce into the Church. Jovinian indeed is accused of maintaining, that a Christian who is baptized cannot fall away from Grace, which is a very great Error; but it had no relation to his other Opinions, and since Obstinacy is necessary to make a Man a Heretick it would be rashness to call Jovinian a Heretick of whom we know nothing, but what we have from his Enemies,]

And now to return to our Subject: St. Jerome going on to justifie himself of those things which they reproached him withal, namely, of commending Origen, sets forth some

St. Jerome. Examples of great Men that might be commended for their Learning, who did hold very remarkable Errors. 'St. Cyprian, ſaith he, took Tertullian for his Tutor, as appears 'by his Writings, and yet did not approve the Dreams of 'Montanus and Maximilla as he did. Apollinarius hath 'written very convincing Books againſt Porphyrius; and 'Euſebius writ a moſt uſeful Hiſtory of the Church. The 'former erred concerning the Myſtery of the Incarnation, 'and the latter defends the Opinions of Arius.' He owns that he was Apollinarius's Diſciple, Didymus's Scholar, yea, that he hath had a Jew for his Maſter; that he collected carefully all Origen's Works, and read them exactly, but affirms, that he never followed his Errors. Laſtly, to make ſhort, he ſaith, that if he may be believed, he never was an Origeniſt, and that tho' he had been, yet now he ceaſeth to be ſo. Upon this Principle he exhorts others to imitate him, and to condemn his Errors; after that, he gives Origen high Commendations, rejecting his Opinions. He refutes what Rufinus had aſſerted, that the Errors which were found in Origen's Works had been added; and laughs at the Liberty which he had taken to expunge what he thought fit. Laſt of all, he affirms, that the firſt Book of the Apology for Origen, which bore the Name of Pamphilus, was not that Martyr's, but Didymus's, or at leaſt ſome other Author's. This Letter is written near 150 years after Origen's Death, that is, in the year 399.

The ſixty ſixth Letter to Rufinus, wherein he complains of his Preface, is written at the ſame time. He ſpeaks to him as to a Perſon with whom he would not quite fall out; he telleth him, that he knew not with what Spirit he writ that Preface, but that all the World ſaw how it was to be underſtood; that he might have been even with him, by commending him after the like malicious Manner, but that he choſe rather to juſtify himſelf of the Crime laid to his Charge than offend his Friend; that he intreated him to cite him no more after the ſame manner; that he undertook to write to him about it as to his Friend, rather than to ingage with him publickly. To let him know that he would do nothing that might check that ſincere Reconciliation which he had made with him, he exhorts him on his part to do the ſame, leſt, ſaith he, that biting one another we do not mutually conſume one another.

Rufinus, who was not of a Temper to lie ſtill without replying, immediately put Pen to Paper to write againſt St. Jerome. Pauliniauus, who was then in the Weſt, having found a Way to get the Extracts of Rufinus his Book before it was quite publiſhed, ſent them to his Brother, who beſides was informed by Pammachius and Marcellinus, of the principal Heads contained in Rufinus's Anſwer, and ſo he compoſed immediately his firſt Apology divided into two Books.

In the firſt he anſwers Rufinus's Calumnies. The firſt was, that he had tranſlated into Latin the Books of Origen's Principles without altering.

St. Jerome anſwers, that he did it, to ſhew the falſity of Rufinus his Tranſlation, and to ſhew Origen's Errors, and ſo his Tranſlation could hurt no Body, ſince it appeared that it was made only to condemn the Errors of that Book.

To juſtifie Origen's Doctrine about the Trinity, Rufinus had quoted the firſt Book of Pamphilus's Apology. St. Jerome affirms, that it was not compoſed by that Martyr.

Rufinus laid before him the Praiſes which he had given to Origen. He anſwers as he did before, that he had commended his Learning but not his Doctrine, as he had commended Euſebius and Apollinarius without approving their Errors.

Rufinus charged him with publiſhing Errors, and Contradictions in his Commentaries. He ſays that he did it without approving of them; that he has collected in his Commentaries, the Notions and Words of others, obſerving that ſome underſtood thoſe paſſages in one Sence, and others in another, that ſo the prudent Reader may chuſe what is Truth, and reject what is falſe; and that in this Caſe none can tax him with Errors, and Contradictions, who barely relates the Notions, and different Expoſitions of others. This he proves by the Example of the ableſt Commentators of profane Authors.

Rufinus had found fault, that he had variouſly tranſlated the twelfth Verſe of the ſecond Pſalm, where the Vulgar Tranſlation ſaith, Embrace the Diſcipline, by rendring it according to the Hebrew, ſometimes worſhip the Son, ſometimes worſhip ye only. St. Jerome tells him, that he had kept to the Sence rather than to the Letter, tranſlating the Hebre Word Naſhecu, which ſignifieth, Kiſs or Embrace, by this term Worſhip ye; That as to the other Word Bar, which hath ſeveral Significations, (for it ſignifies the Son, or a handful of pickt Ears of Corn,) he had followed the former Signification in his Commentary, and that in his Verſion, to prevent the Jews accuſing Chriſtians of falſifying the Holy Scripture, he adher'd to the latter Signification, which both Aquila and Symmachus followed.

Rufinus found fault likewiſe with ſeveral paſſages in St. Jerome's Commentary upon the Epiſtle to the Epheſians, in which he had abridged the Commentaries of Origen. St. Jerome defends himſelf, by ſaying that he produced Origen's Opinions without approving of them, ſince he obſerves at the ſame time, that thoſe Explications were not his own. St. Jerome.

Laſtly Rufinus upbraided St. Jerome, that he was naturally given to Calumniating, and Speaking evil of every Body: That he reproved other Mens Works out of Envy: Yea, he laid Perjury to his Charge; becauſe having proteſted before the Judgment Seat of Chriſt (as he ſays in his Book of the Inſtruction of Virgin's,) that he would read no more the Books of profane Authors, yet it did appear, that he had not left off reading of them. St. Jerome juſtifieth himſelf from the former Accuſations; but as to the laſt he thinks it an Honour to follow the Study of learned Books, and declares, that whatſoever he hath ſaid in the Treatiſe concerning the Inſtructions of Virgins, was only the Deſcription of a Dream.

Towards the latter end of this Letter, he aſſerts that what he had ſaid in the eighty third Epiſtle to Oceanus, that Baptiſm remits all Sins, that it blots out even the very ſpot of Bigamy: So that a Man might be ordained after a ſecond Marriage, if the former was before Baptiſm. This Deciſion is contrary to that of Pope Innocent I.

St. Jerome having thus pleaded for himſelf againſt Rufinus's Accuſations, anſwers the Apology which he had made to ſatisfie Pope Anaſtaſius who had condemned him, and to juſtifie himſelf of thoſe things that they reproached him withall. He made Profeſſion of the Faith of the Church, and of the Myſtery of the Holy Trinity at firſt. St. Jerome anſwers that this is not the Queſtion, for now all Mankind was perſuaded of that Principle concerning the Incarnation. St. Jerome asks him what he thought of the Soul of Chriſt, whether it was created before or at the Moment of his Conception. He chargeth him that he did not ſpeak plain enough about the Reſurrection of the Body, and further he pretends that Rufinus did not ſufficiently explain himſelf upon the Eternity of the Devil's puniſhment. Concerning the Origination of the Soul he had ſaid that there were three different Opinions; ſome held that one Soul begat another, as Tertullian and Lactantius. Others that God created them after the Forming of the Body, and ſo they came in by Infuſion; and laſtly ſome imagined that they were made when God created the World of nothing; that this was Origen's Opinion, and that of ſome other Greeks: For his part, he was at no certainty about it, but left it to God, and to thoſe to whom it ſhould pleaſe God to reveal it: But that he believed what the Church openly profeſſed, that God was the Creator of Souls, and Bodies. St. Jerome torments himſelf much about the laſt Point, and tho' he doth not ſay that any of theſe three Opinions are decided, yet he inveigheth much againſt Rufinus, becauſe he would not condemn Origen's Opinion. He endeavours afterwards to refute the Reaſons which he alledged to juſtifie himſelf for tranſlating the Books of Origen's Principles: He finds fault that he ſhould ſtrike out ſome of the Errors and leave the reſt. He anſwers thoſe Conjectures which he brought to ſhow that Origen's Books were Corrupted; and ſince he had aſſerted the ſame thing of the paſſages in the Works of the Ancients, as in St. Clemens, Dionyſius of Alexandria, and which did not ſeem to be agreeable to the Doctrine of the Church, of the Myſtery of the Holy Trinity: He denies that that can be reaſonably ſaid, obſerving that if ſuch Conjectures may take place, the greateſt Hereticks ſhould thereby be eaſily excuſed, as Marcian, Manichæus, Arius, Eunomius. But as Rufinus might have preſſed upon St. Jerome by asking him, Why then were there any Errors in their Works, and whether he would call them Hereticks upon that Account? St. Jerome prevents that Objection by ſaying, That perhaps they were in an Error, or the expreſſions they made uſe of had another Sence, or their Works might be corrupted by Tranſcribers; or laſtly, that Writing before the Arian Hereſie appeared, they did not take the neceſſary Precautions againſt it. When St. Jerome made theſe remarks, he did not conſider, that Rufinus might uſe them to defend Origen, as he did to excuſe the Ancients: and perhaps this way of juſtifying him had been more ſolid than that which he made uſe of, by ſaying that thoſe Errors had been added. This St. Jerome oppoſes with all his Might, and endeavours to ſhow, that all the Examples of falſification of the Fathers Works alledged by Rufinus, have no Relation to thoſe that are ſuppoſed to be in Origen's Books. In the reſt of the Letter he juſtifies himſelf from that Calumny, that he blamed the Verſion of the Septuagint. He declares, that he was ſo far from condemning it, that he had corrected it himſelf, and ſpake much in its Commendation. But he aſſerts that this Tranſlation was not compoſed by the LXX in diſtinct Cells, and he defends thoſe that have recourſe to the Hebrew Text.

Rufinus was much ſurprized to ſee an Anſwer to a Book that was not yet publiſhed, and he Writ immediately to St. Jerome about it, and ſent him withall an intire Copy of his firſt Anſwer. This Father who was not wont to leave any thing unanſwered that was againſt him, wrote immediately the third Book of his Apology, which contains nothing but Perſonal Quarrels, or Repetitions of what had been ſaid before: which commonly proves the end of all Diſputes that continue long betwixt learned Men.

Pelagius

St. Jerome.

Pelagius having made his Errors publick. St. Jerome, who ſuffered no New Opinion in the Church to paſs unpuniſhed, fell upon him vigorouſly in his Letter to Cteſiphon.

The firſt Maxim of Pelagius, which he oppoſes, is that of Apathy, that is, Freedom from Paſſions, which this Heretick thought Men could attain unto; and that having once got thus far, they might be without Sin.

The ſecond is concerning the Grace of Jeſus Chriſt, whereof Pelagius denyed the Neceſſity, affirming, that Mens Salvation depended upon the Power of their Free Will. St. Jerome, as well as St. Auguſtine oppoſes this Error, by ſhewing the neceſſity of Prayer, and of good Works. If ſaith he, the Grace of Jeſus Chriſt dependeth upon our Will, if we need only a free Will, and none other help is required, to what purpoſe ſhould Prayer be made to God? Wherefore do we endeavour to move his Clemency, and call upon him for Succour, to obtain daily what is our own Power? ..... We muſt therefore remove Faſting alſo and Continence: For why ſhould I labour to get that by my Induſtry, which always depends on my ſelf? He adds that this Conſequence follows ſo Naturally upon this Heretick's Principles, that one of his own Party could not forbear reaſoning after this manner in a Commentary, ſaying; That if there is need of foreign help to do Good, then Liberty is deſtroy'd. 'St. Jerome ſaith a-'gainſt this Error, that we have nothing but what is the 'Gift of God: That indeed it is Man's part to run and to 'will, but he hath need of God's aſſiſtance, to do it: That 'it is not, that God ſhould once give us his Grace, he 'muſt give it conſtantly: If we would obtain we muſt 'ask for it, and having obtained it, there is Need of asking: 'And yet this Grace does not deſtroy Free-will, neither 'does it follow upon theſe Principles, that it is impoſſible 'to keep God's Commandments.

The third Maxim of Pelagius refuted by St. Jerome in this Letter, is a Conſequence of the former. He held, that Man could be perfect, and freed from Sin, without God's Help. St. Jerome proves the contrary by ſeveral places of Scripture, which ſhew that Man cannot be delivered, but by the Grace of Jeſus Chriſt. This Letter is of the year 411.

He handleth the ſame Queſtions in the Dialogue againſt the Pelagians, where he introduces a Pelagian, under the Name of Critobulus, diſcovering and eſtabliſhing his Errors; and a Catholick under the Name of Atticus confuting them particularly, by Teſtimonies of Holy Scripture. This Dialogue is divided into two Books, and was written ſome time after the Letter to Cteſiphon about the year 415.

The ſixty ſeventh Letter is a Tranſlation of a Letter from Theophilus to St. Epiphanius, whereby he deſires that Biſhop of Cyprus to aſſemble a Synod in that Iſland, to condemn Origen, as he had done in Egypt. This Letter is of the year 399.

The ſixty eighth is a Letter of St. Jerome's to Theophilus, who had ſent him Word, that he ſhould be exact in the obſervation of the Canons. St. Jerome thanks him for his admonition, and exhorts him to uſe his Authority againſt the Origeniſts, ſince Patience and Meekneſs could not reclaim them from their Error. This Letter is of the year 398.

The ſixty ninth is from Theophilus to St. Jerome, giving him notice how he had driven away the Monks of Nitria who were accuſed of Origeniſm. St. Jerome returns him thanks for that Noble Action by the ſeventieth Letter. And he commends him again in the ſeventy firſt Letter for what he had done againſt Origen. And in the laſt Place Theophilus acquaints him by the ſeventy ſecond that he had cleanſed the Monaſteries of Nitria of Origeniſm.

The ſeventy third is from St. Epiphanius to St. Jerome, giving him notice of the Judgment given by Theophilus againſt Origen: and he ſends him the Letter written by that Biſhop, and prays him to Publiſh what he had written in Latin upon that Matter.

The ſeventy fourth is a Note to Marcella.

The ſeventy fifth is againſt Vigilantius, who had accuſed him of Origeniſm, he uſes the ſame Arguments for his defence, that he had done in his other Letters, and treats Vigilantius very ill. This Letter was written, about the year 397.

The ſeventy ſixth is of the ſame time. He repeats there what he had written in ſeveral places, that Origen deſerves to be commended for his Learning, but that his Principles are not to be followed.

The ſeventy ſeventh to Mark the Presbyter was written by St. Jerome from the Deſart of Syria, about the time when the Eaſtern Biſhops tormented him to oblige him to own three Hypoſtaſes, about the year 373.

The ſeventy eighth to Pammachius and Marcella, is about Origen's Condemnation. He gives them an Account of what Theophilus had decreed. He ſends them a Copy of his Letter, and the Acts of his Judgment, and deſireth them to have it confirmed at Rome, by Pope Anaſtaſius. This Letter is of 399.

The ſeventy ninth is the laſt Letter of St. Jerome's, to St. Auguſtine. St. Jerome ſent by Innocent the Prieſt, who in the year 419, was ſent from Africa into Egypt to look after the Copies of the Council of Nice. It is not directed to St. Auguſtine alone, but to him and Alypius. He congratulates their overthrowing of Hereſie, and tells them, that he had not had time yet to anſwer what Anianus, Pelagius's Diſciple had written againſt him, but he would do it very ſoon if God gave him Life: He ſpeaketh of Euſtochium's Death, who was alive when Palladius wrote his Hiſtoria Lauſiaca, in 419, which ſhews that this Letter was written in the year 420. St. Jerome.

The eightieth Letter wherein he commends St. Auguſtine for the Reſolution and Courage, wherewith he had oppoſed Pelagius's Hereſie, was written ſome years before. He exhorts him to go on, praiſing him in this manner, You are commended in Rome; The Catholicks look upon you as the Reſtorer of the ancient Faith, and what is yet a more honourable thing for you is, that the Hereticks hate you.

The eighty firſt is a Note written about the time of his falling out with John of Jeruſalem, after the Condemnation of the Origeniſts, about the year 404.

In the eighty ſecond Letter, St. Jerome anſwers the Queſtion about the Origination of Souls, propoſed to him by Marcellinus Governor of Africa. He does not decide the Queſtion, but ſaith that he had delivered his Opinion in his Books againſt Rufinus, and adviſes him to conſult St. Auguſtine, who would clear that Point to him: He adds, that he could not yet compleat the Commentary upon Ezekiel, becauſe of the Barbarian's Incurſions. This Letter is of the year 410.

The eighty third to Oceanus concerneth a Point of Diſcipline, whether a Perſon twice married, but once before Baptiſm, is to be looked upon as a Bigamiſt, and ſo to be kept from ſacred Orders: St. Jerome maintains the Negative with abundance of Wit.

In the eighty fourth to Magnus, St. Jerome proveth by the Examples of St. Paul, and of the moſt famous Chriſtian Authors that a Chriſtian Author, may, as he did, make uſe of prophane Examples, and prophane Authors. This Letter was compoſed about the year 400. In this Letter there is a Catalogue of almoſt all the Chriſtian Authors to St. Jerome.

The eighty fifth is an Invective againſt one who would have Deacons preferred before Prieſts. St. Jerome exalts the Prieſtly Dignity in a manner which ſeems too high, when he compares them with Biſhops, 'I am informed ſaith he, 'that one was ſo impudent as to preferr Deacons before 'Prieſts: before Prieſts, I ſay, who may be compared with 'Biſhops; For when St. Paul plainly teaches that Prieſts 'are Biſhops, who can endure that thoſe who ſerve Tables 'and Widows, ſhould by pride exalt themſelves above thoſe, 'who by their Prayers conſecrate the Body and Blood of 'Jeſus Chriſt?' Then he produces paſſages out of the Apoſtolical Epiſtles, where they give to meer Prieſts the Name of Biſhops, and adds, 'That it was to prevent Schiſm, that 'in proceſs of time, one was choſen to be preferred before 'others, leſt every one preſuming to aſcribe to himſelf the 'Pre-eminence, the Church of Jeſus Chriſt ſhould be perpe-'tually divided.' For, ſaith he, in the See of Alexandria, from St. Mark the Evangeliſt to the time of Heraclas and Dionyſius, the Prieſts choſe one of them, whom they placed in a ſeat higher than the reſt, and called him Biſhop, much after the ſame manner, as an Army chuſes an Emperor, or as Deacons chuſe one of themſelves to make him Archdeacon: And indeed, what doth a Biſhop do, that is not done by a Prieſt, if you except Ordination? We are not to believe that the Church is otherwiſe at Rome, than in other Cities of the World. Gauls, Britains, Africans, Perſians, Indians, and all other Nations worſhip the ſame God, and have the ſame Rule of Faith. If Authority be required, the World is bigger than a City. Let a Biſhop be the Biſhop of what Town you pleaſe, he is neither more or leſs a Biſhop; whether of Rome, or Eugubium, whether of Conſtantinople or of Rhegium, Alexandria or Tunis, it is ſtill the ſame Dignity, and the ſame Function. Power and Riches do not make a Biſhop greater, Poverty and Want of Credit do not render his Station more vile. All Biſhops are Succeſſors of the Apoſtles. But, you will ſay, how cometh it to paſs, that at Rome a Prieſt is not ordained, except a Deacon gives him his Teſtimonial? Why is the Cuſtom of one only Town objected to me? Why is the ſmall number of Deacons ſo exalted, as if that were the Law of the Church? All that is rare is moſt eſteemed. The ſmall number hath made Deacons valued, and the great number hath rendred Prieſts contemptible. However, Deacons ſtand before the Prieſts, even when the Prieſts are ſate down, and this is obſerved even in the Church of Rome. Though I have ſeen a Deacon ſitting in the ſame rank with the Prieſts, in the abſence of the Biſhop, and give the Bleſſing in the Preſence of the Biſhop, ſuch is now the Corruption of Manners! But let ſuch as undertake thoſe things know that they are againſt Order; Let them hear theſe Words of the Apoſtle. It is not Juſt that we ſhould leave the Word of God to ſerve Tables; let them learn wherefore Deacons were eſtabliſhed, let them read the Acts of the Apoſtles, and remember their Condition. The Name of Prieſt or Preſbyter denotes Age, and that of Biſhop Dignity; wherefore in the Epiſtle to Timothy, mention is made of the Ordination of Biſhops and Deacons, but not of that of Prieſts, be-

St. Jerome. Examples of great Men that might be commended for their Learning, who did hold very remarkable Errors. ‘ St. Cy- ‘ prian, ſaith he, took Tertullian for his Tutor, as appears
‘ by his Writings, and yet did not approve the Dreams of ‘ Montanus and Maximilla as he did. Apollinarius hath ‘ written very convincing Books againſt Porphyrius; and ‘ Euſebius writ a moſt uſeful Hiſtory of the Church. The ‘ former erred concerning the Myſtery of the Incarnation,
‘ and the latter defends the Opinions of Arius.’ He owns that he was Apollinarius's Diſciple, Didymus's Scholar, yea, that he hath had a Jew for his Maſter; that he collected carefully all Origen's Works, and read them exactly, but affirms, that he never followed his Errors. Laſtly, to make ſhort, he ſaith, that if he may be believed, he never was an Origeniſt, and that tho' he had been, yet now he ceaſeth to be ſo. Upon this Principle he exhorts others to imitate him, and to condemn his Errors; after that, he gives Origen high Commendations, rejecting his Opinions. He refutes what Rufinus had aſſerted, that the Errors which were found in Origen's Works had been added; and laughs at the Liberty which he had taken to expunge what he thought fit. Laſt of all, he affirms, that the firſt Book of the Apology for Origen, which bore the Name of Pamphilus, was not that Martyr's, but Didymus's, or at leaſt ſome other Author's. This Letter is written near 150 years after Origen's Death, that is, in the year 399.

The ſixty ſixth Letter to Rufinus, wherein he complains of his Preface, is written at the ſame time. He ſpeaks to him as to a Perſon with whom he would not quite fall out; he telleth him, that he knew not with what Spirit he writ that Preface, but that all the World ſaw how it was to be underſtood; that he might have been even with him, by commending him after the like malicious Manner, but that he choſe rather to juſtify himſelf of the Crime laid to his Charge than offend his Friend; that he intreated him to cite him no more after the ſame manner; that he undertook to write to him about it as to his Friend, rather than to ingage with him publickly. To let him know that he would do nothing that might check that ſincere Reconciliation which he had made with him, he exhorts him on his part to do the ſame, leſt, ſaith he, that biting one another we do not mutually conſume one another.

Rufinus, who was not of a Temper to lie ſtill without replying, immediately put Pen to Paper to write againſt St. Jerome. Pauliniamus, who was then in the Weſt, having found a Way to get the Extracts of Rufinus his Book before it was quite publiſhed, ſent them to his Brother, who beſides was informed by Pammachius and Marcellinus, of the principal Heads contained in Rufinus's Anſwer, and ſo he compoſed immediately his firſt Apology divided into two Books.

In the firſt he anſwers Rufinus's Calumnies. The firſt was, that he had tranſlated into Latin the Books of Origen's Principles without altering.

St. Jerome anſwers, that he did it, to ſhew the falſity of Rufinus his Tranſlation, and to ſhew Origen's Errors, and ſo his Tranſlation could hurt no Body, ſince it appeared that it was made only to condemn the Errors of that Book.

To juſtifie Origen's Doctrine about the Trinity, Rufinus had quoted the firſt Book of Pamphilus's Apology. St. Jerome affirms, that it was not compoſed by that Martyr.

Rufinus laid before him the Praiſes which he had given to Origen. He anſwers as he did before, that he had commended his Learning but not his Doctrine, as he had commended Euſebius and Apollinarius without approving their Errors.

Rufinus charged him with publiſhing Errors, and Contradictions in his Commentaries. He ſays that he did it without approving of them; that he has collected in his Commentaries, the Notions and Words of others, obſerving that ſome underſtood thoſe paſſages in one Sence, and others in another, that ſo the prudent Reader may chuſe what is Truth, and reject what is falſe; and that in this Caſe none can tax him with Errors, and Contradictions, who barely relates the Notions, and different Expoſitions of others. This he proves by the Example of the ableſt Commentators of profane Authors.

Rufinus had found fault, that he had variouſly tranſlated the twelfth Verſe of the ſecond Pſalm, where the Vulgar Tranſlation ſaith, Embrace the Diſcipline, by rendring it according to the Hebrew, ſometimes worſhip the Son, ſometimes worſhip ye only. St. Jerome tells him, that he had kept to the Sence rather than to the Letter, tranſlating the Hebre Word Naſhecu, which ſignifieth, Kiſs or Embrace, by this term Worſhip ye; That as to the other Word Bar, which hath ſeveral Significations, (for it ſignifies the Son, or a handful of pickt Ears of Corn,) he had followed the former Signification in his Commentary, and that in his Verſion, to prevent the Jews accuſing Chriſtians of falſifying the Holy Scripture, he adher'd to the latter Signification, which both Aquila and Symmachus followed.

Rufinus found fault likewiſe with ſeveral paſſages in St. Jerome's Commentary upon the Epiſtle to the Epheſians, in which he had abridged the Commentaries of Origen. St. Jerome defends himſelf, by ſaying that he produced Origen's Opinions without approving of them, ſince he obſerves at the ſame time, that thoſe Explications were not his own. St. Jerome.

Laſtly Rufinus upbraided St. Jerome, that he was naturally given to Calumniating, and Speaking evil of every Body: That he reproved other Mens Works out of Envy: Yea, he laid Perjury to his Charge; becauſe having proteſted before the Judgment Seat of Chriſt (as he ſays in his Book of the Inſtruction of Virgin's,) that he would read no more the Books of profane Authors, yet it did appear, that he had not left off reading of them. St. Jerome juſtifieth himſelf from the former Accuſations; but as to the laſt he thinks it an Honour to follow the Study of learned Books, and declares, that whatſoever he hath ſaid in the Treatiſe concerning the Inſtructions of Virgins, was only the Deſcription of a Dream.

Towards the latter end of this Letter, he aſſerts that what he had ſaid in the eighty third Epiſtle to Oceanus, that Baptiſm remits all Sins, that it blots out even the very ſpot of Bigamy: So that a Man might be ordained after a ſecond Marriage, if the former was before Baptiſm. This Deciſion is contrary to that of Pope Innocent I.

St. Jerome having thus pleaded for himſelf againſt Rufinus's Accuſations, anſwers the Apology which he had made to ſatisfie Pope Anaſtaſius who had condemned him, and to juſtifie himſelf of thoſe things that they reproached him withall. He made Profeſſion of the Faith of the Church, and of the Myſtery of the Holy Trinity at firſt. St. Jerome anſwers that this is not the Queſtion, for now all Mankind was perſuaded of that Principle concerning the Incarnation. St. Jerome asks him what he thought of the Soul of Chriſt, whether it was created before or at the Moment of his Conception. He chargeth him that he did not ſpeak plain enough about the Reſurrection of the Body, and further he pretends that Rufinus did not ſufficiently explain himſelf upon the Eternity of the Devil's puniſhment. Concerning the Origination of the Soul he had ſaid that there were three different Opinions; ſome held that one Soul begat another, as Tertullian and Lactantius. St. Jerome torments himſelf much about the laſt Point, and tho' he doth not ſay that any of theſe three Opinions are decided, yet he inveigheth much againſt Rufinus, becauſe he would not condemn Origen's Opinion. He endeavours afterwards to refute the Reaſons which he alledged to juſtifie himſelf for tranſlating the Books of Origen's Principles: He finds fault that he ſhould ſtrike out ſome of the Errors and leave the reſt. He anſwers thoſe Conjectures which he brought to ſhow that Origen's Books were Corrupted; and ſince he had aſſerted the ſame thing of the paſſages in the Works of the Ancients, as in St. Clemens, Dionyſius of Alexandria, and which did not ſeem to be agreeable to the Doctrine of the Church, of the Myſtery of the Holy Trinity: He denies that that can be reaſonably ſaid, obſerving that if ſuch Conjectures may take place, the greateſt Hereticks ſhould thereby be eaſily excuſed, as Marcian, Manichæus, Arius, Eunomius. But as Rufinus might have preſſed upon St. Jerome by asking him, Why then were there any Errors in their Works, and whether he would call them Hereticks upon that Account? St. Jerome prevents that Objection by ſaying, That perhaps they were in an Error, or the expreſſions they made uſe of had another Sence, or their Works might be corrupted by Tranſcribers; or laſtly, that Writing before the Arian Hereſie appeared, they did not take the neceſſary Precautions againſt it. When St. Jerome made theſe remarks, he did not conſider, that Rufinus might uſe them to defend Origen, as he did to excuſe the Ancients: and perhaps this way of juſtifying him had been more ſolid than that which he made uſe of, by ſaying that thoſe Errors had been added. This St. Jerome oppoſes with all his Might, and endeavours to ſhow, that all the Examples of falſification of the Fathers Works alledged by Rufinus, have no Relation to thoſe that are ſuppoſed to be in Origen's Books. In the reſt of the Letter he juſtifies himſelf from that Calumny, that he blamed the Verſion of the Septuagint. He declares, that he was ſo far from condemning it, that he had corrected it himſelf, and ſpake much in its Commendation. But he aſſerts that this Tranſlation was not compoſed by the LXX in diſtinct Cells, and he defends thoſe that have recourſe to the Hebrew Text.

Rufinus was much ſurprized to ſee an Anſwer to a Book that was not yet publiſhed, and he Writ immediately to St. Jerome about it, and ſent him withall an intire Copy of his firſt Anſwer. This Father who was not wont to leave any thing unanſwered that was againſt him, wrote immediately the third Book of his Apology, which contains nothing but Perſonal Quarrels, or Repetitions of what had been ſaid before: which commonly proves the end of all Diſputes that continue long betwixt learned Men.

Pelagius

St. Jerome.

Pelagius having made his Errors publick. St. Jerome, who ſuffered no New Opinion in the Church to paſs unpuniſhed, fell upon him vigorouſly in his Letter to Cteſiphon.

The firſt Maxim of Pelagius, which he oppoſes, is that of Apathy, that is, Freedom from Paſſions, which this Heretick thought Men could attain unto; and that having once got thus far, they might be without Sin.

The ſecond is concerning the Grace of Jeſus Chriſt, whereof Pelagius denyed the Neceſſity, affirming, that Mens Salvation depended upon the Power of their Free Will. St. Jerome, as well as St. Auguſtine oppoſes this Error, by ſhewing the neceſſity of Prayer, and of good Works. If ſaith he, the Grace of Jeſus Chriſt dependeth upon our Will, if we need only a free Will, and none other help is required, to what purpoſe ſhould Prayer be made to God? Wherefore do we endeavour to move his Clemency, and call upon him for Succour, to obtain daily what is our own Power?..... We muſt therefore remove Faſting alſo and Continence: For why ſhould I labour to get that by my Induſtry, which always depends on my ſelf? He adds that this Conſequence follows ſo Naturally upon this Heretick's Principles, that one of his own Party could not forbear reaſoning after this manner in a Commentary, ſaying; That if there is need of foreign help to do Good, then Liberty is deſtroy'd. 'St. Jerome ſaith a-'gainſt this Error, that we have nothing but what is the 'Gift of God: That indeed it is Man's part to run and to 'will, but he hath need of God's aſſiſtance, to do it: That 'it is not, that God ſhould once give us his Grace, he 'muſt give it conſtantly: If we would obtain we muſt 'ask for it, and having obtained it, there is Need of asking: 'And yet this Grace does not deſtroy Free-will, neither 'does it follow upon theſe Principles, that it is impoſſible 'to keep God's Commandments.

The third Maxim of Pelagius refuted by St. Jerome in this Letter, is a Conſequence of the former. He held, that Man could be perfect, and freed from Sin, without God's Help. St. Jerome proves the contrary by ſeveral places of Scripture, which ſhew that Man cannot be delivered, but by the Grace of Jeſus Chriſt. This Letter is of the year 411.

He handleth the ſame Queſtions in the Dialogue againſt the Pelagians, where he introduces a Pelagian, under the Name of Critobulus, diſcovering and eſtabliſhing his Errors; and a Catholick under the Name of Atticus confuting them particularly, by Teſtimonies of Holy Scripture. This Dialogue is divided into two Books, and was written ſome time after the Letter to Cteſiphon about the year 415.

The ſixty ſeventh Letter is a Tranſlation of a Letter from Theophilus to St. Epiphanius, whereby he deſires that Biſhop of Cyprus to aſſemble a Synod in that Iſland, to condemn Origen, as he had done in Egypt. This Letter is of the year 399.

The ſixty eighth is a Letter of St. Jerome's to Theophilus, who had ſent him Word, that he ſhould be exact in the obſervation of the Canons. St. Jerome thanks him for his admonition, and exhorts him to uſe his Authority againſt the Origeniſts, ſince Patience and Meekneſs could not reclaim them from their Error. This Letter is of the year 398.

The ſixty ninth is from Theophilus to St. Jerome, giving him notice how he had driven away the Monks of Nitria who were accuſed of Origeniſm. St. Jerome returns him thanks for that Noble Action by the ſeventieth Letter. And he commends him again in the ſeventy firſt Letter for what he had done againſt Origen. And in the laſt Place Theophilus acquaints him by the ſeventy ſecond that he had cleanſed the Monaſteries of Nitria of Origeniſm.

The ſeventy third is from St. Epiphanius to St. Jerome, giving him notice of the Judgment given by Theophilus againſt Origen: and he ſends him the Letter written by that Biſhop, and prays him to Publiſh what he had written in Latin upon that Matter.

The ſeventy fourth is a Note to Marcella.

The ſeventy fifth is againſt Vigilantius, who had accuſed him of Origeniſm, he uſes the ſame Arguments for his defence, that he had done in his other Letters, and treats Vigilantius very ill. This Letter was written, about the year 397.

The ſeventy ſixth is of the ſame time. He repeats there what he had written in ſeveral places, that Origen deſerves to be commended for his Learning, but that his Principles are not to be followed.

The ſeventy ſeventh to Mark the Presbyter was written by St. Jerome from the Deſart of Syria, about the time when the Eaſtern Biſhops tormented him to oblige him to own three Hypoſtaſes, about the year 373.

The ſeventy eighth to Pammachius and Marcella, is about Origen's Condemnation. He gives them an Account of what Theophilus had decreed. He ſends them a Copy of his Letter, and the Acts of his Judgment, and deſireth them to have it confirmed at Rome, by Pope Anaſtaſius. This Letter is of 399.

The ſeventy ninth is the laſt Letter of St. Jerome's, to St. Auguſtine. St. Jerome ſent by Innocent the Prieſt, who in the year 419, was ſent from Africa into Egypt to look after the Copies of the Council of Nice. It is not directed to St. Auguſtine alone, but to him and Alypius. He congratulates their overthrowing of Hereſie, and tells them, that he had not had time yet to anſwer what Anianus, Pelagius's Diſciple had written againſt him, but he would do it very ſoon if God gave him Life: He ſpeaketh of Euſtochium's Death, who was alive when Palladius wrote his Hiſtoria Lauſiaca, in 419, which ſhews that this Letter was written in the year 420. St. Jerome.

The eightieth Letter wherein he commends St. Auguſtine for the Reſolution and Courage, wherewith he had oppoſed Pelagius's Hereſie, was written ſome years before. He exhorts him to go on, praiſing him in this manner, You are commended in Rome; The Catholicks look upon you as the Reſtorer of the ancient Faith, and what is yet a more honourable thing for you is, that the Hereticks hate you.

The eighty firſt is a Note written about the time of his falling out with John of Jeruſalem, after the Condemnation of the Origeniſts, about the year 404.

In the eighty ſecond Lettet, St. Jerome anſwers the Queſtion about the Origination of Souls, propoſed to him by Marcellinus Governor of Africa. He does not decide the Queſtion, but ſaith that he had delivered his Opinion in his Books againſt Rufinus, and adviſes him to conſult St. Auguſtine, who would clear that Point to him: He adds, that he could not yet compleat the Commentary upon Ezekiel, becauſe of the Barbarian's Incurſions. This Letter is of the year 410.

The eighty third to Oceanus concerneth a Point of Diſcipline, whether a Perſon twice married, but once before Baptiſm, is to be looked upon as a Bigamiſt, and ſo to be kept from ſacred Orders: St. Jerome maintains the Negative with abundance of Wit.

In the eighty fourth to Magnus, St. Jerome proveth by the Examples of St. Paul, and of the moſt famous Chriſtian Authors that a Chriſtian Author, may, as he did, make uſe of prophane Examples, and prophane Authors. This Letter was compoſed about the year 400. In this Letter there is a Catalogue of almoſt all the Chriſtian Authors to St. Jerome.

The eighty fifth is an Invective againſt one who would have Deacons preferred before Prieſts. St. Jerome exalts the Prieſtly Dignity in a manner which ſeems too high, when he compares them with Biſhops, 'I am informed ſaith he, 'that one was ſo impudent as to preferr Deacons before 'Prieſts: before Prieſts, I ſay, who may be compared with 'Biſhops; For when St. Paul plainly teaches that Prieſts 'are Biſhops, who can endure that thoſe who ſerve Tables 'and Widows, ſhould by pride exalt themſelves above thoſe, 'who by their Prayers conſecrate the Body and Blood of 'Jeſus Chriſt?' Then he produces paſſages out of the Apoſtolical Epiſtles, where they give to meer Prieſts the Name of Biſhops, and adds, 'That it was to prevent Schiſm, that 'in proceſs of time, one was choſen to be preferred before 'others, leſt every one preſuming to aſcribe to himſelf the 'Pre-eminence, the Church of Jeſus Chriſt ſhould be perpe-'tually divided.' For, ſaith he, in the See of Alexandria, from St. Mark the Evangeliſt to the time of Heraclas and Dionyſius, the Prieſts choſe one of them, whom they placed in a ſeat higher than the reſt, and called him Biſhop, much after the ſame manner, as an Army chuſes an Emperor, or as Deacons chuſe one of themſelves to make him Archdeacon: And indeed, what doth a Biſhop do, that is not done by a Prieſt, if you except Ordination? We are not to believe that the Church is otherwiſe at Rome, than in other Cities of the World. Gauls, Britains, Africans, Perſians, Indians, and all other Nations worſhip the ſame God, and have the ſame Rule of Faith. If Authority be required, the World is bigger than a City. Let a Biſhop be the Biſhop of what Town you pleaſe, he is neither more or leſs a Biſhop; whether of Rome, or Eugubium, whether of Conſtantinople or of Rhegium, Alexandria or Tunis, it is ſtill the ſame Dignity, and the ſame Function. Power and Riches do not make a Biſhop greater, Poverty and Want of Credit do not render his Station more vile. All Biſhops are Succeſſors of the Apoſtles. But, you will ſay, how cometh it to paſs, that at Rome a Prieſt is not ordained, except a Deacon gives him his Teſtimonial? Why is the Cuſtom of one only Town objected to me? Why is the ſmall number of Deacons ſo exalted, as if that were the Law of the Church? All that is rare is moſt eſteemed. The ſmall number hath made Deacons valued, and the great number hath rendred Prieſts contemptible. However, Deacons ſtand before the Prieſts, even when the Prieſts are ſate down, and this is obſerved even in the Church of Rome. Though I have ſeen a Deacon ſitting in the ſame rank with the Prieſts, in the abſence of the Biſhop, and give the Bleſſing in the Preſence of the Biſhop, ſuch is now the Corruption of Manners! But let ſuch as undertake thoſe things know that they are againſt Order; Let them hear theſe Words of the Apoſtle. It is not Juſt that we ſhould leave the Word of God to ſerve Tables; let them learn wherefore Deacons were eſtabliſhed, let them read the Acts of the Apoſtles, and remember their Condition. The Name of Prieſt or Preſbyter denotes Age, and that of Biſhop Dignity; wherefore in the Epiſtle to Timothy, mention is made of the Ordination of Biſhops and Deacons, but not of that of Prieſts, be-

St. Jerome. cauſe Prieſts are compriſed under the Name of Biſhops. Laſtly, to ſhew that a Prieſt is above a Deacon, one needs only obſerve that a Prieſt is made of a Deacon, but not a Deacon of a Prieſt.

This Letter was written after his going from Rome, the year is not known, but it was in all probability about the year 387. What he ſaith of Biſhops may have a good Sence, if we conſider his deſign in this Place, which was to exalt the Dignity of the Prieſthood by comparing them with Biſhops, not that he thought them equal in Dignity, ſince he poſitively excepteth the Power of Ordination, (and that of Confirmation in his Dialogue againſt the Luciferians:) but ſince Prieſts have a ſhare in the Government of the Church, they may in that Senſe be called Biſhops. Like Expreſſions may be ſeen in St. Jerome's Commentary upon the Epiſtle to Titus and in many Authors that have followed him.

The eighty ſixth is a Letter from St. Auguſtine, to St. Jerome, whereby he thanks him for the Anſwer to his, and intreats him in the Name of the whole African Church, to tranſlate the Greek Authors that had writ Commentaries upon the Scripture. He ſays, that he was very deſirous that St. Jerome would tranſlate the Sacred Books after the ſame way, that he had tranſlated Job, by ſetting down the differences of the Verſion of the LXX, which had great Authority in the Church. Now becauſe St. Auſtin did not underſtand Hebrew he could not apprehend that there ſhould be ſo much difference, betwixt the Hebrew Text, and the Tranſlation of the LXX, and doth not approve of any departing from it. For, ſaith he to St. Jerome, either thoſe paſſages are clear or they are dark. If they are dark you may be miſtaken, as well as the Seventy; If they are clear, can any Man believe that theſe learned Men did not underſtand them? This Letter which was written about the year 395, not being carried, St. Auguſtine wrote another to St. Jerome, upon the ſame Subject, in 397. But the Perſon to whom he had given it to deliver to St. Jerome, gave out ſome Copies of it which were ſpread in Rome, ſo that it was publick before St. Jerome ſaw it. This ſecond Letter is here the ninety ſeventh. St. Auguſtine asketh of St. Jerome the true Title of his Book of Eccleſiaſtical Writers; afterwards he reproves what St. Jerome had ſaid, that St. Peter, and St. Paul pretended to have a difference, though they were agreed. He pretends that this Opinion is of very great Conſequence, and may have dangerous Effects, becauſe if we admit of an Officious Lye in the Holy Scripture, it ſeems to give Men a handle to doubt of all. He therefore exhorts him to alter that paſſage in his Commentary. At the latter end, he prays him to add to his Book of Eccleſiaſtical Writers, the Errors of ſome Hereticks of whom he ſpeaks, or to make a Book purpoſel on that Subject. St. Auguſtine having no Anſwer, becauſe neither of thoſe two Letters were delivered to St. Jerome, wrote a third by Cyprian the Deacon, wherein he requireth an Anſwer to the former, adding in this, that he found fault with his writing a new Tranſlation of the Bible, pretending that it would cauſe Diſturbances and Scandals if it were publickly read in the Church: as it really happened in a Church of Africk; where a Biſhop having publickly read the Prophecy of Jonas, according to St. Jerome's Tranſlation: the People hearing other Terms than they were wont to hear, accuſed their Biſhops of falſifying the Scripture. This Letter was written ſome years after the foregoing, about the year 403.

St. Jerome having received theſe three Letters by Cyprian the Deacon, thought himſelf affronted by St. Auguſtine's demands, and anſwered him with ſome Loftineſs in the eighty ninth Letter. He repeats all the Queſtions that had been put to him by St. Auguſtine, and endeavours to give him ſatisfaction. He telleth him 1. about the Title of his Book of Eccleſiaſtical Writers, that it ought to be Intituled, the Book of famous Men, or of Eccleſiaſtical Writers.

2. He defends his Expoſition of St. Paul's Epiſtle to the Galatians, about the Action of St. Peter, and St. Paul, by the Authority of Origen, Didymus, and other ancient Authors, whoſe Commentaries he only tranſlated, as he had ſaid before in the Preface. That if he is in an Error, he had rather err with thoſe great Men, than flatter himſelf with having the Truth only on his ſide. He adds Reaſons to Authority, ſhewing by the Hiſtory of the Acts, that St. Peter could not but know, that Chriſtians were freed from the Burthen of the Law; That on the other ſide St. Paul had himſelf practiſed that very thing whereof he here accuſeth St. Peter, by obſerving the Ceremonies of the Law; from whence he concludes that both theſe Apoſtles, being of the ſame Opinion, had agreed to raiſe that ſmall Diſpute to inſtruct both Jews and Gentiles by that pious Artifice. Afterwards he refutes St. Auguſtine's Opinion, and ſtrives to anſwer the Reaſons which he had produced.

Laſt of all he gives him Reaſons for the Notes, that were in his Tranſlation of the Scripture. He anſwereth St. Auguſtine's Reaſoning, to prove that he had done well in tranſlating the Bible a new, very pleaſantly, by retorting the ſame upon him, 'You cannot be ignorant, ſaith he, that the 'Pſalms have been expounded by ſeveral Commentators, 'Greek and Latin, who wrote before you. Pray tell me, 'how you durſt undertake to give a new Expoſition of 'them, after thoſe great Men? You believed that thoſe St. Jerome. 'places which you explained were either clear or obſcure: 'If they were clear, it is probable (to uſe your own way of 'reaſoning) that they did underſtand them, and if they are 'obſcure, and they did not well underſtand them, it may 'be thought that you might be miſtaken as well as they. 'And laſtly, he makes himſelf ſport with their Quarrelling with the good Biſhop for reading his Tranſlation of Jonas, ſhewing that the occaſion of it was ridiculous, becauſe the Queſtion was about one ſingle Word only, namely the Term Gourd, which he had rendred Ivy. This Letter is of the year 404.

St. Jerome being ſometime without anſwering this Letter, St. Auguſtine wrote to him, that he was informed that he had received his Letters, and expected an Anſwer, and whereas there was a Diſcourſe that he had ſent a Book to Rome againſt St. Jerome, he aſſures him that he had not. This Letter is of the year 402. It is here the nineteenth.

St. Jerome in anſwer to it ſaith, that he ſaw a Letter wherein he proved a paſſage of his Commentary upon St. Paul, and adviſed him to retract it; but not being ſure that this Letter was from him, he had not anſwered it yet, becauſe he had been diſturbed by the Sickneſs of Paula. Afterwards he upbraids him for the Liberty he had taken; and taxes him with ſeeking after Glory, by attacking great Men, telling him that he ought to examine his own Strength, and not compare himſelf with a Man that is grown old in Studying the Holy Scripture, and much leſs provoke him to a Combat. And at laſt deals with him as with one whom he did not much value, and whom he judged not worthy of his Anger. This Letter is of the year 402.

The ninety ſecond is written by St. Jerome with the ſame Spirit. Again he complains that St. Auguſtine's Letter was publiſhed. He writes him word that his Friends ſaid that he had not acted innocently in that particular, but ſeemed to go about to eſtabliſh his own Glory by the ruin of another Man's: That if he would diſpute, there were young and able Men at Rome of his own ſtrength; As for himſelf, he might, like a Veteran Soldier commend the Victories of others but not engage in the Fight; that he would not ſo much as read his Books to find fault; that he had ſeen nothing of his but his Soliloquies, and ſome Commentaries upon the Pſalms, and that if he would examine them, he could ſhew him how he departed from the Expoſition of ancient Authors. This Letter is of the year 403.

St. Auguſtine having received both theſe Letters, anſwered him with much Civility and Moderation, yet without ſubſcribing to his Opinions. He ſpeaks of the Quarrel which he had with Rufinus, and laments that Diviſion, repreſenting to him, that he had not ſhewed that Meekneſs and Charity which he might have done. This Letter is written very artificially. It is the ninety third. He directed it to Preſidius, to ſee it conveyed to St. Jerome, as appears by the ninety fifth.

St. Jerome contented with St. Auguſtine's Compliments and Satisfaction, writ to him ſome time after the ninety ſixth Letter, whereby he excuſes himſelf for having anſwered him, and tells him, that he earneſtly deſired there ſhould be no more Diſputes betwixt them.

St. Auguſtine having received this Letter by Firmus, returned an Anſwer by the ninety ſeventh Letter, to what St. Jerome had written to ſatisfie his requeſts, and defended his Opinions with great Clearneſs and Moderation. This Letter is here the ninety ſeventh, and was written as well as the foregoing in the year 403.

After this time there was no more ſaid of the Queſtions that were betwixt them, and they never writ to one another but with Civility. This may be taken Notice of in the Letters we have already ſpoken of, and in the ninety fourth, where St. Jerome thanketh St. Auguſtine, for dedicating and ſending to him, by Oroſius, the Books concerning the Origination of Souls; and he tells him, that he ſpake honourably of him in the Dialogue, which he wrote againſt Pelagius. This Letter is of the year 406.

The ninty eighth is a Compliment from St. Jerome to St. Auguſtine of the year 397.

The ninty ninth Letter to Aſella was written by St. Jerome, at his going from Rome; he defends himſelf very warmly from the falſe Rumours, which his Calumniators had ſpread againſt him; becauſe of the Familiarity which he had had at Rome with ſome Roman Ladies. This Letter he writ when he was embarking to return into the Eaſt, in 385.

The hundreth Letter is a Satyr againſt one Bonoſus who had taken what St. Jerome had writ in general againſt all Vices, as particularly deſigned againſt himſelf, it is probably of the ſame time with the foregoing.

[Eraſmus's Edition which Dr. Cave follows calls him Bonaſus, which ſeems to be the truer Reading by the Letter it ſelf, wherein St. Jerome quibbles upon his Name, and plays upon his Noſe, and tells him, That tho' his Name be lucky, yet upon that Account he has no Reaſon to value himſelf.]

The

St. Jerome. The hundred and first to Pammachius, Concerning the best Method of translating, is about the Translation, which he made two years before of St. Epiphanius's Letter to John of Jerusalem. He was accused of not having done it faithfully. To justifie himself, he proves by the Examples of the best Translators both Ecclesiastical and Prophane, that to translate well, one is not to follow the Words, or Terms, but the Sense and Conceptions of his Author. He saith, that this Treatise was composed two years after the Translation of St. Ephiphanius's Letter, of the Year 303, which shews that it is of 395.

In the hundred and second to Marcella, he argues against those who accused him, of corrupting the Text of the Gospel, because he had corrected the Faults of the Latin Translation according to the Greek Original; and he reproveth those that found Fault with him, for blaming the Virgins frequenting Men's Company. This Letter was written likewise sometime after his Departure from Rome, in 385, or 386.

These are St. Jerome's Letters and Treatises contained in the Second Volume.

The third contains the Critical Letters and Works upon the Holy Scripture.

The first directed to Paulinus, is not upon that Subject only; for he exhorts him not only to the Reading of the Holy Scripture, but also to retire, and to vow Poverty. But the Principal Subject of that Letter is Precepts, and a Method which is to be observed both in reading and unstanding the Holy Scripture. He shews at first that no Man ought to enter upon that Study, without a skilful Guide to shew him the way. He complains that all other Arts, and Sciences, are exercised by none but Men of that Profession, but that every one pretends to be skill'd in the understanding of the Scriptures.

To shew that Men are deceived, and that the Scripture is not so easily understood, as they imagine, he reckons up the several Books, and takes notice of the great difficulty of finding the true Sense and Spirit of them, and he draws up in short very curious Observations upon every Book of the Scripture, and upon the Character of their Authors.

The second Letter in Number one hundred and four to Desiderius, is a Preface to his Version of the Pentateuch. He sheweth how necessary, and withall how difficult it is to undertake it after the Translation of the LXX, and that this is defective.

The hundred and fifth Letter is a Preface to the Book of Job.

The hundred and sixth is a Preface to the Books of Kings, where he sets down the number of the Canonical Books of the Old Testament, according to the Jewish Catalogue.

The hundred and seventh is a Preface to the Chronicles directed to Chromatius.

The hundred and eighth is another Preface to the Chronicles.

The hundred and ninth is a Preface to Ezra and Nehemiah.

The hundred and tenth is the Preface to Tobit.

The hundred and eleventh to Judith.

The hundred and twelfth to Esther.

The hundred and thirteenth to Job.

The hundred and fourteenth is another Preface to Job.

The hundred and fifteenth is a Preface to the Books of Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and the Canticles.

The hundred and sixteenth is a particular Letter concerning his Translation of Ecclesiastes.

The hundred and seventeenth to Isaiah.

The hundred and eighteenth to Jeremiah.

The hundred and nineteenth to Ezekiel.

The hundred and twentieth to Daniel.

The hundred and twenty first to the twelve Minor Prophets.

The hundred and twenty second to Joel.

The hundred and twenty third is a Preface directed by St. Jerome to Damasus upon the new Translation of the four Evangelists.

The hundred and twenty fourth is a Letter from Damasus to St. Jerome, wherein he asketh him five Questions about the Holy Scripture. The first what is the meaning of those Words. Genesis Chap. 4. Whosoever slays Cain, Vengeance shall be taken on him seven-fold. The second, if all that God did was very good, as it is said in Genesis wherefore is mention made of clean and unclean Creatures? The third why God said to Abraham, that the Children of Israel should go out of Egypt in the fourth Generation; and yet it is said in Exodus that it was the fifth Generation which came out of Egypt. The fourth why Abraham received Circumcision as a Seal of Faith. And the fifth why Isaac blessed that Son whom he designed not to bless.

St. Jerome makes no answer to Damasus about the second and fourth Questions, because they were handled at Large by Tertullian, Novatian, Origen and Didymus: But he explaineth the rest. He saith to the first concerning those Words of Genesis, Whosoever slays Cain Vengeance shall be taken on him Sevenfold; That they signifie, that whosoever killeth Cain, shall undergo the seven sorts of Revenge, or Punishment wherewith he was threatned. He resolves the third, by observing that we are not to read in Exodus, that the Children of Israel went out of Egypt at the fifth Generation, as it is in the Translation of the Seventy, but that they went out Armed, as it is in Aquila's Translation: Lastly he answereth the fifth, saying that Isaac did that good thing for the Family, in blessing Jacob by a particular Effect of God's Providence without knowing it: He cites afterwards a Passage out of Hyppolitus, which gives an Allegorical Sense to that Action, affirming that Esau was a Type of the People of the Jews, and Jacob that of the Church. He approves this Exposition, and so he easily answers Damasus his Question. St. Jerome.

In the hundred and twenty fifth Letter to Evagrius, he examineth who Melchisedeck was: He rejects that Man's Opinion, who held that Melchisedeck was the Holy Spirit: As also Origen's and Didymus's who said that Melchisedeck was an Angel. He produces the Opinions of Hyppolitus, St. Irenæus, Eusebius, and Eustathius, who believed him to have been a Canaanite, King of a City called Salem, and a Priest of the Lord: He likewise takes Notice of the the Jewish Opinion that it was Sem Noah's Son, and he seems not to disapprove it. He observes that the City of Salem, was not Jerusalem as Josephus and most of the Ancients believed, but another City near Scythopolis, called, as he says, Salem even in his time.

The following Letter to Fabiola, is a moral Explication of the forty Encampings of the Israelites, from their going out of Egypt to the Land of Promise. He looks upon that Journey as a Representation of the way to Heaven, and to every Decamping he applies a moral Instruction. The like Reflections are made in the hundred and twenty eighth Leter upon the Habits, and Sacerdotal Ornaments of the Priests under the Old Law.

He shews in the hundred and twenty ninth, that what is said of the promised Land, is to be understood spiritually of eternal Glory, and as he makes use particularly of the Epistle to the Hebrews to prove his Assertion, so he affirms that tho' the Greek Churches will not own it no more than the Revelations of St. John, yet the Latins receive both, because they are quoted by the Ancients.

In the hundred and thirtieth to Marcella, he tells her what the Ephod and Teraphim were.

The hundred and thirty first Letter to Rufinus, contains an allegorical Exposition of the History of the two Women that were judged by Solomon, who were, as he pretends a Figure of the Church and of the Synagogue.

In the hundred and thirty second, he answers an Historical Difficulty about the years of Solomon and Ahaz. It is said of Solomon that he began to reign at twelve years, that he reigned forty years, and that his Son Roboam succeeded him being forty one years old. It seems by that, that Solomon had a Son at eleven years: The same is said of King Ahaz. He is said to have begun his Reign at twenty years of Age, that he reigned sixteen years, and that his Son Hezekiah succeeded him at the Age of twenty five, which also intimates that Ahaz had him at eleven years of Age. This seems extraordinary and incredible, St. Jerome answers that it might possibly be, but that the difficulty might be salved thus, that the Reigns both of Solomon and of Ahaz, may have had a double beginning: When they began to reign with their Fathers, and when they began to reign by themselves. This being supposed, the Answer is at Hand, when it is said that Solomon began to reign at twelve, and Ahaz at twenty years of Age, is to be understood of the beginning of their Reign with their Fathers, whereas when it is said in another Place, that they died after having reigned, one forty, and the other sixteen years, that is to be understood of the Time when they began to reign alone. Whence it follows that they might then be of Age to have Children. He confesses at the latter end of this Letter that there are several Chronological Difficulties in the History of the Old Testament: Especially about the years of the Kings of Israel and of Juda, but he would have no Man trouble himself much to explain them.

The hundred and thirty third Letter to Marcella is a Critick upon the Commentary upon the Canticles, that was made by Rheticius Bishop of Autun. He observes several Faults in that Author, which were mentioned in the second Volume of this Bibliotheca.

The hundred and thirty fourth to Sophronius containeth Notes upon the Psalms. He saith that some divide them into five Books, but that he comprehended all in one Volume, following therein the Authority of the Jews and the Apostles. He affirms that they are written by those whose Names are found at the beginning of every Psalm. He speaks afterwards of his Latin Translation of the Psalms and of Sophronius's Design to translate it into Greek.

The hundred and thirty fifth Letter to Sunia and Fretella, is a Critick upon those passages of the Psalms, where

St. Jerome. the Greek of the Septuagint, and the Latin Verſion differ. St. Jerome layeth this down for a Rule, that when there is a Difference betwixt the Latin Copies of the New Teſtament, they ought to go to the Original: So likewiſe when there is any Difference between the Greek and the Latin of the Old Teſtament, to find out the truth, the Hebrew Text ought to be conſulted. By this Rule he explains all thoſe paſſages of the Pſalms where the Greek of the Seventy, and the Verſion then in uſe did not agree.

In the hundred and thirty ſixth to Marcella, he expounds the ten ſeveral Names given to God in the Hebrew Tongue.

In the hundred and thirty ſeventh to the ſame, he gives the Signification of the Terms Halleluja, Amen, Maranatha. Halleluja, according to him, ſignifies praiſe the Lord. Amen is a Word which ſignifies that Credit is given to a thing, deſiring that it may be ſo; and which may be rendred, So be it. Maranatha is a Syriack Word, which St. Jerome tranſlateth, Our Lord comes.

In the hundred and thirty eighth Epiſtle to the ſame, he ſhows the Meaning of the Hebrew Selah, which the Greeks tranſlate Diapſalma, a Word very frequent in the Pſalms. He ſaith that ſome have ſaid that the Diapſalma was an Alteration of the Verſe; and others, that it ſignified a Pauſe; others, a Change of the Tune: He is not of their mind, but ſaith with Aquila, that Selah ſignifies always.

The hundred and thirty ninth, to Cyprian, is an Expoſition of the eighty ninth Pſalm according to the Hebrew Text.

The hundred and fortieth to Principia, is an Expoſition of the forty fourth Pſalm.

The hundred and forty firſt containeth certain Remarks to underſtand the hundred and twenty ſixth Pſalm.

The hundred and forty ſecond, and hundred forty third, to Damaſus, clears the Hiſtory of Uzziah, ſpeaks of the Seraphim, the Holy, holy, holy, and the reſt of Iſaiah's Viſion deſcribed in the ſixth Chapter of his Prophecy.

The hundred and forty fifth Letter to Pope Damaſus, explains the meaning of the Word Hoſanna, rejecting St. Hilary's Opinion, who thought that it ſignified The Redemption of David's Houſe; as alſo that it ſignified Glory: to expound it he appeals to the Hebrew Text, and pretends, that Hoſhahna whereof they have made Hoſanna, ſignifies Save us Lord.

The hundred and forty ſixth to the ſame, is an allegorical Expoſition of the Parable of the prodigal Son, whom he ſuppoſes to be a Figure of the Gentiles converted to the Faith.

In the hundred and forty ſeventh to Amandus, he gives a literal Explication of three paſſages of the New Teſtament, of theſe Words of Jeſus Chriſt, Matth. ch. 6. Take no thought for the morrow; ſufficient unto the Day is the Evil thereof. Of thoſe of St. Paul, 1 Cor. 2. He that committeth fornication ſinneth againſt his own body: and of that other of St. Paul, 1 Cor. 15. where he ſaith, that all things are ſubject to the Son of God, and that he is ſubject to him who hath put all things under him. At the latter end he moves the Queſtion, whether a Woman having left her Husband becauſe he was an Adulterer, or given to unnatural Luſts, may be married to another; and if, having done it, ſhe might be admitted to the Communion? He anſwers, that ſhe cannot marry without ſinning, and ought not to be admitted to the Communion but after Penance, and having renounced the ſecond Husband.

In the hundred and forty eighth, he reſolves five Queſtions, which Marcella put to him upon ſeveral paſſages of the New Teſtament. The firſt is, How St. Paul could ſay, that eye hath not ſeen nor ear heard, neither have entred into the heart of Man the things which God hath prepared for them that love him. Since he ſays in another place, that God hath revealed them by his Spirit. St. Jerome anſwereth that in the former place St. Paul ſpeaks of the things which the Eyes and Ears of Fleſh may apprehend, and what may be comprehended by humane Underſtanding without Revelation. The ſecond Queſtion was about the Expoſition which St. Jerome had given of the Parable of the Goats and of the Sheep, which are at the right, and at the left Hand of God; whereby he underſtood the Jews and the Gentiles, and not good and evil Men. Here St. Jerome referrs to what he had ſaid in his Books to Jovinian. The third Queſtion was concerning thoſe of whom the Apoſtle ſaith, that they ſhall be carried alive into the Air at the Day of Judgment to meet Jeſus Chriſt. St. Jerome ſticks not to ſay, that this is to be underſtood literally, and that ſuch as ſhall be found alive then ſhall not die, but their Bodies ſhall become incorruptible and immortal. The fourth is about thoſe Words of Jeſus Chriſt to Mary Magdalen, Touch me not. This is the Senſe of them according to St. Jerome, You deſerve not to fall down at my Feet and worſhip me, ſeeing you doubted of my Reſurrection. It is more natural to expound them after this other manner, Do not make haſte to embrace and to hold me, I am not yet aſcended into Heaven, I will abide for ſome time upon Earth, and you may do it at leiſure. The laſt Queſtion is to know whether Chriſt being upon Earth after his Reſurrection, was likewiſe in Heaven at the ſame time? St. Jerome anſwereth, that it is unqueſtionable that the Word of God was every where; but he does not anſwer the Queſtion propoſed preciſely, which was not concerning the Divinity, but the Humanity of Jeſus Chriſt. St. Jerome.

In the hundred and forty ninth Letter he propoſeth to himſelf one of the chiefeſt and moſt conſiderable Difficulties of the New Teſtament; namely what is the Sin againſt the Holy Ghoſt, and in what Senſe it is unpardonable. But he doth not go to the bottom of the Queſtion, ſhewing only by the bye, againſt Novatians, that it is not the Sin of Idolatry.

The hundred and fiftieth to Hebidia, and the hundred and fifty firſt, to Algaſia, contain Solutions of three and twenty Difficulties about particular Paſſages of the New Teſtament, which theſe Ladies had put to St. Jerome. They are very curious Queſtions, and St. Jerome's Anſwers are very juſt and learned.

To theſe Works we ought to join the Treatiſes which are the latter end of the eighth Volume, which likewiſe are Critical Letters. Namely,

The Book of the Names of the Cities and Countries mentioned in the Bible, tranſlated out of Euſebius.

An Expoſition of the Hebrew Proper Names in the Old and New Teſtament.

The hundred and fifty firſt Epiſtle is an Explication of the Hebrew Alphabet, written whilſt he was at Rome.

A Collection of Traditions, or rather Jewiſh Expoſitions upon Geneſis; a moſt curious and uſeful Work for the right Underſtanding of the Text of the Scripture; where he takes Notice of all the Differences betwixt the Hebrew Text and the Tranſlation of the Septuagint.

The hundred and fifty ſecond Letter, to Minerius and Alexandria, upon theſe Words of St. Paul, 1 Cor. 15. We ſhall not all die, but but we ſhall be changed: wherein he gives a particular Account of the different Expoſitions of this Place by the ancient Commentators. He quoteth Theodorus of Perinthus, Diodorus of Tarſus, Apollinaris, Acacius of Cæſarea, and Origen. This Letter is of the year 406.

In the ſame place is the hundred and fifty third Letter to Paulinus, written about the ſame time; he anſwereth two Queſtions put to him. The firſt, how one could reconcile to Free-Will, what is ſaid in Geneſis, that God hardned Pharaoh's heart; and what St. Paul ſaith, That it is neither of the Will, nor of the Endeavours of Men, but of God who maketh Man to act. The ſecond why St. Paul calleth the Children that are born of baptized Parents, holy, ſince they cannot be ſaved, but by receiving and preſerving the Grace of Baptiſm. For the former, St. Jerome referreth him to what Origen ſaith upon that Subject in the Book of Principles newly tranſlated by St. Jerome. And to the ſecond, he anſwereth, with Tertullian, that the Children of Chriſtians are called holy, becauſe they are as it were Candidates for the Faith, and have not been defiled with Idolatry; adding, that the Scripture gives the Name of holy to things that are pure; and that in this Senſe the Veſſels of the Temple are ſaid to be holy.

Laſtly, There is in the ſame place the hundred fifty fourth Letter to Deſiderius and Serenilla, whom he invites to come to Bethlehem. It it written after the Treatiſe of Famous Men, about the year 400.

We are to reckon likewiſe amongſt St. Jerome's critical Works upon the Bible, the Corrections and Tranſlations which he made of the Books of the Scripture. At firſt he corrected the Greek Text of the Seventy, and reformed the common Edition, by Origen's Hexapla. He made a new Tranſlation (o) of them, wherein he mark'd by two Hooks, thoſe paſſages of the Septuagint that were not in the Hebrew Text, and added the Verſion of what was in the Hebrew Text, which was not in the Tranſlation of the LXX, noting thoſe Additions with a Star, ſo that in this Tranſlation one might ſee at once, both what was added, and what was wanting in the Verſion of the LXX. This Tranſlation of St. Jerome's of the Books of the Prophets, is joyned to his Commentaries.

This was the firſt Labour of St. Jerome upon the Bible, which he undertook when he was but young in his firſt Retirement.

Afterwards having attained to a more perfect knowledge of the Hebrew Tongue, he conceived that it would prove a conſiderable Service to the Church, if he ſet forth an entire Tranſlation of his own from the Hebrew Text. Wherefore he fell upon that Work, and publiſhed a new Latin Verſion of all the Books, which the Jews own to be Ca-

(o) He made a New Tranſlation.] He ſpeaks of this Verſion as wholly his own in the eighty ninth Letter, to St. Auguſtine; yet it is likely, that he made uſe in ſeveral Books of the Scripture, of the ancient vulgar Tranſlation, which he only corrected. It is certain that he made a new Tranſlation of the Pſalms, as he ſays himſelf in this Epiſtle to Sunia and Fretela; He alſo tranſlated anew the Book, of Job, as appears by the two Prefaces to that Book, and to thoſe of Solomon, as it is obſerved in the Second Book of the Apology againſt Ruſinus.

nonical (p), and of the Books of Judith and Tobit, setting before the beginning of each Book the Prefaces already mentioned. St. Jerome.

This new Translation of St. Jerome was but ill received in the Church at first. Men were very much pre-possessed in favour of the Septuagint, and St. Jerome's Enterprize was looked upon as a rash and dangerous Innovation: St. Augustine himself disliked it, and sent him word, as we have seen, that he would have done better if he had been contented with the Translation of the Septuagint, and not have gone about a new one, which would certainly cause some Scandal and Trouble in the Church. Rufinus and others of St. Jerome's Enemies, went yet further, and accused him of perverting the Scripture, and despising the Authority of the Apostles, by rejecting the LXX's Translation which they had made use of, to introduce a new one, borrowed, in some sort from the Jews. All these reproaches did not hinder St. Jerome from publishing his new Translation. He shews the injustice of his Accusers in most of his Prefaces. Sometimes he complains of the ingratitude of Persons in his Age, who instead of acknowledging the good Services he had done to the Church, reckoned it as a Crime in him: Sometimes he declares, That he did not undertake that new Translation to condemn the Septuagint which he commends, and approves, and which he corrected and translated in his Youth, and that his Design barely was, to do an useful Work. Sometimes he saith, that he was obliged to make a new Translation, because the Septuagint had been corrupted. But for the most part he affirms openly, that the main Reason which put him upon making a new Translation, was, the want of Exactness in that of the Seventy, and the small Conformity which it had with the Hebrew Text; which, he believes ought to be depended upon, as the true Original. And for this Reason, almost as often as he speaks of it, he gives it the Name of the Hebrew Truth. He alledgeth also political Reasons for his undertaking. The Jews accused us in their Disputes with us, that we did not faithfully quote the Holy Scripture, they continually urged that the Hebrew Text was not conformable to what was cited to them out of the Translation of the LXX. The Christians who were ignorant of the Hebrew, and besides had no Translation from the Hebrew, were extremely perplexed, and were forced, either to remain Speechless, or to have recourse to the Rabbins. He sheweth how necessary it was, that a Christian learned in the Hebrew Tongue, should make a Translation conformable to the Hebrew Text. St. Jerome had another Argument to recommend his Translation to the Latins, and that was point of Honour.

The Greeks, says he, boast that the Latins have the Holy Scripture only thro' their Channel; it is good to beat down their Pride, and to let them know, that the Latins have no need of them, but could go to the Fountain-head themselves. Interest and Conveniency, were Considerations, that St. Jerome also made use of to bring his Translation into credit. There were a great many different Greek Translations; and several Editions of the Seventy quite different one from the other; It was impossible to compare them together without great pains, and much labour, and to have them without a great deal of Money. And after all, that Variety brought in great Confusion, and rendred the Scripture almost unintelligible, to those that did not understand the Hebrew Text. How necessary then was it to deliver the World out of that perplexity, by setting forth a Translation conformable to the Original, which should make all the rest almost useless.

How good soever these Reasons were in themselves, yet they were not strong enough to make St. Jerome's Translation welcome to the Latins at first; they kept for the most part to the ancient vulgar Version, being unwilling that any thing should be altered in it: But by little and little St. Jerome's got some credit; tho' the ancient vulgar was still in use; so that in St. Gregory's time both these Translations were followed, and this Father observes, that himself used sometimes one, and sometimes the other. Since that time St. Jerome's Translation got the upper hand, and was received and read publickly in the Churches of the West, excepting the Translation of the Psalms, and some Mixtures of the ancient vulgar Translation (q), some passages whereof have been preserved in the vulgar Latin.

As for the New Testament, St. Jerome did not undertake to make a new Translation, but contented himself with comparing the old one with the Greek, and to correct the principal passages where it disagreed with the Text, as he said himself in the Preface of the Gospels to Damasus, in a Letter to St. Augustine, and in his Book of Ecclesiastical Writers. This Work was much better received than the new Version of the Old Testament from the Hebrew, and hardly any Body was offended at it, because the Greek Tongue being easily understood, it was not difficult to discover the Alterations that might be made in the Greek Text, which could not be done in the Hebrew which was understood by the Jews only. St. Jerome.

St. Jerome's Commentaries upon the Scripture, have great Relation to his other Studies, and those Writings that we have hitherto spoken of. First of all he sets down the ancient vulgar Translation, and with it joyns commonly his New Translation: Secondly, He enquires after the Sense of the Hebrew Text exactly, and compares it with the several Greek Versions. He cites the other places of Scripture which have any Relation to that which he expoundeth. In making these Observations, he clears the literal Sense of the Scripture, and discovers the Prophecies, by shewing their Accomplishment. And in the last place, he adds mystical Explications, and short Allegories, which most commonly are only Etymologies, and Turns of Wit about Words. He confesseth, that very often, he barely translated some passages of Origen's Commentaries, and other Greek Authors without naming them: Wherefore he pretends, that the Errors and Contradictions in his Commentaries are not to be imputed to him; because he only related the Opinions of others without approving them: that if he condemned them not, yet he did not intend to defend them, but would spare the others Reputation: And lastly, that this Moderation should give his Enemies no occasion to calumniate as they did, and to accuse him of upholding such Errors, that he was so far from, and which he refuted in other places.

These Remarks may give a General Idea of St. Jerome's Commentaries upon the Bible, especially upon the Books of the Prophets, wherein he followeth this method now described exactly and insists particularly upon the Exposition of the Historical Sense of the Prophecies. He divided his Commentaries into several Books, and intermixed here and there some Prefaces, in which he explains in general, the Subject of his Commentaries, and then answers the Calumnies that were raised against him.

The fourth Volume contains his Commentaries upon the four great Prophets namely eighteen Books of Commentaries upon Isaiah, six upon Jeremiah, fourteen upon Ezekiel, and one upon Daniel.

The fifth Volume contains the Commentaries upon Ecclesiastes and the twelve minor Prophets.

In the sixth Volume are St. Jerome's Commentaries upon the Books of the New Testament, after these there is a Preface to Damasus upon the four Evangelists, a Canon, or a Table of the Harmony of the four Evangelists: four Books of Commentaries or Notes upon St. Matthew's Gospel; wherein he explains very clearly the Letter of the Gospel, only adding now and then some moral Reflections, but he doth not inlarge upon Allegories. He observeth very near the same method in his Commentaries upon St. Paul's Epistles to the Galatians, Ephesians, Titus and Philemon which are in the same Volume, with the Translation of Didymus's Book of the Holy Ghost.

These Commentaries were not written by St. Jerome in the same order as they are set down in this Edition. Those upon the New Testament were composed first, not long after he was returned from his Journey to Rome, towards the year 388. About the same time he writ his Commentaries upon Ecclesiastes, and undertook afterwards those upon the minor Prophets, beginning at Micah, Nahum, Habakkuk, Zephaniah, Haggai. These Works were compleated before the year 392. The Commentaries upon the others held him till towards the year 400. Afterwards he wrote upon Daniel, and having done that he undertook the Commentary upon Isaiah, which was ended in 409; in 410. he composed that upon Ezekiel. The last of all is the Commentary upon Jeremiah, as it is observed in the Preface. If we

(p) The Books which the Jews own to be Canonical.] He did not translate the Books that were not in the Canon of the Hebrews, except Tobit, and Judith; and so the Translations of the Books of Wisdom, Ecclesiasticus, Maccabees, Baruch, and Jeremiah's Letter, and the Additions to the Books of Hester and Daniel, are not St. Jerome's.

(q) Excepting the Translation of the Psalms, and some mixtures of the ancient vulgar Translation.] It is certain that our vulgar is not the ancient Translation that was made from the Septuagint. It is certain also that it was made from the Hebrew but none of the Fathers understood Hebrew, besides St. Jerome, and so the Body of that Translation cannot be attributed to any Body else: Besides, the Translations of the Books of the Bible which are in his Commentaries, are almost wholly conformable to our vulgar. We find also in the other Books a great many of those Alterations which St. Jerome professes to have made in his Translation. It is certain that the vulgar Translation of the Psalms is not St. Jerome's. It was not made after the Hebrew, but after the Septuagint, tho' it is in some places conformable to the Translations of Theodotion, Aquila, and Symmachus, and different from that of St. Jerome, which is yet extant among his Works. The Additions to the Books of Hester, and Daniel, are not of St. Jerome's Translation, no more than that of the Books that were not in the Jewish Canon. In short, in our vulgar Latin are many places, which are remains of the ancient Translation mingled with the new, for there are several places, agreeable to the Translation of the LXX, and differing from the Hebrew Text, as well as from the Observations, and Translation of St. Jerome, who scrupulously tyed himself to the Hebrew Truth.

St. Jerome. add to theſe Works already mentioned, the Tranſlation of Origen's two Homilies upon the Canticles, that are in the eighth Volume, of the nine Homilies upon Iſaiah, of fourteen upon Ezekiel, and of fourteen upon Jeremiah, which are among Origen's Works, and the Verſion of Euſebius's Chronicon, we have all the genuine Works of St. Jerome, the reſt being ſpurious as we ſhall ſhew afterwards.

As for the Chronicon it ſhould not be looked upon as a mere Tranſlation of Euſebius, St. Jerome having added many things to it, as he ſays in his Preface, where he obſerves that what is there from Ninus and Abraham, to the taking of Troy, is a faithful Tranſlation of the Greek: that from the taking of Troy, to the 20*th*. year of Conſtantine, he had added and altered many things, which he had collected out of Suetonius and other Latin Authors; and laſt of all, that he continued Euſebius his Chronicon from the 20*th*. year of Conſtantine, to the ſixth Conſulſhip of Valens, and the ſecond of Valentinian, that is to the year 378. of the vulgar Æra.

We have loſt a Commentary of St. Jerome upon the tenth Pſalm, and the ſix following, divided into ſeven parts, which he mentions in his Catalogue. Notes upon all the Pſalms, which he ſpeaks of in the firſt Apology againſt Rufinus; and a Treatiſe upon the Book of Job, which he mentions in the Commentary upon the fifth Chapter of Amos. St. Auguſtine in his Treatiſe of Hereſies to Quodvultdeus, ſaith, that he had heard that St. Jerome had compoſed a Treatiſe upon the ſame Subject, but that he could not find it. The ſame Saint ſpeaks in the two hundred and ſixtieth Epiſtle to Oceanus, of a Treatiſe of St. Jerome's which Oroſius had brought to Oceanus, wherein he treated of the Reſurrection. Caſſiodorus names ſome other Works of this Father, as a Letter to Antius, where he ſaith, that he has explained great Difficulties: An Expoſition upon Solomon's Judgment: Notes upon all the Prophets; and a Commentary upon the Revelations. Trithemius mentions a moral Commentary upon the four Goſpels, and another upon the Canonical Epiſtles; but theſe Treatiſes are not extant: neither is it very certain, that they were St. Jerome's.

I have omitted ſome Books that are in this Volume now mentioned, becauſe they are not St. Jerome's though they bear his Name; Here is the Catalogue of them, and a Critick upon them.

The Queſtions upon the Book of Chronicles, and the Books of Kings, are rejected by moſt of the Criticks, as being not St. Jerome's. Firſt, becauſe when St. Jerome makes a Catalogue of his Works, he ſpeaks only of his Queſtions upon Geneſis, but ſays nothing of his having written the like Work upon the Chronicles, or the Kings. 2. Becauſe the Subject and the Style of theſe latter Queſtions ſeem different from that of the former. In his Queſtions upon Geneſis, St. Jerome ſets down often the Hebrew Words of the Text, and the Greek Terms of the Tranſlations of which he examines the differences: but in theſe there is nothing like it. In the Queſtions upon Geneſis, he ſeriouſly ſearcheth into the Senſe of the Scripture, and makes ſolid and uſeful reflections: Theſe on the contray are full of uſeleſs' trifling, and fabulous Remarks. Wherefore Lyranus thinks they are unworthy of St. Jerome; and aſcribes them to ſome newly converted Jew: For my part I would not affirm ſo poſitively, that they are not St. Jerome's. They were compoſed by a Man that underſtood Hebrew, who kept to the Letter of the Holy Scripture, who was acqnainted with Jewiſh Traditions: all which Characters belong to St. Jerome: the Style of thoſe Books is very like his, and no Man ought to wonder that in a Treatiſe of this Nature he hath followed ſome of the Jewiſh Fancies.

This will not hold of the ſmall Treatiſe which contains the Explication of the Countries, and Towns ſpoken of in the Acts: it being evidently written by ſome other Author beſides St. Jerome ſince he quotes this Father's Treatiſes when ſpeaking of Smyrna. It is among Bede's Works, who probably may be the Author of it.

The Commentary upon the Lamentations of Jeremiah is a Collection by Rabanus of the Thoughts of ſeveral Fathers, and particularly of St. Gregory. It is among that Author's Works, and it is cited under his Name, by Bonaventure, in his Commentary upon the Lamentations.

The Commentary or Book of Annotations upon St. Mark's Goſpel, is altogether unworthy of St. Jerome, both for the Style and for the Matter. The Author knew neither Greek nor Hebrew, nor ſpake very good Latin. He is guilty of ridiculous Errors, as when he ſaith, that Paſcha ſignifies Paſſage in Latin, and that Phaſe ſignifies the Offering of a Victim, and when he remarks that Nardus Piſtica, is as much as to ſay Myſtical. He confounds Mary Magdalen with Mary of Bethany; an Opinion refuted by St. Jerome in his Commentary upon the Twenty ſixth Chapter to St. Matthew, ſpeaking of the Croſs, he repeateth ſeveral Verſes out of Sedulius, who writ long after St. Jerome.

The Commentaries upon the Pſalms have not fewer Marks of their being Suppoſititious, for 1. The Author of them had no knowledge of the Hebrew and Greek Tongues. 2. His Method in expounding the Scripture is quite different from St. Jerome's, for whereas St. Jerome keepeth to the Hiſtorical and Literal Senſe, he uſes only Moral and Myſtical Expoſitions. 3. His Remarks are contrary to St. Jerome's; as when he expoundeth the hundred and fourth Pſalm, he ſaith that Cynomia is a Dog-fly. But St. Jerome rejects that Notion, at the latter end of his Letter to Sunia and Fretella. Upon the eighty ſixth Pſalm, he obſerves that according to the Hebrew, it muſt be Nunquid Sion, dicet Homo? St. Jerome renders it, Ad Sion, dicet Homo. He denies that the eighty ninth Pſalm is written by Moſes, tho' St. Jerome aſcribes it to him in his Commentary upon the thirteenth Pſalm. He ſaith that a Paſſage of Scripture cited by St. Paul in the third Chapter of the Epiſtle to the Romans, is taken out of Deuteronomy, and St. Jerome ſhews that it is out of Iſaiah. 4. This Author's Style is far from the Elegancy of St. Jerome's, nay it is very full of Faults, Repetitions, and Soleciſms. 5. This Author's Commentary is made up of common Places, and moral Exhortations. 6. he quoteth St. Eucherius upon the ſixteenth Pſalm. 7. It is manifeſt that theſe Commentaries are not Notes explaining the Letter of the Scripture; but Inſtructions, and Conferences (as appears by the Expoſitions of the eighty ninth, hundred and eleventh, and hundred and fifteenth Pſalms) whoſe Concluſions are in the Form of an Homily; and by ſeveral expreſſions, diſcovering that the Author ſpake to others. And this has made it be believ'd, that they are Diſcourſes of ſome Monk, who expounded the Pſalms to his Brethren, by collecting the Expoſitions of ſome Commentators. Wherefore it is no Wonder to find in the Commentary upon the ninety third Pſalm a paſſage which St. Auguſtine citeth in his Epiſtle to Fortunatianus, under St. Jerome's Name, and in the Commentary upon the fiftieth Pſalm, another paſſage quoted under St. Jerome's Name by St. Gregory, in his Expoſition of the fourth penitential Pſalm. St. Jerome.

The Commentary upon Job, having been made as appears by the concluſions at the requeſt of Victorius an Engliſh Biſhop, who lived in Bede's time, cannot be St. Jerome's, but very likely Bede's himſelf. Some attribute it to Philip a Prieſt and Monk, St. Jerome's Diſciple, to whom Gennadius aſcribes Commentaries upon Job. But this Commentary of Philip's is that which is attributed to Bede, and this is rather Bede's, being very like the Commentary upon the Proverbs of Solomon, which is undoubtedly his, as Trithemius aſſures us: Theſe Commentaries do very much differ from St Jerome's both as to the Style, and the Matter: The Author citeth the Scripture according to our Vulgar Tranſlation; he quotes St. Auguſtine, St. Gregory, and St. Jerome. In the Commentary upon the twenty fifth Chapter of Job, there is a paſſage cited by Fauſtus Rhedonenſis under St. Jerome's Name: It is likely that the Author of that Work had taken it out of this Father.

The Commentaries, or Notes upon all St. Paul's Epiſtles are not St. Jerome's, but a Pelagian Author's, who openly teacheth his Errors in ſeveral places, and particularly upon the ſeventh Chapter of the Epiſtle to the Romans. It is certain, that Pelagius made a Commentary upon St. Paul's Epiſtles, which St. Auguſtine quoteth in ſeveral places of the third Book of Merits, and Remiſſion of Sins. This ſame Commentary of Pelagius is likewiſe cited by Marius Mercator, and there are moſt of the Paſſages quoteth by both theſe Authors. Yet two or three are not there; which might give occaſion of doubting, whether it were perfectly the ſame, if Caſſiodorus had not informed us, that he ſtruck ſome places out of it.

The Epiſtle to Demetrias the Virgin which is the firſt Book of St. Jerome's ninth Volume, belongs likewiſe to Pelagius, as St. Auguſtine aſſures us in his Book, of the Grace of Jeſus Chriſt, where he refuteth the Errors therein contained,

The ſecond Epiſtle of the ſame Volume is a Letter of St. Auguſtine's to Juliana, Demetrias's Mother, againſt the foregoing Letter.

The third directed to Gerontius's Daughters, is of the ſame Style with the firſt; and the Author ſeems to be of the ſame Opinions. He commendeth St. Paulinus as his Contemporary and his Friend.

The eighth Letter of the knowledge of God's Law, ſeems to belong to the ſame Author, and perhaps Pelagius, who was St. Paulinus's Friend and had written a Letter to him.

The fourth Letter to Marcella, the fifth to a baniſhed Virgin, the ninth of the three Vertues, the twelfth of the Honour due to Parents are written in the ſame Style. Marianus thinks that the former belong to St. Paulinus. The ſixth and ſeventh are of the ſame Author: In this laſt there is ſome Diſcourſe of the Worſhip of Relicks, and of diſcovering the Bodies of St. Gervaſius, and St. Protaſius by St. Ambroſe. Some aſcribe both theſe Letters to Maximus Taurinenſis.

The Tenth Letter of the Aſſumption of the Virgin Mary, is written by ſome Latin Author who lived when the Eaſt was infected with the Errors of the Eutychians; as he obſerved himſelf long after the Death of St. Jerome, and Sophronius, to whom ſome have attributed this Letter. He that

St. Jerome. that writ it set it out under St. Jerome's Name, that what he saith of the Blessed Virgin Mary, might be more valued. And the better to colour his Cheat, he pretends to direct it to Paula and Eustochium. Altho' he enlargeth much upon the Commendations and Perogatives of the Virgin Mary, yet he saith that it was not certain, whether she was risen again, and her Body carried up into Heaven. This Treatise tho' suppositious, was inserted into the Offices of the Church by Paulus Diaconus, and Alcuinus, in Charlemaign's time: And since it hath made up part of the Lessons for the Feast of the Assumption, in the old Breviaries of France and Italy.

The eleventh is likewise upon the same Subject, and perhaps written by the same Author.

The Book of the Seven Ecclesiastical Orders, falsly supposed to be directed to Rusticus Bishop of Narbon, who lived at the same time with St. Leo, belongs to a Modern Author in comparison of St. Jerome who lived after Isidore of Seville, from whom he hath taken many things. Yet he is older than Micrologus, or than Bishop Hincmar, who quote this Work under St. Jerome's Name; which shews that this Author wrote about the seventh Century.

The fourteenth Letter is a Commendation of Virginity; where he describes the Danger of loosing it, and the Enormity of the Crime committed by a Virgin consecrated to God, when she violateth her Vows. This likewise is a Work of an Author younger than St. Jerome, as well as the thirteenth Letter, where some expressions which the Scripture makes use of after a Manner suitable to the Weakness of our Understanding, are explained. An ordinary skill may discover that none of these Pieces are St. Jerome's.

The Creed attributed to Damasus which is the fifteenth Piece of this Volume, is a Confession of Faith copied out, partly from that in St. Gregory Nazianzen, and in Vigilius Tapsensis, which we attributed to Gregory of Bætica: but this was brought to the Form it now has, long after Damasus; for there is the Article that the Holy Ghost proceedeth from the Father and the Son. Which was not in all the ancient Creeds.

The Explication of the Creed dedicated to Damasus, immediately after this Confession of Faith now spoken of, is that Confession of Faith which Pelagius sent to Pope Innocent, that is condemned by St. Augustine in his Book of the Grace of Jesus Christ, where he produces some Extracts out of it, which are word for word in this.

The eighteenth Tract is a third Confession of Faith, supposed to be directed to St. Cyril and composed by some Modern Author, as appears by his Method of expounding the Mysteries.

The following Treatise upon the Creed goes under Rufinus's Name, who without doubt is the true Author of it.

The Treatise to Præsidius is a Declamation composed by some mean Imitator of St. Jerome, who affects to speak of the Deaths of Valentinian and Gratian, as happening in his time, for I cannot believe that the trifles and impertinencies that occurr in that Work are St. Jerome's: they are far more worthy of an Impostor.

The Treatise of the Circumcision to Therasia, is a more genuine and an ancienter Monument.

The twenty first Epistle is a Letter of St. Augustine to Januarius, which was formerly the one hundred and nineteenth, and now the fifty fifth among this Father's Epistles.

The Author of the two following Treatises is not known, which are, the one a Declamation against a Virgin called Susanna, that was fallen into Sin; and the other a Reproof to Evagrius. for refusing to comfort a Churchman that had sinned.

The twenty fourth Letter is written by Paulinus.

The other Pieces in the first part of this Volume are mean, and flat Sermons upon divers Subjects.

The thirty sixth concerning the Observation of the Eves of Holidays is ascribed in the third Volume of F. Dachery's Spicilegium, to Nicetius Bishop of Triers, who lived about the year 535: there may be possibly several other Sermons of the same Author.

The fortieth and last, is a Letter upon the Parable of the Prodigal Son, which belongs to some Pelagian Author, and perhaps to Pelagius himself.

The second part of this Volume containeth certain Discourses very like St. Jerome's, though they bear the Names of their Authors. These are, a Letter of St. Paulinus to Sebastian the Hermite, the Translation of Pamphilus his Apology for Origen, a Treatise of Rufinus concerning the Falsification of Origen's Books, the Translation of Origen's Principles by Rufinus, with his Prologue, Rufinus his Apology to Pope Anastasius, this Pope's Letter to John of Jerusalem: both the Books of Rufinus against St. Jerome. Three Letters of St. Augustine to St. Jerome, which formerly were the twenty eighth, twenty ninth, and one hundred fifty seventh, amongst St. Augustine's, and now the one hundred sixty sixth, one hundred sixty seventh, and one hundred nintieth, and the Homily of the Pastors which is in the Ninth Volume of the same Author. The Epistle attributed to Valerius addressed to Rufinus, which comes after these Treatises of St. Augustine, is the Work of some Impostor. St. Jerome.

Gennadius his Book of Famous Men, is a continuation of St. Jerome's: but the Catalogue of some Ecclesiastical Authors, which is found also in this Volume, is a sad Piece, and so are two Letters going before it, and two others immediately following, falsly ascribed to St. Jerome and to Damasus,

The Rule for Monks is a Collection of Sentences and Precepts taken out of St. Jerome, composed by Lupus General of the Monks that stiled themselves of the Order of Hermits of St. Jerome, and approved by Pope Martin V.

The Dialogue, of the Origination of the Soul, betwixt St. Augustine and St. Jerome is the Fiction of some ignorant Person, who drew out of both these Fathers Works some Passages of his Dialogue.

It is not easy to guess who was the Author of the small Treatise of the Body and Blood of Jesus Christ; but it is easy to guess, that that he that composed it was well vers'd in the Doctrine of the Fathers: The same may be said of the Author that wrote the Homily upon the Parable of the importunate Neighbour who asked a Loaf of his Friend. Luk. chap. 11.

The third part of this Volume contains such Treatises as Marianus judged unworthy to be ranked among the Pieces of any Value. He might have joined to them those which he set down in the first and second Rank, whereof some are even more contemptible than those in the third.

He begins with three Epistles which some Impostor composed under St Jerome's Name, But the Imposture is discovered by the Meaness of the Expressions, and the little Exactness in the Thoughts, which discover the Cheat. The first is a comforting Letter to Tyrasius upon the Death of his Daughter. The second an Exhortation to Oceanus, how Injuries are to be endured. The third to the same, concerning the Lives of Clergy-men. It is a strange thing that Baronius durst affirm this to be really St. Jerome's, it being manifest that the Style is very different from St. Jerome's; besides that he speaketh of St. Martin, whom he calleth Blessed, and of his Life composed by Sulpitius Severus. We have already given our Judgment of the Catalogue of Ecclesiastical Authors that is inserted here, and of the precedent and following Letters.

The Rule for Nuns is written by some simple and unlearned Monk

The Letter of Chromatius and Heliodorus to St. Jerome, and the Answer under this Father's Name, upon the Virgin Mary's Life, are fabulous Fictions wholly unworthy of Credit.

Lastly, St. Jerome's Life, supposed to have been written by his Disciple Eusebius, St. Augustine's Letter to St. Cyril in St. Jerome's Commendation, and St. Cyril's to St. Augustine about his Miracles, are rejected by every Body, as miserable Pieces, full of Fables, Falsities and Ignorance. Can there be a grosser one than what the Pseudo-Cyrill saith, that St. Jerome's Miracles convinced Silvanus the Heretick, who taught, That there were two Wills in Christ? as if either St. Cyril or St. Jerome had lived in the Time of the Monothelites, or had approved of those Hereticks Doctrines.

St. Jerome, doubtless, was the Learnedest of all the Fathers; he understood Languages very well, and was well skilled in Humanity and Philological Learning. He was well vers'd in Ecclesiastical and Prophane History, and very skilful in Philosophy. Poets, Historians, Orators, and the Greek and Latin Philosophers were equally familiar to him; he throughly understood them, and filled his Writings with their finest Strokes. His way of Writing is clear and lively. He affects not that lofty Eloquence of the Barr, which is supported by high Terms and a handsome Turn of a Period; but he excelleth in that other kind of Eloquence that is necessary for those that commit their Thoughts to Writing, which consists in the Nobleness of Expressions and Thoughts. His Discourse is enlivened by a wonderful Variety of lively and surprizing Turns, and adorned with an infinite number of different Colours, sometimes he brings in Flowers of Rhetorick; sometimes he dextrously employs Logical Subtilties. He often makes apt Allusions by the finest passages of the Poets, and constantly calleth to his Assistance the Thoughts and Maxims of the Philosophers. In a word, he collects the finest things in all Arts and Sciences, and adapts them so exactly to his Discourse, that they may seem to be there in their natural Place. So that this Style may be compared to those in-laid Works, where the Pieces are so artificially pieced together that they seem to have been made one for the other. Yet it must be confessed that he affecteth this way of Writing too much, and overchargeth his Discourse with Quotations. He gives a diverting and chearful Air to the roughest Questions, and explains the most intricate Difficulties with great Clearness. His Commentaries upon the Scripture are written in a Style very different from his other Works. These flowers, and

St. Jerome. that Ornament before named, are baniſhed from them, and the Text is explained with Simplicity and Clearneſs, as he ſays himſelf in ſeveral places: For he ſaith in his Queſtions to Damaſus, He that treateth of the Holy Scripture ſhould not borrow Ariſtotle's ſubtle Reaſonings, nor uſe Tully's Eloquence, or the Flowers of Quintilian to refreſh his Reader with his Declamations. His Diſcourſe ſhould be plain and vulgar. It is not neceſſary that it ſhould be compoſed with Care; it is ſufficient that it expounds the Things, and diſcovers the Senſe of the Scripture and clears its Obſcurities. Let others be eloquent, and by that get Commendations and Applauſe; let them thunder out great Words in a plauſible Harrangue, for my part I am ſatisfied to ſpeak ſo as I may be underſtood, and diſcourſing of the holy Scripture, I ſtrive to imitate its Simplicity. So much of his Style. His Genius was hot and vehement; he fell upon his Adverſaries with Fierceneſs, made them ridiculous by his Jeſts, trampled upon them with Terms of Contempt, and made them bluſh with Reproaches. Though he was very Learned, yet there is infinitely more livelineſs and vehemency in his Exhortations and Polemical Works than Exactneſs and Solidity. He knew a great deal, but he never argued upon Principles which made him ſometimes contradict himſelf. He often carries his Subject too far, being tranſported with his ordinary Heat, he commends, blames, condemns and approves of things according to the Impreſſion which they make upon his Imagination. He is more moderate and juſt in his Commentaries, but not always exact, becauſe he did not think enough, but contented himſelf with dictating to his Amanuenſes (as he owns himſelf) either what he had read in other Mens Commentaries, or learned from the Jews. He often ſets down the Expoſitions of different Commentators, without altering any thing, and without naming thoſe from whom he took them: Nay, he introduced ſuch Explications as he did not approve himſelf, though without refuting them; being perſuaded that it was enough that he had given notice to his Reader, that in his Commentaries there were ſeveral Explications which he copied out of others. Thus he excuſed himſelf of ſome Errors that were imputed to him, becauſe they were found in his Commentaries. This Advertiſement may ſerve alſo to vindicate him from ſeveral Errors and Contradictions which may be found in his Commentaries. In this manner he juſtifieth himſelf againſt Ruſinus, who upbraided him for teaching in his Commentary upon the Epiſtle to the Epheſians, Origen's Opinions of the Reſurrection, the Præ-exiſtence of Souls, and of the Deliverance of Devils and Damned Men. He does not deny that theſe Opinions are in his Commentaries; but he aſſerts, that they are ſet down in Origen's Name, and not in his own; and conſequently, that they ought not to be imputed to him. It is an extraordinary thing however, that having produced theſe Opinions of Origen without declaring againſt them, he ſhould afterwards look upon them as criminal in Origen, and condemn them as very dangerous Errors. But what may ſeem yet more ſtrange, is, that himſelf hath uttered ſomething like it in his Commentary upon the 66th. Chapter of Iſaiah; where he really acknowledges, that the Puniſhments of Devils, Infidels, and impious Men, that know not God, are never to end; but he ſaith, that as for Sinners and impious Men that are Chriſtians, whoſe Works are to be tried and purified by the Fire, the Judge's Sentence will be moderate, and temper'd with Clemency. I know this place is underſtood of Purgatory and Venial Sins; but St. Jerome's Words ſeem to imply ſomething more, ſince the name of Impious Chriſtians cannot be given to thoſe who are guilty of Venial Sins only, and deſerve no more than Purgatory. Several ſuch things may be found in the Commentary upon the 4th. Chapter of Amos, in the firſt Book againſt the Pelagians: and in the Commentary upon the Prophet Nahum, where he ſays, That God granted Pardon to thoſe that periſhed in the Flood, as well as to the Sodomites, Egyptians, and other Sinners, who were puniſhed in this World for their Crimes; according to this Rule of the Prophet, that God will not puniſh twice for the ſame Sin. Several other particular Opinions of Origen, are to be met with in this Father's Commentaries, which he ſeems to approve of. He teaches in his Treatiſe of the Prodigal Son, that the Angels may ſin. Upon the Epiſtle to Titus, he affirms that they were before the Creation of the World. Upon the Prophet Micah, that they ſhall be preſent at the laſt Judgment. Upon the Epiſtle to the Epheſians, that Chriſt died for them. Upon Eccleſiaſtes that the Sun and the Stars have Souls; and many other Notions of this kind which he rejected himſelf when he refuted Origen.

In St. Jerome's Commentaries there are alſo ſeveral Opinions that ſavour of Jewiſh Superſtitions, or the too great credulity of the firſt Chriſtians: As when he aſſerteth in the Commentaries upon the Prophets, Daniel and Micah, that the World ſhall laſt but one thouſand years; or, when he ſaith in his Commentary upon the Prophet Habakkuk, that God's particular Providence extends only to Men; and that all other Creatures are governed by a general Providence without God's having a diſtinct knowledge of each Event: Or, when by too much ſcrupuloſity he condemns all Oaths, as he doth in his Commentary upon the 5*th*. of St. Matthew, and upon the 2*d*. Chapter of Zachary: Or, when he forbids Chriſtians to pay Tribute to Heathen Princes, upon St. Matthew, Chap. the 7*th*. Or, when he pretends that the Name of Father is to be given to no Man, in the Commentary upon the Epiſtle to the Galatians, l. 2. But if he is too ſcrupulous in theſe places, in others he ſeems to be a little too free; as, when in his Commentary upon Jonas, he adviſes and approves the Action of ſuch as kill themſelves to preſerve their Chaſtity. Perhaps ſome Perſons will not think him leſs to blame in his Commentary upon the 23*d*. of St. Matthew, where he diſapproves the Action of ſome devout Women, who, in imitation of the Phariſees, bound about their Necks, Books of the Goſpel, or Croſſes, or other Marks of Devotion*. Laſtly, He ſometimes giveth Allegorial Senſes to things which are to be underſtood literally; as, when in the Commentary upon the Epiſtle to the Epheſians, he ſaith, that Jacob's Wreſtling with the Angel, is not to be underſtood literally of a corporeal and viſible Combat, but myſtically of an inviſible and ſpiritual Fight: Yet he is angry that Men ſhould ſay that Hell-fire is not a real Fire, and that the Scripture makes uſe of that Word by a Metaphor; or, that what is ſaid of the Earthly Paradiſe, is not to be underſtood Literally, but Allegorically. Theſe are ſome of the Faults that have been taken notice of in St. Jerome's Commentaries, and which crept in by too great Precipitation with which he wrote them.

St. Jerome.

[* If ſome Perſons will think St. Jerome to blame, others, upon much better grounds, will commend him for diſapproving Practices that are ſo very ſuperſtitious, and that cannot any manner of way tend to the advancement of ſolid Piety and Holineſs.]

His Polemical Treatiſes are written with more care. But as he indulges his ordinary heat too much, ſo he falleth into thoſe Extreams for which he hath been often blamed. As for Example; when he diſputeth with Helvidius, he commendeth Virginity to that exceſs, that it was thought, he deſigned to condemn Matrimony; and his Book having ſcandalized many, himſelf was obliged to apologize for it, and moderate the Terms which he had uſed before. When he undertakes to abate the pride of Deacons, who would make themſelves equal with Prieſts; he ſo exalteth the Dignity of the latter, that he ſeems not to think them inferior to Biſhops. He diſcourſeth after ſuch a manner of Virginity, as would almoſt perſuade Men that it is neceſſary to lead that ſort of Life to be ſaved. Labour, Faſtings, Auſterities, with other Mortifications, Solitude and Pilgrimages, make up the Subject of almoſt all his Advices and Exhortations. His Delight was to write and hear of the Lives of Monks and Hermits, and he eaſily believed whatſoever was told him upon that Subject, though never ſo extraordinary.

Moſt of St. Jerome's Writings being either Critical or Moral, there is very little Dogmatical concerning the main Points of Chriſtianity to be met with in them: Beſides, he flouriſhed in a time wherein the Diſputes concerning the Trinity and Incarnation were over: the Arian and Apollinarian Hereſies having been rejected, and thoſe of Neſtorius and Eutyches not being yet riſen. The Pelagian Hereſie broke out towards the latter end of this Father's Life, which he undertook to refute immediately, with as much Vigour, as he could have done in his earlier years. He ſhewed the Neceſſity of Chriſt's Help, and the Impoſſibility of living in this World without Sin; and free from Paſſions, againſt that Heretick: However, he doth not weaken the ſtrength of Free-will, which conſiſted, in his Opinion, in a free Choice, either to follow or to reject God's Call. He went no further into the Nature of Grace, or other Difficulties about Original Sin and Predeſtination. He ſeems to think that God hath predeſtinated or reproved Men, becauſe of his eternal Fore-knowledge of the Good or Evil they ſhould do. This he teacheth in his Apology againſt Ruſinus, by oppoſing Origen's Principle, which grounded Predeſtination or Reprobation upon paſt Merits. He ſaith upon the 121*ſt*. Pſalm, that the Prayer of Jeſus Chriſt did not always obtain what he deſired.

I ſhall conclude theſe Remarks with ſome Paſſages of St. Jerome, that expreſs his Thoughts upon the Sacraments of the Euchariſt and Penance. You ask (ſaith he in his Letter to Hedibia, Queſt. 2.) how thoſe words of our Saviour in St. Matthew are to be underſtood: I ſay unto you, that henceforth I will drink no more of the fruit of the Vine, until I drink it new with you in my Father's Kingdom. Some grounding their Opinion upon theſe words, have invented a fabulous Reign of a thouſand years; wherein, they pretend, that Jeſus Chriſt ſhall reign corporeally, and drink of a ſort of new Wine, whereof he has not drunk from the time of his Paſſion, to the end of the World. But not to trouble our ſelves about ſuch Fables: Let us acknowledge, that the Bread which our Saviour broke, and gave to his Diſciples, is the Body of the ſame Saviour. If then the Bread that came down from Heaven is the Lord's Body,

St. Jerome. Body, and if the Wine which he gave to his Disciples is his Blood, let us reject those Jewish Fables, and go up with the Lord into that great and high Room [which is the Church;] let us receive at his hand the Cup, which is the New Covenant. Moses gave us not the true Bread, but our Lord Jesus Christ did; he invites us to the Feast, and is himself our Meat; he eats with us, and we eat him. We drink his Blood, we daily tread in the Sacrifices, the Grapes that are red with his Blood. He tells us again upon the same Subject, in his Commentary upon the first Chapter of the Epistle to the Corinthians, That Jesus Christ the Son of God hath given his Blood to redeem us, but that this Blood of Jesus Christ may be taken, either for his Spiritual and Divine Flesh; whereof he saith himself, My Flesh is Meat indeed, and my Blood is Drink indeed: Or for his Flesh that was crucified, and his Blood that was spilt in his Passion with the Soldier's Lance. The Author of the Book of the Body and Blood of Christ, that goes under Bertram's Name, quotes this last passage, which doth not prove, as some pretend, that the Flesh of Jesus Christ is not really in the Eucharist, but only that it is not there after a visible, passible, and corruptible manner, as it was upon the Cross. The Comparison, added by St. Jerome, of the Flesh of the Saints, explains his meaning. There may be found (saith he) a variety of Flesh and Blood in the Saints; so that the Flesh which shall one Day see the Salvation of God, shall be different from the Flesh that shall be incapable of possessing his Kingdom. Thus, as the Flesh of Saints, in the next Life, is the same Flesh, though impassible and incorruptible; so the same Flesh of Christ, which was corruptible, and capable of suffering upon the Cross, is impassible and incorruptible in the Eucharist. There is another passage, the Exposition whereof is much controverted in the Commentary upon the twenty-sixth Chapter of St. Matthew, where he saith, That the Lord having celebrated the Old Passover, which was a Figure of the New, passed to the true Sacrament of the Passover, that as formerly Melchisedeck, High-priest of the Almighty God, offering Bread and Wine, drew out before-hand the Figure of this Mystery; so Jesus Christ, to fulfil the same, should represent the Truth of his Body and Blood. These last Words are variously rendred: The Protestants will have the Word repræsentare to signifie only to represent. The Church of Rome, on the contrary, maintains, that repræsentare implies as much as to make present. This latter Sense is confirmed by the following Words: The fatted Calf which is offered, to obtain the Salvation of Repentance, is the Saviour himself, whose Flesh we daily eat, and whose Blood we daily drink. The Reader, who is one of the Faithful, understands as well as I do, what this nourishment is, which filling us with its abundance, makes us put forth outwardly Praises and holy Thanksgivings. This sacred Feast is daily celebrated; The Father receiveth his Son every Day, Jesus Christ is continually offered upon the Altars. In the Epistle to Pope Damasus, he saith, that there is as much difference betwixt the Loaves they offered to God in the Old Law, and the Body of Jesus Christ, in the Eucharist, as betwixt the Shadow and the Body, betwixt the Image and the Truth, and betwixt the Types and the things they represent. Lastly, In the Epistle to Heliodorus, speaking of Priests, he saith, that they make the Body of Jesus Christ with their sacred Mouth: Qui Christi corpus sacro ore conficiunt. In his Commentary upon Zephaniah, he seems to doubt whether wicked Priests consecrate it: But 'tis probable, that he speaks thus rather to terrifie them, than to establish a Proposition, whose Consequences would prove very dangerous.

I add an excellent Passage of this Father concerning the Sacrament of Penance, taken out of his Commentary upon these Words of the 16*th*. Chapter of St. Matthew: Whatsoever ye shall bind on Earth, shall be bound in Heaven; and whatsoever ye shall loose on Earth, shall be loosed in Heaven. Some (saith he) Priests and Bishops of the New Law, understanding not the Sense of these words, do imitate the pride of the Pharisees, by ascribing to themselves, a power to condemn the Innocent, and to absolve the Guilty. But God doth not so much consider the Sentence of the Priest, as the Life of the Penitent: And as the Levites did not cleanse the Lepers, but only separated those that were cleansed from those that were not, by the knowledge which they had of the Leprosie: Even so the Bishop, or the Priest, doth not bind those that are innocent, and loose the guilty; but having heard the difference of Sins, he knows whom to bind, and whom to loose, in the discharge of his Ministry. In this place, we may take notice, 1. Of the Custom of declaring Sins to the Priest. 2. The Power which Priests had to absolve. 3. The use Priests were to make of the Keys, and the care they were to take not to absolve, but such as were truly penitent *.

[* After what has been already said of St. Jerome, one can hardly esteem him a Person, upon whose Authority Points of Doctrine or Matters of Discipline can safely be established. He may however give the Sense of the Church in his own time, in Matters wherein he personally was not concerned, in which we have Reason to think that he gives a faithful Account of things: and therefore since we have no Cause to disbelieve what he says of the Eucharist, and of (what the Church of Rome calls the Sacrament of) Penance: but, on the contrary, may reasonably suppose, that he spake the Sense of the Church. The Passages themselves are to be examined. Of those concerning the Eucharist, we are to consider, 1. That he keeps himself to the Language of the New Testament in his answer to Hedibia's Question, and only confutes the Millennaries, but says nothing of the Modus of the Presence of the Body and Blood of Christ in the Sacrament. 2. That his Interpretation of those Words in St. John, My Flesh is Meat indeed, and my Blood is Drink indeed, of the Spiritual and Divine Flesh of Jesus Christ, shews that he understood them Allegorically; for he distinguishes that from the Flesh of Jesus Christ, which suffered upon the Cross: Now there is equal Reason to believe, that what our Saviour says in the 6th. Chapter of St. John, concerning Eating his Flesh, and Drinking his Blood, is literally to be understood, as what he says in the Institution of the Sacrament of the Eucharist: And if one is Allegorically to be interpreted, then they are both. 3. That the Mysteries of Religion were as nicely examined in that Age, as in any since Jesus Christ declared it to the World; and when every thing else that was Mysterious was controverted, this single Article of the Real Presence, as defined by the Council of Trent, which is contrary to that Reason, that the other Disputes concerning the Trinity and the Divine Decrees are properly above, was never debated. This is so strange (if we suppose the Doctrine of the Church of Rome to have been then receiv'd) that it is incredible; especially when we consider, 4. That the generality of the Fathers, at that time, interpreted every thing in Scripture Allegorically, to which they could not assign a convenient literal Sense. This the People were used to: This was St. Jerome's practice very often; and he had learnt it of Origen, whom he seems sincerely to have followed, till he quarrelled with Rufinus: So that we have great Reason to think, that Men so accustomed to Allegories, as the Teachers and the People were in this Age, would not be at a Loss to interpret our Blessed Saviour's meaning in any of his Words, which literally interpreted, would contradict and do Violence to that Reason by which they were capacitated to understand any part of his Law.

St. Jerome.

The Passage produced in favour of Auricular Confession proves nothing less; St. Jerome says, that after the Priest had heard the difference of Sins, he knew whom to bind and whom to loose; that is very true; but that is no Reason for Men to reveal all their Sins to the Priest; because the Church, in that Age, put Men under Penance only for publick Sins; those that had committed private ones of such a Nature, as would, if discovered, have made them unfit to come to the Sacrament, were exhorted to put themselves under a voluntary Penance; and if they did so, they were obliged to declare why they did it, that so the time of their Penance might be regulated; but this seems to have been left to themselves, which makes it quite another thing from the practice of the Church of Rome.]

St. Jerome's Works were published by Erasmus, and printed in six Volumes at Basil, from the Year 1516, to the Year 1526. In 1530, they were again printed at Lyons by Gryphius, and at Basil by Froben, in 1553. The first Edition of Marianus was at Rome, by Manutius, in the Year 1565, 1571, and 1572. The second at Paris, by Nivelle, in 1579. The third at Antwerp, in 1579. The fourth at Paris, with Gravius his Notes, in 1609. The fifth is of 1624, at Paris. The last was printed in 1643. These are the Collections of all this Father's Works. There are several of them printed by themelves, as the Letters in Octavo, printed at Rome by Manutius in 1566, at Antwerp in 1568, with Gravius's Notes, and at Mentz in 1470, at Venice in 1476, at Paris in 1583, at Dilingen in 1565, at Louvain in 1573. The Book of Famous Men, at Louvain and Helmstad in 1611, at Colen in 1580, at Lyons in 1617, at Antwerp in 1639. The Epistles to Theophilus at Paris in 1546, and 1589. The Book of Virginity at Rome in 1562. The Treatise of Hebrew Names at Wirtemberg in 1626. I say nothing of the Editions of the Chronicon, because they were mentioned in the Account of Eusebius his Works.

[Dr. Cave mentions an Edition of St. Jerome's Works at Frankfort in 1684, in 12 Volumes in folio, with all the Scholia, Censures, Index's, and Collections of all sorts that had been printed, till that time, upon St. Jerome; which are all comprized in the three last Volumes.]

The Benedictines of the Congregation of St. Maura will soon undertake a new Edition of St. Jerome. There is Reason to hope that it will not be inferior either in Beauty or Exactness to those of St. Augustine and St. Ambrose, which are almost compleated by the Labours of those Illustrious Monks, who make so good use both of their Time and Watchings, to enrich the Church with such glorious Works.

RUFINUS.

Rufinus.

Rufinus, Sir-named by ſome Toranus or, Tyranius (a), a Prieſt of Aquileia (b), was famous in St. Jerome's time and after he had been one of his beſt Friends (c), he proved afterwards one of his greateſt Enemies. He embraced a Monaſtick Life (d), and was baptized in a Monaſtery about the Year 370. He went out of Rome with Melania in 372 to go into Egypt (e), to viſit the Monks in the Deſart of Nitria; they came out of Egypt into Palæſtina, and dwelt 25 Years in Jeruſalem, where the Houſe of that famous Widow was the Reſort and Harbour of all the Pilgrims that came to viſit the Holy Places. She received them with Joy, and kept them at her own Charges and gave great Gifts to the Church of Jeruſalem. All this time Rufinus ſpent his Life in the Study and Exerciſes of Piety. Becauſe he underſtood the Greek and Latin Tongues very well, he undertook to read and tranſlate the Works of Greek Authors, and eſpecially of Origen: He conceived ſo High an Eſteem for that Author, that he undertook his Defence againſt all Accuſers. This made him fall out with St. Jerome, who took the contrary ſide: However, they were reconciled before Rufinus (f) left Palæſtina to return to Rome. But this Peace did not laſt long. Rufinus and Melania having tarried 25 Years in the Eaſt, reſolved to go back to Rome: They took Shipping in the Year 397; and having paſſed by Nola, where they were very well received by St. Paulinus, Biſhop of that place they came to Rome. Sometime after Rufinus publiſhed the Tranſlation of the firſt Book of the Apology for Origen, which went under Pamphilus's Name, with a Letter to ſhew that Origen's Works had been falſified, and a Tranſlation of the Books of Principles with a Preface that offended St. Jerome. This Saint wrote immediately his Apology againſt Rufinus, againſt which Rufinus compoſed two Books of Invectives. This Controverſie made a great noiſe in Rome, where both theſe famous Antagoniſts were in great credit, and had many Advocates. Rufinus kept himſelf quiet as long as Pope Syricius lived, and received a Letter of Communion from this Pope; with which he retired into Aquileia. But after his Death, Anaſtaſius, that ſucceeded him, cited Rufinus to appear before him; but he not appearing, only excuſing himſelf by an Apology, was condemned without Mercy; ſo that he could not preſerve his Dignity of Presbyter in Aquileia, where he abode till the Viſigoths ſpoiled Italy in 409, when he was forced to retire into Sicily, where he died in the Year 410 (g).

Rufinus wrote two ſorts of Books, Tranſlations of Greek Authors, and Books of his own making.

The Greek Tranſlations are the greateſt and moſt conſiderable part of his Labours; for, as Gennadius ſays, he gave the Latins a great many of the Greek Books. The Catalogue of them is this:

The twenty Books of Jewiſh Antiquities, by Flavius Joſephus.

The ſeven Books of the Jewiſh War.

Two Books againſt Appion of the ſame Author.

Euſebius his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, reduced into nine Books, and tranſlated with great Liberty (h). The Books of Recognitions (i), attributed to St. Clement with a Preface. Rufinus.

The Sentences (k) of Sixtus the Pythagorean, which he had falſely aſcribed to Pope Sixtus the ſecond of that Name.

The Book of Origen's Principles; 17 Homilies of the ſame Author upon Geneſis; 12 Homilies upon Exodus; 16 Homilies upon Leviticus; 28 Homilies upon Numbers, 26 Homilies upon Joſhua; 9 Homilies upon the Book of Judges; the firſt Homily upon the Book of Kings; 9 Homilies upon the Pſalms, and Commentaries upon the Epiſtle to the Romans; and a Letter of Origen's, wherein he complains of his Books having been corrupted.

The firſt Book of Pamphilus's Apology for Origen.

The Orations of St. Gregory Nazianzen: The Aſcetical Rules of St. Baſil, and ſome other Treatiſes of both theſe Fathers of the Church.

The Sentences of Evagrius Ponticus; and ſome other Treatiſes of this Author. He tranſlated beſides if we believe Gennadius, a Treatiſe of Pamphilus's againſt the Mathematicians *: And St. Jerome obſerves that he had publiſhed an Arian's Book under the Name of Theophilus the Martyr; but neither of theſe Books are extant.

[* By Mathematicians, they meant Judicial Aſtrologers; as alſo did moſt of the antient Romans, who were for the moſt part very ignorant of that part of Learning, till towards the Fall of their Empire, when Apuleius, Boëthius and Caſſiodorus tranſlated ſome of the Elementary Books of the Grecians, into Latin.]

Rufinus gave himſelf a great deal of Liberty in his Tranſlations, and kept more to the Senſe which he judged ought to be given to Authors, than to their Words. In a word, his Tranſlations are Paraphraſes, rather than literal and faithful Verſions. He hath uſed much Freedom, particularly in Euſebius's Hiſtory, and in Origen's Treatiſes, where he hath changed, added and ſtruck out many things, as he acknowledgeth himſelf. But if theſe Tranſlations be not ſincere, they are eloquent enough, and they have that clearneſs, which makes them pleaſing to the Reader.

The Works of Rufinus's own Compoſition, are theſe.

Two Books of Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, which he hath added to the Tranſlation of Euſebius his Books; wherein he continues the Hiſtory of the Church, to the Death of Theodoſius the Emperor, theſe Books are dedicated to Chromatius, of Aquileia, and were written at the ſame time that Alarick, King of the Goths, waſted Italy. They were tranſlated into Greek by Gelaſius of Cæſarea. They are pretty well written, but there are many Hiſtorical Faults (l).

A Diſcourſe to prove, that Origen's Books have been falſified; publiſhed at Rome in 397, with the Tranſlation of Origen's Book of Principles, and of Pamphilus's Apology.

(a) Sir-named Toranus or Tyranius.] This Sir-name was given him by a certain Author that ſpeaketh of Eccleſiaſtical Writers, whoſe Book is immediately after ther Treatiſe of Ildephonſus of Toledo in Miraus's Bibliotheca. He is commonly called Toranus; but the Original of that Name is not known.

(b) Prieſt of Aquileia.] Gennadius, Palladius, and all the reſt of the Ancients ſay that he was of Aquileia, a City of Italy; yea, himſelf ſeems, to declare it plainly in his Apology: yet Marius Mercator calleth him a Syrian. Garnerius is of opinion, That that Rufinus ſpoken of by Marius Mercator, and whom he ſuppoſes to have been Author of the Pelagian Hereſie in Rome, is not the ſame with him of whom we write now; but his Arguments are very weak, and in all probability he is the ſame Rufinus Father Gerberon thinks, on the contrary, that Marius Mercator ſpeaks indeed of our Rufinus; but he affirms, that Rufinus was not born in Aquileia, but only a Prieſt and an Inhabitant of that Town. He quotes two paſſages of St. Jerome to prove it, but they are not convincing. It is more natural to ſay that Marius Mercator called Rufinus, a Syrian, becauſe he dwelt long in Syria, and came from thence, when he ſowed the Pelagian Doctrine in Rome.

(c) One of his beſt Friends.] St. Jerome commends him in the 5th. Epiſtle to Florentius, and recommends him as a Man whom he particularly eſteemed. His 4th. Epiſtle to Rufinus ſhews the ſame.

(d) He embraced a Monaſtick Life.] He ſaith in his firſt Invective, that thirty years before he was baptized in a Monaſtery by Chromatius, Jovinian and Euſebius. This Writing is of 399, or 400.

(e) To go into Egypt, &c.] Palladius relateth theſe Circumſtances of the Lives of Rufinus and Melania, in his Hiſtoria Lauſiaca. Chap. 32. and 33. He ſaith, that they abode 27 Years in the Eaſt, but St. Paulinus reckons but 25: And this Epocha agreeth beſt with the other circumſtances of their Journey.

(f) Yet they were reconciled.] St. Epiphanius in his Letter charges Rufinus with Origen's Errors, and reckons him among the Followers of John of Jeruſalem, and among St. Jerome's Enemies. St. Jerome ſays the ſame in the 66th. Letter to Rufinus, as ſoon as he had publiſhed his Tranſlation of the Books of Principles, Scias nos reconciliatas inimicitias purè colere.

(g) Where he died, &c.] St. Jerome in his Commentaries upon Ezekiel and Jeremiah, ſpeaks of Rufinus as one already dead: It is certain that Rufinus retired into Sicily after Rome was taken, as he ſays himſelf in his Letter to Urſacius, ſet forth by Valeſius.

(h) Euſebius his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory reduced into Nine Books, and tranſlated with great Liberty.] He hath paſſed over almoſt all Euſebius his Ninth Book, and hath made but one of the Eighth and Ninth. In the Seventh he hath added a Relation of St. Gregory Thaumaturgus his Miracles, which is not in Euſebius; and in the Ninth, an Harangue of Lucian the Martyr. There is ſome alteration in the Order of the Chapters in the Sixth and and Seventh Books. There are ſeveral faults in his Tranſlation; he makes Zacharias, ſpoken of in St. Luke, to have been a Martyr at Lyons; he confounds St. Biblias with St. Blandina, &c.

(i) The Books of Recognitions.] Bellarmine believes that this Tranſlation is falſly attributed to Rufinus; but Gennadius owns it to be his.

(k) The Sentences of Sixtus the Pythagorean.] St. Jerome upbraids him with that Fraud in ſeveral places. Ep. ad Cteſiph. in c. 18. Ezek. & in c. 12. Jeremiæ.

(l) There are many Hiſtorical Faults.] Theſe are ſome of them. He ſuppoſes that Athanaſius hid himſelf for ſix Years after he was condemned by the Council of Tyre. He perverts the Order of Time in the Hiſtory of St. Athanaſius. He ſheweth but little favour to St. Gregory Nazianzen, and St. Baſil. He ſaith that St. Hilary was excommunicated, which is falſe: And he confounds the Time, when he ſays, That St. Hilary was baniſhed after the Council of Milan. There are ſeveral other faults of the ſame nature; notwithſtanding which, it is a very uſefull Work, becauſe he is the firſt that has unfolded and put in Order the Hiſtory of that time.

Two

Rufinus.

Two Books againſt St. Jerome's Apology, intituled Invectives.

In the former to juſtifie his Doctrine againſt the Accuſations of St. Jerome, he produces that Creed, and that Doctrine which he had learned at Aquileia above thirty years before, from Chromatius, Jovinian and Euſebius; he obſerveth, that in his Church they did not only profeſs in their Creed to believe the Reſurrection of the Fleſh, carnis Reſurrectionem; but that they added, of this Fleſh, hujus carnis Reſurrectionem. 'To the end, ſaith he, that making the 'Sign of the Croſs upon our Brother, as is uſually done at 'the end of the Creed, we may make a publick Profeſſion, 'that we believe the Reſurrection of the ſame Fleſh which 'we now touch.' He uſes this Confeſſion for his Juſtification againſt St. Jerome, from the accuſation of being in an Error in the Point of the Reſurrection of the Fleſh, and of not believing that Man ſhould riſe again with his whole Fleſh. He affirms, that he is wrongfully accuſed of that Error; for his Opinion is, that the whole Body ſhall riſe again with its Members; but that it ſhall be glorious and immortal, and ſhall be no more ſubject to Corruption, and other infirmities of mortal and corruptible Fleſh.

After this he anſwers what was objected againſt him, that he entertained Heretical Opinions concerning the Trinity. He ſhews that his Doctrine in that Point cannot be ſuſpected of Error: That if through inadvertency he hath let paſs in the Tranſlation of Origen's Principles, any paſſage wherein he ſeems to ſay that the Son ſees not the Father, and that the Holy Ghoſt ſees not the Son, he ſhould not for all that be accuſed of Error, ſince in ſo many places he profeſſes the contrary: That if they had charitably warned him of it, he would have either blotted out or altered it, as he had done the others, which he found to be contrary to the Doctrine of the Church, concerning the Trinity. He complains alſo, that Paulinianus had poiſoned the Tranſlation of that place, making him ſay, that it was neither Impious nor abſurd to ſay that the Son ſees not the Father; whereas he had only ſaid, That he would afterwards give a Reaſon of the Senſe in which it might be ſaid, That the Perſon of the Father was inviſible.

After that he repelleth all St. Jerome's reproachful Allegations, declaring that St. Jerome himſelf had formerly commended Origen, tranſlated his Works, and that in his Commentaries there were the ſame Errors concerning the Nature of the Fleſh, when riſen again; the Præ-exiſtence of Souls, and the end of the Torments of the Devils, and the Damned; for which Reaſon he found Fault that Origen's Books were tranſlated. This he ſheweth by long Extracts out of different Commentaries of this Father.

The Second Book of Rufinus's Invectives is concerning the perſonal Reproaches which he utters againſt St. Jerome. Firſt he charges him with tearing the Reputation of Chriſtians of all States and Conditions, in his Book of Virginity, and with blaming their Manners at ſuch a rate, that Pagans and Apoſtates enquire diligently after that Book, to make uſe of it againſt the Church. Secondly, he accuſes him of Perjury, becauſe after a ſolemn Oath to read the Books of Prophane Authors no more, he ceaſed not to read and make uſe of them in his Works: Particularly he takes notice of a paſſage in his Treatiſe of Virginity, wherein he pretends that St. Jerome ſpake of God after an irreverent manner. He laughs at St. Jerome, for boaſting that he was Dydimus's Diſciple, for having had one Month's Converſation with him. He jeſts upon him for taking as his Teachers, Porphyry the Philoſopher, and Barrabas the Jew. He quoteth ſeveral places of his Writings, to prove, that he not only commended the Erudition and Learning of Origen, but that he approved his Doctrine alſo. He accuſeth him of ſtriking out of his Chronicon, what he had ſaid before in favour of Melania. He reproveth him for the low Eſteem he had of the Septuagint. He finds fault with his contemptuous rejecting the Story of their 70 Cells. He blames him for not owning the Hiſtory of Suſanna for Canonical. Laſtly, he makes it criminal in St. Jerome, to tranſlate the Bible a-new, This Invective is written with much addreſs and vehemence. He compoſed it in the year 399.

Sometime after he writ his Apology to Pope Anaſtaſius, wherein having expounded his Belief of the Trinity, the Reſurrection, the laſt Judgment, and the Torment of Eternal Fire for the Devils, in a very Catholick Manner; he declares that he was uncertain of the Origination of Souls, having obſerved that Eccleſiaſtical Authors were not agreed upon that Subject; That ſome, with Tertullian and Lactantius, believed that they were formed with the Bodies; That others, as Origen, were of Opinion, that they were created with the World, and that God infuſed them into Bodies and Laſtly, that others affirmed that God both created and placed them in the Bodies at the ſame time; and ſo, not knowing which of theſe Opinions was the trueſt, he remitted the deciſion to God, not being able to be poſitive concerning any more than what the Church teaches, that God is the Creator of Souls and Bodies.

Having thus given an account of his Doctrine, he juſtifies himſelf of the Objections made againſt him for tranſlating Origen's Books. He ſaith, that it is very plain, that it was Envy only that made them condemn that Undertaking; that if there is any thing diſpleaſing in the Author, the Tranſlator is not to be charged therewith, who has barely delivered the Senſe of the Author. That he had prevented the inconveniency that might have happened, by ſtriking out the Errors which he conceived to have been added in Origen's Books; that he had given notice of it in his Preface; ſo that they were much to blame to accuſe and calumniate him upon that Subject: 'For, ſaith he, when will Simplici-'ty and Innocency be ſecured againſt Envy and Slander-'ing, if they be not upon this occaſion? I neither juſtifie nor 'approve Origen, but I tranſlated him, and ſo did many 'others before me; I am the laſt, and that at therequeſt of my 'Friends.' If ſuch a Tranſlation is not acceptable, be it ſo, I will tranſlate no more. He concludes, by aſſuring the Pope, that he neither has nor ever had any other Sentiments than theſe he hath now declared, and which are thoſe of the Churches of Rome, Alexandria and Aquileia; telling him withall, that ſuch as through Envy or Jealouſie againſt their Brethren, do occaſion Scandals and Diviſions, ſhall give an account at the Judgment-ſeat of God.

Rufinus.

The Expoſition of the Creed directed to Laurentius, which is found amongſt the Works of St. Cyprian, and of St. Jerome, is likewiſe Rufinus's Work. Gennadius who was one of the moſt Zealous Defenders of this Author, ſaith he hath done extreamly well in this Piece, and that all other Expoſitions of the Creed are not to be compared with it; and indeed it would be hard to find a more compleat Treatiſe upon the Creed than this.

He obſerves in the beginning, the Difficulty of that Undertaking, becauſe it was very dangerous to ſpeak of Myſteries; That ſome famous Authors had already written, but very ſuccinctly upon that Subject: That Photinus had choſen that way to eſtabliſh his Hereſie: But his Deſign was to expound the Creed with Simplicity, by keeping to the very Terms of the Scripture, ſo to ſupply what had been omitted by thoſe that writ before him. Then he declares that the Apoſtles had Conference together to compoſe the Creed, before they divided, that ſo they might teach all whom they ſhould convert by the ſame common Creed; That it is called Symbolum, either becauſe it is the Reſult of a Conference betwixt ſeveral Perſons, or becauſe it is the Mark of diſtinction, whereby Chriſtians are known. Afterwards he examines all the Articles, and obſerves the ſeveral ways of repeating them in different Churches. He clears their Senſe in a very plain manner, and confirms it by the moſt appoſite paſſages in the Holy Scripture. In explaining the Articles of the Catholick Church, he gives a Catalogue of the Canonical Books, of the Old and New Teſtament, and admits into the Canon of the Old Teſtament, none but the Books owned by the Hebrews: But he ſays, that there are other Books read in Churches, which are not made uſe of to confirm Articles of Faith, and he calls them Eccleſiaſtical Books. Theſe Books in the Old Teſtament are; Wiſdom, Eccleſiaſticus, Tobit, Judith, the Maccabees, and in the New Teſtament, the Book of Hermas, and St. Peter's Judgment. He obſerves further upon the ſame Article, that there is but one Church; And in few Words he condemns moſt of the Sects that have ſeparated from it; he enlarges much upon the laſt Article concerning the Reſurrection of the Body, obſerving again in this place, that the Church of Aquileia had added, of this Body, and that they made the Sign of the Croſs in the Concluſion of the Creed.

The Expoſition of Jacob's Bleſſing is the firſt Book that is printed under Rufinus's Name, in the Collection of his Works. This Treatiſe was written at Paulinus's requeſt; which made Iſidore to attribute it to Paulinus, tho' it be compoſed by Rufinus, as Gennadius aſſures us: It is divided into two Books. In the firſt he explains Judah's Bleſſing, and in the ſecond, that of the reſt of Jacob's Children. He particularly keeps to the Hiſtorical Senſe, without neglecting either the Myſtical or the Moral: He ſhews, That this Patriarch's Prophecies are fulfilled, either in the Church, or in the Jewiſh Tribes.

He follows the ſame method in his Commentaries upon the Prophets Hoſea, Joel and Amos. Theſe Commentaries are clear and neat: He expounds his Text after an elegant but natural way without entangling himſelf with Allegories, hard Queſtions, or long Digreſſions. He tells us in the Preface, that he had made ſome Commentaries upon Solomon's Books, and that he deſigned to do the like upon all the leſſer Prophets. He deſires the Reader to take Notice, That he made uſe of the laſt Tranſlation which is conformable to the Hebrew Text, but that he had but little Help from other Men's Works in his Commentaries. 'For ſaith 'he, the Latins ſeem to have been agreed to write nothing 'upon the Minor Prophets. Some Greek and Syrian Authors 'indeed have endeavoured to expound their Prophecies; 'and I confeſs I have read upon thoſe Books ſome Com-'mentaries of St. John Biſhop of Conſtantinople; but, his 'Cuſtom was, he compoſed them rather for Exhortations 'to his Auditors, than for Expoſitions of the Scripture 'Text. Origen after his peculiar Way, entertained his Rea-'ders with delightful Allegories, but takes no pains to 'give the Hiſtorical Senſe; which is the only thing that is 'ſolid. St. Jerome, a Man of vaſt Parts, and throughly 'learned, hath written Commentaries upon thoſe Prophets, 'but he ſo much inſiſted upon the Jewiſh Traditions, that 'he took no pains to find out the Senſe of the Prophe-'cies by their Events. So that his Commentaries are whol-'ly made up, either of Origen's Allegories, or of Jewiſh 'Traditions.' This is Ruſinus his Judgment of others; and it muſt be confeſſed, that he hath avoided what he reproves in the Commentaries of others, and that his is more uſeful for the underſtanding of the Hiſtorical Senſe of the Prophecies. It is ſtrange that Gennadius ſhould make no mention of thoſe Commentaries; but the Style and the Circumſtances ſufficiently diſcover them to be compoſed by Ruſinus: Though ſome have doubted it.

We have only now to ſpeak of the Commentaries upon the Seventy five firſt Pſalms, which were printed by themſelves at Lyons, in the year 1570. But they cannot belong to Ruſinus, becauſe there are whole Periods taken out of St. Auguſtine's Commentaries upon the Pſalms (m), and out of St. Gregory's Morals. Gennadius ſpeaks of ſeveral Letters of Piety written by Ruſinus, among which he gives the firſt place to thoſe that are written to Proba, but they are not now extant.

It muſt be acknowledged, that Ruſinus, tho' very ill uſed by St. Jerome, was one of the ableſt Men of his time: Perhaps he had not ſo much Learning as St. Jerome, but his Temper was better and leſs violent. He doth not write ſo good Latin, but his Style is more even. It cannot be denied, but that the Latin Church is obliged to him for the knowledge of the moſt conſiderable among the Greek Authors; and particularly of Church-Hiſtory. Tho' he was accuſed of divers Errors, yet he was convicted of none, and he juſtified himſelf ſufficiently of the reproachful Objections made againſt him. He defended Origen, but that was by rejecting the Errors father'd upon him. The only thing he may be thought to have been guilty of, not upon the Score of his own Writings, but by the Teſtimony of the Authors that have ſpoken of him, is that he was Pelagius's Tutor. But perhaps the Diſciples Errors may have been imputed to the Maſter, tho' he never taught them. However it cannot be ſaid, that he divided from the Church upon that occaſion, or that theſe Errors were obſtinately maintained by him. And ſo, in my Opinion, it is very unjuſt for modern Writers, to blemiſh the Memory of him, and uſe him, as if he had been one of the greateſt Hereticks in the World. We ſhould not mind all the Accuſations wherewith St. Jerome loaded him in the heat of their Quarrel: but rather imitate the Modeſty of Pope Gelaſius, who gives him the Character of an Holy Man; Ruſinus vir religioſus. Tho' he confeſſes, that St. Jerome was in the right when he reproved him, for what he ſaid concerning Man's Free Will.

Ruſinus.

The Works of this Author have been collected into one Volume in Folio, and printed at Paris by Sonnius in 1580. They forgot to inſert the two Invectives, and the Apology to Pope Anaſtaſius, with the Letter concerning the falſifying of Origen's Books, which are in the laſt Volume of St. Jerome's Works. His Tranſlations are in the ancient Latin Editions of thoſe Greek Authors, which were made publick before new Tranſlations were made.

(m) There are whole Periods taken out of St. Auguſtine's Commentaries upon the Pſalms.] This is particularly remarkable upon the 1ſt. Pſal. ver. 1. Pſal. 3d. ver. 1. Pſal. 4th. ver. 1. Upon the ninth Pſalm there is a whole Period which beginneth, Prima Perſecutio, taken almoſt word for word out of St. Auguſtine's Commentary upon the third Pſalm. The Author ſays, that he lived in a time, when no Hereſies appeared, which ſhews that this is the Work of a new Compiler.

SOPHRONIUS.

Sophronius

'SOphronius a Man of great Erudition, ſays his Friend St. Jerome, in his Book of Famous Men, writ when he was little more than a Child, the Praiſe of Bethlehem, and not long ago compoſed an excellent 'Treatiſe of the Ruin of Serapis: He tranſlated alſo into 'Greek, my Treatiſe of Virginity to Euſtochium, and the 'Life of Hilarion the Hermite: He likewiſe turned into 'Greek the Latin Tranſlation of the Pſalms, and Prophets, 'which I made from the Hebrew Text. The Greek Tran-'ſlation of the Book of Famous Men, is alſo attributed to 'him. There is another Sophronius Biſhop of Jeruſalem, who lived under the Emperor Heraclius about the year 636, to whom is aſcribed a ſmall Treatiſe of the Labours and Travels of St. Peter, and of St. Paul: It is a miſerable Buſineſs not worth mentioning.

Sophronius

SEVERUS SULPICIUS.

Severus Sulpicius.

SEverus Sulpicius, (a) Prieſt of Agen (b), famous for the Nobility of his Extraction, the Fineneſs of his Parts, and the Holineſs of his Life, was eminent in the times of St. Jerome, and Ruſinus, he was St. Martin's Diſciple, whoſe Life he writ; He was an intimate Friend of Paulinus Biſhop of Nola, to whom he writ ſeveral Letters. This Man ſpeaking of Severus's Converſion in one of his Letters, ſaith, that it was altogether extraordinary and miraculous; 'Becauſe he had at once ſhaken off 'the Yoke of Sin, and broken the Bands of Fleſh and Blood, 'in the flower of his Age; and at a time when he was 'famous at the Bar, when neither Riches, nor a Licence 'to enjoy Pleaſures after Marriage, nor his Youth could 'turn him out of the Way of Vertue, to ingage in the 'broad and eaſie Path of worldly Men: that he deſpiſed 'Wealth and Glory to follow Jeſus Chriſt, and preferred 'the Preaching of Fiſher-men, before all the Pieces of Cice-'ronian Eloquence, and all the Books of fine Learning: 'However, he ſhewed his Eloquence in the Writings which 'he compoſed after his Converſion.

The chief of theſe Works is his ſacred Hiſtory divided into two Books, which contains an Abridgment of what remarkable things happened in the Hiſtory of the Jews, and of the Church, from the Creation of the World, to the Conſulſhip of Stilico, and Aurelianus, that is, to the Year of Jeſus Chriſt 400, written with great Skill. He wrote alſo St. Martin's Life, three Letters concerning the Death, and Vertues of that Saint, and three Dialogues betwixt Gallus and Poſthumianus, whereof the firſt is concerning the Miracles of the Eaſtern Monks, and the two others about St. Martin's Vertues. Gennadius ſaith, that he writ ſome pious Letters beſides to his Siſter, two Letters to St. Paulinus, that were common in his time, not to ſpeak of ſeveral others, which were not publiſhed becauſe they were intermixt with Domeſtick Affairs. F. Dachery in the fifth Volume of his Spicilegium, hath publiſhed us five Letters of Severus Sulpicius to his Siſter, and Baluzius hath likewiſe publiſhed two in the firſt Volume of his Miſcellanea. The others are not yet publiſhed.

Severus Sulpicius.

Gennadius affirms, that Sulpicius Severus towards the latter end of his Life, was ſurprized by the Pelagians, but that afterwards having acknowledged the Error, which he was fallen into, by too great a Deſire of ſpeaking, he kept Silence all the reſt of his days, that he might repair his Fault. Guibertus Abbot of Gemblours, ſeems to queſtion the matter of Fact. But Gennadius his Teſtimony is not to be queſtioned in ſuch a matter: Sulpicius Severus lived till towards the year 420.

This Author is eloquent, his Writings are pure and poliſhed, he writ with great Brevity, and great Clearneſs, wherein he excelled Salluſt whom he imitated. His is the beſt written Hiſtorical Abridgment that we have, and yet he is not very exact, but commits Faults againſt the Truth of Hiſtory, eſpecially of the Eccleſiaſtical. He is very credulous of Miracles, and approves the Dreams of the Ancients about the Reign of a thouſand years, about Anti-Chriſt, whom he thought to be Nero, about the time of the World's end, and about the Sons of Men that had to do with the Women. He passes over the Church History from Jesus Christ, to the fourth Century, very lightly; he saith very little of the Arians, but he inlargeth much upon the Priscillianists, and from him we learn more of them than from all the Authors besides.

(a) Severus Sulpicius.] Gennadius ſaith, that Sulpicius was his Sirname; and St. Gregory of Tours, lib. de vit. St. Mart. c. 1. & l. 10. Hiſt. Franc. c. 31. calleth him as we do Severus Sulpicius: but in his Letters he calls himſelf Sulpicius Severus. But ſometimes the Sirname is put before the Proper Name. Moſt of the Ancients call him only Sulpicius. [Sulpicius was the Name of his Family; the Emperor Galba was of the Sulpician Family: Severus was his Cognomen, as Cicero to Tully, and Criſpus to Salluſt; ſo that in Strictneſs his Name is Sulpicius Severus, not Severus Sulpicius; his Prænomen, which went always firſt, is not known: In Gennadius's time, the Roman way of naming Perſons was almoſt wholly out of uſe, excepting ſome few of the Deſcendants of the Old Roman Families; and therefore one is not ſtrictly to take thoſe words Cognomento Sulpicius, as if Severus were the Name of the Family and not Sulpicius.

(b) Prieſt of Agen.] He ſaith in the firſt Dialogue c. 20. that he was of Aquitain, and in his Hiſtory l. 2. He calleth Phabadius Biſhop of Agen his Biſhop. They were miſtaken who confounded him with one Sulpicius Biſhop of Bourges, who lived above 190 years afterwards under King Gontran. All the Ancients allow to this Sulpicius no other Quality, beſides that of Prieſt.]

The Life of St. Martin is written with the same Purity as his History; but in a more diffuse and agreeable manner. The Dialogues are composed with so much Art and Exactness, that one can never be weary of reading them, and particularly the first, where Posthumianus relates several Particulars of the Eastern Monks. He speaks there of the Troubles that were in Egypt, and Palæstine, about Origen's Books, and makes a most wise and moderate Judgment of them, and tho' he does not wholly excuse Origen; Yet he does not approve of that Severity, which the Bishop of Alexandria exercised against those that defended him. He bewails the Misfortune of the Church to be disturbed with things of so small Importance. He commends St. Jerome without entirely applauding his Conduct. He quotes a Jest of a good Priest of the Coast of Africa, who refused to take Money offered him by Posthumianus, saying, That Gold did rather destroy the Church than edifie it.

Severus Sulpicius.

The Works of Sulpicius Severus, which Lazius had published full of Faults, were revised and corrected by Giselinus, who Printed them with his own Notes, and with Galesinius's at Antwerp, in the Year 1574. Sigonius made a new Edition of them with new Notes, Printed at Bononia in 1581, and at Francfort in 1593. The History was printed with Drusius's at Franker in 1607. There is an Edition by Elzevir at Amsterdam in 1635. And we have him entire with the Notes of several learned Men, Printed at Amsterdam, by Hornius his care in 1647 and 1654. These are the principal Editions of Sulpicius Severus, to say nothing of the Collections, into which his Works have been inserted.

In speaking of Sulpicius Severus who writ St. Martins's Life, it is worth observing that a Creed is ascribed to this Saint, but it is very uncertain, whether he be the Author of it, tho' it is very ancient.

Saint PAULINUS.

Paulinus.

SAint PAULINUS, called also Pontius, and Meropius, descended from an illustrious Family of Roman Senators, was born at Bourdeaux about the Year 453. He was directed in his Studies by the famous Ausonius; he studied with so much Assiduity the best of the Latin Authors, that he got a Style very like theirs. He advanced afterwards to the most considerable Offices of the Empire. Ausonius says that Paulinus was Consul along with him, but his Name being not found in the Fasti consulares, it is probable that he obtained that Dignity only in the Room of some other Person, who died in that Office, and perhaps in the Year 378, after the Death of Valens. He married Therasia a rich Woman, by whom he got a great Estate, the happiness that a Person so powerful and rich as he was, might have enjoyed, was much disturbed by abundance of Businesses, which made him recollect himself, and resolve to be converted. And to retire into Spain with his Wife Therasia, who had contributed much to make him take this Resolution. He was baptized by Delphinus Bishop of Bourdeaux some time before his Retreat, in the Year 389. He dwelt four years in Spain, where he embraced voluntary Poverty, selling his Goods by degrees to give them to the Poor. The Inhabitants of Barcelona, where he dwelt conceived such Esteem for him, that they caused him to be ordained Priest upon Christmas-day, tho' he thought not of it. St, Paulinus perceiving that he could not overcome the People's Resolution, after a long resistance, yielded to be ordained, upon condition that he should not be obliged to remain in Barcelona, because his Design was to withdraw to Nola. This Ordination was performed in 393, and the next Year, he left Spain to go into Italy. In his way he saw St. Ambrose at Florence, who shewed him some Marks of Respect: at Rome he was kindly received both by Persons of Quality, and by the People: but Pope Siricius, and the Clergy were jealous of him, which made him leave that Town quickly, and repair to Nola, where he dwelt in a Country House half a League from the Town; having lived there Sixteen Years with his Wife Therasia, in the Study and Exercises of a Monastical Life, he was chosen and ordained Bishop of Nola in 409. The beginning of his Promotion was disturbed by the Incursions of the Goths, who took the City of Nola; this Assault being over, he enjoy'd his Bishoprick peaceably to his dying day, in the Year 431. We read in St. Gregory's Dialogues, that he yielded himself to be a Captive in Africa voluntarily, to deliver a Widows's Son that was taken by the Vandals: but this Action which did not agree, either with the Circumstances, or the time of St. Paulinus's Life, is looked upon by the Learned as a Fable, as several others are, which may be found in St. Gregory's Dialogues.

There was a new Edition lately made of this Father's Poems and Letters, wherein they are set very exactly in a Chronological Order.

The first Letter is written by Paulinus to Sulpicius Severus, sometime after he was ordained a Priest; there he exhorteth Sulpicius Severus to continue in that sort of Life, which he had embraced, without being disturbed at the Discourses of the Men of the World that blamed him. He invites him to come to him at Barcelona, and acquaints him after what manner he was ordained Priest. 'Upon 'Christmas-day, saith he, the People obliged me to receive 'the Order of Priesthood, against my Will: not that I 'have any Aversion to that Dignity; on the contrary, I 'could wish to have began at the Porter's Order to come 'into the Clergy: but as my Design looked another way, 'so I was surprised and established at that new Order of 'the Divine Providence. I submitted my self to Christ's 'Yoke, and am now engaged in a Ministry beyond my 'Merit and my Strength..... I can hardly yet comprehend the heavy weight of that Dignity: I tremble when 'I consider the Importance of that Office, being conscious 'to my self of my own weakness: but he that giveth 'Wisdom to the Simple, and causeth suckling Babes to 'sing his Praises, is able to accomplish his Work in me, 'to give me his Grace, and make me worthy, whom he 'has called when I was unworthy.' He addeth, that he took Orders upon this condition, that he should not be tyed to the Church of Barcelona, so that he consecrated himself to the Holy Ministry, without being bound to the Service of any particular Church. He invites him at last not to put off his Journey, but to come to him before Easter.

Paulinus.

The second Letter to Amandus a Priest, afterwards Bishop of Bourdeaux is written likewise concerning that Ordination, at the same time with the first. He intreats him to give him Advice and necessary Instructions, for the worthy discharging of his Ministry.

The third to Alypius Bishop in Africa, was written immediately after his Arrival at Nola, in the Autumn of the Year 394. He commends there St. Augustine's Books which Alypius had sent him; he sends him Eusebius his Chronicon, and tells him, that he was very desirous to know the Particulars of his Life: and at the latter end of the Letter, he says, that he sent him a Loaf as a token of their Union, and a Figure of the Trinity, adding, that he shall make an Eulogy, of that Bread when he receives it, that is, that in receiving it he shall bless it, as he says in the following Letter to St. Augustine. It was the Custom of that time, especially with St. Paulinus thus to send Bread as a mark of Union: See the 1st. 4th. 45th. and 46th. Letters. St. Augustine in the 34th. Letter speaks likewise of a Loaf, which he sent to Paulinus, and makes use of the same expression; The Bread, saith he, which we send unto you, shall be made a Subject of Blessing, by the Charity wherewith you shall receive it. UBERIOR BENEDICTIO FIET DILECTIONE ACCIPIENTIS VESTRÆ BENIGNITATIS.

The fourth is written to St. Augustine; he commends his five Books against the Manichees which Alypius had sent him: It is full of Expressions, to shew how greatly he esteemed St. Augustine, of whom he craves Advice for his Behaviour: both these Letters were written in Autumn, in the Year 394, as appears by the sixth. St. Augustine answers this last by the 27th. Letter of the last Edition, which is there in the Italick Letter.

St Paulinus's fifth Letter is directed to Sulpicius Severus, wherein he returns him Thanks for the Testimonies of Love that he had received from him: He exalts his Conversion; and comparing it with his own, shews that it was more surprizing and wonderfull. There he also speaks of his Distemper, and of the Envy which the Roman Clergy bore to all Men, of any Reputation either for their Holiness or their Piety: and alledgeth this as a Reason of his withdrawing far from Rome; He oppoſes Pope Siricius his proud Behaviour towards him, Papæ urbici superba duritia, to that Charity where with both the Bishops and Clergy of Campania, had entertained him by their frequent Visits, and to that of the African Bishops, who had sent on purpose to know how he did.

The sixth Letter is written to St. Augustine in the Year 395, wherein he expresseth how impatient he was to receive some Letters from him.

The following Letter is an Answer of St. Augustine's which is the thirty first of his Letters, written in 396. He sends Paulinus word of his Promotion to be a Bishop.

Paulinus having received this Letter, acquaints Romanianus by the seventh, with his great Joy for that News.

In the eighth he exhorteth Licentius Romanianus his Son, in Prose and in Verse, to leave the World and give himself to God. These Letters are of the Year 396.

Paulinus. In the eleventh of the following Year, as is ſuppoſed, he urges Severus Sulpicius to come to ſee him.

The twelfth to Amandus is one of the moſt excellent of all St. Paulinus his Letters. There he very elegantly explains the Degrees of Man's Fall, and of the Redemption by Jeſus Chriſt, obſerving that God had preſerved Holineſs in the Poſterity of Seth; that in the time of the Flood, the Spirit of Holineſs reſted in one only righteous Man, who was then the Redeemer of Mankind, and a Type of the Redemption through Chriſt: That after the Flood Men returning to Corruption, God choſe Abraham to be the Father of the Faithful, of whom ſhould come the everlaſting King, and that at laſt all Mankind being ſo corrupted with Vice, that hardly any Remedy could be hoped for; the ſame Lord who formed Man, came to reſtore him by the ſame power by which he had created him: that he made himſelf Man to be a Mediator betwixt God and Men: That he was humble, and had choſen the vile things in this World to confound the proud, the learned and the mighty things of the Age: and at laſt he died and roſe again, to deſtroy Death in us, and reſtore Immortality. Theſe are the main Points explained very exactly by St. Paulinus in that Letter. At the latter end he takes notice that there is both Humility, and laudable Pride. That Pride, ſaith he, is to be approved, which makes us deſpiſe the World, and neglect whatſoever ſeemeth great, handſome and pleaſing to the Eyes of Man, apply our ſelves only to Heavenly Things, and ſtoop to nothing but God's Commandments, &c. On the other ſide, that that Humility is to be condemned, which hath not Faith for its Foundation, but only ſuch a Littleneſs of Mind as ſerves for lying, and is an Enemy to truth, which makes us looſe our Liberty, and become the Slaves of Vice; which mingles Wine with Water, that is, to ſay, which weakens the pure truth, by a baſe Complacency. MENDACII FAMULA VERITATIS INIMICA MISCENS AQUA VINUM, ID EST, VERITATIS MERUM AQUOSO ADULATIONIS ENERVANS.

The thirteenth is a Letter of Conſolation to Pammachius upon the Death of Paulina his Wife in 397, wherein having exhorted him to ſtop his Tears, and moderate his Sorrow, he commends his great Charity to the poor of the City of Rome.

In the fourteenth and fifteenth to Delphinus, and Amandus, St. Paulinus teſtifies his joy for Delphinus's Recovery, who had been dangerouſly Sick, giving him Thanks for the Service he had done to Baſilius the Prieſt. In the firſt upon occaſion of Delphinus his Sickneſs, he ſaith, that the Afflictions of the Righteous are profitable. 1. For the Exerciſe of their Vertue. 2. To keep them from Pride. 3. To imprint in them the Fear of God's Juſtice, which will grievouſly puniſh the Impious, ſince it deals ſo ſeverely with the Righteous.

The ſixteenth Letter to Jovius, is an Excellent Diſcourſe of Providence. It is placed in 399.

In the ſeventeenth to Severus Sulpicius, he complains that he came not to ſee him, neither met him at Rome, whether he was gone to celebrate the Feaſt of the Apoſtles St. Peter, and St. Paul; He exhorts him to come into that Country, to honour St. Felix the Martyr. This Letter was written by St. Paulinus at the latter end of the Year 399, after a Recovery from Sickneſs.

The eighteenth is written to Victricius Biſhop of Rouen, he ſent it by Paſchaſius his Deacon whom he found at Rome, and had brought to Nola. Having excuſed himſelf for detaining him ſo long, he makes a Panegyrick upon Victricius, deſcribing the Torments which he had ſuffered for the Faith of Jeſus Chriſt. This Letter is of the ſame Date with the foregoing.

The three following to Delphinus Biſhop of Bourdeaux, were ſent in the Year 400, by Cardamas an Exorciſt, who came to viſit him from that Biſhop.

In the firſt, he ſhews his Gratitude for the Love which that Biſhop had for him: He owns himſelf to be one of that Biſhop's planting, praying him that he would cultivate the ſame Plant by his Prayers, and water it with his Counſels. In the ſecond, he gives him notice of the tokens of Love and Reſpect that had been ſhewed him by Anaſtaſius Biſhop of Rome, and Veneris Biſhop of Milan. At laſt having commended Cardamas, he expounds the beginning of St. John's Goſpel.

In the twenty ſecond to Severus, He deſcribeth the Luxury, and Effeminateneſs of the Men of the World, and exalteth the Frugality of the Monks, in very elegant and proper Words.

Here is a very pleaſant Letter from Severus to Paulinus, wherein he recommends a Cook to him, affirming that he was very fit for him, knowing exactly well how to dreſs a Diſh of Beans, and Lettices, and one that would deſtroy as many Pot-Herbs as any Man he ever ſaw.

St. Paulinus made this Cook called Victor welcome, being ſo highly commended, and Paulinus was ſo well pleaſed with him, that he makes his Panegyrick in the twenty third Letter commending him, becauſe he cut his Hair perfectly well. He ſpeaks of the uſe of Hair, and from thence takes opportunity to give an Allegorical Expoſition of the Hiſtories of Sampſon and Mary Magdalen.

Paulinus. Sulpicius Severus had written St. Paulinus a Letter wherein he commended that Saint, for diſtributing his Eſtate to the Poor. St. Paulinus anſwers him, that it is but a ſmall thing to renounce this World's wealth, except one alſo denies himſelf; and that a Man may quit the Goods of this World heartily, without parting with them altogether. He treateth afterwards of the Conditions of the Evangelical Poverty, and the dangers and temptations that attend a Spiritual Life. Both theſe Letters are ſuppoſed to have been written about the latter end of the Year 400.

The twenty fifth Letter is addreſſed to a Perſon of Quality, whom he exhorts to quit the World, and adviſes him not to deferr his Converſion.

In the twenty ſixth Letter he praiſes a Monk named Sebaſtian, and a Deacon named Benedictus, upon their having worthily diſcharged their Duties. Theſe two Letters are in the ninth Tome of St. Jerome's Works, among thoſe falſly attributed to him. They ſeem to have been written in the Year 401.

The twenty ſeventh Letter to Severus Sulpicius contains nothing conſiderable.

The twenty eighth directed to the ſame, is ſomething more uſefull; there are ſeveral paſſages of Scripture applied to Jeſus Chriſt with much wit and dexterity. He writes, that he ſent to him by Victor, (whom he commends again in this place,) his Panegyrick of Theodoſius the Emperor, and his Verſes in commendation of St. Felix the Martyr: Both theſe Letters are believed to be of the Year 401.

By the twenty ninth, he thanks Severus for a Suit of Camel's Hair which he had ſent him; judging, that he thereby intended to let him underſtand the Need he had of Penance, and that in exchange he ſent him a Suit of Lamb's Wool which Melania had given him; whereupon he takes occaſion to commend that famous Widow, who lately paſſed through Nola. If this Letter was written in the ſame Year that Melania returned from Jeruſalem, as he that writ the Notes upon it ſuppoſes, then it is of the Year 397, and not of 402, as he affirms: But there is no Proof that it is of the ſame Year.

Sulpicius Severus had deſired to have St. Paulinus's Picture. The Saint refuſes to give it, and calls his requeſt a Piece of Folly: And this puts him upon diſcourſing in the thirtieth Letter of the inward and outward Man; it is thought to be of 402. There he draws a wonderfull Picture of Man's Heart; this is one excellent paſſage of it, much admired of St. Auguſtine in his 186*th*. Epiſtle. How ſhould I dare give you my Picture, that am altogether like the Earthly Man, and by my Actions repreſent the Carnal Man? Shame preſſeth me on every ſide. I am aſhamed, to have my Picture drawn, as I am, and I dare not have it made otherwiſe. I hate what I am, and I am not what I would be. But what will it avail me, wretched Man, to hate Vice, and love Vertue, ſince I am what I hate, and my lazineſs hinders me from endeavouring to do what I love? I find my ſelf at variance with my ſelf, and am torn by an inteſtine War. The Fleſh fights againſt the Spirit, and the Spirit againſt the Fleſh. The Law of the Body oppoſes the Law of the Spirit. Woe is me, becauſe I have not taken away the taſte of the poiſoned Tree, by that of the ſaving Croſs. The poiſon communicated to all Men from our firſt Parent by his Sin, abideth yet in me.

About the ſame time Severus asked St. Paulinus to ſend him ſome Aſhes of the Martyrs, to conſecrate a Church: St. Paulinus having none, ſent him a Bit of the true Croſs, which Melania had brought from Jeruſalem, with a Deſign to ſend it to Baſſula, Severus his Mother-in-Law. This precious Relick was locked up in a Golden Box. Upon Occaſion of this Preſent, he writes the Hiſtory of the Invention of the Holy Croſs. He ſays that Adrianus the Emperor cauſed a Temple to Jupiter to be built in the place where Chriſt ſuffered, and one to Adonis in Bethlehem to blot out the Memory, both of Chriſt's Birth and Paſſion: that theſe Temples ſtood till the time of Conſtantine: that the Empreſs Helena deſtroyed the Temples and Idols of falſe Deities, and erected Churches in thoſe places; and that in one of them the Prints of Chriſt's Feet when he aſcended up to Heaven were viſible upon the Sand. That after this the Empreſs, deſirous to find out where the Croſs of Chriſt lay, ſent for Chriſtians and Jews, to learn of them the Place where it might have been hid, and that when ſhe was ſhewed the Place, ſhe cauſed the Ground to be opened, and contrary to all mens Expectation, having dug deep, they found three Croſſes planted in the Ground, as formerly; that the Joy of finding what they ſought after, was much abated by the Difficulty of diſcovering which of the three was the Croſs of Chriſt, but that in this uncertainty it came into the Empreſs's Mind to bring thither a dead Corps; being perſwaded that Jeſus Chriſt would manifeſt by the Reſurrection of that Man which of theſe three Croſſes was his. The thing being immediately done, the Body which had been laid upon the two others (of the Thieves)

Paulinus. to no purpose, returned to Life as soon as the Cross of Christ touched him. He adds, that this Cross does dot diminish though Chips are constantly cut off from it.

In the Thirty second Letter to Severus, there are Verses concerning a Picture which Severus Sulpicius had placed in a Church of his own Building which represented St. Martin and St. Paulinus. The latter out of Humility saith, that St. Martin represented innocent Persons; but he represented Sinners. He likewise makes a Description in Verse, of the Church which he was building at Nola; and writ Inscriptions for both Churches. Here is a Description of the Churches that were built at that time. Both these Letters are of the Year 403. or thereabouts.

The following Letter to Alethius, hath nothing worth taking notice of: but they have joyned with it a Treatise directed to the same Alethius, which is one of the most Excellent Pieces in Antiquity, concerning Alms-deeds. It is intituled, of Ecclesiastical Treasure; because he shews there, that the greatest Treasure that a Man can get, and the best Gain that he can make, is to give Alms: It is Lending to God, who payeth great Use for it, and who gave Wealth to the Rich upon no other account than that they might communicate to the Poor; as he hath made the Poor and Destitute, that the Rich might not want Opportunity of exercising Mercy and Charity. This small Treatise is full of such Notions, about the Excellency and Necessity of Alms. It is believed that this Treatise was sent to Alethius, by Victor, with the foregoing Letter in 403.

In the thirty fifth, and thirty sixth Letters to Delphinus and Amandus, he recommends to their Prayers the Soul of of his Brother, whom he had formerly baptized, desiring them not to forget it. Delphinus being dead in 404. as appears by St. Paulinus's twenty seventh Poem. The Date of this Letter cannot be set backward.

Victricius Bishop of Rouen, having been at Rome, and Paulinus not being able to see him, this Saint writ him the thirty seventh Letter to tell him that his Sins must needs have been the Cause of his being deprived of that Happiness: and there he commends the Faith and Watchfulness of that Bishop: This Lettter was written after Victricius's Jour into Italy, in the Year 404.

In the thirty eighth to Aper, St. Paulinus exalts that Man's Conversion, exhorting him to rejoyce rather than be sad, because the World hates and despises that sort of Life which he had embraced; charging him to serve God with the same Zeal that he had served the World. This Letter is supposed to be of the Year 404.

Aper, and his Wife Amanda, having declared to St. Paulinus, that they were obliged to take care of their Estate, because of the Lands belonging to their Children; he answereth them, that they ought to be persuaded that the Divine Providence had left them that care for the Exercise of their Vertue. He saith further, that a Man may advance towards perfection by the Exercise of Country-Business, and learn to improve his Soul by the manner of tilling Ground. Here one may find an excellent Comparison of Agriculture, with the Spiritual Life, and an ingenious Allegory upon those four kinds of Beasts that eat up the Fruits of the Earth, spoken of by the Prophet Joel, which he applies to the Passions of the Soul.

In the fortieth Letter St. Paulinus answereth very modestly to the Letter sent him by Sanctus and Amandus; he treateth there of the great need he had to bewail his Sins, and applies to this Subject what is in the hundred and first Psalm, concerning the Pelican, the Owl, and the Sparrow.

The forty first, to Sanctus, is a Treatise of Christian Watchfulness, upon the Parable of the ten Virgins.

In the forty second, to Florentius Bishop of Cahors, he thanketh this Bishop for the Honour he had done him in writing to him, assuring him of his Friendship; he commendeth him and desireth his Prayers. That Letter is full of Noble Expressions, to extoll the Dignity and Merits of Jesus Christ. Jesus Christ, saith he, is that Rock containing that Spring of living Water, which we happily find not far from us, when we are very thirsty in this World: This is it that refreshes us, and keeps us from being consumed by the Heat of Lust. This is the Rock upon which standeth that House that shall never fall. This is the Rock, which having opened at the Side cast out Water and Blood, to make us taste of two wholsome Fountains, the Water of Grace, and the Blood, of the Sacrament, which proves at the same time both the Spring and the Price of our Salvation. These Letters are of the year 405.

The forty third is written to Desiderius, who desired an Exposition of the Benediction of the Patriarchs; he answers that he is better able to expound them himself, than him, of whom he desireth the Exposition, He only gives by the bye, an Explication of the Parable of the withered Fig-Tree He sent this Letter in 406. by Victor, lately recovered of a long and dangerous sickness. He gave him likewise two Notes which he had written long before, with a Letter to Severus, not now extant, Desiderius his Request gave him Occasion to require it of Rufinus, who gave him that Satisfaction. The Letters he writ upon that Subject are among Rufinus's Works, and among these the forty sixth and forty seventh, were written in 408. Paulinus.

In the forty fourth he admires the Spirit of Unction and Piety which he finds in Aper's Letters. Then he commends the Vertues of his Wife, and wishes that her Children may be well brought up.

In the forty fifth, to St. Augustine, St. Paulinus, returns him Thanks for the Book that Quintus had given him at Rome, as from him. Afterwards he commends Melania, then in Affliction for the loss of her only Son: Upon Occasion of whose Death, he discourseth of the Felicity which the Saints shall enjoy after the Resurrection. He observes that all their Employment shall be then to praise God everlastingly, and to give him continual Thanks. This Letter was put into the Hands of Quintus, an African Deacon, who came into Italy in the Year 408. St. Paulinus's Letter is of the 20*th*. of May following, as he observes in the Body of the Letter.

The forty eighth Letter is a Fragment of an Epistle, quoted by St. Gregory of Tours, in which St. Paulinus opposes to the Disorders and Impieties of the Age, the Sanctity and Religion of some Bishops, as of Exuperius of Tolouse, of Simplicius of Vienna, of Amandus of Bourdeaux, of Diogenianus of Albi, of Dinamius of Angoulesme, of Verecundus of Clermont, of Alethius of Cahors, and of Pegasius of Perigueux, Since those times there have been some Ages wherein the Manners of the Laity might have been opposed to the Disorders of Church-men.

The forty ninth Letter to Macarius contains the History of a Pilot Catechumen, who happening to be alone in a Ship loaded with Corn, which a Storm had blown off the Port of Sardinia, was saved miraculously by St. Felix the Martyr's Protection: and having been several Days at Sea, at last came safe to Land upon the Coasts of Abruzzo. This Letter may be called St. Paulinus's Master-piece. It were difficult to make a more agreeable Description, and a more natural Draught, than this which he makes, of all the Circumstances of that Story. He concludes from thence, that undoubtedly the Saints succour us in time of need. He was a Bishop when he writ it; and so it could not be before the Year 410.

In the fiftieth to St. Augustine, St. Paulinus proposes to him several Difficulties upon several places of the Scripture, to which St. Augustine answereth by the hundred and forty ninth, written in 414. since St. Paulinus's Letter was written some time before. The Date of the fifty first to Eucherius is not known; for he was yet in the Monastery of Lerins, out of which he did not withdraw till 426. It is a Letter of Christian Compliments, such as are all those of St. Paulinus.

There remains only the Passion of St. Genesius, Martyr of Arles, which bears St. Paulinus his Name, and is sufficiently like his Style, though some have doubted whether he was the Author of it.

After these Letters are thirty two Pieces of Poetry; fifteen of them are concerning St. Felix the Martyr, and others upon different Subjects, upon which I need not inlarge.

We have not his Epitome, in Verse, of a Book of the History of the Kings, commended by Ausonius; nor his Panegyrick upon Theodosius the Emperor, spoken of in St. Jerome, ep. 13. in Cassiodorus l. 2. Instit. divin. in Gennadius and Trithemius, and mentioned by St. Paulinus in his twenty eighth Letter. We have lost likewise some of his Letters to his Friends, which are mentioned in those that we have, and all those which he writ to his Sister concerning the Contempt of the World, reckoned by Gennadius among this Father's Works. The same Author speaks likewise of a Treatise of Repentance, and of the Praise of Martyrs, which he affirms to be the chiefest of his Works, and an Office of the Sacrament. As to the Collection of Hymns mentioned likewise by him, that perhaps did not differ from the Hymns we have in Honour of St. Felix. St. Augustine witnesseth in the thirty first Letter, that St. Paulinus was writing something against the Pagans. St. Gregory of Tours citeth a Letter, not now extant, which mentions the Relicks of St. Gervasius and St. Protasius. Lastly, St. Paulinus tells us in his forty sixth Epistle, that he had translated some of the Works of St. Clemens Romanus. It is likely, that while he was Bishop he made some Sermons, but whether they were not collected, or whether they have been lost, certain it is that we have none of them.

The Letter to Marcella is written in St. Paulinus's Style, but it doth not well agree with the History of that famous Widow; for the Author of that Letter writes to her as to a Person newly converted: whereas it is certain that she was converted long before St. Paulinus. It may be that the Lady to whom it is directed was another of the same Name.

The Letter to Celancia, attributed likewise to St. Paulinus, is of a Style not very different from his, yet not altogether the same, and he turns the Scripture after another manner. It is certainly of an ancient Author, who lived before Paganism was utterly destroyed, and after the Reign of Jovian.

Paulinus.

The Poem, whereby the Author exhorts his Wife to conſecrate her ſelf to God, is more elegant and better written than thoſe of St. Paulinus. It does not agree to him, becauſe at the time when it was written, the Weſt was all in a Confuſion, that is, in the year 407. It was not neceſſary that he ſhould exhort his Wife to be converted, and to lead a Chriſtian Life, ſeeing ſhe had lived ſo a long time. Four Manuſcripts aſcribe that Poem to Proſper.

The Poem, immediately following, is a Paraphraſe upon what St. Bernard hath written in honour of the Name of Jeſus, and ſo is far younger than St. Paulinus, though it ſeems to many to be ancient. It is not neceſſary to obſerve, that the Life of St. Ambroſe is written by another Paulinus.

The ſix Books of St. Martin's Life, aſcribed to St. Paulinus, cannot be his, becauſe in the ſecond he is cited as a third Perſon, and he that wrote them mentions Perpetuus, ſixth Biſhop of Tours after St. Martin, who was not ordained till towards the latter end of the fifth Century, long after the Death of St. Paulinus Biſhop of Nola. There is in the Rules of Benedictus Anianenſis an Anſwer to this Queſtion; What ought to be the Monks Penance, which is attributed to Paulinus, but though it be eloquent, yet it is not believed to have been written by the Biſhop of Nola.

The Writings of St. Paulinus are compoſed with a great deal of Art and Elegance, his way of ſpeaking is cloſe and clear, his Terms are pure and choice, his Diſcourſe ſententious and lively: He excites the Attention of his Readers and keeps them awake. He paſſes inſenſibly from one thing to another, all hangs well together, one Sentence depending upon the other, and the end of one Thought is the beginning of the next. St. Jerome adviſed him, upon his Converſion, to learn the Holy Scripture and to make uſe of it. He made great uſe of that Counſel; for after that he had made it ſo familiar to him, that in all his Diſcourſes he inſerts a vaſt Number of Paſſages of Scripture, and adapts them to his Subject, by giving them often a Senſe very different from their natural one. They are as ſo many precious Stones, ſet in, and ſo curiouſly wrought that they raiſe the Diſcourſe and give it a new Luſtre. Yet it muſt be confeſſed that he doth it too often, and that his Alluſions and Allegories are ſometimes too far fetch'd. He turns things agreeably and finely: His Letters are pleaſant and cheerful, they move, and they divert, rather than inſtruct. It is hard to judge, ſaith St. Auguſtine, whether they have more Sweetneſs or Fire, more Fruitfulneſs or Light. They ſoften and give Heat at the ſame time, they ſtrengthen and mollify. Yet it muſt be owned that his Notions are not always ſolid and exact; and often pleaſe becauſe of a falſe Luſtre. He often plays with Words, and uſes ſeveral Childiſh Allegories. He is excellent in his Draughts and Deſcriptions. He doth not penetrate into Dogmatical Matters, nor carry Points of Morality very far, but only points at them ſuperficially. All his Writings are ſhort, but they are many, and all carefully compoſed. Auſonius highly commends his Poems, yet can they not paſs for perfect in that kind, eſpecially thoſe which he made after his Converſion. He underſtood Greek but indifferently, and was very little converſant with Hiſtory or the Sciences. He was eſteemed, beloved, and careſſed by all the great Men of that Age, of what Party ſoever they were, and he kept Correſpondency with them without falling out with any. We may ſay, with Cardinal Perron, that he was the Delight of his time. He led a retired and very frugal Life, yet without great Auſterity. He was the Admiration of his own Age by Reaſon of his voluntary Poverty, and his Beſtowing his great Eſtate upon the Poor. Paulinus.

He was very pious, and had a very tender Conſcience. One finds in all his Letters the Character of an humble, modeſt and meek Spirit, he was much affected with the Senſe of his own Weakneſs, and the Neceſſity of God's Help. He had much Devotion for the Saints, was inclinable to believe miraculous Stories, and to reverence Relicks.

The firſt Edition of this Author's Works was made at Paris by Badius in the year 1516. The ſecond was printed at Colen, by the Care of Gravius. After that they were inſerted into the Orthodoxographa and the Bibliothecæ Patrum. Roſweidus cauſed them to be printed at Antwerp in 1622. but at laſt there was an Edition of them in Quarto at Paris. It is to be wiſhed, that the Bookſellers who printed it had taken as much care to have it upon good Paper and in a fair Character as he that took care of the Edition did to render it Correct and Uſeful. He hath divided it into two Volumes; in the former are the Letters and Poems, generally owned to belong to St. Paulinus, which are ſet down ſeparately according to the Order of Time. He hath reviſed and corrected the Letters and Poems by ſeveral Manuſcripts. He hath added ſome new Letters, ſome he hath divided into two, and in ſome places he hath made one of two.

The ſecond Volume contains the doubtful Works, Notes upon the Epiſtles and Poems that are in the firſt Volume; the Teſtimonies both of Ancient and Modern Authors concerning St. Paulinus, with a new Account of this Saint's Life, very large, and taken out of his own Writings: ſeven Diſſertations, whereof the two firſt are to juſtify the Chronological Order, wherein he hath ſet the Letters and Poems. The three following contain the Lives of Sulpicius Severus, Alethius, Victricius, and Aper, to whom St. Paulinus writ moſt of his Letters. The ſixth is concerning St. Paulinus his Works, which are either loſt or dubious, or ſuppoſititious. The laſt contains an Examination of the Hiſtory of St. Paulinus his Captivity. After this comes a Catalogue of various Readings, and ſeveral very uſeful Tables. There is a French Tranſlation of St. Paulinus, his Letters preparing, which will be uſeful and diverting.

PELAGIUS.

Pelagius.

PElagius, an Engliſh Monk, (a) Rufinus's Diſciple, Head of the Hereſy called by his Name, hath his place amongſt the Eccleſiaſtical Authors, becauſe of ſome Books that he hath written, of which we have ſpoken already. His Treatiſes are a Commentary upon St. Paul's Epiſtles (b), attributed to St. Jerome (c). The Letter to Demetrias (d) and ſome others, in the laſt Volume of St. Jerome's Works. A Treatiſe concerning the power of Nature, refuted by St. Auguſtine in the Book of Nature and of Grace. Several Books about Free-will; part whereof St. Auguſtine refuteth in the Book of the Grace of Jeſus Chriſt; and a Confeſſion of Faith, directed to Pope Innocent, (e) which is in St. Jerome, in St. Auguſtine, and in the ſecond Volume of Councils of the laſt Edition, pag. 1563. This Author's Style is dry, flat, and barren. He was not learned, but he was a Man of good Senſe: His Reflections are ſhort and judicious. Pelagius.

(a) PElagius, an Engliſh Monk.] St. Auguſtine, Ep. 106. Marius Mercator, St. Proſper in his Chronicon, and in the Poem of ungrateful Men, calls him Britonem, or Britannum. St. Auguſtine in ſeveral places gives him the Quality of Monk. He was of the Monaſtery of Bangor in England, not in Ireland. He began to publiſh his Error in Rome towards the latter end of the fourth Century, if Marius Mercator may be believed.

(b) A Commentary upon St. Paul's Epiſtles.] St. Auguſtine and Marius Mercator ſpeak of his Commentaries, and the latter obſerves that he compoſed them before the taking of Rome, which happened in the year 410.

(c) Attributed to St. Jerome.] ſome queſtion whether this Commentary be the ſame which St. Auguſtine quoteth under Pelagius his Name. 1. Becauſe that among St. Ambroſe's Works there is alſo a Pelagian Commentary upon St. Paul's Epiſtles. 2. Becauſe all the paſſages cited by St. Auguſtine out of Pelagius's Commentaries are not to be found there, or at leaſt they are not there in the ſame Terms. The former of theſe two Reaſons is very weak, it being poſſible that a Pelagian Author might write Commentaries upon St. Paul, different from Pelagius's. The ſecond would be of ſome weight, if in that Commentary attributed to St. Jerome, there were not moſt of the paſſages quoted by St. Auguſtine. For in the firſt place, St. Auguſtine in the 16*th* chapter of Pelagius his Acts, ſaith, that that Heretick had expounded theſe Words of the 9*th* chapter of the Romans, Neque volentis, neque currentis eſt Dei; by ſaying that St. Paul ſpake thus by way of Interrogation, Voce interrogantis & redarguentis. This very Expoſition, and theſe very Words are in the Commentary we are now ſpeaking of. 2. St. Auguſtine, in the 3*d*. Book of the Merits of Sins, ch. 12. ſaith, that Pelagius expounding that place of the 7*th* Chapter of the Epiſtle to the Corinthians, Sanctificatus eſt vir fidelis, obſerves that there were ſeveral Examples of believing Women who had converted their unbelieving Husbands. The ſame remark is in this Commentary. 3. St. Auguſtine, in the ſame Book, Chap. 4. ſaith, that Pelagius tells us upon theſe Words, Rom. 5. Qua eſt forma futuri, that they may be underſtood ſeveral ways: the ſame thing is mentioned in this Commentary: But what puts the matter out of doubt, is that Marius Mercator in his Commentaries, cites a long Paſſage out of Pelagius's Commentaries, which is found intire in this. It is true that St. Auguſtine in the 3*d*. Book of the Merits of Sins, chap. 2. produces an Argument againſt Original Sin which is not in this Commentary, and that he quotes in the 3*d*. chap. a place taken notice of by Marius Mercator, which likewiſe is not in this Commentary aſcribed to St. Jerome; but thoſe places may poſſibly have been blotted out by ſome Catholicks.

(d) The Letter to Demetrias.] It is certainly Pelagius's. See what is ſaid of it in the Account of St Jerome.

(e) The Confeſſion of Faith directed to Pope Innocent.] This Confeſſion of Faith was delivered to Zoſimus Succeſſor to Innocent, who ſent it to the Afrikan Biſhops.

COELE-

COELESTIUS.

Cœlestius. COelestius, Pelagius's his Country-man and Disciple (a), was guilty of the same Errors; yea, he carried them farther, and maintained them with greater Boldness. He was of a subtile and cunning Temper (b). He included his whole Doctrine in six Propositions, which Hilary of Syracuse sent to St. Augustine, who refutes them in the eighty ninth Epistle. They are related likewise by Marius Mercator; and were condemned in the Synod of Palæstine, where Pelagius himself was constrained to anathematize them. St. Augustine published, and withal answered eight Definitions, or Reasonings of this Author. He presented a kind of Confession of Faith to Pope Zosimus, out of which St. Augustine produces some Fragments in the fifth, sixth, and twenty third Chapters of the second Book of Grace and Original Sin. Cœlestius.

(a) Cœlestius, Pelagius his Country-man and Disciple.] St. Jerome says that he was of Scotland or Ireland; that he was a Disciple of Pelagius, and afterwatds Head of the Pelagians. Marius Mercator says that he was of a good Family, and born an Eunuch, and wanted no Learning.

(b) He was of a subtile and cunning Temper.] St. Jerome in his Letter to Ctesiphon observes that his Disciples said that he went over the Thorns of Logick. He professeth to despise him much, and calleth him Ignorant Calumniator, in his Preface upon Jeremy. But St. Augustine, in his Book to Boniface, Chap. 3. takes notice that he had a great deal of Wit.

NICEAS.

Niceas. THe account which Gennadius gives of this Author, is this. 'Niceas, Bishop of some Town in Roma-'nia, hath written after a plain and easy manner, 'six Books of Instructions for those that were pre-'paring for Baptism. The first is concerning the Dispositi-'ons of the Catechumens, who desired to be baptized. The 'second of the Errors of the Gentiles. He observes that 'in his time they put into the number of the Gods one 'Melchidius, a House-keeper because of his Liberality; and 'one Gadarius, a Peasant, because of his Strength. The 'third Book is of Faith in one only God. The fourth is against 'Calculating of Nativities. The fifth is concerning the 'Creed. The sixth concerning the Victim of the Paschal 'Lamb. The same Author writ a Letter to a Virgin that was 'fallen into Sin. Which Discourse may serve for an Exhor-'tation to all those that commit Sin.' This Author lived about the beginning of the fifth Century. And this is all that we know of him. Niceas.

OLYMPIUS.

Olympius. OLympius, a Bishop, and a Spaniard by Birth, hath written a Doctrinal Treatise against those that ascribe Sin to Nature, and not to Free-will: Where he shews, that not by Nature, but by Disobedience, Evil was mingled with our Nature. This Bishop was present at the Council of Toledo in 405. St. Augustine commends him for a Man of great Repute, in the first Book against Julianus, Chap. 3*d*. and 7*th*. and he quoteth his Writings in the 2*d*. Chapter of the same Work. Olympius.

BACHIARIUS.

Bachiarius BAchiarius, a Christian Philosopher, saith Gennadius, 'who was desirous wholly to disingage himself 'from the World, and to fix his Thoughts entire-'ly upon God; and therefore often changed his 'Habitation that he might be the less in love with any. It 'is said that he writ several small Books. I have read but 'one, concerning Faith, directed to the Bishop of Rome, 'wherein he applauds himself for his way of living; affirm-'ing, that it was not the Fear of Men, that made him chuse 'a Pilgrim's Life, but that he might imitate Abraham when 'he left his Country, and parted with his Kindred.' There is in the Bibliotheca Patrum a Letter of this Author's directed to a Bishop Januarius, written about a Monk, who had abused a Nun. The Bishop to whom he writes, would receive him no more, nor admit him to Penance: Bachiarius telleth him, that such Severity is contrary to the Scripture, and exhorteth the Monk to quit the Nun whom he had abused, and do Penance. This is a learned Letter, and well written; there are many happy Applications of both the Ceremonies and the Histories of the Old Testament. Ivo Carnutensis, Epist. 64. mentions another Letter of this Author's upon Solomon's latter end. Bachiarius

SABBATIUS.

Sabbatius. SAbbatius, a Bishop in Gaul, at the request of a Virgin that was consecrated to God, whose Name was Secunda, wrote a Book of Faith against Marcion, Valentinus, Aëtius, and Eunomius; wherein he demonstrates both by Reason and Testimonies of Holy Scripture, that there is but one only God who made Heaven and Earth out of nothing: He proves also that Jesus Christ was very Man, having had a real Body, subject to the same infirmities with ours, to the necessity of Eating and Drinking, to Weariness, Sorrow, Sufferings and Death. He opposes these Truths to the Errors of Marcion and Valentinus, who admitted two Principles, and affirmed that Jesus Christ had only the Similitude of Flesh: He sheweth against Aëtius and Eunomius, that the Father and the Son are not two different Natures, nor two Divinities, but that they have but one and the same Essence; that the Son proceedeth from the Father, and yet is co-eternal with him. This is what Gennadius saith of this Author, whom he places among those who flourished in the beginning of the fifth Century. Sabbatius.

ISAAC.

Isaac. THis Isaac is mentioned by none but Gennadius: He ranks him among the Authors that lived in the beginning of the fifth Century, and says, that he writ a Book of the Trinity and Incarnation; whose dark Reasonings and intricate Discourses shew that he owned three Persons in one and the same Divinity; yet so, as that each of them had something proper and peculiar, which the others had not: Viz. That it was peculiar to the Father to be without beginning, and to be the Original of the rest; That it was the Property of the Son to be begotten, and yet neither created nor posterior to him that begot him: And Lastly, that the Property of the Holy Ghost was, that though he was neither created nor begotten, yet he proceeded from another: And, as to the Incarnation, he wrote so, as that it appeared that he owned two Natures in one and the same Person. Sirmondus published this Book from a Manuscript in Pithœus's Library, which tells us that this Author had been a Jew; for this Treatise is intituled of Isaac's Faith, who had been a Jew. It contains those things whereof Gennadius hath made an Extract: There are very subtil Reasonings upon the Mysteries of the Trinity and of the Incarnation. Isaac.

PAULUS OROSIUS.

Paulus Oroſius.

Paulus Oroſius, a Spaniſh Prieſt of Tarracon, St. Auguſtine's Diſciple flouriſhed under the Emperors Arcadius and Honorius.

St. Auguſtine ſent him into Paleſtine in the Year 415, to deſire St. Jerome's Opinion concerning the Original of the Soul: He brought from thence St. Stephen's Relicks. The City of Rome having been taken in the Year 410, by Alarick King of the Goths, the Heathens willing to render the Chriſtians odious accuſed them of being the Cauſe of that misfortune, and of all other calamities that oppreſſed the Roman Empire. To defend them againſt that reproach, Paulus Oroſius, at St. Auguſtine's requeſt, undertook to write the Hiſtory of the greateſt Events that occurred from Jeſus Chriſt to his own Time, to ſhew that great Calamities had happened from time to time in the World, and that the Roman Empire had never been ſo free as ſince the Nativity of Jeſus Chriſt. This Work is intituled Hormeſta in ſome Manuſcripts, and is cited under that Name by ſome Author; the Original and Explication of which Title is very uncertain. It is a kind of Univerſal Hiſtory, divided into Seven Books, which may be of ſome uſe. It is not ill written, but not exact. It has many Faults againſt Hiſtory and againſt Chronology. He had not read the Greek Hiſtorians, and eaſily credited whatſoever might help his Subject, without examining whether it was well atteſted or not.

This Author hath written beſides a ſmall Treatiſe, intituled, An Apology for Free-will againſt Pelagius, which was printed with his Hiſtory in the Colen Edition of the Year 1582. By a Miſtake they inſerted ſeveral Chapters of St. Auguſtine's Treatiſe of Nature and Grace, which were ſeparated by Andreas Schottus in his Edition of it, in the Bibliotheca Patrum.

Paulus Oroſius.

There is alſo, among St. Auguſtine's Works, before the Treatiſe againſt the Priſcillianiſts and Origeniſts, a Letter of Oroſius to St. Auguſtine concerning thoſe Heretieks.

Some upon the Credit of certain Manuſcripts, aſcribe to him a Commentary upon the Book of Canticles which is amongſt Origen's Works, and a Treatiſe of Illuſtrious Men; but this was becauſe they put Oroſius's Name for Honorius's.

St. Auguſtine in his 166th. Letter, ſaith, that Oroſius had great Livelineſs of Spirit, a wonderful facility of ſpeaking, and a fervent Zeal, Vigil ingenio, promptus eloquio, flagrans ſtudio. His Style is cloſe, and his Language pure enough.

Oroſius's Hiſtory, was printed at Paris 1506, by Petit; The Apology for Free-will was printed by it ſelf at Louvain in 1558. The beſt Edition of both theſe Works, is that of Colen, of the Year 1582. The latter is found in the Bibliothecæ Patrum, and the former in the Collections of Hiſtorians.

LUCIANUS, AVITUS, EVODIUS, SEVERUS.

Lucianus, Avitus, Evodius, Severus.

THeſe four Authors are to be joyned with Oroſius, becauſe they writ concrening a particular Circumſtance of his Life, that related to the Relicks of St. Stephen.

The firſt is a Grecian Prieſt, one Lucianus, who writ an Hiſtory of the finding of St. Stephen's Relicks: His Book was tranſlated into Latin by Avitus, a Spaniſh Prieſt, Oroſius's Friend, the ſecond of theſe Authors we are now ſpeaking of. The third is Evodius, Biſhop of Uzala, in Africa, one of the five that writ to Innocent the firſt, the 95th. Letter in St. Auguſtine; he wrote a ſmall Treatiſe concerning the Miracles of St. Stephen's Relicks, which Oroſius had brought into the Weſt. He is likewiſe the Author of a ſmall Treatiſe of Faith, or of the Unity of the Trinity, againſt the Manichees, which is in the Eighth Volume of St. Auguſtine's Works, as Sirmondus, proves upon the Credit of MSS. St. Auguſtine mentions Evodius's Book, touching St. Stephen's Miracles in the 8th. Chapt. l. 22. Of the City of God; and Sigebert placeth Evodius amongſt the Eccleſiaſtical Writers.

Lucianus, Avitus, Evodius, Severus.

The laſt Author here named, is one Severus, a Biſhop of the Iſland of Minorca, who wrote a Circular Letter of the Jew's Converſion in that Iſland; and of the Miracles wrought in that place by St. Stephen's Relicks, which Oroſius left there.

Lucianus's Book and Avitus's Letter, are printed by Surius, upon the third day of Auguſt.

Both theſe Books, attributed to Evodius, are none of his, ſince they do not bear his Name as the Author, but only becauſe they are directed to him. Baronius publiſhed Severus's Letter from a MS. in the Vatican Library. Theſe Relations are ſo incredible, that were they not authorized by the Teſtimonies of St. Auguſtine and Gennadius, we ſhould ſcarce give any credit to them. They are all at the end of the ſeventh Volume of the new Edition of St. Auguſtine.

MARCELLUS MEMORIALIS.

Marcellus Memorialis.

THis Author wrote the Acts of the Conference held at Carthage, betwixt the Catholicks and the Donatiſts, in the Year 1411. Part of them were printed by Papirius Maſſonus, and printed with Optatus, and in the laſt Collection of the Councils; but Baluzius printed them more exactly in his new Collection of Councils.

Marcellus Memorialis.

EUSEBIUS.

Euſebius.

THis Euſebius is not much known. Gennadius doth not tell us whence he was, nor what he was; but only obſerves, that he writ a Treatiſe of the Myſtery of the Croſs, and of the Conſtancy which the Apoſtles, and particularly St. Peter, had, by virtue of the Croſs. He places this Author among thoſe that flouriſhed in the beginning of the fifth Century.

Euſebius.

URSINUS.

Urſinus.

URſinus the Monk wrote a Treatiſe againſt thoſe who affirm, that Hereticks are to be re-baptized; wherein he teacheth, that thoſe ought not to be baptized again, who were baptized in the Name of Jeſus Chriſt, or the Father, the Son and the Holy Ghoſt; though they that baptized them were in an Error, becauſe it is enough to have been baptized either in the Name of Chriſt, or in the Name of the Trinity, to give a right to receive the Impoſition of hands from the Biſhop. This Treatiſe is among St. Cyprian's Works; I am apt to believe that the Author of it is more ancient, than to agree to this place

Urſinus.

MACARIUS.

Macarius.

GEnnadius mentions one Macarius a Monk, who writ a Treatiſe againſt Aſtrologers in Rome; Wherein ſaith he, he ſought the help of the Scripture, by the labours of thoſe of the Eaſt. This Macarius is he, probably, to whom Rufinus addreſſes his Apology, and his Tranſlation of the Books of Origen's Principles; of whom St. Jerome ſaith in his Second Apology: Had you not returned from the Eaſt, this able Man would yet have been among the Aſtrologers. His Book is not extant.

Macarius.

HELIO-

HELIODORUS.

Heliodorus. HEliodorus, a Priest of Antioch, wrote an excellent Book of Virginity, grounded upon Scripture-testimonies. Gennadius, Chap. 29. Heliodorus.

PAULUS.

Paulus. ‘PAulus, a Bishop (saith the same Gennadius, Chap 31.) wrote a small Treatise of Repentance; wherein he ‘maintains, that Sinners are not so to afflict themselves for ‘their Sins, as to fall into despair. Paulus.

HELVIDIUS and VIGILANTIUS.

Helvidius and Vigilantius. HEre are two Hereticks refuted by St. Jerome, reckoned by Gennadius amongst the Ecclesiastical Writers. Helvidius, saith he, Chap. 32. Auxentius his Disciple, an imitator of Symmachus, writ a Book that shows some Zeal for Religion, but an indiscreet one: His Style and Arguments are very intricate. He cites several passages of Scripture, whence he concludes, that the Virgin Mary having brought forth Jesus Christ, had other Children by Joseph, that were called the Lord's Brethren. St. Jerome confuted that Error, and writ a Treatise full of Testimonies out of the Scriptures against this Author.

Vigilantius, a Priest, Originally of Gaul, a Parish-priest, in the Dioceses of Barcelona in Spain, hath written likewise some Treatises, whereby he shows his Zeal for Religion; but he was deceived with Ambition, and an Opinion of himself, because he had a fine Style. Not being well versed in the Scriptures, he made a very bad Exposition of Daniel's Visions, publishing several impertinent things, wherefore he is numbred amongst Hereticks. St. Jerome answered him likewise. Helvidius and Vigilantius.

St. AUGUSTINE.

St. Augustine. ST. AUGUSTINE was born at Tagasta, a City of Numidia, in the Reign of Constantius, the 13*th*. of November, in the Year 354. which had for Consuls the Emperour himself the seventh time, and Gallus Cæsar the third. St. Augustine's Father, an ordinary Citizen of that Town, was called Patricius; and his Mother, a very vertuous Woman, was named Monica. This holy Woman took care to instill into her Son the Principles of the Christian Religion, and placed him among the Catechumens: so that falling dangerously sick, he earnestly desired to be Baptized; but the violence of the Distemper abating, it was put off to another time. His Father being yet Unbaptized, and wanting that Sense of Religion that his Mother had, intended only to promote his Son in the World; and though he was not very Rich, yet he spared nothing to instruct and give him Learning: He made him learn the Rudiments of Grammar at Tagasta; and then sent him to Madaura, to study Humanity-Learning. This Child had no Mind to study, and particularly hated the Greek Tongue; but his love for the Poets, made him first take a pleasure in it. At sixteen Years of Age, having gone through his Humanity-Course, his Father took him from Madaura, and sent him to Carthage to learn Rhetorick; but wanting a Fund for this necessary Expence for some time, St. Augustine tarried a whole Year at Tagasta; where Idleness disordered him. He went away at the latter end of the Year 371. for Carthage, where he applied himself to study Rhetorick, with much Application and Success. In the mean while his Father died, quickly after he was baptized. The reading of Cicero's Hortensius, inspir'd St. Augustine with a love of Wisdom: But not finding there the Name of Jesus Christ, which he had printed in his Heart from his Infancy, he betook himself to the reading of the Holy Scripture: But meeting not there with the flowers of profane Eloquence, he could not relish it, and so suffered himself to be led away by the Manichees. Being nineteen Years old, he returned to Tagasta; where he taught Grammar, and frequented the Barr. This Exercise having fitted him for some noble Employment, he went to Carthage, at the Age of twenty five, about the latter end of the Year 379. where he taught Rhetorick with Applause. He was still engaged in the Manichæan Errors; but he began to be better informed, by a Conference which he had with Faustus, about the Year 383. The Insolence of the Carthaginian Scholars, made him resolve to go to Rome, though against his Mother's Will, who desired either to keep him there, or to go with him. Being come to Rome, he fell sick in the House of a Manichee where he lodged: Being recover'd, he got some Scholars about him; but finding that most part of them were so base, to go away without Paying, he sought to settle somewhere else. The Inhabitants of Milan having sent to Symmachus, the Præfect of the City, desiring that he would find a Rhetorick-Professor for them, St. Augustine procured himself to be Chosen for that Employment. Being in Milan, he was so wrought upon by St. Ambrose's Discourses that he resolved to be converted, and quit the Sect of the Manichees: He discovered this Design to his Mother, who who came to him to Milan. Plato's Books confirm'd him in his Resolution. His Conversation with Simplicianus and Petilian did much further his Conversion; and the reading of St. Paul's Epistles brought this great Work to Perfection, in the 32d. year of his Age. Before the Vacation, in the year 386. He stay'd only a few Days, to make an end of his Publick Lectures, which he was to read before the Vacation: which no sooner came, but he withdrew to Verecundus his House; where he betook himself seriously to studying of the Truth, and to fit himself for Baptism; which he received at Easter, in the year 387. Having utterly renounced his Profession. Afterwards, He resolved to return into his own Country; and having tarried some time at Rome; he embark'd at Ostia, where his Mother died. However, he continued his Voyage, and arrived in Africa towards the end of the year 388. He went through Carthage, where he lodged in a Magistrate's House, named Innocent; who was miraculously cured, as he gives the Account, in the 8th. Chap. of the 22d. Book of The City of God. He went to dwell at Tagasta; where he abode three years, living in common with some of his Friends exercising himself by Fastings, Prayers, and other Works of Piety, and applying himself Day and Night to the Meditation of the Law of God. The Fame of his Piety was so great, that all that designed to embrace a Spiritual Life, addressed themselves to him: Among the rest, a Person of Quality in Hippo, who was willing to give up himself to God, desired to entertain him, and to bring him to that Town. St. Augustine did not find himself disposed to follow his Advice: yet God did not permit his Journey to prove in vain; for Valerius, Bishop of Hippo, having proposed to the People to chuse a Priest whom that Church stood in need of, he chose St. Augustine, when he did not think of it; and he Ordained him, against his Will, about the beginning of the year 391. St. Augustine immediately retir'd to prepare himself for the worthy discharging of the Sacerdotal Function, and begg'd of Valerius time till Easter: In which space, he established a Monastery, or Community of Persons that had all things common, renouncing the Property of any thing. Valerius, who designed that St. Augustine should preach in his room, permitted him to do it in his Presence, contrary to the Custom of the African Churches. This did not please some of his Brethren; but he excus'd it, by the Usage of the Eastern Churches, and the need he had that some Body should preach the Word of God in his place; because he being a Greek, could not do it so well in Latin. This Custom was found so reasonable, that several Bishops in Africa followed his Example; admitting Priests to preach in their Presence: yea they did St. Augustine the Honour to make him speak in a General Council of Africa, held at Carthage, in the year 393. where he expounded the Creed, in the Presence of the Bishops; who conceived so great an Esteem of his Learning, that they judged him worthy of a more excellent Dignity. But Valerius fearing lest a Person so necessary for the Government of his Dioceses, should be taken away from him, resolved to make him his Co-adjutor; and accordingly, two years after, he caused him to be Ordained Bishop of Hippo, by Megalius, Bishop of Calama, then Primate of Numidia, in the year 395. With much difficulty St. Augustine consented to that Ordination, though he did not St. Augustine.

St. Auguſtine.

then know, as he afterwards declar'd, that it was contrary to the Laws of the Church, and to a Canon of the Council of Nice, which forbids the Ordaining two Biſhops in the ſame Church. I ſhall not now give any Account of what he did and wrote whilſt he was Biſhop, becauſe that will come in, in the Abridgment of his Works: Neither will I enlarge upon the Praiſes which may be given him, nor upon his Holineſs and his Vertues, which were known and admir'd by all the World, both before and after his Death. This is no part of my Deſign: beſides, the Name only of St. Auguſtine, is the greateſt Commendation that can be given him; and whatſoever may be ſaid after that, can ſerve only to leſſen the Opinion Men have conceived of his rare Merit, and his great Piety. He died as Holily as he had lived, the 28th. day of Auguſt, 430. aged Seventy ſix Years, with Grief to ſee his Country invaded by the Vandals; and the City, whereof he was Biſhop, beſieged for ſeveral Months. St. Auguſtine.

St. Auguſtine's Works make up ſeveral Volumes, wherein they are divided according to that order which was judged to be moſt natural. We ſhall follow that which is obſerved in the laſt Edition, ſet forth by the Benedictines of St. Germains.

The Firſt TOME of St. Auguſtine's Works.

Tome. I

THe Firſt Volume containeth the Works which he wrote before he was a Prieſt; with his Retractations and Confeſſions: which ſerve as Prefaces to his Works; becauſe the firſt giveth an Account of his Writings; and is uſeful to underſtand the moſt difficult places of his Works: and the ſecond diſcovers his Genius, and takes notice of the principal Circumſtances of his Life.

The Book of Retractations, is a Critical Review of his Works. He tells you there the Title, and ſets down the firſt Words of them: He gives a Catalogue according to the Time, and he obſerves upon what Occaſion, and wherefore he writ them: He tells the Subject and the Deſign which he had in compoſing them: He clears thoſe places which ſeem to be obſcure: He ſoftens thoſe which he thinks are too hard, gives a good Senſe to ſuch as ſeem capable of having a bad one, and rectifies them where he thinks that he erred from the Truth. In one word; He confeſſeth ingenuouſly the Errors or Miſtakes which he committed. The Preface to this Work is very humble: He ſays, that his Deſign is, to review his Works with the ſeverity of a Cenſor, and to reprove his own Faults himſelf; following therein the Apoſtle's Advice, who ſaith, That if we judge our ſelves, we ſhould not be judged of the Lord. That he is frighted with thoſe Words of the Wiſe-man, That it is difficult to avoid committing Faults in much ſpeaking. That he is not terrify'd with the great number of his Writings; ſince none can be ſaid to write or ſpeak too much, when he ſpeaks and writes only things that are neceſſary: but he is afraid, leſt there ſhould be in his Writings many falſe things, or at leaſt, unprofitable ones. That if now being Old, he thinketh not himſelf free from Error, it is impoſſible but that he muſt have committed Faults when he was Young, either in Speaking or in Writing; and ſo much the rather, becauſe he was then obliged to ſpeak often. That therefore he is reſolved to judge himſelf, according to the Rules of Jeſus Chriſt, his Maſter, whoſe Judgments he deſires to avoid.

The Body of this Work is divided into two Books. In the former, he reviſeth the Works which he writ before he was Biſhop: And in the latter, he ſpeaketh of thoſe which he compoſed afterwards, to the Year 427. which is the time when he made his Book of Retractations. I need ſay no more at preſent, becauſe in diſcourſing of each of them, I ſhall mention what St. Auguſtine hath obſerved in his Retractations.

His Confeſſions are an excellent Picture of his Life; he draweth himſelf with lively and natural ſhapes, repreſenting his Infancy, his Youth, and Converſion, very critically. He diſcovers both his Vices, and his Vertues, ſhewing plainly the inward Bent of his Heart; with the ſeveral Motions wherewith he was agitated: As he ſpeaks to God, ſo he often lifts up his Spirit towards him, and intermixes his Narration with Prayers, Inſtructions, and Reflections. He tells us himſelf, that he would have us view him in that Book, as in a Looking-Glaſs that repreſents him to the Life; and that his Deſign in the Writing of it, was to praiſe both the Juſtice, and the Mercy of God, with Reſpect to the Good and Evil which he had done, and to lift up his Heart, and Spirit to God. That this is the Effect that it produced in him when he compoſed it, and that which it produceth now, when he readeth it. Others (ſaith he) may have what Opinion of it they pleaſe; but I know that ſeveral Pious Perſons have loved my Confeſſions very much, and do love them ſtill. As indeed, all Spiritual Perſons have ever ſince read that Work with Delight and Admiration. This Book is not full of whimſical Imaginations, and empty, obſcure, uſeleſs Spiritualities, as moſt Works of this Nature are: It contains, on the contrary, excellent Prayers; ſublime Notions of the Greatneſs, Wiſdom, Goodneſs, and Providence of God; ſolid Reflections upon the Vanity, Weakneſs, and Corruption of Man; proper Remedies for his Miſery, and Darkneſs; and moſt uſeful Inſtructions to further him in a ſpiritual Life. In one word, it may be ſaid, that of all ſpiritual Books, there is none more ſublime or ſtronger than this. Yet there are ſome Notions too Metaphyſical, above the Reach of ſome devout Men; and there appeareth too great an Affectation of Eloquence: there is, perhaps, too much Wit and Heat, and not enough of Meekneſs, and Simplicity. Tome I.

St. Auguſtine's Confeſſions are divided into thirteen Books; whereof the ten firſt treat of his Actions, and the three laſt contain Reflections upon the beginning of Geneſis. In the firſt Book, after an excellent Prayer to God, he deſcribeth his Infancy, diſcovering the Sins he committed at that time, as well as the evil Inclinations that were in him. He repreſents, with all the beauty, and exactneſs imaginable, the things that are incident to Children; their Motions of Joy, and Sorrow, their Jealouſie before they can ſpeak, how hardly they learn to ſpeak; their averſion to Study, their love of Play, and the fear of Chaſtiſement. He charges himſelf with loving the Study of Fables, and Poetical Fictions; and hating the Principles of Grammar, and particularly the Greek Tongue, tho' theſe things were infinitely more profitable, than thoſe Fables, whereof he diſcovers the danger. He ſays, that being fallen dangerouſly Sick, he deſired to be baptized; but coming to have ſome Eaſe, they deferred it, fearing he might defile himſelf again with new Crimes: Becauſe (ſaith he) the Sins committed after Baptiſm, are greater, and more dangerous, than ſuch as are committed before.

In the ſecond, he begins to deſcribe the Diſorders of his Youth; he ſays, that being returned to his Father's Houſe at ſixteen years of Age, he gave himſelf to Debauchery, notwithſtanding his Mother's Admonitions; that he was guilty of Theft, by robbing an Apple-tree in a Neighbour's Orchard with his Companions, with ſeveral Reflections upon the Motives that put him upon that Action.

In the third he confeſſeth, that at Carthage, whither he was gone to finiſh his Studies; he was tranſported with the Fire of Luſt. He laments the Love which he had for Stage-Plays and Publick Shows, and the Pleaſure he found when they affected him at any time with Paſſion. He declares afterwards, that he read one of Cicero's Books, intituled Hortenſius, that inſpired him with the love of Wiſdom; but not finding in that Book the Name of Jeſus Chriſt, which remained engraven in his Heart, and which he had as it were ſuck'd in with his Milk, he applied himſelf to the Holy Scripture; but that having read it with a Spirit of Pride, he reliſhed it not, becauſe of the plainneſs of it's Style; and then he hearkened to the Dreams of the Manichees, who promiſed to bring him to the Knowledge of of the Truth. He refutes their Errors, and ſpeaks with great tenderneſs of the Prayers which his Mother made, and the Tears that ſhe ſhed for his Converſion.

He continued however nine years in that Hereſie, being deceived, and endeavouring to deceive others. He taught Rhetorick at Tagaſta. There he loſt one of his intimate Friends, whoſe Death grieved him exceedingly; whereof he deſcribeth the Exceſs in the fourth Book, where he ſays many fine things concerning true and counterfeit Friendſhip. There he mentions the Treatiſe of Comelineſs and Beauty, which he made at twenty five years of Age; and gives an Account how eaſily he came to underſtand Ariſtotle's Categories. And he ſhews the Unprofitableneſs of Learning.

In the fifth he deſcribes the degrees by which he came to be delivered from the Manichæan Hereſie, how he diſcovered Fauſtus his Ignorance who was the Head of that Hereſie. He adds, that having taught Rhetorick at Carthage, he went to Rome with a Deſign to follow there the ſame Profeſſion; but having been diſheartened by the unhandſome Uſage of the Scholars, who refuſed to pay their Maſters, he obtain'd of Symmachus the place of Rhetorick-Profeſſor at Milan, where he heard St. Ambroſe preach, who perfectly diſabuſed him of the Errors of the Manichees, and made him reſolve abſolutely to quit that Sect, and become a Catechumen.

He goeth on in the ſixth Book, to deſcribe the Progreſs of his Converſion; which was much furthered by the Prayers and Admonitions of his Mother St. Monica, who came to find him at Milan, and contracted a ſtrict Friendſhip with St. Ambroſe. He obſerves, that this Holy Biſhop kept her from carrying Meat to the Graves of the Martyrs, as ſhe uſed to do in her own Country. He deſcribeth the Manners of of two of his Friends, Alypius and Nebridius, and the Agitations that were caused in himself by the knowledge of his Miseries, and the design which he had to alter his course of Life.

In the seventh Book, he declares his Condition in the 31*st* year of his Age, how much he was yet in the dark as to the Nature of God, and the Spring of Evil: how he was perfectly weaned from Judicial Astrology, by hearing of the History of two Children that were born at the same moment of time, whose Lot proved quite different: And lastly, by what degrees he rid himself of his Prejudices, and came to the knowledge of God, though he had not as yet those Thoughts of Jesus Christ, which he ought to have had.

He declares, that he found the Divinity of the Word in the Books of the Platonists, but not his Incarnation: And afterwards comparing the Books of those Philosophers with the Books of the Holy Scripture, which he began to read, he observeth that the former had made him more knowing, but also more presumptuous. Whereas the others instructed him in true Humility, and in the way which Men ought to follow to obtain Salvation.

At last he comes in the eighth Book to the best Passage of his Life, to that which happened in the two and thirtieth year of his Age, which was his Conversion. First of all he was wrought upon by a Conference which he had with a Holy Old Man, Simplicianus, who related to him the Conversion of a famous Rhetorick-Professor named Victorinus. He was further moved by the Story which Potitianus told him of another Conversion. And at last feeling himself agitated, and distracted, by several contrary Thoughts, he withdrew into a Garden, where he heard a Voice from Heaven, commanding him, to open St. Paul's Epistles; whereof he had no sooner read some Lines, but he found himself wholly converted, and freed from the Agitations which till then had troubled him: Nothing can be more noble than the Description which he makes in that Book, of the Combates and Agitations which that Man feels that is engaged in Vice, and hath formed a Design of being converted to God.

St. Augustine was no sooner converted, but he resolved to leave his Profession. The Vacation being come, he retired to the Country-House of one of his Friends called Verecundus, to prepare himself for Baptism, which he received at Easter with Alypius, and his Son Adeodatus, whom he had by a Concubine. This he relateth in the ninth Book, where he discourseth again of the Death of Verecundus, and Nebridius, and Adeodatus, which happened shortly after his Baptism; He speaketh likewise, of the Original of the Singing in the Church of Milan, that was established by St. Ambrose, when he was persecuted by Justina an Arian Princess; concerning the discovering of the Bodies of the Martyrs, St. Gervasius and St. Protasius, and of the Miracles done at the time of their Translation; of the Discourse he had with his Mother St. Monica, about the Felicities of the other Life, and of the Death of that holy Widow which happened at Ostia, when he was returning into Africa; of her Burial; of the Prayers that were made for her; and of the Sacrifice which was offered. He concludes this Book by recommending her to the Prayers of those that shall read his Confessions.

Having set forth in the foregoing Books what he was before his Conversion, he sheweth in the tenth what he was at the time of his writing. He finds that his Conscience gave an unquestionable Testimony of his Love to God. He explains the Reasons that oblige Men to love God, reckoning up all the Faculties of his Soul that can lead him to know God, especially Memory, whereof he makes a wonderful Description: He says, amongst other things, that it serves to teach us many things, which entred not into the Mind by the Senses, and that it may lift us up to God. He occasionally speaks of Happiness, and of the Idea that Men have of God; afterwards he examineth himself about the three main Passions of Man, the love of Pleasures, of Knowledge, and of Glory. He sincerely confesseth what was his disposition with respect to these Passions, prescribing at the same time excellent Rules, to keep our selves from them. Lastly, he discovers the Knowledge of the true Mediator, and of the Graces which he merited for us.

The three last Books are about less sensible Matters: He waves the History of his Life to speak of the Love which he had for the Sacred Books, and of the Knowledge that God had given him of them; which to show, he undertakes to explain the beginning of Genesis, upon which occasion he starts several very subtil Questions.

In the eleventh, he refuteth those that asked, what God was doing before he created the World, and how God on a sudden formed the Design of creating any thing; whereupon he enters into a long Discourse concerning the Nature of Time.

In the twelfth Book he treateth of the first Matter. He pretends that by the Heavens and the Earth, which God is said to have created in the beginning, we are to understand spiritual Substances, and the shapeless Matter of corporeal things; that the Scripture speaking of the Creation of those two sorts of Beings, makes no mention of Days; because there is no time with respect to them. He affirms, that whatsoever he hath said concerning the World's Creation cannot be denied, though the beginning of Genesis were otherwise expounded, because these are undoubted Truths. He treateth here of the different Explications which may be made of the Holy Scripture, affirming, that there is sufficient Reason to believe, that the Canonical Authors foresaw all the Truths that might be drawn from their Words, and though they had not foreseen these Truths, yet the Holy Ghost foresaw them: Whence he seems to conclude, that we are not to reject any Sense that may be given to the Holy Scripture, provided it is conformable to the Truth.

St. Augustine. Tome I.

At last, having admired the Goodness of God who standing in no Need of the Creatures, had given them not only a Being, but also all the Perfections of that Being; he discovereth in the last Book the Mystery of the Trinity in the first Words of Genesis, and even the Personal Property of the Holy Ghost; which gives him an admirable opportunity of describing the Actions of Charity in our selves. He concludes with a curious Allegory upon the beginning of Genesis, and finds in the Creation the System and Oeconomy of whatsoever God hath done for the Establishment of his Church, and the Sanctification of Men: the only End which he proposed to himself in all his Works.

St. Augustine placeth the Books of Confessions before those against Faustus, which were written about the Year 400, in his Retractations, from whence we may conclude, that these were both written about the same time.

After these two, which serve, as we have said, for a Preface to all St. Augustine's Works, you find in this first Volume, the Books that St. Augustine writ in his Youth, before he was a Priest, in the same order in which they were written.

The three Books against the Academici, are the first after the Treatise of Beauty and Comeliness, which is lost. He composed them in the Year 386, in his solitude, when he prepared himself for Baptism. They are written in imitation of Cicero, in the Form of a Dialogue, and directed to Romanianus his Countryman, whom he adviseth to Study Philosophy. The Dispute beginneth betwixt Licentius Son to Romanianus, and Trygetius; after them Alypius and St. Augustine begin to speak.

Having observed in the first Book, that the good things of Fortune do not render Men happy, he exhorts Romanianus to the Study of Wisdom, whose sweetness he then tasted. He afterwards gives an Account of three Conferences which Licentius and Trygetius had had about Happiness. Licentius held with the Academici, that to be happy it was enough to seek after the Truth; but Trygetius pretended, that it was necessary to know it perfectly, both being agreed, that Wisdom is that which makes Men happy, they begin to dispute about the definition of Wisdom. Trygetius gives several, all disapproved by Licentius, who asserts, that Wisdom consisted not only in Knowledge, but also in the Pursuit of the Truth, whereupon St. Augustine concludes, that since we cannot be happy without knowing and enquiring after the Truth, our only application should be to seek for it.

In the second Book, having again exhorted Romanianus to the Study of Philosophy. he sets down three other Conferences, wherein Alypius produces the several Opinions of both the Ancient and Modern Academicks. And because the latter said, that some things were probable, though the Truth was not known, they laughed at that Opinion, it being impossible, say they, to know whether a thing is like the Truth, without knowing the Truth it self. And this very thing obligeth Men to enquire the more carefully after likely and probable things, according to the Principles of the Academicks.

The third Book begins with Reflections upon Fortune. St. Augustine shews, that the Goods of Fortune are of no Use to get Wisdom: and that the Wise Man ought at least to know Wisdom, refuting withall, the Principles both of Cicero, and of the other Academicks, who affirmed, that we know nothing, and that nothing ought to be asserted. He blames the damnable Maxim of those who permitted Men to follow every thing that seemed probable, without being certain of any thing. He shews the dangerous Consequences of such Principles, and endeavours to prove that neither the ancient Academicks, nor Cicero himself, were of that Opinion.

These three Books are written with all imaginable Elegance and Purity: The Method and Reasonings are just: The Matter treated of is well cleared and made intelligible for all Men; it is beautified with agreeable suppositions and pleasant stories. It may be said, that these Dialogues are not much inferiour to Tully's for Style, but much above them for the exactness and solidity of the Arguments and Notions. In his Retractations he findeth fault with several places in them, which seemed not to him sufficiently to favour of Christianity, but might be born with in a Philosophical Work.

The Book of a Happy Life, or, of Felicity, is a Work of the same Nature, written by St. Augustine at the same time, in the 33d. year of his Age. It is dedicated to Manlius lius Theodorus, whom he had known at Milan. In the beginning he makes a diſtinction of three ſorts of Perſons. Some to avoid the Troubles of this Life, fly into Harbour as ſoon as they come to the uſe of Reaſon, that they may live quietly. Others on the contrary, having been a while ingaged in the Storms of this Life, carried away with Paſſions, Pleaſures, or Glory, find themſelves happily driven into Harbour by ſome Storm. The third ſort are they, who in the midſt of Storms and Tempeſts, have always had an Eye to ſome Star, with a deſign to return into Harbour. The moſt dangerous Rock to be feared in this Navigation, is that of Vain-Glory, which we meet with at the firſt ſetting out, and where it is difficult to avoid Shipwrack. Theſe Reflections St. Auguſtine applies to himſelf, and ſaith, that at twenty five Years of Age, having conceived a ſtrong Paſſion for Philoſophy, by reading of Tully's Hortenſius, he reſolved to give up himſelf to that Study: but that having been ſome time wrap'd up with the dark Clouds of the Errors of the Manichees, which hid from him the Star that ſhould have guided him: At laſt that Miſt was diſſipated. That the Academicks had long detain'd him in the midſt of the Sea, in a continual Agitation; but he had now diſcover'd a lucky Star that ſhewed him the Truth, by the Diſcourſes, both of St. Ambroſe, and Theodorus, to whom he writeth, that the love both of Pleaſure and of Glory, had for ſometime detained him; but, in the end, he weighed all his Anchors to come into Port.

St. Auguſtine. Tome I.

After this fair beginning, he acquaints Theodorus with a Diſcourſe, which he ſuppoſeth to be held upon the 15th. of November, his Birth-day, with his Mother, his Brother, his Son, his Couſins, and his two Diſciples, Trygetius and Licentius, who appeared already in the foregoing Dialogues. That they might enter upon the Matter the ſooner, St. Auguſtine introduces them agreed in this Point, that Man being made up of Body, and Soul, the Soul is to be fed as well as the Body, becauſe it hath equal need of Nouriſhment. After this he propounds the Subject of their Conference, ſaying, that ſince all Men deſire to be happy, it is certain, that all that want what they would have, are not happy; but he asketh, whether they be happy that have what they deſire? St. Auguſtine's Mother having anſwered, that they are happy, if that which they deſire be good, Si bona, inquit, velit & habeat, beatus eſt: He replies immediately, that ſhe had found out the greateſt Secret in Philoſophy; Ipſam prorſus, mater, arcem Philoſophiæ tenuiſti. Upon theſe Principles, he ſhews, in the three Dialogues of this Book, That true Felicity conſiſts in the Knowledge of God: For, in the firſt place, the Goods of Fortune cannot make us happy, ſince we cannot have them when we would. The Academicks cannot be happy in their enquiry after Truth, ſince they have not what they would find; but they that ſeek God are happy, becauſe they no ſooner ſeek to him, but he begins to ſhew them Mercy. All thoſe whoſe Souls want any thing, are not happy: None but God can fill the Soul; therefore none but God can make us happy: None is happy without Wiſdom; And can Wiſdom be had without God? Is there any other Wiſdom than that which cometh from him? Is he not Wiſdom and Truth?

He concludes with exhorting thoſe to whom he ſpeaks, to ſeek after God, that they may come to the perfect knowledge of him, wherein conſiſts the Soveraign Felicity of Life, and the true Happineſs of the Soul. He corrects this Paſſage in his Retractations, obſerving that Man cannot be entirely and perfectly happy in this Life; becauſe he cannot know God perfectly, till he comes to the other World.

St. Auguſtine treateth of Providence in his two Books of Order: ſhewing, that all good, and evil things come to paſs, according to the Order of Divine Providence. Theſe Books, are written Dialogue-wiſe: In the Firſt, he diſcourſes of Providence in general; in the ſecond, he begins to enquire, what Order is; but immediately digreſſes to ſpeak of the Love of Glory: And his Mother coming in, he puts an end to the Conference; ſhewing, that Women ſhould not be forbidden to ſtudy Wiſdom.

In the third Dialogue, which begins the ſecond Book, St. Auguſtine clears ſeveral particular Difficulties, about the Order of Providence. He enquires what it is to be with God, and in God's Order; in what Senſe a wiſe Man may be ſaid to abide with God, and to be immoveable: He maintains, that fooliſh, and wicked Actions come into the Order of Providence, becauſe they have their Uſe for the Good of the Univerſe, and manifeſt God's Juſtice.

In the fourth Dialogue he proves, that God was always juſt, tho' there was no occaſion for the exerciſe of his Juſtice before there were wicked Men: that Evil was introduced againſt God's Order, but that the Juſtice of God ſubmitted it to its Orders. Having bandied theſe Metaphyſical Queſtions, he enters, upon Morals; exhorting his Diſciples to follow God's Order, both in their Behaviour, and in their Studies. He ſays, Men ought to live after the following Pattern. 'Tis neceſſary (ſaith he) 'for young Men to avoid Debauches, and Excels; to deſpiſe gay Cloths, and rich Attire; to be careful not to 'loſe their time, either at Play, or unprofitable Recreations; not to be Idle, or Sleepy; to be free from Jealouſie, Envy, and Ambition; in one word, not to ſuffer themſelves to be tranſported by any violent Paſſion: they ſhould be perſuaded, that the love of Riches, is the worſt Poyſon that can infect their Hearts. They ought to do nothing, either with Cowardice, or with Raſhneſs. If they are offended, let them refrain their Anger. They ought to correct all Vices, but to hate no Body; not to be too ſevere, nor too yielding. Let their Reproofs be always for a good End; and their Meekneſs never authorize Vice: Let them look upon all that are committed to their Charge, as their own: Let them ſerve others without Affectation of Dominion; and when they become Maſters, let them ſtill be willing to ſerve: Let them carefully avoid making Enemies; and if they have any, let them bear with them patiently, and endeavour to be quickly reconciled: In all their Buſineſs with others, and their whole Behaviour, let them obſerve that Maxim of the Law of Nature: Do not that, to others, which you would not have done to you. Let them not meddle with Publick Affairs, except they are very capable ..... and ſtudy to get Friends in what Employment ſoever they be; take a delight in ſerving thoſe that deſerve it, even when they leaſt look for it: Let them live orderly, honour God, think of him and ſeek him by Faith, Hope, and Charity.

St. Auguſtine. Tome I.

Having thus given Precepts for the Manners of Youth, he preſcribeth Rules for their Studies. He ſaith, that Learning is got by Authority and Reaſon; and, that there is a two-fold Authority, that of God, and that of Men. Theſe may deceive us; but God never affirmeth any thing but what is true. He treateth afterwards of Reaſon; and having given a Definition of it, he ſhews, that all Learning is nothing but Reaſon occupied in the conſideration of different Objects. He draws up a Catalogue of all the Sciences, and gives a ſhort Account, both of the Object and Uſe of each of them: From thence he paſſes to the Knowledge of the Soul, and of God; wherein he places true Wiſdom, and concludes his Diſcourſe with an Exhortation to Vertue.

His two Books of Soliloquies, were likewiſe written by St. Auguſtine in his Retirement, about the beginning of the Year 387. His Deſign is to grow more perfect in the Knowledge, both of God and his own Soul. To this End, after an excellent Prayer to God, he examines his Reaſon, and makes it return Anſwers. In the firſt Book he treateth particularly, of the neceſſary Diſpoſitions in the Soul, to deſerve the Knowledge of God. He teaches, that it arrives to that Knowledge by Faith, Hope, and Charity, and by turning away the Heart, and Thoughts from Earthly Things, to ſeek and love nothing but God. At the latter end, he falls upon the Queſtion of the Immortality of the Soul, which he proſecutes in the Second Book. He concludes, that the Soul is Immortal, becauſe it is the Habitation of Truth, which is Eternal; Which puts him upon making ſeveral Reflections, both upon Truth and Falſhood. This laſt Volume is not compleat, as St. Auguſtine himſelf obſerves in his Retractations; where he corrects ſome faulty Expreſſions that he uſed at a time when he was not throughly inſtructed in Religion.

Sometime after the Books of Soliloquies, St. Auguſtine being returned to Milan writ the Book Of the Immortality of the Soul: Which is (ſaith he in his Retractations) as a Memorial which I made to compleat my Soliloquies, that were imperfect: But I know not how it came to be Publick againſt my Will; ſo it is now amongſt my Works. This Book (addeth he) is ſo dark in the beginning, both by reaſon of the Expreſſions, and the brevity of the Reaſonings, that it wearieth the Reader; and requires ſo great an Attention, that I can ſcarce underſtand it my ſelf with much Application. The reading of it will diſcover, that it is rather Memoirs, than a finiſh'd Work. He has collected ſeveral, dry, barren Arguments, to prove the Immortality of the Soul.

Theſe are ſome of his Principles. Knowledge is Eternal; wherefore the Soul, which is the Seat of Knowledge, is Immortal. Reaſon, and the Soul, are all one; but Reaſon is Immutable and Eternal. Matter cannot be annihilated, let it be divided never ſo much; yet it abideth. And, who can believe the Soul to be in a worſe Condition? Nothing can create it ſelf, and nothing can annihilate it ſelf. Life is the Eſſence of the Soul; therefore it cannot be deprived of it. The Soul is not the Diſpoſition of the Parts of the Body; ſeeing the more we endeavour to abſtract it from Senſe, the more eaſily we comprehend Things: Neither can it be changed into a Body; for were this Change poſſible, it muſt be either becauſe the Soul is willing, or becauſe it may be forced to it by the Body; but both theſe Notions are equally abſurd. Theſe are the Principles, whereupon St. Auguſtine enlargeth in this Treatiſe, and which he applies to his Purpoſe with great ſubtilty, and fineneſs. This Book is a convincing Evidence of his Skill in Logick.

The following Treatiſe is Intituled Of the Quantity of the Soul: It is placed here, becauſe it treateth of the ſame Matter with the foregoing; for, according to the order of time, it ought to be placed after that Of the Manners of the Church, as St. Auguſtine obſerves in his Retractations. He gives this Account of this Treatiſe Of the Quantity of the Soul. I writ whilſt I was in that City (Rome) A Dialogue, wherein I raiſe ſeveral Queſtions concerning the Soul, viz. What is its Original; what its Nature; whether it is extended; why it was united with the Body; what alterations happen to it, either when it comes into, or goeth out of the Body. But, becauſe I undertook to Examine with exactneſs and curioſity, whether it was extended; deſigning to ſhew, that it is not, after the manner of Bodies, tho' it is ſome great thing. This only Queſtion hath given the Name to the whole Book; which therefore hath been Intituled, Of the Quantity of the Soul. Evodius is the Perſon whom St. Auguſtine introduceth, ſpeaking in this Dialogue; as he ſays in the 101*ſt.* Letter: and ſo it was a Miſtake, to put in the common Editions, the Name of Adeodatus, which is not found in the Ancient Manuſcripts; and with much Reaſon they have reſtor'd the Name of Evodius in the laſt Edition. This Man propounds to St. Auguſtine ſix Queſtions; the firſt, Whence is the Soul? and, What is the Matter it is made of? Evodius deſiring to have both theſe Queſtions clear'd to him, he ſaith, That the Habitation of the Soul is God, who created it. As for the Nature thereof, he declares, that he can neither Name nor Explain it, becauſe it hath nothing like Corporeal Beings; and that it is ſingle in its kind. Evodius his ſecond Queſtion, is, What is the Quality of the Soul? St. Auguſtine anſwereth, That it is like God. The third Queſtion propoſed by Evodius, concerns the Quantity of the Soul: St. Auguſtine affirms, that the Soul hath no Quantity, if by Quantity be underſtood Corporeal Extenſion; but that it hath, if by that Term is meant ſpiritual Greatneſs, Strength, and Power. St. Auguſtine, here diſcuſſes the Queſtion of the Soul's Extenſion with care; and ſhews, by ſeveral Reaſons, that it hath no Corporeal Dimenſions. He diſtinguiſhes Men's Souls from thoſe of Beaſts; and grants to the Latter, Senſe without Reaſon: Afterwards, he reckons up the excellent Qualities of Man's Soul, which he reduces to ſeven Heads; whence he concludes, that of all Creatures, Man's Soul is that which comes neareſt to the Nature of God. With this he endeth this Treatiſe, without medling with the other three Queſtions propoſed by Evodius, viz. The fourth, Why the Soul was united with the Body. The fifth, What it is at the entrance into the Body: And the ſixth, What becomes of it when it goes out of it. This Treatiſe was compoſed by St. Auguſtine, in 388.

St. Auguſtine having left his Retirement, and being come back to Milan in the year 381 began to write Treatiſes upon the Sciences, as he tells us in his Retractations. He could finiſh none but a Treatiſe of Grammar; but he began ſeveral others of Logick, Rhetorick, Geometry, Arithmetick, and Philoſophy. He did not know himſelf, what was become of theſe Diſcourſes, when he compoſed his Retractations. At the ſame time he began, alſo, the ſix Books of Muſick; which he compleated after his return into Africa, about the Year 389. In the firſt Book he ſpeaks of Muſick in general: In the ſecond, of Syllables, and Feet: In the three following, he diſcourſes of Meaſure, Harmony, and Verſes: In the laſt he ſhews, that Muſick ought to raiſe up the Mind, and Heart, to a Divine, and Heavenly Harmony.

St. Auguſtine's Diſcourſe of a Maſter, was written about the Year 395. It is a Dialogue betwixt himſelf, and his Son Adeodatus; wherein he ſhews, that it is not by Men's Words that we receive Inſtruction, but from the Eternal Truth, viz. Jeſus Chriſt the Word of God, who informeth us inwardly of all Truth.

The firſt of the three Books of Free-Will, was compoſed at Rome, in 387. and the two others in Africa, in 395. In the firſt, St. Auguſtine reſolves that hard Queſtion, touching the Original of Evil: And having explained what it is to do Evil, he ſhews, that all manner of Evil comes from the Free-Will, which readily followeth the Suggeſtions of Luſt; adding, that our Will makes us either happy, or unhappy: That if we are not happy, though we deſire to be ſo, it is becauſe we will not live conformably to the Law of God; without which, it is impoſſible to be Happy.

In the ſecond Book, the Difficulty alledged by Evodius why God hath left in Man a Liberty of Sinning, which is ſo prejudicial to him, hath ſtarted theſe three other Queſtions. How we are ſure that there is a God? Doth all Good come from him? Is the Will free to do Good, as well as Evil? St. Auguſtine clears all theſe Difficulties, proving, that Free-Will was given for a good End, and that we received it of God; that there is a Being more perfect than our Soul; that this Being is Truth it ſelf, Goodneſs, Wiſdom it ſelf; that every good and perfect thing cometh from it; and that Free-Will is to be reckoned among the good Things. That there are three ſorts of Goods: The greateſt are the Vertues that make us live Well; the Ideas of Corporeal Objects, without which we cannot live Well, are the leaſt, and the Powers of the Soul are the middle Ones: That the firſt cannot be abuſed; but both the ſecond, and the laſt may be put to ill Uſes; That Free-Will is of the Number of theſe middle Goods. When the Will adheres to the Sovereign Good, it renders Man Happy; but but when it departeth from that, to cleave to other Objects, then Man becometh Criminal, and ſo Unhappy. Wherefore neither the Will, nor the Objects it embraceth, are Evil; but it is a Separation from God, that makes all Evil, and Sin but God is not the Author of this Separation. From whence then is this Principle of Averſion? This St. Auguſtine clears in the third Book. It is not Natural, ſince it is Guilty: It is Free, and Voluntary; and it is enough to ſay, that we may chuſe, whether we will follow it, or no, to juſtifie God's Juſtice: But, how can this Liberty agree with the Fore-knowledge of God? Nothing is more eaſie, according to St. Auguſtine, in this Place. We are Free when we do what we pleaſe: But Preſcience doth not take away our Will; on the contrary it ſuppoſes it, ſince it is a Knowledge of our Will. But are not the Creature's Faults to be imputed to the Creator? Why did he not make it impeccable? Had not Men been more perfect, if they had been created at firſt in the ſame condition with the Angels, and the glorified Saints that cannot be ſeparated from the Love of God? But St. Auguſtine replies, doth it therefore follow, that becauſe we may conceive a more Perfect State, therefore God was obliged to create us in that State? Should we not rather believe that he had his Reaſons why he did not create us more Perfect? There are ſeveral ſorts of Perfections. If the State of a Creature, that enjoyeth God, makes Soveraign Felicity; then the State of a Creature that is ſubject to Sin, which liveth in hope of recovering the Happineſs which it loſt, is alſo in God's Order, and exceedingly above that of a Creature that lies under the neceſſity of ſinning eternally. The Condition of theſe laſt, is the worſt of all; and yet God cannot be accuſed of Injuſtice, for giving a Being to Creatures which he knew would be eternally miſerable: He is not the Cauſe of their Sin: That Being which he gave them, is ſtill a Perfection; their Sins and their Miſery contribute to the Perfection of the Univerſe, and to exalt the Juſtice of God by the Puniſhment of their Sins. What then is the Cauſe of Sins? there is none but the Will it ſelf, which freely and knowingly inclineth to do Evil. For if Sin, could not be reſiſted, it were impoſſible to know or to avoid it; and then there would be no Sin. Wherefore then doth God puniſh Sins of Ignorance? How cometh it to paſs that he blameth thoſe Actions that are done out of Neceſſity? What mean thoſe Words of the Apoſtle, I do not the Good that I would, but the Evil that I would not? All that, ſaith St. Auguſtine, is ſpoken of Men born ſince Mankind was condemned to Death, becauſe of the firſt Man's Sin. For were this Natural to Man, and not a Puniſhment of his Sin; it is certain, there would be no Sin of Ignorance nor Neceſſity: But when we ſpeak here of Liberty, we ſpeak of that which Man had when God created him.

St. Auguſtine. Tome I.

Here St. Auguſtine anſwers the greateſt Objection that can be urged againſt Original Sin: Though, ſay they, both Adam and Eve have ſinned, yet what had we done, wretched Perſons that we are, to be thus abandoned to Ignorance and to Luſt? Muſt we therefore be deprived of the knowledge of the Precepts of Righteouſneſs? and when we begin to know them, muſt we ſee our ſelves under a kind of Neceſſity not to keep them, by reaſon of the reſiſtance of Luſt? 'St. Auguſtine confeſſeth, that this Complaint were 'juſt, if Men were under an impoſſibility of overcoming 'their Ignorance and Luſt. But God being preſent every 'where to call his Creature to his Service, to teach him 'what he ought to believe, to comfort him in his hopes, 'to confirm him in his Love, to help his Endeavours, and 'to hear his Prayers; Man cannot complain, That that is 'imputed to him which he is unavoidably ignorant of; but 'then that he muſt blame himſelf, if he neglects to ſeek after that which he knows not. It is none of his fault, 'that he cannot uſe his broken Members; but he is guilty 'if he deſpiſeth the Phyſician that proffers to cure him: for 'none can be ignorant, that Man may profitably ſeek for 'the Knowledge of what he knows not, and which he 'thinks to be neceſſary: And it is well enough known that 'Men ought humbly to acknowledge their Weakneſs, to 'obtain Help. In a word, If Men do that which is Evil 'out of Ignorance, or if it ſo happens, that they cannot do 'the Good which they would, there is Sin in that; becauſe 'it is in conſequence of the Firſt Man's Sin committed 'with full Liberty. This firſt Sin deſerved the following.

There remained yet a conſiderable Difficulty, Why the Innocent Soul becometh ſubject unto Sin by it's Union with the Body? To explain this, St. Auguſtine mentions four ſeveral Opinions concerning the Original of Souls. The firſt is, that the Soul is formed from the Parents. The ſecond is, that God creates new ones at Mens Birth. The third is, that Souls being created beforehand, God cauſeth them to enter their reſpective Bodies. The fourth is, that they come down into the Bodies of their own accord: Now, he judging all theſe Opinions equally probable, and that it was as yet undecided, he endeavoureth to prove, that a Reaſon may be given for Original Sin, what Opinion ſoever one holds of the Original of the Soul.

He cometh at laſt to that particular Difficulty concerning the Children that die as ſoon as they are born. As for thoſe that have received Baptiſm, though without knowledge, he ſaith, that it is Piouſly and Juſtly believed (for theſe are the Terms he makes Uſe of Satis pie recteq; Creditur)

St. Auguſtine. Tome I.

tur) that the Faith of thoſe who preſent the Child to be baptized, ſupplies for that of the Child: As to the Pain and Sorrow which they ſuffer, having not deſerved them by their Sins, St. Auguſtine ſaith, that God hath his Ends in permitting their Sufferings, and that perhaps he will recompence them for theſe Sufferings, as the Church believeth of the holy Innocents killed by Herod, who are reckoned among the Martyrs; having thus ſalved theſe Difficulties, he makes other uſeleſs Queries concerning the Sin of Adam.

St. Auguſtine obſerves in his Retractations, that he deſigned nothing in theſe Books, but to oppoſe their Opinion, who deny the Original of Evil to be from Free-Will; pretending that if this were true, God muſt be the Author of it, introducing thereby an Eternal and Immutable Subſiſtency of Evil; that he did not enlarge upon it, nor treat of Predeſtination or Grace, whereby God prepares the Wills of Men, that they might make good Uſe of their Liberty. Yet, when there was occaſion to ſpeak of it, he ſays ſomething by the bye, without making any Stop to defend it. Wherefore Pelagius and the Pelagians, alledged ſeveral Expreſſions in favour of Free-Will, which St. Auguſtine had uſed in his Books: But St. Auguſtine ſhews, that what he ſaid of Free-Will, is conſiſtent enough with his Syſtem of Grace, and that he eſtabliſhed all the Principles of it: This he proves by Paſſages taken out of theſe Books, where he affirms, that every good thing comes from God, and that Man cannot be delivered from Ignorance, and the neceſſity of Sinning, but by God's help.

The two Books upon Geneſis againſt the Manichees, were compoſed by St. Auguſtine after his return into Africa, about the Year 389. There he refuteth thoſe impertinent Objections which the Manichees made concerning the three firſt Chapters of Geneſis, by giving a reaſonable Expoſition of them. He inſiſts moſt upon the literal Senſe; but ſometimes he goes out of the way, and only gives an Allegorical one. As St. Auguſtine deſigned to benefit all Men by this Book; and particularly, to inform the common People that were abuſed by the Manichees, ſo he writ it with all the clearneſs and ſimplicity he could: In his Retractations, he explaineth ſome Paſſages that were miſconſtrued by the Pelagians; eſpecially two, one againſt the Neceſſity of Grace, and the other againſt Original Sin.

The Books of the Manners of the Church, and of the Manichees, were compoſed at Rome by St. Auguſtine, ſoon after his Baptiſm, about the Year 387. as himſelf witneſſeth in his Retractations. It is very probable that he reviſed them after his return into Africa, ſeeing he mentions them in the firſt of thoſe Treatiſes lately named. His Deſign was to confound the Inſolence and Vanity of the Manichees, who gloried in a vain Temperance; and under that Pretence, exalted themſelves above the Catholicks: Wherefore in theſe two Books he ſhews the oppoſition of the true Chriſtian's Manners, to thoſe of the Manichees; proving how much the counterfeit Vertues which theſe made their boaſt of, were inferior to the real Vertue of Chriſt's Diſciples.

In the Book of the Manners of the Church, he layeth down, as the firſt ground of Morality, that God alone is the Soveraign Good of our Souls; from which Truth, he inferrs, that all things muſt have reſpect to God, and that we are to love him above all things; and proves this firſt Principle of Chriſtian Ethicks by Teſtimonies of the Old and New Teſtament. He ſhews, that all the Vertues are but ſo many different Expreſſions of this Love; that Temperance is that Love, which keeps it ſelf pure and uncorrupt for God: Fortitude, is a love that endureth all things with eaſe, for God's ſake: Juſtice is a love that ſerveth God only, and by reaſon of that, procures Good to all Creatures that are ſubjected to him: Prudence is a love which has a Light, to diſtinguiſh that which may help to bring us to God, from that which may hinder us in that way; even the love of our Neighbour is not a Vertue, but ſo far as it relates to God. He alone that loveth God, is capable of loving himſelf and his Neighbour, as he ought to do. This Reflection giveth St. Auguſtine an Opportunity of ſpeaking of the Duties of Society, and of what Chriſtians owe one to another. Laſtly, as Examples do often affect more than Precepts; ſo he produces ſeveral Precedents of vertuous Men in the Church, that he may raiſe a higher Notion of the Manners of the Catholicks. He ſets forth the Examples of Hermits, Monks, and Nuns, who have quite ſevered themſelves from the World, to ſpend their Lives in conſtant Abſtinence, and in Exerciſes of Piety. He adds the Example of ſeveral vertuous Eccleſiaſticks, and of many holy Prelates, who kept themſelves pure in the midſt of a corrupt Age; and of an infinite Number of Chriſtians, that led moſt exemplary Lives. He concludes this Book, by ſhewing, that the Examples of Evil Catholicks can be no pretence for Hereticks to ſeparate from the Church; and that the Notions of the Manichees touching Marriage, are contrary to thoſe of the Apoſtles.

He obſerveth much the ſame Method in his Book of the Manners of the Manichees: He begins it by refuting their Doctrine about the Nature and Original of Good and Evil: Afterwards he diſcovers their impious and ſuperſtitious Practices, in ſuch a manner as renders them ridiculous and abominable; and then gives a relation of the Diſorders whereof the greateſt part of that Sect hath been convicted.

St. Auguſtine. Tome I.

The Book of true Religion, is the laſt of thoſe which St. Auguſtine writ before he was a Prieſt; He therefore made it about the Year 390. There he ſhews both the Excellencies and the Duties of the true Religion; that the Chriſtian Religion is the only true one: And he refutes the Errors of other Religions, and particularly of the Manichees concerning the two Natures. He ſpeaks of Jeſus Chriſt's Religion, inth at lofty manner, as gives a very high Notion of it. I ſhall give an Analyſis of his Principles. Religion is the only thing that can guide us to the Truth, to Vertue and Happineſs. The Heathen Philoſophers acknowledge the Falſhood of the popular Religion, and yet approve the ſame by their outward Worſhip. Since the Eſtabliſhment of Chriſtianity, none can doubt but that it is the Religion which ought to be followed. Plato himſelf would have owned it, ſeeing that the loftieſt Maxims of Philoſophy, concerning the Divinity and the Neceſſity of purifying the Soul, whereof he deſpaired of perſuading the People, are not only preached throughout the Earth, but alſo embraced and followed by an infinite number of Perſons. The Philoſophers muſt needs know God upon this occaſion, and give place to him that did this Miracle. Neither Curioſity, nor Vain-glory ought to keep them from acknowledging the difference between the proud Conjectures of a few Philoſophers, and the Publication of a Doctrine that cures the Soul and reforms the Errors of all Nations. Religion is not to be ſought for either among the Philoſophers, ſince they approve by their Actions, the ſame Worſhip which they condemn in their Writings; nor among the Hereticks who have no ſhare in the Sacraments of the Church; nor among Schiſmaticks, who have ſeparated themſelves from the Church; nor among the Jews, who expect from God none but Temporal and Tranſitory Rewards; but only in the Church univerſally diſperſed throughout the Earth, which makes uſe of the Errors of others for its own Good. The Church makes uſe of the Pagans, as the Matter of her Works; Of Hereticks as a Proof of the Purity of her Doctrine; Of Schiſmaticks, as a Mark of her Stability; and of the Jews, as an Evidence of her Excellency: and ſo ſhe inviteth the Heathens, thruſts out Hereticks, forſakes Schiſmaticks, goes before the Jews, and yet ſhe openeth to all Entrance into the Myſteries, and a Door of Grace, either by forming the Faith of the former, or by reforming the Errors of the latter, or by cauſing the laſt to return into her Boſom, or admitting the others into the Society of her Children. As for carnal Chriſtians ſhe beareth with them for a time, as Straw which is ſerviceable to the Wheat upon the Floor; and becauſe every one is either Straw or Wheat, according to the Motions of his Will, She ſuffers thoſe that are in Sin or in Error till they are Accuſed, or till they undertake to defend their falſe Opinions with obſtinate Animoſity. But ſuch as are cut off from the Church do either return by Penance, or being carried away by a miſchievous Liberty they give up themſelves to Vice; or they make a Schiſm, or frame an Hereſie. Yea, very often God's Providence permits ſome vertuous Chriſtians to be put out of the Communion of the Church by Tumults and Diſturbances excited againſt them by carnal Perſons: but this ſeparation is not imputed unto them, and God notwithſtanding crowneth them in ſecret, when they bear with that Injury patiently, without making a Schiſm from the Church, or ſetting up any new Hereſie; Such Examples, ſaith St. Auguſtine, ſeem rare, but yet there are ſome, and more than can be believed. Having thus rejected the falſe Religions, he concludes, That we muſt hold to that of Chriſt, and to that Church which is Catholick; and which is ſo called, not only by her own Children, but alſo by her very Enemies. The firſt Ground of this Religion is Hiſtory, and Prophecy, which diſcovers to us the Oeconomy that God's Providence hath made uſe of in proceſs of times for the Salvation of Men. That after this Belief we ought to purifie our Hearts, to render them capable of knowing the Trinity, the Incarnation, and other Articles of the Creed. That Hereſies ſerve to clear the Myſteries. After this, he diſcourſeth of the Soul; ſhewing after what manner it becometh, as it were, Earthly and Carnal by loving the Body, and how it gets out of that Unhappy State, by turning to God and overcoming diſorderly Affections by the Grace of God. He treateth of the Nature and Fall of Angels. He ſhews, that Sin muſt be voluntary; That Death, Weakneſs, and Pain, are Puniſhments, for Sin; and yet are not unprofitable, becauſe they wean us from Corporeal Things. He reſumes his Diſcourſe of the Myſtery of the Incarnation, and ſaith, that God's Bounty towards Men, never appeared ſo much as in that Myſtery; That the Word of God of the ſame Subſtance and Co-eternal with the Father, vouchſafed to make himſelf Man like unto us, to deliver us from our Sins: That he hath uſed no force or violence to draw us to himſelf; that he hath manifeſted himſelf to God by Miracles, and Man by his Sufferings; that he hath appointed his Example for a Remedy againſt all the diſorderly Paſſions of Men; that his Life is a continual Inſtruction, and his Reſurrection, an Evidence that we may hope to be one day delivered from all sorts of Evils; that he hath taken off the Veil from the Figures of the Old-Law; That he hath abolished the Ceremonial Ordinances, with which the Jews were overloaden; That he hath instituted few Sacraments indeed, but very wholsome ones to preserve Society in his Church; that he hath perfected our Morals, by increasing the number of Precepts, but that at the same time he hath given Men strength to practise them. He treateth here of the Nature and Original of Evil, shewing that it is not a Corporeal Substance, but consists in a vicious adhæsion of the Will to Corporeal Beings. He runs through the several Conditions of Men, and the means to find out Remedies for all their Distempers. He discovereth the Use that is to be made both of Authority and Reason to cure Man, and applieth both to take him off from the Creature. He hath several curious Speculations upon the Knowledge and the Affections of Men; and particularly he examines the three principal Passions, Pleasure, Ambition and Curiosity, and layeth down very profitable Precepts for Piety and Manners. He recommends the Reading of the Holy Scripture, distinguishing the several Explications, and giving some Rules for the understanding of it. The whole Work is concluded with an Exhortation to all Men to embrace the true Religion.

In his Retractations he maketh some Remarks upon this Treatise; most of them are of small Consequence; these are some of the most important. He had said, that Sin was so necessarily Voluntary, that an Action could not be Sin, if it was not Voluntary. He justifies this Assertion in his Retractations: but he adds that Sins commited through Ignorance or Lust, are in some sort Voluntary, because they cannot be commited without Will: and that even Original Sin is Voluntary, in this Sense, because it was the Will of the First Man, that made it Hereditary to all his Posterity. He observeth likewise, upon what he had said, that Jesus Christ had done nothing by Violence, but only used Counsels and Exhortations: That he did not then reflect upon the Actions of Jesus Christ, when he drove the Merchants out of the Temple with Scourges, that came thither to Buy and Sell; but saith he, that cannot be looked upon as a violent Action: Sed quid hoc aut quantum est? Upon what he had said, That Miracles were ceased in his time, lest Men should still cleave to Sensible Things, and their Minds be too much accustomed to them; he noteth that these Words are not to be taken strictly, seeing that Miracles are still wrought in the Church, and that himself had seen some at Milan.

St. Augustine. Tome I.

The Rule, which is the last Piece of this Tome, is indeed St. Augustine's; but he wrote it for Nuns, and not for Monks. Some Body took it out of the 109*th*. Epistle, and fitted it for Men. This Alteration has been long made.

As they have placed by themselves, at the latter end of each Tome, those Pieces which are none of St. Augustine's, and yet have some relation to those contained in that Volume; so at the end of this, there are the Treatises of Grammar, Logick, Categories and Rhetorick, that were attributed to St. Augustine in the former Editions; perhaps, because he saith himself, in his Retractations, That he had began some Treatises upon those Sciences: But his Discourses were written in the Form of Dialogues, and like that of Musick; where he makes use of that Science, to raise up the Mind of Man to his Creator; but these are neither Dialogue-wise, nor fit to lift up Mens Minds towards God. The manner how they are written, and the methods observed in them are very different from those of St. Augustine. In a word there are in those Treatises several Observations unworthy of that Father, and contrary to his Opinions. The Discourse of Grammar, begins indeed with the same Words that St. Augustine hath noted in his Retractations; but they have been added, and are not to be found in the Manuscripts.

The Author of the Book of Categories, has a great Esteem for Aristotle's Philosophy; and saith that he could scarce understand his Book of Categories with Themistius his Help: Whereas St. Augustine, who had no great Esteem for Aristotle's Philosophy, assureth us that he understood his Categories, without Labour, and without a Tutor. The Name of Adeodatus, that was inserted into the printed Copies, is not found in the Manuscripts.

The Monastick Rules, which are at the latter end of this Volume, are rejected with Common Consent. The last, wherein St. Benedict's Rule is quoted, is, if we believe Holstenius, written by Alredus Rievellensis, an Abbot in England who flourished in the Twelfth Century; and indeed it is in the Catalogue of this Authors Works, published [by Bale,] in the Second Century of English Writers: part of it is among St. Anselm's Works.

The second TOME.

Tome II.

THE Second Tome of St. Augustine's Works, containeth his Letters; which do not only represent the Genius and Character of that holy Father, but contain also very important Points of Doctrine, Discipline and Morality. In the last Edition, they are placed according to the order of Time; for which Arguments are brought in a Preface. They are divided into Four Classes. The First contains those which he writ before he was Bishop, from the Year 386. to 395. In the Second, are those which he Writ from the Year 396. to the time when the Catholick Bishops had a Conference at Carthage with the Donatists, and the breaking out of the Pelagian Heresie in Africa, that is, to the Year 410. The Third comprehends those that were written from the Year 411. to the end of his Life, that is, to 430. And the Fourth contains those whereof the time is not justly known, though they were certainly written after he was made Bishop. There are two hundred and seventy in all. The Benedictines have taken away some Treatises, which were put among the Letters; and, they have added those which he answered. And lastly, some are added that were not published before.

The thirteen or fourteen first are about Philosophical Matters that St. Augustine used to discourse about with his Friends when he was first Converted.

The first was written by St. Augustine to Hermogenianus, about the latter end of the Year 380. concerning the Books that he wrote against the Academicks. He tells him what his aim was in writing them, and asketh his Advice about what he had said concerning those Philosophers. About the latter end of the Third Book he commends the Academicks, and saith, that he was so far from Condemning them, that he had Imitated them. He blameth the false Academicks, of his own time, and calleth them stupid who believed the Soul to be Corporeal. He concludes, with saying, that he flattered not himself with triumphing over the Academicks, as Hermogenianus said; but that he thought himself Happy, for being above despair of finding the Truth, which is the Food of the Soul; and that he had thereby broken that troublesome Chain which hindred him from fastning as one may say, to the Breasts of the true Philosophy.

In the second Letter, to Zenobius, he testifies his Sorrow for his being Absent, and his Impatience to see him again, that they might resolve a Question which he had begun to examine: This Letter was written the same time with the foregoing.

The third, to Nebridius, is about his Books of Soliloquies, composed in the beginning of the year 387. He speaketh there of his Happiness of having attained to the Knowledge of some particular Truths, and particularly of those concerning our Nature; confessing withall, that he was Ignorant of many things. Among things unknown to Man, he proposeth these: Why the World is of such Bigness? or rather, how big it is? Why it is where it is, rather than any where else? He observes, that Bodies may be infinitely divided; and that there is no Quantity but may be both infinitely increased and diminished: That it is not so with numbers, which may be infinitely increased, but not diminished proportionably, seeing there is nothing below Unity.

Tome II.

In the next directed to the same, and written about the same time, St. Augustine acquaints him with the progress that he had made in the knowledge of the Truth, during the time of his retirement. We have not the other Letters, which he writ at that time to Nebridius, as appears by the Ninth Book of Confessions.

The fifth and sixth, are Letters written in Africa, by Nebridius, to St. Augustine, about the end of the Year 388. or the beginning of 389. In the first, Nebridius pitieth St. Austine, that he was interrupted in the Contemplation of the Truth by other Businesses. And in the second, he tells him his Notion, that Memory cannot act without Imagination; and, that the Imagination draws her Images of things from it self, and not from the Senses. St. Augustine resolves both these Questions in the seventh Letter to the former, he answereth that we remember things which cannot be represented by Sensible Ideas: whence he concludes, that there is a Memory independent upon the Imagination. To the latter, that there are three sorts of Images or Phantoms, in our Imagination; that some are transmitted by the Senses, and these represent such things as we have seen and felt. That the second, that are formed by Imagination, represent such things as we never saw; and which perhaps, are not, but which we fansie, or suppose to be, or to have been: And that the last arise from the Consideration of some Speculative Truths, as Numbers and Dimensions. That without doubt, the first sort do not proceed from Sense; but we must grant, that the second have their Original from Sense, since they represent nothing but what is true. That the last though they seem to spring from the Reasons and Principles of Sciences which lead not into Error, yet are false; because they represent Spiritual Things, as if they were Corporeal and extended. Whence he concludes that the Soul doth not imagine the things that it does not see, and that it doth not feel, but either by lessening or by increasing the Images of what it hath seen or felt.

The following Letters to the thirteenth, are directed to Nebridius, though the Years are not precisely known: it is certain, that they were written before St. Augustine was Ordained, becauſe Nebridius died before that time. In the eighth, Nebridius asketh St. Auguſtine, how Dæmons can make us Dream? St. Auguſtine anſwers him in the ninth, that they do it, by ſtirring thoſe Parts of the Body which can make an Impreſſion upon the Soul, after the ſame manner as Muſical Inſtruments excite in us certain Thoughts, Paſſions and Affections. In the tenth, St. Auguſtine propoſes to Nebridius, to live together retired: and he ſetteth forth the Advantages of Solitude. In the eleventh, he endeavours to explain that Queſtion in Divinity, how the three Perſons being inſeparable, the Son alone was made Man? having diligently ſtudied how to anſwer it, he tells Nebridius, that the underſtanding of Myſteries, is got only by Piety: that this is the ſureſt way to compaſs it, and therefore that Men ought chiefly to give up themſelves to the Practice thereof. He had alſo handled that Queſtion in the twelfth Letter, but it it is imperfect. In the thirteenth, he adviſes Nebridius not to think any longer, that the Soul hath another thinner Body than that which we ſee, it being impoſſible to reſolve that Queſtion, ſince our Senſes cannot diſcern ſuch a Body, and Reaſon cannot diſcover any ſuch thing to us.

In the fourteenth, he anſwers two other Queſtions propoſed by Nebridius. The firſt, concerning the Sun; which is of ſmall importance, and hath no difficulty; The ſecond deſerves more Reflection: Nebridius asks St. Auguſtine, Whether the Knowledge of God, includeth not only a general Idea of Mankind, but alſo an Idea of every Man in particular? St. Auguſtine anſwereth, that in the Creation, God had only a Proſpect of the general Idea of Mankind; but yet that there is in God a particular Idea of every Man. He clears his Anſwer by this Example: the Idea of an Angle, is one ſingle Notion, as well as that of a Square: ſo when I deſign to make an Angle, one only Idea offers it ſelf; and yet when I go about to deſcribe a Square, I muſt have in my Mind the Notion of four Angles joined together: Even ſo each Man was formed after the particular Idea of a Man; but in the Creation of People, it is no longer the particular Idea of one Man, but the general Idea of many ſeen and conceived all at once. This is refined Metaphyſicks.

The fifteenth Letter is written to Romanianus; to whom St. Auguſtine promiſeth his Book of The true Religion, which he finiſhed not long before he was Ordained Prieſt. Which proves, that this Letter was written about the year 390. He exhorts Romanianus to renounce the cares of the World, and to ſeek after ſolid and laſting Goods.

The ſixteenth Letter, is a Diſcourſe, written by Maximus, a Grammarian of Madaura, who diſputeth againſt the Chriſtian Religion. He owns, that there is but one Sovereign Being, and one only God; but pretends, that it is the ſame God whom the Heathen worſhip under ſeveral Names, which ſignifie his ſeveral Attributes. He cannot endure, that in the Chriſtian Religion, they ſhould preferr Martyrs of obſcure and ſtrange Names, before thoſe Immortal Gods whoſe Names are ſo famous. He deſires of St. Auſtine to let him know who that particular God is, whom the Chriſtians ſuppoſe to be preſent in ſecret and retired places.

St. Auguſtine anſwereth this in the ſeventeenth Letter, diſcovering the Falſhood of this Pagan's Raillery, by other Railleries that are more Spiritual. At the latter end of his Letter, he declares, That among Chriſtians and Catholicks the Dead are not adored: and, That no Divine Honours are done to any Creature, but only to God, who created all things. Theſe Letters were written before the Worſhip of the Gods was prohibited by the Imperial-Law of the year 391. whilſt St. Auguſtine was retir'd at Tagaſta, near Madaura, and before he was a Prieſt, namely, about the Year 390.

It is believed, that the eighteenth, nineteenth, and twentieth Letters, were written before St. Auguſtine was Ordained Prieſt; becauſe he gives himſelf no Title in the Inſcription, and becauſe they ſeem more florid than thoſe which he he wrote after he was in Orders. The eighteenth is directed to Cæleſtinus. There he diſtinguiſhes Beings into three Natures: The firſt Moveable in Place and Time, and that's Body: The ſecond Moveable in Time, but not in Place, and that is the Soul: And the third is Immoveable in Time and Place, and this is God. The firſt is incapable either of Happineſs or Unhappineſs: the Laſt is eſſentially Happy: the Middle Being is Unhappy when it cleaveth to the Beings of the firſt ſort, but happy when it carries it ſelf to the Supreme Being. In the nineteenth Letter, he exhorteth Caius, to whom he ſendeth his Works, to continue in thoſe good Diſpoſitions of Mind wherein he left him. In the twentieth, he giveth Antonius Thanks for his Love, and for the good Opinion he had of him; with excellent Inſtructions, deſiring the Converſion of his whole Family,

St. Auguſtine was Ordained Prieſt by Valerius, Biſhop of Hippo, who being a Greek, and not able to ſpeak Latin fluently enough to Preach to the People, caſt his Eyes upon St. Auguſtine to Preach in his room. St. Auguſtine being ſenſible how hard it was to diſcharge the Duties of that Station, intreateth Valerius,] in the twenty firſt Letter, to let him withdraw for a time, that he might fit himſelf, by Study and Prayer, for the Employment which he had laid upon him. This Letter is very inſtructive for thoſe that are to be promoted to Eccleſiaſtical Dignities; It begins with this curious Reflection; That there is nothing more acceptable, eſpecially at this time, than the Dignity of a Prieſt, a Biſhop and a Deacon; nothing more pleaſant and eaſie than the Exerciſe of theſe Offices, when Men will do things only of Courſe, and flatter others in their Diſorders: But on the other ſide, That there is nothing more miſchievous, pernicious and damnable before God: On the contrary, nothing is more glorious and happy in God's account: but at the ſame time, nothing more difficult, painful and dangerous, eſpecially at this time, than the Exerciſe of thoſe Functions, when Men reſolve to diſcharge them according to the Rules of that holy Warfare which we profeſs to follow. He declareth, that though he wept very heartily on the Day of his Ordination, foreſeeing the Dangers he was expoſed unto; yet he did not then know his Weakneſs ſo well as he has done ſince.

St. Auguſtine. Tome II.

He obſerves, that he was Ordained, when he thought to have taken ſome time to ſtudy the Scriptures. He begs time till Eaſter, to prepare himſelf for Preaching, by Study and Prayer. This Letter was written about the beginning of the Year 391.

The twenty ſecond, to Aurelius, Biſhop of Carthage, was written the following year. St. Auguſtine laments the Feaſts which they made in Church-yards, and at the Martyrs Graves, under pretence of Religion, deſiring Aurelius to give Order about them. He obſerves, that of the three Vices condemned by St. Paul, in the Epiſtle to the Romans, namely, Drunkenneſs, Uncleanneſs and Diſcord, they ſeemed to puniſh but One in the Church, that was, Uncleanneſs: That the others were tolerated; yea they thought to honour the Martyrs by their Drunkenneſs: that this Abuſe was never in the Churches of Italy, or elſe it had been reformed by the Care and Vigilancy of their Biſhops; and that his Biſhop wanted neither Zeal, nor Knowledge, to correct it in his Dioceſs but that this Diſorder was ſo rooted, he thought that there was no hope to ſee it aboliſhed, but by the authority of a Council. That if any particular Church was to do it, that of Carthage ought to begin. Yet, that ſuch Abuſes were not to be oppoſed by ſharpneſs, roughneſs, or imperiouſneſs; that Inſtructions were to be uſed, rather than Commands; and Counſels, rather than Threatnings: that if there be need of threatnings, they muſt be uſed in a lamenting manner, and only ſuch as are found in Scripture; not to inſpire them by Words, with the Fear of Eccleſiaſtical Power, but with a Dread of the Divine Vengeance. And ſince the People was perſuaded, that theſe Feaſts were not only to the Honour of the Martyrs, but alſo gave Eaſe to the Dead, he would have the Offerings, made in the Church for the Dead, to be done modeſtly, without Pomp and Affectation. He would not have them ſold, but that the Money that was offered, ſhould be immediately diſtributed to the Poor. Afterwards he reproves the Quarrels and Enmities betwixt the African Clergy.

The twenty third Letter was written by St. Auguſtine, during his being a Prieſt, but what year, is unknown. It is directed to a Donatiſt Biſhop, called Maximinus, who had Re-baptiz'd a Deacon of the Church that was become a Donatiſt. St Auguſtine having been informed, that this Biſhop did not do Things like the other Donatiſts, prayeth him to let him know the Truth, and exhorts him, either to declare himſelf a Catholick, if he were not in that Point of the other Donatiſts Opinion; or to hold a Conference with him about his ſeparation from the Catholick Church.

The 24th. and 25th. are two Letters of Paulinus to Alypius, and to St. Auguſtine, written in the Year 394.

The 26th. is a Letter from St. Auguſtine, to his old Diſciple Licentius; wherein he exhorts him to deſpiſe the World, making Uſe of the Verſes which Licentius had Dedicated to him. It was written after St. Paulinus, and St. Auguſtine were acquainted, about the Year 395.

The 27th. is an Anſwer from St. Auguſtine, to Paulinus written the ſame Year.

The 28th. to St. Jerome, was the beginning of their Quarrel. St Auguſtine adviſeth him rather to Tranſlate into Latin the beſt of the Greek Authors, than to make a new Tranſlation of the Scripture upon the Hebrew Text. He beginneth alſo the Diſpute, about that Place, to the Galatians, which ſpeaks of St. Peter's Diſſembling; reproving St. Jerome for approving an officious Lye. This Letter was written in the Year 395.

The 29th. lately Publiſhed by the Benedictines from a Manuſcript in the Library at St. Croſſe, is directed to Alypius, then Biſhop of Tagaſta. There St. Auguſtine acquaints him, how he had at laſt compaſſed his Deſign of putting down, in the Church of Hippo, thoſe Feaſts that they were wont to make in the Church upon the Feſtival Days of the Martyrs: He repeats the Arguments that he uſed in his Sermons upon that Subject, that ſo Alypius might take the ſame Courſe to aboliſh the ſame Abuſe in his own Church. St. Auguſtine was but Prieſt, when when he writ this Letter, and Alypius was newly choſen Biſhop; which ſhews that it was written in the Year 395.

The 30*th.* is a Letter of Paulinus's, written to St. Auguſtine before he was Biſhop. Theſe are all the Letters of the First Claſſe.

St. Auguſtine. Tome II.

The Second Claſſe.

THE Second Claſſe containeth the Letters written by St. Auguſtine, from the time of his being made Biſhop, to the Conference at Carthage, before the breaking out of the Pelagian Hereſie in Africa, that is, from the Year of our Lord 396, to 410.

The firſt of theſe Letters, which is the 31*ſt.* written at the beginning of the Year 396. ſhortly after his Ordination, is directed to Paulinus. He thanks him for his Second Letters; and takes notice, that he was ordained Coadjutor to Valerius in the Biſhoprick of Hippo, and invites him to come over into Africa.

The 32*d.* is Paulinus's Anſwer.

The 33*d.* is to Proculianus, a Donatiſt Biſhop at Hippo. St. Auguſtine being informed, that he deſigned to clear his Doubts by a Conference with him, offereth it to him, that they might agree, and put an end to the Schiſm. This Letter was written ſoon after he was made Biſhop, Valerius being yet alive.

The 34*th.* was written, not long after the former: there he complaineth to Euſebius, that Proculianus, a Donatiſt Biſhop at Hippo, to whom the foregoing Letter was directed, had admitted into his Sect, and Re-baptiz'd a young Man, that uſed to beat his Mother, and threatned to kill her; declaring, towards the end, that he was ready to conſpire amicably with him, about the pretended Reaſons of their Separation.

This Euſebius, who in all Probability, was a Man of Note, that ſided with the Donatiſts, having returned to St. Auguſtine this Anſwer, that he would be no Judge betwixt Biſhops; this Saint writ to him again, by the 35*th.* Letter, that he might be on that occaſion, where there was no need of Judging; but only to know, Whether it was by Proculianus his Order, that the young Man was Re-baptiz'd; and, whether he would enter upon a Conference; He Complains likewiſe, that the ſame Biſhop had received, and Re-baptized a Sub-Deacon of the Church of Iſpana; who being accuſed of having an infamous Commerce with ſome Virgins that were conſecrated to God, was gone over to the Donatiſts to avoid the Chaſtiſement which he deſerved; and ever ſince led a ſcandalous Life. St. Auguſtine takes notice, that he dealt not ſo with thoſe that proffered to come into the Church: If they be found guilty of any Crime, they are not admitted, but upon Condition that they ſubmit themſelves to the Humiliation of Penance. He ſhews how abominable this Cuſtom of the Donatiſts was, to perſuade ſuch as were to be chaſtiſed for their Diſorders, to come over to them, and be Re-baptized. At laſt he tells Euſebius, that if, by this means, he doth not obtain an Anſwer from Proculianus, he will cauſe theſe things to be notifi'd to him, formally by a publick Officer: He ſpeaks, beſide, of a Donatiſt Prieſt, who had been troubleſome to one of the Church's Tenants; and of a Woman of that Party that had affronted him.

The thirty ſixth Letter to Caſulanus, concerning Saturday's Faſt, ſeems to have been written before St. Ambroſe's Death, of whom he ſpeaketh, as holding ſtill the See of Milan; whereby it appears, that it belongs to the Year 396. or 397. There he refuteth the Writing of a certain Roman, who had aſſerted, that all Men were obliged to faſt on Saturdays, according to the Practice of the Church of Rome. St. Auguſtine lays down this Rule, that in thoſe things, where the Scripture hath determined nothing certain, the Cuſtoms received among Chriſtians, or ſettled by our Anceſtors, are to be inſtead of a Law, and no Conteſts ought to be admitted about ſuch Matters. Afterwards he examineth the Writing which Caſulanus ſent him, and ſhews, that it is made up of falſe Suppoſitions, and unconcluding Conſequences. Having anſwered this Writing, he explains his own Notion, ſaying, that he finds indeed, that Faſting is enjoyn'd in the Goſpel, and in the Writings of the Apoſtles: but that neither Jeſus Chriſt, nor the Apoſtles, ever appointed the days wherein we ſhould faſt, nor the days in which we ought to forbear. That he thinks it more convenient not to faſt upon the Saturday; and yet whether we faſt or faſt not, we ought to maintain Peace; and this Precept of the Apoſtle is to be obſerved, Let not him that eateth, condemn him that eateth not; neither let him that eateth not, condemn him that eateth. That there is no great Inconvenience in obſerving the Saturday's Faſt, ſince the Church of Rome obſerves it as well as ſome other Churches: But it would prove a great Scandle to faſt upon Sundays; eſpecially, ſince the Manichees affect to command their Diſciples to faſt upon that Day: That notwithſtanding, it were pardonable to faſt upon Sunday, for thoſe who are able to carry Faſting ſo far, as to be more than a week without eating, that ſo they may draw nearer to the Faſt of forty Days. St. Auguſtine ſaith, that ſome have done it, and that he was inform'd, that a certain Perſon had continued faſting full forty Days. This is hard to be believ'd, yet St. Auguſtine ſaith, that he heard it from credible Perſons. Having refuted the Reaſons of the Manichees, who affirming, that Sunday is to be kept as a Faſt; he ſaith, that the Church obſerves Faſting upon Wedneſdays and Fridays; becauſe the Jews reſolved upon Wedneſday to put Chriſt to Death, and executed it upon Friday. That on Saturday, the Body of Jeſus Chriſt having reſted in the Grave, gave occaſion to ſome to forbear Faſting on that day, to mark thereby the reſting of Chriſt's Fleſh; and that others faſt upon it, becauſe of that Humiliation of our Saviour: but that the former Celebrate that Faſt once only, on the Saturday before Eaſter, to renew the Remembrance of the Diſciple's Sorrow. All theſe Notions having but little Solidity, he concludes with an excellent Rule which St. Ambroſe had taught him upon that Subject: For having asked his Opinion, concerning his Mother's Scruple, who being at Milan, doubted whether ſhe ought to obſerve Saturday's Faſt, according to the Cuſtom of her own Church, or according to the Cuſtom of the Church of Milan, that obſerved no Faſt on that Day. This Holy Biſhop anſwer'd him, Let her do as I do. When I am here, I do not faſt upon Saturdays; when I am at Rome, I faſt upon that day, and ſo in what Church ſoever you are, keep to its Cuſtoms, if you mean to ſcandalize no Body, or to be ſcandalized at no Body. But becauſe he was then in Africa, and that among the Churches of the ſame Country, and even among the Chriſtians of the ſame Church, ſome faſted upon Saturdays, and others not, St. Auguſtine ſaith, that we muſt conform our ſelves to thoſe that bear Rule over the People; and ſo he adviſeth him to whom he writeth, not to reſiſt his Biſhop in that Caſe, but to do as he did.

The thirty ſeventh Letter to Simplicianus, is a Preface to the Books that he Dedicated to that Biſhop that were written in 397.

In the thirty eighth to Profuturus, St. Auguſtine being ſick, recommends himſelf to his Prayers, and deſires to know what Biſhop ſucceeded in the Primacy of Numidia, after the Death of Megalius Biſhop of Calama, who had been dead twenty Days. In the Council of Carthage, aſſembled in Auguſt, 397. Creſcentianus wrote, that he was Primate of Numidia. Thus, the death of Megalius happening ſome time before, ſerves to fix the date of this Letter. There are two excellent Notions of Morality; the one of Patience, and the other againſt Anger. The former is this: Tho' I ſuffer, yet I am well, becauſe I am as God would have me to be, for when we will not what he wills, 'tis we that are in the fault, and not he, who can neither do, nor permit any thing but what is juſt. The latter is equally valuable: It is incomparably better to ſhut the door of our Hearts againſt juſt Anger when it offers to come in, than to give it entrance, being uncertain whether we can turn it out again, when we find it growing from a Thread to a Beam.

The thirty ninth Letter, is a Note from St. Jerome, who recommends Præſidius, and preſents his Service to Alypius. It is written in the Year 397.

The fortieth from St. Auguſtine to St. Jerome, is about their Diſagreement, concerning St. Peter's Action. St. Auguſtine alſo deſires to know the Title of his Book of Eccleſiaſtical Writers, and exhorts him to make a Collection of Origen's Errors, and of thoſe of other Hereticks.

The forty firſt Letter written in Alypius's and St. Auguſtine's Name, to Aurelius Biſhop of Carthage, commending that Biſhop for preferring the Good of the Church, before the Honour of the Epiſcopal Order; by permitting contrary to Cuſtom, that Prieſts ſhould Preach God's Word in his preſence. This Letter was written within few Years after St. Auguſtine was a Biſhop.

The forty ſecond, is a Note from St. Auguſtine to St. Paulinus, never before Publiſhed, intreating him to write to him, and to ſend him his Book againſt the Gentiles. It is of the latter end of the Year 397.

The forty third, and forty fourth Letters to Glorius Eleuſius, give an Account of a Conference, which St. Auguſtine held in the City of Tubuſica, with ſome Donatiſts, in the Year 397, or 398. as it is proved in the Preface to the Letters. In the firſt, he produces the Judgments that were given againſt the Donatiſts; He juſtifies Cæcilian's Innocency, and ſhews, that thoſe who condemned him, were ſuſpected Judges; and that the Authors of the Donatiſt Schiſm, were guilty of the Crime which they charged upon others. He adds, that it was to no purpoſe to impute to the Church the pretended Crimes of the Dead; ſince the Church may tolerate wicked men, without ceaſing to be a Church. That the Donatiſts themſelves ſuffer among them very diſorderly Perſons; that Maximianus had cauſed Primianus to be condemned, as Majorinus had formerly procured a Sentence againſt Cæcilian, by Cabalting and Intrigue: that the Sect of the Donatiſts being limited within Africa, and having no Communion with the Churches that were diſperſed throughout the World, cannot be the Catholick Church. In this Letter there is that Famous Sentence concerning the Authority of Councils. Let us ſuppoſe, that Pope Miltiades, and the other Biſhops, who gave Judgment with him, have not judged right, then we may have recourſe to a Plenary Council of the whole Church, in which the Cauſe of the Donatiſts ought to be debated again with thoſe that judged it, and their Sentence reverſed, if it ſhall be found that they have given wrong Judgment.

St. Auguſtine. Tome II.

The ſecond Letter contains a particular Conference of St. Auguſtine with Fortunius a Donatiſt Biſhop, which was ſpent in Reproaches on both ſides, for the Villanies that were committed on both ſides, without medling with the main Queſtion, of the Schiſm. St. Auguſtine requeſted, that the Diſpute might be ended in a greater Aſſembly, and in what place they pleaſed, where Chriſtians of all Parties might meet. In this Letter, there is an Account of a Letter of the falſe Council of Sardica, of Eaſtern Biſhops; which Fortunius quoted, becauſe it was directed to Donatus: St. Auguſtine not knowing the Story, was perplexed; but finding that St. Athanaſius was condemned in that Letter, he did not mind it.

The forty fifth Letter, is a Note to Paulinus, written a Year after the foregoing, in 398.

The forty ſixth, from Publicola to St. Auguſtine, contains ſeveral Caſes of Conſcience, which this Lord propoſed concerning the Oath, whereby they obliged the Barbarians to ſwear by their Gods, that they would preſerve the Fruits of the ground faithfully, which they would not otherwiſe have preſerv'd, had they not been bound by that Oath; About the uſe of Meats, and other things offered to Idols; and concerning the killing of one that aſſaults, or robs us.

In the next, St. Auguſtine endeavours to decide the Queſtions propoſed by Publicola, concerning thoſe Matters. Upon the firſt he ſaith, That that Oath ought not to be required of the Barbarians, but that uſe may be made of them, after they have taken it; and he that uſes their Service, hath no ſhare in the Oath. That thoſe that ſwear by falſe Gods, are doubly guilty, if they keep not their Oath, both of an abominable Oath, and of Perjury. As to things offered to Idols, he anſwereth Publicola upon ſeveral Particulars, as that there is no danger in making uſe of the Meats offered to them, when it is not known, and it is too nice a Scruple to forbear the uſe of thoſe things which have been applyed to prophane uſes, if it be not done with reſpect to that. To the Laſt Query he ſaith, that no Man ought to kill any Man, upon any Account whatſoever; except perhaps, ſays he, Soldiers, or ſuch as are obliged to it by the Duties of ſome publick Office. But that we are not forbidden to ſecure our ſelves againſt the Violences of others, by making uſe of Walls, and, that if a Thief be killed or wounded with the Wall falling upon him, or he falling from the Wall, the thing is not to be imputed to him that built the Wall. This Letter was written before the Temples of Idols were quite demoliſhed, in 399.

In the forty eighth Letter to Eudoxius, Abbot of a Monaſtery in the Iſland of Capraria, St. Auguſtine exhorteth both him and his Monks to make good uſe of the Quiet they enjoy'd, that ſo they might be ready to leave it whenſoever the Church ſhould have need of them. This Letter is ſuppoſed to have been writ in the Year 398.

In the 49*th*. He asketh of Honoratus a Donatiſt Biſhop, a Reaſon, why the Catholick Church, which ought to be Univerſal over the whole Earth, came to be limited to Africa, and was no where to be found but among the Donatiſts? the time of this Letter is not very certain.

The 50*th*. Letter to the Principal Perſons of the Colony of Suffectum, is a Complaint upon the account of a Murther of 60 Chriſtians whom they Maſſacred, becauſe their Hercules was taken away; He jeſts upon them, promiſing to have another made for them; But he concludes with theſe upbraiding Words, But do you alſo reſtore to us that great number of our Brethren, whoſe Lives you have taken away; for if we reſtore to you your Hercules, it is reaſonable you ſhould reſtore them to us. Baronius thinketh that this Maſſacre happened upon occaſion of an Edict made againſt Idolatry in 399. But the Tranſlator of St. Auguſtine's Letters, affirms, that this is none of his, for two Reaſons; Firſt, Becauſe he thinks it is Impertinent; Secondly, Becauſe it is not written in St. Auguſtine's Style. I am much of his mind as to the ſecond Point, but I cannot allow the firſt; for though this Letter does not ſeem to be grave enough for ſuch a Subject, yet the Raillery is ſharp, which ſometimes is more effectual than a Pathetical Diſcourſe. However it is ancient, and of St. Auguſtine's time.

In the 51*ſt*. Letter, St. Auguſtine objects to Criſpinus, a Donatiſt Biſhop at Calama, the Diſſention between the Primianiſts, and the Maximianiſts, as an Anſwer to what the Donatiſts urged againſt the Church. It was written after the Death of Optatus Gildonianus in 399, and before that of Prætextatus, who died in 400, when St. Auguſtine wrote his Books againſt Parmenianus.

In the 52*d*. He exhorts Severinus, his Kinſman to forſake the Donatiſts, and to come into the Catholick Church. It may be of the ſame time with the foregoing.

The 53*d*. is written in St. Auguſtine's Name, and of two of his Colleagues, Fortunatus and Alypius, to Generoſus, a Catholick of Conſtantina; and contains an Anſwer to a Letter written by a Donatiſt Prieſt to this Man, to ſeduce him; wherein he pretends to have received an Order by an Angel from Heaven, to oblige him to embrace the Donatiſt's Party.

St. Auguſtine proves in that Letter, that the Donatiſt's Party cannot be the true Church. 1. Becauſe they have no Succeſſion of Biſhops from the Apoſtles. To prove this, he produces the Succeſſion of the Biſhops of Rome, from St. Peter to Anaſtaſius. 2. He quoteth the Acts of Minutius Felix, which ſhew, that Silvianus the Predeceſſor of a Donatiſt Biſhop of Cirta was a Traditor. 3. He urges all the Determinations that had been made againſt the Donatiſts. 4. He confeſſes, that there may be wicked Men in the Church, and urges againſt the Donatiſts the Diſſentions between the Primianiſts, and the Maximianiſts.

The 54*th*. and 55*th*. Letters to Januarius, are mentioned in St. Auguſtine's Retractations; where they are placed among the Books that were written about the Year 400: They contain ſeveral very uſeful Deciſions about Church-Diſcipline: He layeth it down at firſt as a Principal Matter, that Jeſus Chriſt, whoſe yoke is eaſie, his burthen light, hath inſtituted but few Sacraments; the obſervation whereof is as Eaſie, as the Wonders which they repreſent to us, are Sublime. Such is Baptiſm, the Communion of his Body and Blood, and other things which the Scripture enjoyns us to obſerve, excepting thoſe that belong to Moſes's Law. But as to thoſe that are obſerved by Tradition, being not written, if they be univerſally obſerved, we ought to look upon them as ſettled either by the Apoſtles themſelves, or by General Councils, whoſe Authority is very great in the Church; as the Annual Celebration of the Paſſion, Reſurrection, and Aſcenſion of Jeſus Chriſt, and of the Coming of the Holy Ghoſt, and of other things of this Nature, which are generally obſerved through the whole Church. As to thoſe that are variouſly obſerved in divers places, as Faſting upon Saturdays, which is practiſed in ſome places, and in others not, Communicating every Day, or only upon certain Days; Offering daily or only upon Sundays and Saturdays: there is a Liberty for thoſe things, and for all others of the like Nature. And there is no better Rule for a Wiſe and Prudent Chriſtian, than to follow what he ſeeth practiſed in the Church where he is. For what is clearly ſeen to be neither againſt Faith, nor Good Manners, ought to be indifferently received; and the Good of a Society requireth, that Men ſhould hold to what they find eſtabliſhed among thoſe with whom they live. He gives an Account of what he had heard St. Ambroſe ſay in that caſe; and having laid down this Rule as the Ground of all that he was to ſay, he ſpeaks particularly of frequent Communion; that ſome believe, that it is good to Communicate daily; but to do it more worthily, certain Days are to be ſet apart, in which they live after a purer and more reſerved manner: Others, on the contrary judge, that when Men are not Guilty of thoſe Sins for which Penance is enjoyned, and themſelves forbidden to come to the Communion of the Body of Jeſus Chriſt; that they ought to come daily to the Euchariſt, as a Remedy to preſerve them ſtill. He reconcileth theſe two, by adding a third Advice; in which he exhorts them both to Peace, and leaves it to every one, to act according as he ſhall be guided by the light both of Faith and of Piety, ſince neither of them Prophane the Body of Chriſt; but on the contrary ſtrive to honour it. He propoſes the Examples of Zacchæus and the Centurion, whereof the one preſently received Jeſus Chriſt with Joy into his Houſe; and the other, judged not himſelf worthy, that he ſhould come under his Roof.

Secondly, St. Auguſtine ſaith, that a Traveller ought to obſerve the Cuſtoms of the Place, where he is, and not require thoſe of his own Country. Thus when a Man comes into a Country where they Faſt upon Thurſdays in Lent; he ought to Faſt with them, though they Faſt not in his Country; for fear of diſturbing the Peace by unprofitable Diſputes.

Theſe Principles being laid down, he anſwereth Januarius his Queſtions. The Firſt is about the Hour of Offering upon the Holy-Thurſday, whether it ſhould be done in the Morning or in the Evening? Or, Whether we ought to Faſt and not to Offer till after Supper; becauſe it is ſaid, that it was after Supper that Jeſus Chriſt took Bread; or whether we ought not to Sup till the Offering be over? St. Auguſtine anſwereth, that this is one of thoſe things which are neither ſettled by Scripture, nor univerſally obſerved throughout the Church; and ſo every one is to follow the Cuſtom of his own Church, there being nothing of either ſide inconſiſtent either with Faith or good Manners; and that alterations, though Uſeful in themſelves, cauſe Diſturbances: That Chriſt's Example is no Law in this caſe, otherwiſe the whole Church is in an Error to enjoyn the receiving the Euchariſt Faſting, which the Apoſtles firſt received after Supper; but that ſince it ſeemed good to the Holy Ghoſt, out of Reverence to ſo great a Sacrament, that the Body of Jeſus Chriſt ſhould be received ved into Chriſtians Mouths before any other Meat; and therefore this Cuſtom is obſerved throughout the World. And yet ſome others believing upon good Grounds, That for a more exact Commemoration of Chriſt's Death, it was convenient to offer and receive once a Year upon Holy-Thurſday after Eating, This Cuſtom can no more be condemned, than that of Bathing upon that Day; neither are they to blame that Faſt and Bath not; wherefore the Sacrifice is offered twice once in the Morning for theſe laſt, and once in the Evening for the firſt.

St. Auguſtine. Tome II.

St. Auguſtine. Tome II.

In the ſecond Letter to Januarius, which is the 55th. St. Auguſtine goeth on to treat of the Ceremonies of the Church: Shewing, why Eaſter is always celebrated after the Fourteenth Day of the Moon in March; Why Chriſt would riſe again the third Day, and the next Day after the Sabbath; what ſignifieth the Day of Chriſt's Crucifixion, and that in which his Body remained in the Grave, and that of his Reſurrection; Why Lent is kept before the Reſurrection; Why the Holy Ghoſt came down the fiftieth Day after the Reſurrection, with many other things whereof he gives Myſtical Reaſons, very edifying and very proper to ſhew how both our Saviour's Death and Reſurrection ought to operate upon us.

He adds ſeveral things concerning the Ceremonies of the Church: he obſerves that Lent is kept throughout the whole Church, as well as the Solemnity of the Holy Days which were deſigned for thoſe that were newly baptized; That the Cuſtom of Singing Hallelujah from Eaſter to Whitſuntide is not general; becauſe, though it is Sung every where at that time; yet in ſome Churches it is Sung at other times alſo. As to the Praying, ſtanding at the ſame time, he durſt not affirm it to be an univerſal Cuſtom. The Waſhing of Feet was not conſtantly uſed every where. He approves of Singing in the Church, though it was not univerſally eſtabliſhed. He condemns thoſe that introduce new Cuſtoms, if they are uſeleſs; and declares how much he is troubled to ſee thoſe Wholſome Things, neglected which the Church preſcribes; and that all is full of Human Inſtitutions. He affirms that Endeavours ſhould be uſed, to aboliſh all ſorts of things, which are neither Expreſſed in Scripture, nor enjoyned by Councils, nor confirmed by the univerſal Practiſe of the Church; but are done after different manners, according to the difference of Places, though no Reaſon can be ſhewed why they were firſt eſtabliſhed. For, ſaith he, though it doth not appear that they are contrary to the Faith, yet it is ſufficient to make us reject them; That they are ſervile Cuſtoms and Burthens to our Holy Religion: And which from that Liberty, wherein God's Mercy hath Eſtabliſhed it, preſcribing but few Sacraments; the Deſign and Virtue whereof are clearly manifeſt, make it fall into a kind of Slavery, worſe than that of the Jews. . . . But as the Church encloſeth much Straw, ſo it is forced to tolerate many things, yet without doing or approving, yea, without palliating, what it finds to be contrary to Faith or Good Manners. He afterwards blameth thoſe who through Superſtition abſtain from certain Meats; and thoſe who, that they may know what they have to do, will at all adventures open the Book the Goſpel out of a Superſtitious Cuſtom. Laſtly, he tells Januarius, That all Knowledge muſt have reſpect to Charity, which is the only End of all our Actions.

The 56th. and 57th. Letters were written to Celer, before the Conference at Carthage. He exhorts him to the Study of the Holy Scriptures, and to forſake the Donatiſts.

In the 58th. He applauds Pammachius, a Senator, for cauſing his Vaſſals that were Donatiſts to return to the Church. It ſeems to have been written at the latter end of 401. and ſent by the Legates of the Council of Carthage, the ſame Year.

The 59th. is an Anſwer to Victorinus a Biſhop; who writ to him, to come to a Council which he was then calling. He ſaith, that he could not be there becauſe he was indiſpoſed; and beſides he would not have gone otherwiſe, upon account of this Letter; becauſe Xantippus Biſhop of Tagoſa, pretended to the Primacy, which ought firſt to be determined. It appears by the 65th. Letter, that Xantippus was in the right, and that he was acknowledged Primate in 402. which ſhews that this Letter was written in 401. Now to underſtand this Letter, and all the reſt of St. Auguſtine's, that ſpeak of Primacy or Metropolitical Rights, we are to obſerve, that this Right belonged not in Africa to the Dignity of the Towns, but to the Seniority of the Biſhops.

In the 60th. St. Auguſtine acquaints Aurelius, Biſhop of Carthage, That Donatus and his Brother had left a Monaſtery againſt his Will; and that ſuch Falls being ordinary to Men of that Profeſſion, thoſe do the Clergy an Injury, who admit Deſerters from Monaſteries into the Church again. That an ill Monk is ſo far from making a good Church-man, that on the contrary, it is hard to make a good Church-man of a good Monk; becauſe, though there may be Purity enough on the one ſide, yet there is often want of Inſtruction on the other; or at leaſt ſome other Imperfections which may make him unworthy of coming into the Church. Yet Aurelius had ordained Donatus, ſuppoſing that he had left the Monaſtery by St. Auguſtine's order before that Canon was made; whereby it was forbidden to ordain a Monk of another Dioceſs. Wherefore St. Auguſtine writes to Donatus, That he was at liberty, to do what he pleaſed, if he was not acted by a Spirit of Pride: But as to his Brother, who was the Cauſe of his Deſertion, You know, ſaith St. Auguſtine, what I think of it, but I have nothing to ſay to you as to that matter; for I dare not contradict the Opinions of ſo Wiſe and Charitable a Man as you are, and whom I ought to reverence ſo much. The Canon mentioned in that Letter, is that of the Council held the 13th. of September 401. and it is in the African Code, Chap. 80. which ſhews that the Letter was written ſoon after.

St. Auguſtine. Tome II.

The 61ſt. is written to Theodorus, to aſſure the Donatiſt Clergy, That if they returned to the Church, they ſhould be admitted to the ſame Rank and Dignity, which they held before in their own Party. St. Auguſtine promiſes it ſolemnly and with an Oath. He confeſſeth, that there was no Evil in the Donatiſts, but only their Separation from the Church: That their Baptiſm, their Ordination, their Vows and all their Sacraments were good; though unprofitable to them whilſt they wanted Charity.

Both the following Letters directed to Severus, Biſhop of Milevis, are written about a Clerk called Timothy, who had ſworn, that he would never leave Severus, though he was of the Church of Hippo, and had performed the Office of Reader in that Dioceſs. St. Auguſtine pretends, That the Oath which this Prieſt had taken, being diſapproved by his Biſhop, and not received by him with whom he had Sworn to abide did not oblige him, nor free him from the Obligation which he was under to remain in that Church to which he belonged. Yet he dealt very civilly with Severus; and though he cauſed Timothy to be ordained Sub-Deacon at Suſanna, which belonged to the Dioceſs of Hippo, yet he ſent him back to Severus, that he might have no occaſion to complain of him. It was upon this occaſion, probably, that a Canon was made in the Council of Milevis, of the 27th. of September, 402. whereby a Biſhop is forbidden to detain a Clerk, who had performed the Office of a Reader in another Dioceſs.

In the 64th. Letter to Quintianus, he exhorts him not to be Impatient, becauſe Aurelius deferred to give Judgment in his Cauſe; declaring that he could not admit him to his Communion before Aurelius had admitted him to his; adviſing him likewiſe, not to ſuffer the Apocryphal Books to be read in his Church; and Anſwers the Complaint that was made againſt St. Auguſtine, for receiving into his Monaſtery, Perſons of another Dioceſs, againſt the Canon of the Council of Carthage, that was held in the Year 401.

In the 65th. Letter, St. Auguſtine acquaints Xantippus, Primate of Numidia, That he had given Judgment againſt Abundantius the Prieſt, who was convicted of ſtaying and eating upon a Faſt-Day in the Houſe of a Woman of ill Reputation. He ſaith farther, that he had admoniſhed him, and aſſured him, that according to the Canon of the Council of Carthage, in 401. He might, within the Year, have his Cauſe examined again: but he declares to Xantippus, that what Judgment ſoever, might intervene in his behalf, yet he would never truſt him with a Church in his Juriſdiction. It is obſerved in that Letter, that Eaſter-Day in that Year, wherein it was written, happened upon the 6th. of April, which is an infallible Proof, that this Letter was written in the Year 402.

In the 66th. St. Auguſtine upbraideth Criſpinus, a Donatiſt Biſhop at Calama, becauſe he Re-baptized thoſe of Mappalia, whom with Threatnings, he had forced to embrace his Communion. It appears by the ſecond Book againſt Petilianus, written in 402, that this happened not long before that ſame Year.

The 67th. and 68th. are Letters which St. Auguſtine, and St. Jerome writ to one another in the Year 402.

In the 69th. both Alipius, and St. Auguſtine, exhort Caſtorius to fill up the Biſhoprick of Vagæ or Bagaia, which was then vacant by the Demiſſion of his Brother Maximian; who, for Quietneſs ſake, being obliged to quit the Biſhoprick, had generouſly done it, as appears likewiſe by a Canon of the Council of Milevis, in the Year 402. which is the 88th. in the African Code.

The 71ſt. 72d. 73d. 74th. and 75th. of St. Auguſtine, to St. Jerome, and of St. Jerome, to St. Auguſtine, are about that Diſpute that was between them: Of which we gave an Account in the Abridgment of St. Jerome's Works.

The 76th. is an Exhortation, in the Church's Name, to all Donatiſts, which contains the moſt prevailing Motives to make them return to the Church. It was written after the Donatiſt Biſhops had refuſed a Conference that was offered, in purſuance of the order of the general Council of Africa, in the year 403.

The 77th. and 78th. are concerning a Scandal that happened in the Church of Hippo. One Spes, of St. Auguſtine's Monaſtery, had been accuſed of Uncleanneſs, by Boniface, a Prieſt. This Man charged the Crime upon the Prieſt; affirming that he was the guilty Perſon. St. Auguſtine finding no Proof to Convict either of them, remitted the Judgment to God. But Spes deſiring to come into the Clergy; and being denyed by St. Auguſtine, inſiſted that if he might not be admitted, becauſe he had been accuſed, neither was Boniface to continue in the order of Prieſthood, St. Auguſtine thought fit to oblige them both, to go to the Grave of St. Felix of Nola, that God might be pleaſed to diſcover the Truth by ſome Miracle. Now he intended that this ſhould be kept Secret: but the thing taking vent, St. Auguſtine wrote about it to the Clergy of Hippo, and to two private Men, that none ought to be diſturbed at the Scandals happening in the Church; That no Man ſhould be raſhly Condemned; That there was no Proof againſt the Prieſt Boniface: So that he could neither be Condemned nor Degraded before Conviction; yet he proffers, till the thing be cleared, not to let the Name of Boniface be read with the Names of the other Prieſts if that be judged convenient, not to ſcandalize the Weak: and ſo much the rather, becauſe it ſignified but little to Boniface, not to have his Name read in a Table that was Written with his Hand, if the Impurity of his Conſcience did not cauſe it to be blotted out of the Book of Life.

The ſeventy ninth is directed to a Manichæan Prieſt, who is thought to be that Felix with whom St. Auguſtine had Conference in 404. whom he challenges to anſwer that Difficulty wherewith he had exerciſed another Manichee, called Fortunatus.

By the eightieth Letter, to St. Paulinus, he intreateth him to explain more clearly than he had done already. How it may be known what that is which God requireth of us, ſince we are always to preferr it before what we would our ſelves? This was written in the year 405,

The eighty firſt, is a Letter of Compliment, from St. Jerome, to St. Auguſtine, concerning the Diſpute that was betwixt them. He exhorts him to give over ſuch Queſtions, and to exerciſe himſelf about the Scriptures.

The eighty ſecond, is the laſt of St. Auguſtine's Letters to St. Jerome, about their Conteſts. He inſiſts eſpecially upon what concerns the Expoſition of the Epiſtle to the Galatians; having declared, 'that he valued none but Canonical Books ſo far as to believe that the Authors of them 'were never deceived: And as for other Authors, how holy 'ſoever they might be, he doth not think, that what they 'ſay is a Rule to him, becauſe they believed it to be true; 'but that he dependeth no farther upon them, than the Rea'ſons and Authorities of Canonical Books, which they lean 'upon, perſuaded him that their Aſſertions are conforma'ble to Truth.' Having laid down this Principle, he proves that St. Paul correcting of St. Peter was ſerious: becauſe St. Paul ſaith it in his Epiſtle to the Galatians; at the beginning of which he declares that he lyes not; and takes God to witneſs what he ſaith. He endeavours to anſwer St. Jerome's chief Reaſon, grounded upon this, that it is incredible that St. Paul would reprove in St. Peter what he did himſelf by ſhewing that the Circumſtances were very different. He maintains that the Ceremonies of the Law being of themſelves indifferent, neither good nor bad, the Uſe of them becomes good or bad, according to Times and Occaſions: That they were neceſſary to the Jews, before Chriſt came: That they ſignified, that he being come, it was not convenient immediately to forbid them as Sacrilegious, and that it was ſufficient to let them die, and go out of themſelves; but that they were now neither to be looked upon nor practiſed, as neceſſary to Salvation: That St. Peter's Fearfulneſs having made him obſerve Legal Ceremonies, in ſuch Circumſtances as might have perſuaded others that he believed them neceſſary, St. Paul was in the right, to accuſe him of not walking uprightly, according to the Truth of the Goſpel, and of obliging the Gentiles to Judaize; whereas St. Paul could not be reproached with the ſame Fault, ſince he had kept them only to ſhew that they were not to be condemned, as Criminal Superſtitions: And yet, That it is not now permitted to obſerve theſe Ceremonies, under any pretence, or any purpoſe whatſoever, he does not examine the caſe of an officious Lye, and doth not decide whether it is permitted to tell a Lye at any time. He leaves to every Man to take what ſide he pleaſes, provided that this be believed and laid down as an unalterable Principle, that there is no Lye in the Authors of the Holy Scripture. He ſets St. Cyprian and St. Ambroſe againſt the Authors that St. Jerome had alledged to juſtifie his Opinion; but chiefly he citeth St. Paul againſt them, who ſaith and declares at the beginning of his Epiſtle, that he lyes not; and, that God is Witneſs of the Truth of what he affirms. He concludes his Argument with a Compliment, and Expreſſions of the high eſteem and reſpect that he had for St. Jerome: he approves of his Tranſlation of the Scripture, propoſing withal ſome objections concerning the Correction of the Hebrew Text, repreſenting the difficulty of having his new Tranſlation publickly read to People, who were accuſtomed to that, from the Septuagint, which was authorized by the Apoſtles themſelves, who made uſe of it.

The Argument of the eighty third Letter, as it is explained by the Tranſlator, is this; The Men of Thiana having renounced the Donatiſts Schiſm, they wanted a Prieſt to govern them: One Honoratus was choſen, and for that purpoſe taken out of the Monaſtery at Tagaſta, and was Ordained Prieſt of Thiana. The Cuſtom was, that thoſe who enter'd into Monaſteries, did begin with parting with all they had, for the benefit of the Poor, or of the Monaſtery it ſelf: That if any offer'd to come in, that was not yet in a Condition to diſpoſe of his Eſtate, they refuſed him not, provided he was ſincerely reſolved to execute the Order as ſoon as he could. Honoratus was in this Condition, and Owner of his Eſtate when he was Ordained Prieſt of Thiana. The Queſtion was, who ſhould have this Eſtate? The Men of Thiana pretended to have it by the Rule of thoſe Times: That the Goods of ſuch as were Ordained Prieſts of any Church, ſhould be converted to the Uſe of that Church. Alypius, on the contrary, pretended, that Honoratus's Eſtate belonged to the Monaſtery of Tagaſta; and was afraid, that if the Church of Thiana had it, and it were look'd upon as Honoratus's Eſtate, that Example would ſerve for a Pretence to thoſe that ſhould come into Monaſteries, to deferr the parting with their Eſtates; wherefore, his Opinion was, that at leaſt they ſhould divide it, and that the Church of Thiana ſhould have but Half. St. Auguſtine tells him, that he was not of that mind, but deſireth him to Sign the Letter which he had written to the Church of Thiana; whereby he utterly renounced all Pretenſions upon Honoratus's Eſtate, and he proffers to return Half of it to the Monaſtery of Tagaſta, when any conſiderable Donation ſhould be conferred upon the Monaſtery of Hippo. This Letter is placed in the Year 405.

St. Auguſtine. Tome II.

In the Eighty fourth Letter, he excuſes himſelf towards Novatus, who is ſuppoſed to be the Biſhop of Sitifi, that was preſent at the Conference in Carthage,) for detaining Lucillius the Deacon, his Brother, becauſe he underſtood and ſpake the Punick Language well; the uſe whereof being common at Sitifi, and not at Hippo, it was eaſie for Novatus to find a Church-man in thoſe Parts, to Preach in that Tongue; whereas St. Auguſtine could not ſo readily meet with ſuch a One in his Country. Thus is this Letter to be underſtood, as the Tranſlator obſerveth, after a very Learned Man. It ſeems to belong to the ſame Year as the foregoing.

In the eighty fifth, St. Auguſtine reproves Paul of Catagnæ, for parting with his own Eſtate when he was made a Biſhop, that he might abuſe the Revenue of his Church, to live more at eaſe; telling him, that ſo long as he liveth thus, he will not communicate with him. In this Letter there is this excellent Advice; Non eſt Epiſcopatus Artificium tranſigendæ vitæ fallacis: 'Epiſcopacy ought not to be 'look'd upon as an Eſtabliſhment, or a Means to procure 'the deceitful Pleaſures of this Life.' This Paul being dead before the year 408. as is plain by the ninety ſixth Letter, this Letter muſt have been written about the Year 405.

In the eighty ſixth, he ſolliciteth Cæcilian Governour of Numidia, to reſtrain the Donatiſts about Hippo, as he had done in other Places under his Government. It was written after the Edict of Honorius, of the year 403. before Cæcilianus was created Præfectus Prætorio, in the Year 409.

In the eighty ſeventh Letter, that was written about the ſame time, St. Auguſtine preſſes Emeritus, a Donatiſt Biſhop at Cæſarea, to tell the Reaſons which made him ſeparate from the Church; and refuteth thoſe wich he uſed to alledge.

The eighty eighth was written by St. Auguſtine, in the Name of the Clergy of Hippo, to Januarius, a Donatiſt Biſhop, after the Donatiſts Deputies, that were ſent in 406. to the Emperors, were rejected. It contains ſeveral Complaints againſt the Violences of ſome Donatiſt Clerks; and the authentick Acts of what happen'd in Conſtantine's time, concerning the buſineſs of the Donatiſts. About the end of the Letter, they propoſe a Conference.

The eighty ninth Letter, to Feſtus, is much upon the the ſame Subject. St. Auguſtine begins, by juſtifying the Emperor's Edicts againſt the Donatiſts: Then he relates the Original of that Schiſm, and the Judgments whereby it was condemned. He proves, that the Donatiſts had no Grounds for their Separation, nor for Re-baptizing Catholicks. Laſtly, He giveth Feſtus notice, that the People about Hippo ſtill perſiſted in the Schiſm, notwithſtanding his Letters, and continued their Violences.
